VOL. IX.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1831.

No. 1.

WE give the following verbatim as we received it, and feel ourselves indebted to the writer for his ingenious and amusing favor.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

GENTLEMEN—In reply to your note, reminding me of my promise to contribute for your journal, I have prepared the enclosed, which, as you will perceive, is intended for the opening of your new volume. I need not here assure you of the sincere interest with which I have regarded the Mirror, and the pleasure I have experienced in its success. I will endeavor, for the future, to be a more regular correspondent. Make whatever alterations you think necessary. With best wishes, I remain yours sincerely.

THE NINTH ANNIVERSARY.

A DRAMATIC MEDLEY—IN ONE ACT.

Dramatis personæ.

IMMORTALS.

APOLLO, patron of all the fine arts.
Clio, the muse presiding over history.
Euterpe, the muse presiding over music.
Thalia, the muse presiding over comic poetry.
Melpomene, the muse presiding over tragedy.
Terpsichore, the muse presiding over dancing.
Erato, the muse presiding over lyric and tender poetry.
Polyhymnia, the muse presiding over singing and rhetoric.
Calliope, the muse presiding over epic poetry.
Urania, the muse presiding over astronomy.
Cupid, apparitions, &c.

MORTALS.

FIRST EDITOR, SECOND EDITOR, COLLECTOR, LIBRARIAN, and PETER the printer's devil, &c.

SCENE I. The Battery by moonlight. Music in Castle garden. Enter three muses, viz. POLYHYMNIA, ERATO, and TERPSICHOE.

Pol.—When shall we three meet again,
In honor of the Mirror's reign?
Era.—When the present volume's done,
When the NINTH is number one.
Terps.—That won't be till June has run.
Pol.—Where the place?
Era.—Within the Park.
Terps.—There to meet with Era.—M—s.
Terps.—Hark!
Pol.—I come, Euterpe.
Era.—Clio calls,
From the Castle garden walls.
All.—Fair or foul, we pay no fare,
Hover o'er the bridge, and through the air.
[Exeunt into Castle garden, and out of the port holes.]

SCENE II. The Park. Evening. Moon-light. Theatre lighted up. Music in Peale's Museum. Enter EUTERPE, THALIA, and CLIO.

Eut.—Where hast thou been, sister, say?
Tha.—Strolling up and down Broadway,
Stripping vice of its disguise,
Shooting folly as it flies;
Pauding now demands my aid,
That's a call I can't evade.
Hallock asks no favors, bless him!
All the sisters so caress him.
Cor, you know, in Albion's Isle
Waits for my inspiring smile;
Thither in a shell I'll sail,
Banneted with a peacock's tail;
He will folly's emblem view,
And then he'll do, he'll do, he'll do!
Eut.—I'll give thee a favoring wind.
Tha.—Thank thee, sister, thou art kind.
Clio.—I'll supply thee with another.
Tha.—I myself have all the other.
Where hast thou been with thy flute?
Eut.—Austin's voice has kept it mute;
For I cannot wake such tones
As Cinderella breathes with Jones.
Brichia, Gillingham, and Knight,
Fill their hearers with delight;
Feron, George, and tuncful Poole,
Pupils of a Sterling school,
All have won such high repute,
I've a mind to break my flute!
All that I can now pretend,
Is their sweetest airs to blend,
Copied weekly from the stage
For the Mirror's music page.
Tha.—Where hast thou been, sister Clio?
Clio.—In the classic Isle of Scio,
Gathering facts to form a story
Of Moslem hate and Grecian glory;
Present times and former ages,
Fit to grace the Mirror's pages.
Buried archives, deep and loamy—
Look what I have!
Tha.—Show me! show me!
Clio.—Here I have Minerva's thumb,
Dug from Heraculeum.
Eut.—Be dumb! be dumb! our sisters come!
Enter POLYHYMNIA, ERATO, and TERPSICHOE. All join hands and sing in chorus:
Aonian sisters, hand in hand,
Thus shall bless Columbia's land,
Where they go about, about,
Inviting native talent out.

Pol.—Volume eighth its course has run.

Era.—Volume NINE.

Terp.—Has just begun.

Enter MELPOMENE, CALLIOPE, and URANIA.

Eut.—Thrice to thine,

Cal.—And thrice to mine,

Ura.—And thrice again,

All.—To make up NINE.

Clio.—Peace! the charms wound up.

Enter 1st and 2nd EDITORS, reading communications by moonlight.

1st Ed.—Here let us halt a moment on the green.

So foul and fair a scroll I have not seen.

2nd Ed.—How far is't called to Flushing? What are

So strange in their attire—yet formed to please;

That look not like the belles of gay Broadway,

And yet are near it! Ladies, if I may

So far presume, I beg that you'll command me

In any thing. You seem to understand me!

Mortal or not, you know what I am saying

By each at once her taper finger laying

Upon her lips. As females you appear,

And yet your silence baffles that idea.

1st Ed.—Speak, if you can! What are you? Why de-

Clio.—All hail the Mirror's senior editor!

Tha.—All hail to thee, whose fame shall long exist!

Eut.—A thousand names are added to thy list!

Mel.—All hail to thee, who shalt be rich as Ceresus!

2nd Ed.—Why do you start, good sir, at what should

(to the muses) please us?

Are ye fantastical, I fain would know?

Or 't'hat indeed which outwardly ye show?

You greet my partner, here, with present fee,

And great prediction: why not speak to me?

Who neither beg nor fear your love nor hate.

All.—Hail! lesser than thy partner, yet more great!

Cl.—Thou shalt have fame that ne'er can fade or fall,

All.—So all hail M—s, F—y and M—s hail!

I know that I am senior editor;

But as to fame, and wealth, and all the rest,

The thousand names which you have just exprest,

Stand not within the prospect of belief,

No more than to be rich as Lydia's chief.

How know you this? or why, here, after dark,

Stop you our way in this triangled Park,

With such prophetic greeting in our path, [they vanish]

2nd Ed.—The earth hath bubbles, as the water hath.

And these are of them. Whither did they fly?

1st Ed.—Into the air, or theatre, just by;

Would they had staid and told their story out. [about?]

2nd Ed.—Went such things here as we do speak

Or have we breathed exhilarating gas,

And merely dream that such things came to pass?

1st Ed.—Why I fancy shall still increase.

2nd Ed.—T'hy wealth shall grow.

1st Ed.—And reputation too; went it not so?

2nd Ed.—To the self-same tune and words. Whom have we here?

Enter COLLECTOR, in haste.

Col.—The news of my success will charm thine ear.

One thousand new subscribers swell our list,

Which still increases, and they all insist

On paying in advance. There's the amount,

Which you will find correct, sir, if you count.

2nd Ed.—What! can their words be true? [aside]

1st Ed.—Sir, you are kind. [musing]

Thanks for your pains—the greatest is behind.

Wealthy as Ceresus! the hope within me stirs

Our children's children may be editors!

Two truths are told—the one a golden fact,

As happy prologues to the swelling act.

2nd Ed.—Look how our partner's rapt.

1st Ed.—Come what, come may,

Time and the hour run thro' the roughest day. [Exeunt]

SCENE III. The Battery. Evening. Enter the NINE muses.

Clio.—Speak, sister, speak! Is the deed done?

Tha.—Long ago—long ago;

'Tis volume NINE and number one.

Era.—Great acts are seldom slow,

Nor single; new ideas on former wait,

The brightest thoughts the fastest propagate.

CHORUS.

Many more volumes must this one ensue:

New pictures will abound,

And elegance surround,

As if in plates were found

Propagation too.

Clio.—He must,

Tha.—He shall,

Eut.—He will spillink a flood,

And labor hard to make his title good.

Chorus.—He must, he shall, he will, &c.

Terp.—Now let us dance.

Tha.—Agreed.

Eut.—Agreed.

Chorus.—We should rejoice when books succeed.

Clio.—When poets woo, what should we do?

When freedom's voice in thunder

Bends tyrants' chains asunder,

And fills the world with wonder,

What should we do?

Chorus.—Rejoice—we should rejoice.

Tha.—When genius, bold and daring,

The laurel wreath is wearing,

While ignorance flies despairing,

What should we do?

Chorus.—Rejoice—we should rejoice.

Enter APOLLO, in a rage.

Tha.—How now, Apollo! what's the matter now?

There seems to be a cloud upon thy brow.

Pol.—Have I not reason, modellers as you are,

Saucy and overbold? How did you dare

To trade and traffic, after dark,

With F—y and M—s in the Park,

And I the leader of your choir,

"The bright-haired master of the lyre,"

Was never called to bear my part,

Or show the glory of our art?

But make amends now; get you gone,

And meet me there to-morrow morn;

From thence we'll go to Clinton-hall,

Where I expect you, one and all.

Your vessels and your spells provide,

Your charms, and every thing beside.

I'm for the air; this night I'll spend

To show that I'm the Mirror's friend.

APOLLO hands TERPSICHOE into the car of a balloon, just then inflated; the cord is cut, and they slowly ascend, singing:

Now we go, and now we fly,

Sweet Terpsichore and I.

O what a dainty pleasure's this!

To sail in the air,

Along with the fair;

To sing, to toy, to dance, and kiss.

Over woods, rail-roads, and mountains,

Over seas, canals, and fountains,

Over steeples, towers, and turrets,

We fly by night o'er poet's garrets.

Chorus.—We fly by night o'er poet's garrets.

APOLLO and TERPSICHOE ascend in a balloon, and pass over the city just as the clock on the hall ought to strike twelve. The rest of the muses form a dance on the Battery, and then disperse.

SCENE IV. Clinton-hall Library. Sunrise. In the centre,

the magic urn. Enter the NINE muses. Music.

Clio.—Thrice has quarter day been round.

Tha.—Thrice and once has S—s called.

Eut.—T—s a cry, 'tis time, 'tis time!

Clio.—Round about the urn we'll go,

In our contributions throw;

All who wish to aid the Mirror,

Quickly bring your offerings hither.

Works by genius wrought upon,

Days and nights full many a one;

Pictures brought from gallery wall,

Arcade bath, and City-hall;

Fancy's sketch and faithful view,

History's scenes and portraits too;

All your wonted treasures bring,

On this NINTH year's opening;

Thoughts that breathe, and words that burn,

Bring them to the charmed urn.

Chorus.—Taste and genius shall combine

To embellish volume NINE.

Euterpe.—Novel, romance, moral tale,

Female fancy to regale;

Essay grave, and satire keen,

Strictures on the drama's scene;

Female manners, dress, and beauty,

With some hints of moral duty;

March of sciences and arts,

Letters sent from foreign parts;

Travels over land and sea,

Sketches of biography;

Weekly literary news,

Candid, liberal reviews;

Fairy tale, and mirthful sketch,

All that's useful hither fetch.

All your wonted treasure bring

On this NINTH year's opening;

Thoughts that breathe, and words that burn,

Bring them to the charmed urn.

Chorus.—Taste and genius shall combine

To embellish volume NINE.

Tha.—Native scenery, grand or fair,

By our tourists sketched with care;

Mountains, cataracts, and springs,

All that mark their journeyings;

New inventions as they rise,

Aphorisms of the wise,

Fresh discoveries of note,

Great improvements just afloat;

Reminiscences of things

Fled on time's unwearied wings;

Curious legends and relations,

Known to former generations,

(When the Park was out of town)

By their children handed down;

Newest fashions as they pass,

Poetry of every class;

Anecdote and humor chaste,

Polished wit for ears of taste;

Weekly list of strange events,

Current facts and incidents.

All your wonted treasures bring,

On this NINTH year's opening.

Thoughts that breathe, and words that burn,

Bring them to the charmed urn.

Chorus.—Taste and genius shall combine

To embellish volume NINE.

Enter APOLLO.

O well done! I commend your pains,

For nothing's lost the Mirror gains.

And now about the urn we'll sing,

Like elves and fairies in a ring,

Enchanting all that we put in.

SONG.

Grave essays and light,

Sad stories and gay,

Mingle, mingle, mingle,

You that mingle may.

Pol.—Sedley, Sedley, aid the medley.

Terp.—Wit of Pauding, sharp and scolding.

Era.—Verse of Palmer, that's a charmer.

Mel.—Tale from Leggett, readers beg it.

Chorus.—Around, around, around, about, about,

Put in the good, and keep the others out.

Tha.—Pauding's Dutch and Yankee chat,

Apot.—Put in that—put in that.

Ura.—Here's Butler's brain.

Apot.—Put in a grain.

Tha.—Here is Cor's latest letter,

That will please the reader better.

Apot.—Put in all these, 'twill raise its worth the higher.

Hold! here's three stanzas from Ianthe's lyre.

Chorus.—Around, around, around, about, about,

Put in the good, and keep the others out.

Apot.—By the pricking of my thumbs,

Something sentimental comes.

Open locks, whoever knocks.

Enter LIBRARIAN, with a pocket.

Era.—What have you there? Show me—show me!

Say, is it prose or poetry? [Exit Librarian.]

Oh, I perceive, there's both. Who sent

This bucket-full of sentiment?

Pious thoughts and moral feeling,

Tender wishes, hopes revealing;

Home's enjoyments, pastoral pleasure.

Apot.—Pour it in—'tis Woodworth's measure.

Chorus.—Around, around, around, about, about,

City view, and rural chart;
Leave them all to tasteful Weir,
He will see that they appear.
Though we highly prize such treasures,
They must yield to music's measures;
For our spells are not complete
Till we add an art so sweet.

But—Let the grateful task be mine—
Haydn's splendor here shall shine;
Handel's solemn grandeur roll,
Weber's horrors fright the soul;
Sweet Rossini's strains that move
E'en the sternest hearts to love,
With the grave Mozart's combined,
Here shall charm the ear and mind;
While a thousand more, in turn,
Shall contribute to the urn.

Apol.—Such shall be our spells of power,
Meet for chamber, hall, or bower;
So our labors we conclude,
Now the charm is firm and good.

All.—Hail to those whose kind assistance
Gave our protégé existence;
Hail to those who with renown
Did its earliest labors crown;
Hail to those who now may grace
Its prouder rank and prosperous race.
Hail to all, whose generous aid
Has a sure foundation laid,
On which the Mirror long shall stand,
Reflecting light throughout the land.
While your smiles our labors cheer
Through another rolling year,
We will go about, about,
Drawing native talent out.
Thrice to thine, and thrice to mine,
And thrice again to make up mine.
Peace! the charm's wound up.

[Exit Apollo.]

Enter First Editor.

1st Ed.—How now, you promisers of wealth and fame!
What is't you do?

All.—A deed without a name.

1st Ed.—I conjure you by that which you foresee,
Howe'er you come to know it, answer me,
To what I ask you.

Clio.—Speak.

Tha.—Demand.

Terp.—We'll answer.

1st Ed.—The Mirror's fate? thou dancing necro-Clio.—Wouldst know it from our mouths, or from our master's?

1st Ed.—Conjure them up—let's see these poetasters.
Clio.—Pour in the milk of roses, and the dew
Gathered by star-light when the moon was new;
Nine pearly drops from Helicon's spring,
With gold-dust shaken from a humbird's wing.

All.—Come, high or low,

Thyself and office deftly show.

[music.]

First Apparition, the genius of the Port-Folio.

1st Ed.—Tell me, thou well-known power—

Clio.—He knows thy thought,

Hear his speech, but say thou nought.

App.—Beware of politics! avoid such stuff;
Beware of party strife! I've said enough. [descends.]

1st Ed.—What'er thou art, for thy good caution, thanks!

Thou'lt harp'd my fear aright—we'll shun their ranks.
But one word more.

Clio.—He will not be commanded:

Here comes another—less polite, but candid.

Second Apparition, the genius of the Analectic Magazine.

App.—Attend! attend! attend!

1st Ed.—Had I three ears I'd hear thee to an end.

App.—Be liberal, mild, but manly—laugh to scorn
The shafts of envy; there's no journal born
Can harm the Mirror with its present talent. [descends.]

1st Ed.—Then let them live.

Third Apparition, genius of the Literary Casket, and Pocket Magazine.

1st Ed.—But who is this young gallant

Of baby stature?

All.—Listen, but speak not;

He, like the others, knows thy every thought.

App.—Be independent, firm, and take no care
Who chafes, who frets, or where detractors are:
The Mirror must be prosperous until Inferior scribblers all its columns fill;
Till every tasteless duncie shall weekly see
His nonsense in it. [descends.]

1st Ed.—That will never be,
Sweet bodeomens good! I thank you! yet my heart
Throbs to know one thing. Tell me, if your art
Can tell so much, of years how many score,
How many volumes—

All.—Seek to know no more.

1st Ed.—I will be satisfied. Deny me this,
And you embitter all my promised bliss.

All.—Show his eyes, and please his heart,
Come like shadows, so depart. [music.]

A procession of cupids, each bearing a volume of the Mirror, elegantly bound and lettered, followed by the "LITTLE GENIUS," with his magical glass. As the NINTH volume passes, the Editor speaks.

1st Ed.—Thou art too like the eighth to be mistook.
Thy gilding cheers my eyeballs; and thy look,
Thou other gold-bound book, is like the rest;
The twelfth is like the former! Be ye blest
For showing this! A fourteenth! still in bloom!
What! will the line stretch out to the crack of doom!
Another yet! Ha! eighteenth! nineteenth! twentieth!
All bound and lettered too, with gilding plenty!
And there's the Little Genius with a glass
Which shows me many others yet to pass!
Delightful prospect! [music—musics vanish.]

The scene suddenly changes to the Editor's closet, where the 1st Editor appears seated in an arm-chair, rubbing his eyes. PETER, the printer's devil, stands at his elbow.

1st Ed.—Well, what is it, Peter? [metre]

Dev.—The printer says there's neither rhyme nor in that thou sonnet to a lady's sandal;
And bade me tell you that the piece on scandal is not well pointed. We're now standing still
For want of copy.

1st Ed.—That's impossible! [columns.]

Dev.—We've not a line, sir, and are short two

1st Ed.—Well, here's enough to fill a dozen volumes,
I'll be in this urn. Ha! where the dickens is it?
Saw you those girls that just made me a visit,
And left me in such haste?

Dev.—I met with none.

When I came in, sir, you were all alone,
And sound asleep too, till you heard me call.

1st Ed.—Oh! was it but a dream then, after all!

And waiting too for copy! from this hour
I'll not rely on any fabled power,
But on myself alone; that which the Mirror
Promised in sleep, shall seeking yet be mine.
I'll win the prize; no boasting like a fool,
This deed I'll do before my purpose cool.

[writes.]

Enter Collector.

Coll.—Sir, since you ridiculed that dinner caper,
A. B. and C. have bid me stop their paper.
1st Ed.—Bring me no more reports! let them fly all,
Till dunces fill our columns we can't fall.
The hand I write with, and the heart I bear,
Shall never sag with doubt, nor shake with fear;
I'll write till fingers, head, and sinews ache,
Give me some paper—now I'm wide awake.
Send out more agents; scour the country round;
Stop those that talk of stopping; there'll be found
Enough without them. Take this copy, Peter,
For volume NINE. Say, is it larger—neater?
False-hearted cravens—here's another lot;
Throw sonnets to the dogs, we want them not.

Enter Second Editor. [Exit devil.]

1st Ed.—Of all men else I have so wished for thee;
But sit thee down; my fingers, as you see,
Are stained with ink. A column's wanted still.

2nd Ed.—I have no words—my voice is in my quill.
1st Ed.—Then lay on, F—y, at essay, tale, or puff,
Till Peter re-appears, and cries—enough!

LITERARY NOTICES.

Familiar Lectures on Botany; including practical and elementary Botany, with generic and specific descriptions of the most common native and foreign plants, and a vocabulary of botanical terms. For the use of higher schools and academies. By Mrs. Almira H. Lincoln, vice-principal of Troy Female Seminary. Second edition. 12mo. pp. 428. Hartford: H. & F. J. Huntington. 1831.

MRS. LINCOLN here presents a charming series of lectures upon one of the most agreeable of the sciences, and one most appropriate and attractive to the youthful mind. The subject has been strangely neglected by our institutions of learning, and it is creditable to the author of the present excellent treatise, that she should have detected a deficiency in the generally practised systems of education, and afford means of an immediate remedy. She appears competent to the task she has undertaken. The familiar lectures on botany form one of several valuable publications which have issued from the Troy female seminary, and, among the rest, impresses us with a high opinion of the academy whence it emanates. We trust it is in general use. A better book to place in the hands of the young, we have not seen for many a day. The science of botany is indeed "beautiful and delicate," and, as the writer observes in her introduction, "its pursuits, leading to exercise in the open air, are conducive to health and cheerfulness. It is not a sedentary study, which can be acquired in the library, but its objects are scattered over the surface of the earth, along the banks of the winding brooks, on the borders of precipices, the sides of mountains, and in the depths of the forest." We should esteem that youthful mind dull or naturally vicious, indeed, which could be led through the graceful details compressed in this modest and useful volume, without being interested, amused and elevated. It literally strews the path of learning with flowers. We give an extract as a specimen of the wholesome matter conveyed to the student. Some instances of inaccuracy in style might have been avoided, but they are slight, and may easily be corrected in future editions.

"SOME OF THE USES OF LEAVES.—Leaves perform a very important office, in sheltering and protecting the flowers and fruit; the fact of their inhaling or absorbing air, is thought to have been proved, by placing a plant under an exhausted receiver, permitting the leaves only to receive the influence of air; the plant remained thrifty in this situation for a length of time; but as soon as the whole plant was placed under the receiver, it withered and died."

"The upper surface of leaves, usually of a deeper green, is supposed to perform a more important part in respiration, than the under surface. The upper surface is also thought to repel moisture; as you may perceive upon a cabbage leaf after a shower or heavy dew, that the moisture is collected in drops, but has no appearance of being absorbed by the leaf. It has been found that the leaves of plants, laid with their upper surface upon the water, wither almost as soon as if exposed to the air; although the leaves of the same plant, placed with their under surfaces upon the water, retain their freshness for some days. But few plants among the vegetable tribes are destitute of leaves, or green stems, which answer as a substitute. The Monotropa, or Indian pipe, is of a pure white, as if made of wax; the mushrooms are also destitute of any green herbage. It is not known in what manner the deficiency of leaves is made up to these vegetables.

* I give this experiment on the authority of Barton; but although the respiration of leaves seems not to be doubted, this experiment may not be thought a fair one; for it would seem very difficult, to place a plant under a receiver, with the leaves exposed to the air, without at the same time admitting any air into the receiver.

"The period in which any species of plant unfolds its leaves, is termed its frondescence. Linnaeus paid much attention to this subject; he stated as the result of his investigations that the opening of the leaf buds of the birch tree, (Betula), was the most proper time for the sowing of barley. The Indians of our country had an opinion, that the best time for planting Indian corn, was when the leaves of the white oak, (QUERCUS alba), first made their appearance; or, according to their expression, are of the size of a squirrel's ears.

"One of the most remarkable phenomena of leaves, is their irritability, or power of contraction, upon coming in contact with other substances. Compound leaves possess this property in the greatest degree; as the sensitive plant, MIMOSA sensitiva; and the American sensitive plant, CASSIA nitida; these plants on holding the hand near them, exhibit agitation, yet as they are destitute of intelligence, we must attribute this phenomenon to a physical cause; this cause is probably the warmth of the hand, which in some manner not understood by us, produces the contractions, and dilations of the leaves.

"The effect of light upon the leaves is very apparent, as plants are almost uniformly found to present their upper surfaces to the side on which the greatest quantity of light is to be found. It has already been observed that plants throw off oxygen gas; but for this purpose they require the agency of light. Oxygen exists in plants united with carbon, forming carbonic acid gas; by the agency of light, the oxygen is separated from the carbon, the latter is incorporated into the substance of the vegetable, while the former is exhaled by the leaves.

"Many plants close their leaves at a certain period of the day, and open them at another regular period; almost every garden contains some plants, in which this phenomenon may be observed; it is particularly remarkable in the sensitive plant and the tamarind tree. This folding up of the leaves at particular periods, has been termed the sleep of plants; a celebrated botanist* remarks, 'this folding up of the leaves may be as useful to the vegetable constitution, as real sleep is to the animal.' Linnaeus was led to observe the appearance of plants in the night, from a circumstance which occurred in raising the Lotus plant; he found one morning some very thrifty flowers, but at night they had disappeared; this excited his attention, and he began to watch the plants through the night, in order to observe the period of their unfolding. He was thus led to investigate the appearance of other plants in the night, and to observe their different manner of sleep; some folding their leaves together, others throwing them back upon their stems, and exhibiting a variety of appearances. This phenomenon has been attributed to the absence of light. A curious experiment has been made by another botanist, who placed the sensitive plant in a dark cave at midnight, and then lighted up the cave with lamps; the leaves which were before folded up, suddenly expanded, and when on the following day the lights were extinguished, the leaves again closed.

"The period at which the leaves fall off is termed the defoliation of the plant; about the middle of autumn, the leaves of all annual, and of many perennial plants, gradually lose their vigor, change their color, and at length fall from their stems.

"The 'fall of the leaf' may be referred to two causes; the death of the leaf, and the vital action of the parts to which it is attached. If a whole tree is killed by lightning, or any sudden cause, the leaves will adhere to the dead branches, the latter not having the energy to cast them off. The richness and variety of coloring exhibited about the end of autumn, by our groves and forests, is splendid beyond the power of the painter to imitate. Yellow, red, and brown, are the most common colors of the dying leaf; but these colors vary from the brightest scarlet, and the deepest crimson, intermixed with every shade of yellow, from the deep orange, to the pale straw color.

"Although we have said considerable upon leaves, yet we have merely touched upon the most important circumstances with respect to them. You will, perhaps, be induced to pay more attention than formerly to them, in their different stages; from their situation in the bud, to their full growth and perfection; and will feel a new interest in their change of color, when you understand something of the philosophy of this change; even the dry skeletons of leaves, which the blasts of autumn strew around us, may not only afford a direct moral lesson, but, inducing you to examine their structure, lead you to admire and adore the power which formed them."

The work contains a number of well executed plates, and judicious poetic selections. We may confidently insure success to the fair classes to be conducted through this study by so intelligent a lecturer, who brings a clear, correct, and occasionally eloquent style, to aid poetry and engraving in delighting the mind, and instructing it in the wonderful design and beautiful skill of nature, which thus

"In its case,
Russet and rude, folds up the tender germ,
Uninjured, with inimitable art;
And ere one flowery season fades and dies,
Designs the blooming wonders of the next."

Narrative of the War in Germany and France in 1813 and 1814. By Lieut. General Charles William Vane, Marquis of Londonderry, G. C. B. G. C. H., Colonel of the tenth Royal Hussars. 12mo. pp. 320. Philadelphia: Cary & Lea. 1831.

THIS is the first of a series of works published by Cary & Lea, under the title of Cabinet Library. The succeeding numbers will appear monthly. The present volume is full of interesting and well authenticated events which preceded the fall of Napoleon. The reader will be both instructed and gratified by a perusal. The following appears in the appendix as the extract from a private letter.

"If I had had my will, or any responsibility, I should certainly have despatched a messenger to England as soon as the news of Napoleon's flight reached this capital, in order to have put you in possession of the sensations this event has occasioned here, with the speculations it has given rise to, and the probable effect it will have on our still pending operations in Congress.

"Before I send off this letter, however, it is probable that many of my hypotheses may be at an end, by the destination of this singular man being ascertained. Nevertheless, to give you the conversation now current here, cannot be entirely uninteresting. It happened that Lord Burghersh's aide-de-camp, Captain Aubin, arrived in Vienna on the day of one of the fêtes at court. He was the first proclaimer of the startling news; and Metternich was so alarmed, that he would willingly have kept it secret, at least for that night, in order not to throw a sudden gloom over the representations du Théâtre Royal at court. However, as the populace in the town, and the cabarets had got possession of the intelligence, all notion of keeping the matter concealed was soon at an end. A conference was sitting the same day, with reference, I believe, to the mode of dealing with the king of Saxony. At this meeting the event of the escape came under discussion; and I understand there was an idea of a meeting of the eight Powers, to come to some sort of a declaration or sentiment of general and united hostility on the event.

"Whether it was afterwards considered that this had better be deferred until it was known where the game was to be found, or whether it was deemed imprudent to sound the tocsin too soon, I know not; but I understood the above notion was given up, and the Duke of Wellington, Metternich, and Talleyrand, set out to conduct their negotiation with the king of Saxony, at Presburg, yesterday, as if nothing had occurred. It is almost difficult to describe to you the various impressions produced on the circle at court by the intelligence of the day. Some, with a degree of seeming indifference and jest, expressed blame and surprise that the English could have let him escape from Elba, the custody of him at that island having been confided to them. Others blustered and rejoiced at it, as an auspicious accident, that must bring all disagreeable differences to a close. Others again dreaded the possible breaking out of a civil war in France, and of the renewed bloodshed and tumult, of which Napoleon's appearance in France would be the forerunner; and finally, others speculated on Bonaparte's having made common cause with Murat to rescue the kingdom of Italy.

"It is however, too true, that the present apparent quixotical expedition from the land of Elba occasions a general and indescribable expression of fear in every quarter, that their best efforts cannot conceal. I understand that all the great men laughed on reading Lord Burghersh's despatch;

* Sir J. E. Smith. † Or depriving of leaves.

but next to the smile, I believe apprehension and alarm existed to an inordinate degree. Lord Wellington did not see the emperor before the ball and play took place at court. The duke, I understand, was very much satisfied with the emperor of Russia's expressions. It seemed a moment for a general rally, and renewed pledges of union against a common danger. If the phoenix should again rise out of its ashes in Europe, whatever were the difficulties among ourselves, the emperor declared that we must unite more firmly than ever against any new efforts made by Napoleon; and that we ought now to exert every nerve to carry into the speediest effect all the remaining stipulations relative to the treaty of Paris.

"When the emperor approached Talleyrand, and observed on the curious fact that of the bird having escaped from his cage, which he believed would not have occurred if France had made the payments as stipulated by treaty, Talleyrand is said to have asked him jocosely, if his imperial majesty would pay in March what was not due till May."

"I was not in the way when the last messenger was despatched, and therefore missed the opportunity of writing. To-day's intelligence has confirmed Napoleon's entry into Paris—his nomination of his ministry—the king's flight to Lisle—his safe journey as far as Peronne, and all the other details, which you will have heard before this reaches you. Prince Metternich read his accounts at the conference to-night, up to the twenty-first. Nothing can be worse; and there is a gloom here quite indescribable; it is a most wonderful change in one short month. It may be divided into three acts—Buonaparte lands, his attempt is ridiculed, and it is supposed the measures of the police and the first troops that meet him, will put an end to him—His entry into Lyons next announces that the whole French army are with him, and opposed to the nation—The last act of his arrival at Paris shows that nearly all France is under his influence; and we must not deceive ourselves in thinking we have an easy task before us. It is true the nation are unaccountable in their acts and feelings; for Ney's renewing his oath of fidelity perplexes sadly a well-regulated honorable mind; and one is lost in amazement at the repeated instances of infidelity in the military chiefs."

The work is rendered more valuable by a fine map of Germany, as divided according to the treaty of Paris, and the acts of the congress of Vienna.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

A SKETCH.

I HAD ridden two hundred miles without intermission, and yet felt no fatigue. As I approached the habitation that contained my all in this world—my Mary—I urged my good steed yet the more. "Forward, my bonny bay," said I; "bear me swiftly to her I love, and soft shall be your repose."

At the distance of two miles from the dwelling, I was to pass a small summer-house, in which we had been accustomed to spend much of our time. "Perhaps," said I, "she may have come thus far to meet me." I alighted, and entered. It was empty. I sat down for a moment by the table, and amused myself with conjecturing from the situation of the books and papers, what had been her employment. Here was a music-book, with a part of an air copied into it, the original lying by its side. There was a volume of poetry, with a piece of pink ribbon placed between the leaves, to mark where the reader finished. On the floor, around the chair in which I sat, were strewn leaves of roses, which I indulged myself in supposing she had picked to pieces in a reverie, in which I formed a prominent figure. In indulging myself in these and the like speculations I crossed my arms upon the table, and dropped my head upon them, unconsciously yielding myself to all the fascination of a lover's reverie.

How long I sat in this position I do not know, but a quick step at the door attracted my attention, and I looked up to see the entrance of her who was uppermost in my thoughts, even my own Mary. I sprang to meet her; I printed a thousand kisses on her hand; I asked her a hundred questions in a breath, and, without staying for an answer, heaped another hundred upon them.

"Sit down," said Mary, "and talk lower, and I'll tell you all you want to know."

"What, all? all? Will you tell me that you love me—that you are mine—that you will name the day that shall make me happier than all the world beside? Will you tell me all this, Mary?"

"All this!" said she, blushing rosyly; "and pray, sir, by what claim do you call on me to be so communicative?"

"By what claim? By years of affection, of undoubting love; by days and nights spent in thinking of you, and endeavoring to deserve you; by a heart wholly and solely devoted to you; by your intimation that I was not hateful to you; by—"

"Foolish jealousy, when I danced with Frederick, or laughed at Henry; by teasing attentions one day, and cold neglect the next; by—"

"How could I help it? Would the miser see, with calm indifference, the hand extended to deprive him of his treasure?"

"But he need not tremble and turn pale if one by accident looked at the chest which contained it."

"He dreads that others appreciate it as well as himself; and my fear of losing my treasure shows how highly I value it. But may I not hope for a happiness beyond the miser's? His treasure is unsusceptible of emotion, and cannot return the affectionate regard he has for it. May I not hope that mine is of a different character, and can not only inspire but feel affection?"

"How ingenious is a lover in turning every avenue of conversation to one centre, like converging paths in a lawn; and like them, too, often terminating at a chapel?"

"Nay—"

"Nay, say I too—and let me have my say, and I will be serious, in spite of your piteous looks. I will be frank enough to say, that I do not resemble the miser's treasure."

"Thanks, ten thousand thanks for the dear avowal. Years of affection shall testify my gratitude; and now only name a day, an early day, on which you will make assurance doubly sure?"

"The day—what signifies the day—nay, if you will be importunate, what say you to next Thursday two years?"

"Two centuries?"

"One year?"

"An age!"

"Six months?"

"Six lives!"

"Three months?"

"Three years!"

"Say for yourself, then!" with affected pettishness.

"Next Thursday?"

"Too soon?"

"Next Thursday sevennight?"

"Seven minutes?"

"Come, affection, have done. It shall be next Thursday."

"It shall! Very peremptory! But, as I mean to be disobedient ever after, I will be obedient before, and submit to your superior judgment."

I had been married about a year when business called me to leave home for a season. It was with some reluctance I consented to do so, as my Mary seemed to show symptoms of disease, to me very alarming. I was, however, prevailed on by her requests and her ridicule to go. The business on which I set out detained me longer than I anticipated; and I had no intelligence from my wife for more than a fortnight, on the day when I started on my return. It will be supposed I was eager to get home; and indeed my anxiety led me to travel day and night, so that I arrived—in season to see her whom I loved, and with whom I had anticipated many happy years, breathe her last breath, unconscious of the presence of one whose heart was broken by that event.

I will not attempt to describe my feelings.—Those who have experienced such can imagine them; to those who have not, no words will be adequate to describe them. I can only speak of their effects. I embraced the lifeless form. I even strained it to my breast, as if by so doing I could impart to it a portion of the vital warmth which was well nigh hateful to me. I called upon the dead Mary by all the names of affection that I had at command. I cursed the occupations that had carried me away, and my own easy disposition, which had allowed me to be persuaded to go against my will. I avowed my determination to join her even in death, and raised the weapon aloft to stab myself to the heart, when my arm was arrested, and my attention awakened, by the voice of the very Mary I was lamenting, saying,

"Hold, George! How came you here, and why are you brandishing that pen about so furiously?"

Don't you see it all, reader? Watching and riding had made me sleepy. When I laid my head on my arms, I fell asleep; in my sleep I dreamed, in my dream I gesticulated. I laid aside the pen, which I had unconsciously seized, and could do no more than relate my dream, and press that it might in part prove true. My suit was granted.

It is now fourteen years since, and even now Mary asks me, as perhaps my readers may, if I will never have done brandishing pens.

THE DRAMA.

THE LYRICAL DRAMA.

THE Park theatre closed on Monday, and, as the present season has been "most musical," (we cannot add "most melancholy") a few observations on this subject, as well prospective as retrospective, may not be out of place at the present moment. Our musical readers will remember that in the early part of the season, the manager announced Cinderella as in rehearsal; but its appearance was postponed from day to day, in a most unprecedented manner, and the public at last began to suspect that the "mountain was about to produce a mouse." The worthy editors of this paper were accused by some sagacious Bostonian of being particeps criminis, for so frequently proclaiming its approach. The result, however, has proved that the manager felt perfectly aware of the responsibility he incurred in producing so difficult a piece, and the editors felt, likewise, as certain that the labor and time bestowed in getting it up would be recompensed by a community which has passed its novitiate in musical affairs. Cinderella has had a run of forty-five nights, and but for the severe indisposition of the prima donna, would probably ere this have arrived at its fiftieth. So much for pains-taking and a due respect for the public, on the part of the manager. It is remarkable that this piece has not been increased in value, to any great extent, by the arrival of strangers, who are the most general patrons of the drama in the spring, but has been supported chiefly by the amateurs of music in this city, many of whom have witnessed every representation, and some of whose names are to be found on the box book for twenty and thirty nights successively, thereby affording an example of good taste to other cities in the Union, and offering to Mr. Simpson the best encouragement to make future exertions in the same cause. In addition to this opera, we have had the Tempest, the Caliph of Bagdad, and John of Paris, by Boieldieu, with Artaxerxes, and Der Freischutz. The latter piece has had a reinforcement of devilry added to it, and the machinist and pyrotechnist (we admire the man of salt-petre and charcoal disguised under this sounding title) have not been idle. At the moment we are writing this article there is a patriot beneath our windows full of gin and glory, letting off a wheel, and alternately calling upon Simpson and Zamiel—a proof that Mr. Barry's exertions in this branch of the art have been also crowned with success. Il Don Giovanni, misnamed an opera, is nothing more than the old melo-drama of the Libertine, to which a few of Mozart's airs, and a chorus or two have been added. It was produced after Cinderella, and consequently the beautiful, but chaste and retiring nature of the music, was duly depreciated by the boldness and dash of such a selection of Rossini as preceded it. Having thus briefly noticed the proceedings of the late season, we may venture to inspect the probability held out to us for that which approaches. The band, which certainly has done itself credit by the neatness and precision with which it executed the music of Rossini, has had several valuable additions made to it, and some alterations have taken place which we conceive will tend considerably to its improvement; among the instruments named are a first clarinet and a trumpet. An organ is likewise about to be erected; its location, we understand, will be under the stage, the keys being near the centre of the orchestra. This expensive undertaking warrants us in believing the managers to be in earnest in their musical efforts. The opera of Massaniello, by Auber, has been for some time underlined in the bills as in rehearsal. Strong additions have been made to the music from adaptations of Rossini in place of interpolations by a Mr. Barham Swins, which were presented at Drury-lane—a change which we conceive to be much in our favor. Mr. Evers, the artist attached to the establishment, has been active in his department, and we have been favored with the sight of designs for the scenery of uncommon splendor and apparent effect. In short, we have every reason to believe that the lyrical drama will take a strong and decided stand next season at the Park theatre. We observe in a contemporary paper, the Albion, that music has taken the lead of all other branches of the drama in England. Our private information tallies, in every respect, with this statement. The inhabitants of Liverpool, Edinburgh, and Dublin, expect to have the musical novelties produced in London, placed before them with all their paraphernalia of band and chorus. No manager can hope for success with them who does not boldly incur this enormous expense. At these towns Massaniello has been got up, Der Freischutz, &c. &c.; but we have not observed that Cinderella has been yet attempted, although its run in London is unabated. B.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 114.

THE shadow rolled away from the glass, and I beheld Jupiter, seated upon his throne of clouds, surrounded by a conclave of the gods and goddesses. In the distance below, as from the earth, there was a sudden noise, and voices in loud exclamation. The father of men and gods bade Mercury seek out the cause of the clamor. The winged messenger returned with speed, and said,

"Sire, it is a dispute between a great poverty-stricken poet and an ignorant wealthy grocer. The grocer spurns the poet for his misery, and the latter curses thy decree."

"Bring them before us," said Jove. "By the Styx, Mercury, but thy bargain-driving children should have nothing to do with the favored of the muses."

In an instant the mortals stood before him. One of them was tall and pale-faced, with a flashing eye and hollow cheek. His apparel was earthly and thread-bare. The other was fat, and clothed with goodly garments. The combatants regarded each other in silence.

"My sons," said Jupiter, "what difference is between you?"

"He cursed thy decree," said the grocer, "and I rebuked him."

"Slave and fool," said the other, "thou rebuke me? Thou art unworthy to breathe upon the same globe, and I wonder that Jupiter endows thee with blessings, while I, thy superior, am an outcast from peace and pleasure."

"I will decide between you, my children," said Jove; "speak, poet, what hast thou done, that thy bearing is so lofty?"

"Done," said the poet; "I have done nothing; but I have taught others to do every thing that is noble. I have worn myself out with the labor of mind. I have painted nature and virtue. I have expanded great sentiments in the hearts of my fellow-beings, awakened the soft wish, and called forth the gentle tear. I influence all the world, and posterity shall know and honor me."

"And thou, grocer, what hast thou done to mankind?"

"Given them the means whereby to live," said the grocer; "sold them pork, bread, and figs. Of me they obtain the beverage which soothes their care and cheers their spirits."

"And hopest thou for everlasting fame for thy industry?" asked Jove.

"Tush, your worship," said the grocer. "What care I for such foolish reward, which, if useless while we live, must be particularly so when dead. I work for gold—the clothes I wear—the house I live in—the food which has made me thus good-humored and capacious—these are my objects."

"Enough," said Jupiter to the poet, his face slightly shaded with displeasure.

"Get thee back to earth and complain no more at what thy own folly has caused; or if thou must yearn for gross bodily comforts, bide thee to the grocer and let him teach thee a thriving trade. Men will admire thy genius, but they would rather purchase thy corn and butter. We can do nothing to aid thee.—Be gone—and disturb us no more." F.

UNCLE ZIM AND DEACON PETTIBONE.

BY WILLIAM L. STONE.

Open your ears: for which of you will stop
The vent of hearing, when loud Rumor speaks?—Shaks.

IN one of those pleasant rural villages which chequer the coast of Long Island Sound with their white houses and green window blinds, not more than twenty miles east of New-Haven, lived my highly respected uncle, Zimri Bradley, Esq. He was a man of some consequence in his day, having successively filled the offices of tything-man, grand-juryman, selectman, and sometime justice of the quorum. He would have continued to enforce a wholesome moral discipline among the unruly boys of the congregation, as a tything-man, longer, probably, than he did, were it not that there was always a sly laughing devil lurking in his eye; so, that when, with his mace of office, he rapped the head of one mischievous urchin, or attempted to gather a frown as he shook his wig at another, for tittering when aunt Deborah Hornblower started from her sleep as she tuned her nasal organ too high for the voice of the Rev. Mr. Wakeman, instead of checking the one, or intimidating the other into a seemly and reverent silence, he invariably had the ill fortune to set a dozen more into a giggling titillation. As a selectman, uncle Zim was kind to the poor; and as in duty bound, he more than once had several common drunkards exhibited in the stocks. As justice of the quorum, he held the scales with a steady and impartial hand, though he was not much of a lawyer. Indeed the public would not so soon have lost the benefit of his services on the bench, had he not fallen into an unlucky mistake, in attempting to use technical language.—It devolved upon him, on some ordinary occasion, to charge the jury in an action on a promissory note, to which the defence set up was a want of consideration. Uncle Zim advised the jury to find for the defendant, "as the alibi was clearly made out." He was, in this instance, as unfortunate as the pedant, whose whole stock of latin was "quid horae est, domine?"* of which he was so proud, that he was continually putting the question to all whom he met; till one day, a stranger upon whom he inflicted it, after looking at his watch, replied—"Horarum manualis mei motus turbatur, domine."† The pedant turned away in great haste, profanely saying, "Bless my soul! I didn't think it was so late"—much to the amusement of the young freshmen, who heard of it soon afterwards. Uncle Zim, however, would have encountered no such rebuff from any of the "gentlemen of the jury;" for his alibi sounded as sweetly in their ears, as Mesopotamia in those of the old lady, who could give no other reason for crying at a sermon, but "that blessed word Mesopotamia, which continued to ring so sweetly in her ears." But lawyer Daggett and lawyer Wagstaff took occasion to make themselves merry at the expense of his worship. Uncle Zim was a man of spirit, and some pride withal; and no sooner had he heard of his error, and that the wags were laughing about the "alibi," when his back was turned, than he threw his commission into the fire, declaring that after all, it was a wise saying, that "a cobbler should stick to his last."

The village above mentioned, which we shall call Applebury, was a quiet sort of a place, where the people to this day walk in the ways of their fathers, queue their hair with eel-skins, and go to and from meeting "decently and in order," in accordance with the injunction of the Saybrook Platform, and as all honest people should do.—The names, titles, and biographies of their ancestors, since the days of governor Leete to the present, curiously carved in immortal freestone, may be found in the old grave-yard, each inscription being surmounted either by a death's head and cross-bones, grinning in relief, in a style that would make the grisly messenger himself rattle his joints for very laughter; or the head of a cherub, with wings stuck on where the ears should be, shaped more like a pair of bellows-handles than the pinions of one of Tom Moore's angels.—Here some future Alden, or Alden himself, should the worthy president of Allegany college ever go that way, may trace the brief histories of deacon Theophilus Scran,‡ or captain Noah Crinning; or ensign Icabod Chinning; or sergeant Solomon Doud, "who was, for seventeen years, the oldest corporal of the company." Here, too, sleep the remains of Hopeful Goodenough, and Thankful Bigelow, in the midst of their ancestors and their descendants. But to return from our digression; the folks of Applebury are an exceedingly clever people, in the yankee sense of the term—most of them attend to their own business, and all of them know the business of every body else. Here, then—for we find we shall have to begin our story again—here, then, lived our worthy uncle, ZIMRI BRADLEY.

Uncle Zim, as we used to call him, was as full of fun and mischief as any urchin in the village. Near by his domicile, sojourned Malichi Fowler, who married the accomplished Miss Abigail Pettibone, of Hazlewood, the adjoining town, whose brother, Eliakim Pettibone, in process of time, became a deacon of the church in that parish. The distance was only about twenty miles, and deacon Pettibone used to keep every thanksgiving with his brother Fowler;—uncle Zim not unfrequently making one of the family party. But though uncle Zim was himself a christian professor, according to the Platform, and in the main walked according to the vows he had made, yet he was not altogether free from carnal ways. He was never at a loss for a fact, and was fond of telling ludicrous stories, which, in his hands, were seldom diminished by repetition. He could not for the soul of him suppress a joke when it came upon his tongue, cut where it would. On one of these occasions, he had the good, or the ill fortune, to keep the pious deacon Pettibone roaring with laughter, until his very ribs cracked again. Much, however, it grieved the good man afterwards, that he had yielded to the temptation of mirth, which he was half persuaded had been excited as a snare by the evil one, and it preyed upon his spirits the whole of the following day, on his return to Hazlewood. This impression, however, soon wore away, and he lost all unpleasant recollections in the warm and affectionate smiles with which he was welcomed to the little family circle of his happy and peaceful abode.

Soon after this convivial occurrence, which had, for the moment, disturbed the quiet of the conscientious deacon Pettibone's inner man, uncle Zim made a journey to Hazlewood to purchase a yoke of oxen of Mr. Ishmael Crane, nephew of Icabod Crane, the celebrated schoolmaster, for which he was to pay in "West India goods," after the return of the last cargo of mules and white-fish, shipped by him to Jamaica. Uncle Zim's wits were as bright as a dollar; he talked as slick as a whistle; and he was a cute chap at a bargain, as Mr. Ishmael Crane soon found out.

Mr. Crane took three-quarters of an hour to consider, before he would conclude the bargain, and as it was just twelve o'clock by the conch-shell, uncle Zim thought he would go and take pot-luck with deacon Pettibone, who lived near the school-house hard by. By the way, uncle Zim once drove a barter with the deacon for some mules, for which the deacon always thought he could have got more, if he had known what they were bringing at the time; though as uncle Zim only took him at his word in the price of the cattle, he had nothing to complain of. But that is not to the purpose.

While at dinner, Mr. Ishmael Crane came and called the deacon out, to inquire something about the character of my uncle Zim; whereupon the following dialogue took place:—

"What sort of a man," asked Mr. Crane, "is this 'squire Bradley?"

Deacon Pettibone had not forgotten the sale of his mules, nor uncle Zim's fat stories, and his merry jokes, over deacon Fowler's pumpkin-pies and cider-brandy; nor his own supposed delinquency in his late unseemly merriment.

"What sort of a man?" said the deacon, repeating his words:—"Why he is a member of good Dr. Wakeman's church, in Applebury, I reckon."

"Well; do you know him?"

"Know him! I guess I do! He lives next door to brother Fowler's; and I tell you he is a member of Dr. Wakeman's church. But I guess—"

"Guess! guess what? Don't you think he is good enough for my brindle four-year-olds?"

"Why—yes—I 'spose so—but I guess, to be candid—"

"Zounds, deacon! what do you mean by your guesses, and your buts?"

"Why, if I must say, I guess that God-ward he means to do the thing that's right, but man-ward I reckon he is a little twistical or so."

Mr. Ishmael Crane went away, and deacon Pettibone returned and finished his dinner with uncle Zim. When deacon Pettibone stepped out, however, he had unconsciously left the door ajar, and the consequence was, that uncle Zim had very innocently heard most of the conversation. But he knew that the deacon had no malice in his heart, and he knew also the cause of his scruples in qualifying his recommendation. He therefore took no notice at that time of what had been said; but determined, in his own mind, to seek some innocent and characteristic mode of revenge. Meantime he completed his bargain in the afternoon, and drove the bullocks home.

Two or three years rolled away, and as his sister Abigail presented his brother-in-law with so many young Fowlers, that she had little time for going abroad herself, deacon Pettibone's visits to Applebury were continued as usual; on which occasions he always passed an evening or so in uncle Zim's company, either at his own, or his brother's house. Uncle Zim's bosom was filled with the milk of human kindness. Though like an over-ripe melon, rough on the outside, as the poet says, there was much sweetness under it; and his winning ways were such, that the good deacon had long since dismissed the affair of the mules, and the temporary trials to which he had been subjected by his irresistible drollery. They therefore continued the best friends in the world;—still uncle Zim never lost sight of his project in some way of avenging himself for having been represented as being "man-ward rather twistical or so."

One morning, bright and early, as deacon Fowler came out picking his teeth from breakfast, while the dew-drops were yet spangling the meadows, he saw uncle Zim just preparing to mount the old dapple mare, with his butternut-colored coat strapped on behind the saddle.

"Good morning, 'squire," said deacon Fowler, "you seem to be stirring arly this morning."

"Yes," said uncle Zim: "in the hot season, the morning is the best part of the day—Gad, my son, mind that you keep the cattle out of the clover patch to-day!"

"—A very beautiful day to-day, as I was saying, 'squire!"

"—And send Jehiel to mill this afternoon.—Yes, deacon, a fine beautiful day. The air is as sweet as a new hay-stack this morning."

"You are going to take a ride to-day, I guess, 'squire. Pray which way are you journeying, if I may be so bold?"

"Oh, I'm only going to Haddam to speak for grave-stones for good old aunt Wealthy Crookshanks."

"You'll go through Hazlewood, I guess? So, I wish you'd give brother Pettibone a call and see how they're all dewing there. Tell them that Nabby's got another nice boy with eyes as bright as a weasel's."

"Yes, I think it's like-enough that I shall stop and give Dapple a bait there on my return."

"D'ye think it's going to rain to-day, 'squire? I see you've got your great-coat with you, and if I thought 'twould rain, I'd tell the boys to get the rest of the hay in."

"Don't know, don't know, deacon: they say a fool knows enough to take a great-coat when it storms; and every body knows that folks must make hay while the sun shines." And off rode uncle Zim, and into the orchard went deacon Fowler.

Uncle Zim came back in the evening, and overtook deacon Fowler, returning from the meadow, just as he had descended to the foot of Clapboard hill.

"Ah! is that you, 'squire?" said deacon Fowler: "you are home arly to-night, I calculate."

"Yes," replied uncle Zim; "old Dapple will carry me along at the rate of seven miles an hour, day in and day out, without putting on the long oats neither."

"A faithful beast, I vow. You saw brother Pettibone, I hope?"

"Yes—I saw him"—replied uncle Zim, with a grave, mysterious air, such as deacon Fowler had never seen before, upon his neighbor's lively countenance.

"Saw him!—he was well, I hope?"

"Why—yes—he was—pretty well, I believe."

"Nothing unusual was the matter, I hope, 'squire?"

"No—I—I can't say that there was any thing unusual," replied uncle Zim, with a peculiar emphasis upon the last word.

"And how were his family?"

"All very well; save the youngest child, Habakkuk, which has the measles."

"And brother Pettibone himself, is he ailing in any way?"

"I can't say that he was much ailing. Perhaps, moreover, I was mistaken—no, I can't be mistaken either."

"Why, 'squire, you frighten me. For goodness' sake what was the matter! You're sure you saw him?"

"Yes—I—I met him," replied uncle Zim, with the same assumed air of mystery.

"And how was he? do speak out, and let me know the worst on't, 'squire."

"Why, then—if I must say"—replied uncle Zim—"I should think when I met him, he was about—yes—just about half shaved."

"Impossible! you must be joking, 'squire."

"It's true, joke or no joke," said uncle Zim.

By this time the parties had reached the green. The two last sentences of uncle Zim's, had fallen upon the worthy deacon Fowler, like a pail of ice-water; and he went to his house with a heavy heart. He did not sleep a wink all that night, and the humiliating fact pressed so heavily upon his mind—though it was his first intention to have kept it a profound secret, until he could have inquired into the particulars of his brother's being overcome with liquor,—that he was even constrained to communicate the dismal tidings to his faithful Abigail. It was indeed planting a pang in her breast, without extracting the barb which rankled in his own bleeding bosom. But truly hath the poet said of woman, and Abigail, after the first gush of feeling had subsided, half forgot her own sorrow in her affectionate endeavors to soothe that of her husband. A thousand little comforting hopes, excuses, and palliating circumstances came into her mind. Her brother might not have been so badly off as the 'squire supposed. He might have been unwell; or perhaps he had been overcome by drinking ever so little on an empty stomach. The deacon folded his faithful spouse closer to his heart, and both determined that nothing should be said about the circumstance, even in their family, for the present. And between haying time and harvest, it was agreed that deacon Fowler should go up to Hazlewood, and commune with his brother Pettibone, privately, upon the subject.

"When pain and anguish wring the brow,

But Mrs. Abigail Fowler, notwithstanding her many fine qualities, was not entirely free from the frailties of the other daughters of Eve; and while alone on the ensuing day, her husband being engaged with his workmen in the fields, the secret became so burdensome that she wanted somebody to help her keep it. Perhaps, also, in her affliction, she thought she needed the sympathies of one, at least, of her most confidential female friends, who might, in turn, soothe her sorrows, and pour a few drops of balm into her wounded heart. In an evil hour, therefore, she revealed the tale of woe to Mrs. Aimwell, who kindly spent the whole afternoon in comforting the afflicted woman, by telling over how many others were suffering under still greater calamities. Temperance societies had not then been invented.

Mrs. Aimwell left the deacon's after tea, promising not to whisper a breath about it. "You know, my dear Mrs. Fowler," said she, "that I wouldn't do no such a thing for the world." But she, too, wanted some one to help her keep the secret, and so she hinted it to Mrs. Sly. This was enough. It was on Thursday: and it was no longer than the afternoon of the next day, at a meeting of the fragment society, that the members were startled by the exclamation of Mrs. Doolittle, preceded by a deep-drawn sigh, to the following effect:—

"Dear me! who'd have thought it! Well, I don't know who will fall next, for my part."

Now, justice to Mrs. Doolittle requires me to say in this place, that she was no mischief-maker; and, that, next to a witch, she held a slanderer as an utter abomination. She was a very tidy body, and the worthy heplmate of my venerated great uncle, Captain Jasper Doolittle, of Cohabit. There was no more notable housewife in all the parish. She used to begin her washing on Sabbath-day nights, as soon as three stars could be seen, in order to have her ample stores of linen, white as the driven snow, streaming in triumph upon the clothes-lines, like the lily-flag of the fallen Bourbons, at an earlier hour than her neighbors on Mondays. And her quince-and-apple-sauce, and boiled cider, were exactly the best to be found between Branford and Pettypaug. But, rest her good soul! her benevolent heart occasionally felt too deeply for others' woes, to enable her always to hide the faults she saw or heard of. Not but that she meant to do it. But as in the instance before us, there were sometimes secrets actually too great to be concealed within the narrow casement of her noble soul, and then it was impossible to prevent their breaking forth in exclamations full of meaning, as we have seen. "Dear me! who'd have thought it!" &c.

"Why, what do you mean?" exclaimed a dozen voices at once. "I hope," continued Miss Tabitha Tattler, a lady of no particular age, "that the shocking story about Miss Prim is not true. But I've heard as much ever since Ned Bramble came home from the south. She's kept company with him ever since last Thanksgiving."

"No," said Mrs. Doolittle, with a melancholy shake of the head. "That's like-enough, too. But haven't you heard of the fall of good deacon Pettibone?"

"Of Hazlewood? He haint hurt himself much, I hope?"

"I don't mean a fall from a barn or a hay-stack, child," said Mrs. Doolittle. "But haven't you heard on't?"

"No," replied sixteen voices in a breath. "Do let us hear all about it."

"Why," said Mrs. Doolittle, "you must know it's a great secret yet; and one doesn't want to expose a body's failings, you know. But I'll tell you, though it must not go from me, for I wouldn't injure the hair of any mortal being's head. You know I cannot endure scandal! And all I can now say, is, that Mrs. Crampton told me, that she heard Mr. Wilcox's wife say, that Mrs. Munger's aunt mentioned to her, that Mrs. Graves was present, when the widow Blatchley said, that Ick. Scran's wife thought Captain Evett's sister believed, that old Mrs. Willard reckoned, that Ephraim Standard's better half had told Mrs. Hand, that she heard Mrs. Sly say, that deacon Fowler's wife had told Mrs. Aimwell, as a great secret, that the deacon had told her, that 'squire Bradley had seen deacon Pettibone dead drunk, after an ordination dinner!"

"Do tell!" was the brief and emphatic exclamation of the benevolent coterie.

This, as we have before remarked, was on Friday, and the subtle electrical fluid could scarcely have travelled faster than did the story of the deacon's falling. From mouth to mouth—

"The flying rumor gathered as it rolled;
And scarce the tale was sooner heard than told;
And all who told it added something new—
And all who heard it made enlargement too—
In every ear it spread, on every tongue it grew!"

so that, before Saturday night, the fatal account had reached Hazlewood, enlarged and improved, until the story of the three black crows was nothing to it. Nor did it hesitate to travel Saturday night, although the blue-laws were then yet in force. The consequence was, that before the crows were all milked on Sunday morning, every body, out of the deacon's unsuspecting family, was acquainted with the melancholy catastrophe supposed to have overtaken that truly excellent man.

Of course the painful news was the general theme of conversation among the groups which collected around the portals of the sanctuary, while the bell was tolling for the minister—the late excellent and reverend Mr. Gamaliel Holdfast. The deacon presently approached; but never before was he so coldly greeted by his friends. And as for enemies, it is believed that he never had one. Every countenance seemed looking darkly upon, or averted from him. People even seemed to shrink from the proffered grasp of his friendly hand. But the good deacon, in the unsuspecting simplicity of his innocence, did not observe the change, and as the minister came along, all gathered into the venerable meeting-house. Every body cast a searching eye—"a furtive glance," our friend Cooper would say—upon the deacon; while he was engaged, as others should have been, in searching his own heart.

The services proceeded as usual; but at the close, the minister gave out a notice for a special meeting of the elders and deacons of the church, to be held on Wednesday, upon business of great importance. And after exhorting his little flock so to conduct themselves as to show, that though in the world, they were not of the world, and suitably admonishing the officers, as assistant shepherds, to make themselves patterns in good works—not forgetting to remind them of the passage, "Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall!"—(upon which stolen glances were again cast at the good deacon Pettibone)—the benediction was pronounced. The deacon, however, did not observe, and never once thought, that he was the sole object of this special exhortation, or of the dark and suspicious gaze of the congregation. His heart was right, and his eyes had been closed in the attitude of deep and heartfelt adoration. Thus he who was most interested in the dark givings out, was the least conscious of their existence.

The story, as we have already seen, had grown in its travels, like that of the boy who saw the thousand cats in the cellar; and for the three subsequent days the deacon's house was shunned as though it had been the seat of the plague. Meantime, as uncle Zim's name was somehow connected with the tale, one of the elders was despatched to Applebury, to inquire into the real facts of the statement which had brought such heavy and unexpected scandal upon the little Zion of Hazlewood. On his arrival, he immediately had an interview with uncle Zim, and commenced an inquiry into the facts of the case which had brought him to Applebury.

"Squire Bradley," said Mr. Elnathan Cook—for such was the cognomen of this important messenger—"it is rumored up our way, that you have said, that you met deacon Pettibone last week, drunk."

"Then I guess rumor lies," replied uncle Zim, "for I haint said no such thing."

"But pray, 'squire, what did you say, if I may be so bold?"

"Why," replied uncle Zim, "I only said that I met him about half shaved."

The result was, that although Mr. Elnathan Cook was one of the cutest chaps in those parts at a cross-examination, he having formerly been an unlicensed practitioner of the law in a justice's court, he obtained just so much information from uncle Zim, and no more.—Uncle Zim was requested to go up to Hazlewood and attend the council as a witness; but this he declined peremptorily, as he was busily engaged in making up a cargo of mules for the West-Indies. He assured the zealous Elnathan, however, that deacon Pettibone's negro man, Camillus, or Cam, as he was called for the sake of brevity, knew as much as he did, and could tell them all about it. As Cam was known to be a very honest fellow, this assurance gave the messenger much satisfaction; so he clambered into his "one horse shay," and got him back to Hazlewood.

The wheels of time rapidly brought Wednesday along, when the church council assembled, and the yet unsuspecting deacon Pettibone, expecting to hear the names of some reclaimed sinners propounded for membership, came among them. The Rev. Mr. Holdfast was appointed moderator. An unusual air of solemnity pervaded the council, and in imploring the direction and blessing of heaven upon their proceedings, the moderator was peculiarly earnest, and much affected. Indeed the half suppressed sighs from various bosoms, plainly indicated that they had business in hand which went home to their hearts.

At length the momentous subject of their meeting was opened, and the charge of intemperance formally preferred against no less a master in Israel, than deacon Eliakim Pettibone, then and there present. Had a bolt from heaven fallen at his feet, he could not have been more astonished or confounded. For a while, his hand pressed upon his temples—he remained dumb with amazement—then raising his eyes to heaven, he solemnly protested his innocence—but in vain; and in vain did he tax his memory to recall any circumstance in his life, that could have given rise to such an unlooked-for scandal. In vain, likewise, did he demand the name of the informer upon whose testimony the accusation was preferred; for uncle Zim had stipulated that his name was not to be used, save in the very last resort—dernier resort he probably would have said, had it not been for the recollection of the alibi of the note of hand. Finally, the witness, Camillus, was sent for.

Camillus soon arrived, and came grinning into the conference room, exhibiting the whole treasury of his ivory; but he immediately saw that his kind master was in deep affliction, and his own heart soon yearned with compassion. There the good deacon sat, his head bowed down, and supported by his hands: he raised it not, but hid his tears in his bandanna, and smothered the sighs heaving up and struggling to escape his throbbing bosom.

"Cam," said the moderator, with solemn gravity, "we have sent for you, because we want you to tell the truth."

"Yes, massa minister, me always tell de troot to shame e'debble."

"Well, Cam, we believe you will. Now tell us, Cam, did you ever see your master intoxicated?"

"Me ebber see massa tosticated! golly, only tink ob dat!"

"But, Cam, you must tell us the truth; now didn't you ever see your master when he was intoxicated—when he had drunk too much?"

"Golly, no, massa minister."

[Here a consultation took place, among a few of the members of the council, in an under tone.]

"Don't you remember that 'squire Bradley, who lives in the second house beyond the stocks and whipping-post, north of the meeting-house in Applebury, came up to see your master last Wednesday?"

"Yes, massa, me know dat berry well."

"Well, that's very good now, Cam: and when 'squire Bradley met your master, was he not about half shaved?"

"O yes, massa: when 'squire Bradley ride by ee window, massa Pettibone was juss shaving heSELF, I guess; but den he so grad to see de 'squire, he run out door to shak'ee hand, wid ee lather all on one side he face!"

Here the mighty mystery was solved. All knew the droll mischievous character of uncle Zim, and the truth flashed upon their minds in an instant. A bitter smile played across the features of the good deacon, as he meekly raised his dark hazel eyes, glistening with tears, and in his heart returned thanks for his deliverance. The council was broken up—a thousand sincere apologies were tendered to the good man—and the parties all set their faces towards their respective homes—the worthy deacon being more strongly than ever convinced, that, "MAN-WARD, UNCLE ZIM WAS RATHER TWISTICAL OR SO."

THERE ARE SOME THINGS BEYOND THE REACH OF FORTUNE.—An Italian very much addicted to gambling, but withal poor and unlucky, used to exclaim on such occasions, "Fortune, thou vile traitress, it is true you can make me lose, but I defy you to make me pay."

BENSERADE.—Some one was praising a poet whom Benserade admired, observing, that no person since his time had been able to imitate him. "Sir," replied Benserade, "the fellow climbed Mount Parnassus with a ladder which he took up after him."

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

DR. FRANCIS' DISCOURSE.

As the classical and interesting address of Dr. Francis, delivered before the Philolexian Society and a numerous and fashionable audience in the hall of Columbia college, has not yet been printed, we take occasion to lay before our readers an extract from the manuscript. The subjoined remarks were prefatory to a biographical memoir of the late chancellor Livingston, one of the alumni of the college. We trust that the whole will be given to the public in a book form, and if so, we shall recur to it again.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN—In consenting to perform the unexpected task assigned me by your kind partiality, allow me to bespeak your indulgent criticism on the efforts of one long since estranged by the duties of professional life from the contemplative studies of the scholar. Many years have passed since, within the walls of this honored institution, I listened with delight, and I hope with profit, to the learned lessons of instructors, whose pride it was to adapt to the youthful capacity the matured fruits of their ample wisdom and knowledge. Death has since called them from the sphere of their activity to their reward. I cannot but reflect with gratitude, that their devoted attention to our welfare lessened the labor which was the necessary attendant on our studies; our lament, however, over their departure is lessened when we turn to the chairs now so ably filled by their successors.

And here allow me, gentlemen, to testify to the high character of the institution which I, the humblest of her alumni, boast as my alma mater. Connected with her by no other relation, justice alone compels me to declare, that among the temples to learning which the piety and public spirit of our countrymen have reared up among us, none can boast superiority in the ability of its teachers, or the judicious and ample courses of instruction afforded to its pupils.

To you, young gentlemen, who now occupy those scholastic seats which myself and my former juvenile associates once held, permit me to advert to the ample and capacious theatre of action which the American republic offers to her ingenious youth. Although I am fully persuaded that in the discharge of the numerous and responsible duties of your future life, the monitions of justice, and the dictates of your own consciences, will ever be the governing principles of your actions; yet it is not inconsistent with the purest feelings of the heart to be cheered in your arduous career by a generous and laudable desire of distinction.

Who, says the illustrious author of the Fairy Queen,

"Who would care to do brave deed,
Or strive in virtue others to excel,
If none should yield him his deserved meed,
Due praise? that is the spur of doing well."

No nation, ancient or contemporary, presents to its youth nobler projects of ambition than the one which we can proudly call our own; whether emulous of political eminence, or literary renown. In the absence of all hereditary distinctions or privileged orders, merit alone is the passport to success; and here, it may be justly said, in the language of the poet,

"The field of glory is the field for all."

Here are offered on the broad and splendid theatre of ambition, the glorious rewards which the ancient republics of Greece and Rome held out to virtuous exertions for the public good, unattended with those direful results which too often awaited among them the most meritorious services. But there are other and higher distinctions than kings or people can bestow. Our ancestors have bequeathed, in their literature and language, an inheritance inferior only in value to our sacred religion, and to the great principles of our republican constitution. Our noble anglo-saxon dialect, rich and various, copious yet philosophical, in which no fact worthy of attention is unrecorded, no important principle which has not been illustrated, now conveys instruction to as great a number of readers as any ever used by man; and, ere the lapse of another century, the English and American writer will address as many readers as are embraced in all other civilized communities. Our philosophers will enlighten the understandings, our poets melt the feelings of those who dwell on the banks of the Oregon, the Burampooter, the Macquarie and the Messurado.

"The western nations," says the philosophic Humboldt, in his late address before the imperial academy of sciences, at St. Petersburg, "have carried into the different parts of the world those forms of civilization, that development of the human intellect, whose origin ascends to the epoch of the intellectual greatness of the Greeks, and to the gentle influence of christianity. Divided in language and manners, and in political and religious institutions, the enlightened nations form in our day but a single family, (and this is one of the most beautiful results of modern civilization,) where the object in view is the great interests of science, literature and the arts; all that, springing from one internal source, the depths of thought and feeling, elevates man above the vulgar care of society."

Although our country has entered latest into the great career of nations, her Washington, her Franklin, her Hamilton, her Jefferson, her Rittenhouse, her Clinton, her Fulton, vie in the splendor of their renown with the most illustrious names which the ancient world can present, and are a pledge that her sons will not faint or grow weary in the course.

The diligent observer will not fail to trace an intimate connection between the moral and intellectual cultivation of a people, with the fullest exercise of their powers, and the highest enjoyment of their privileges: by the condition of his nature, man must prove himself capable of his rights, by the antecedent discharge of his duties.

Those who cultivate the habit of thinking for themselves, soon acquire the power of dictating to others: a modern geographer represents the probable number of living writers in Germany, France, and England, as exceeding twelve thousand. "A body," adds he, "which, were it not divided against itself, might govern the world." Nor does this seem an unqualified declaration. The intellectual, the moral, and the religious character of the Greeks was formed by Homer; Cervantes disarmed the potent spell of knight-errantry; the mighty mind of Milton at one time delineated the warfare of rebellious angels, and at another vindicated the rights and liberties of man; and, in our own times, the magic genius of Sir Walter Scott has swept into oblivion volumes of sentimental inanity, and consecrated the pages of fiction to the noblest lessons of thought.

Such is the influence of letters. Illustrations of equal value and of a like import may be deduced by the power exercised over a people by the cultivation of the arts. The boundary between the savage and the civilized, between the debased and exalted of our species, may be traced in the condition of the arts and sciences. According as they are nurtured, we find them giving birth to new affections, unalloyed with the grosser habits of our nature; they increase and multiply the happiness, and capacity, and well-being of society. The Apollo of Praxiteles was admired and worshipped by a pagan world; the sculpture of Angelo and the pencil of Corregio have demonstrated the almost infinite faculties of our species in mind and in matter; while Raphael has given to the verba ardentia of the poet augmented warmth and coloring.

The position is axiomatic: national education is national power: and in proportion to the exigency will be the resources which it holds at command.

The most strenuous asserters of political liberty have ever been found among those who have explored the treasures of science and literature. In the recent revolution which hurled a tyrant from his throne, the cultivators of science were among the warmest devoted to free principles; and the most zealous defenders of the liberties of the nation were the beardless pupils of the Polytechnic school.—Should the rights of the American nation ever be invaded, either by a foreign or domestic foe, which heaven forbid, I cannot doubt that the favored youth of her seminaries of learning, faithful to the great examples of Greece and Rome, would present an impregnable phalanx of spirits devoted to her cause. But I may be allowed to advert a moment longer to the influence of letters on the modern state of society. By means of the facilities and impetus which are now applied to the productions of the press, and by the perfect intercourse which is now established throughout the great commonwealth of letters, the researches of every member passes in review before the critical tribunal of all; thus refined and elaborated, it has ready access to the fire-side of the laborious peasant and the active inhabitant of the town. The heavy tome, once the delight of the scholar and the dread of all others, now yields to the comely pocket manual, and what was at a former period the luxury of the arrogant and self-sufficient recluse, has become the daily fare of the inquiring of all classes. Nor need we regret this revolution in letters. By means thereof, the ample treasures of wit and knowledge are unlocked to the better half of our species, and grave wisdom is made attractive by the graces of refinement and social intercourse. It was the boast of the almost inspired sage of antiquity, that he called the attention of the learned from the vain search of natural causes to the moral pursuits of man: it is the triumph of modern philosophy that it has opened the page of every variety of knowledge, equally to the contemplative and to the active, to the philosopher and to the fair.

An illustrious character of antiquity congratulated himself that he was born a Greek, and not a barbarian. May we not in like manner congratulate ourselves, that we are natives of the western world, and participants in the enjoyment of privileges hitherto denied to the inhabitants of every other portion of the globe? Nay, more, it is our happy destiny to occupy the fairest portion of this favored domain. The state of New-York is the best representative of our common country, and is the acknowledged precursor of most of those plans of improvement, for which the world is indebted to America. Here have been first successfully executed those grand measures of internal intercourse which are gradually extending their vast consequences throughout our land: here, the application of the power of condensed vapor to the wants and conveniences of man, has been first effectively exhibited: here the most beneficial system of common school education has been exemplified on a scale of commanding grandeur and importance: and here the reform in the complex fabric of our legal system, has been most extensively applied. The metropolis which we inhabit, though inferior in extent to many in the ancient world, rivals in importance, as a commercial emporium, the most commanding and celebrated in history. The wealth, the science, the arts of all nations, are tributary to her enterprise and spirit—the character of the state happily corresponds with that of her metropolis.

In the language of the most eminent geographer of our days, M. de Brun, "if we estimate the importance of the state of New-York, now the most populous and powerful of the confederation, by the intelligence of the people; their physical, moral, and commercial activity; and the wonderful spirit of improvement they display, we shall find that this small community is entitled to take precedence of many European kingdoms, and of the whole empire of Mexico."

ANECDOTE OF CURRAN.—One day, when it was known that Curran was to make an elaborate speech in chancery, Lord Clare, (the then chancellor of Ireland) brought a large Newfoundland dog upon the bench with him; and during the progress of the argument, he leant his ear much more to the dog than to the barrister. At last, the chancellor seemed to lose all regard to decency: he turned himself quite aside in the most material part of the case, and begun in full court to fondle the animal. Curran stopped short. "Go on, go on, Mr. Curran," said Lord Clare. "Oh," replied Curran, "I beg a thousand pardons, my lord; I really took it for granted that your lordship was employed in consultation."

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

COLLEGE REMINISCENCES.

It was the eve of the coronation of George the fourth: I was then an Etonian, and what is usually denominated a king's man in contradistinction, at that particular juncture, to a queen's man. Two opinions which divided the people of England, the innocence or guilt of the princess of Wales, equally affected every student of college. The prevailing feeling with us was decidedly in favor of the king; nor is that to be wondered at, since we have ever been considered under the immediate patronage of the reigning sovereign. Besides, George the fourth had shown us many kind attentions; he visited the montem; attended our annual rowing matches, and at the death of his much loved and highly respected father, kindly ordered a particular part of the royal chapel, at Windsor, to be made fit for our reception to witness the solemn and splendid interment: moreover, he often gained us holidays, together with other tokens of his fondness for his father's favorite school. Every Etonian, therefore, on the evening in question, was inspired with an irrepressible feeling of loyalty.

The towns of Eton and Windsor are joined by a bridge which passes over an insignificant stream, separating the county of Berks from that of Bucks, Eton being in the latter. The privileges of the Etonians did not extend one inch beyond the central line of the bridge, and their rights were so strictly observed by the people of Windsor and its vicinity, that, however closely an Etonian might be pursued by them for any misdeed, the moment he crossed this line, he could turn round and laugh at them with impunity; nor would they dare to place their foot beyond it with inimical intentions.

On this memorable night, illuminations and transparencies of all descriptions, some for king, some for queen, were visible on every house, except of those whose parsimony induced them to refrain from the expense until called for by the mob, by the well known cry of "light up, light up." At dusk, we began to collect in groups, here and there, and to form parties for our mutual protection; for the lower class of people inhabiting Windsor and Eton, were all queen's people, consisting of athletic bargemen, coalheavers, butchers, and common farmers, and right glad to have an opportunity of confronting us under a plausible excuse, in order that they might put in execution some of their repeated threats to us for pillage, robbery, and destruction. In fact, we were old and deadly enemies; for whenever a barge of coals happened to be going under Windsor bridge, and any of our body were near, the navigators therein might depend upon a plentiful and well directed shower of stones from above, which told always with great effect, from the fact that the stream being very strong, and the arch of the bridge only of sufficient width to permit the passage of a single barge, directed by skillful management, the men were obliged to pay the most scrupulous attention to their duty, and passively to receive our heavy charge of artillery without the possibility of ever acting on the defensive. They would sometimes, however, have their revenge; for whenever they caught us higher up the river, in our club-boats, they would invariably steer against us, break our oars, or drive us among the bushes and pelt us with coals at their leisure. The farmers, in every direction, were our most inveterate enemies, solely because they kept large bull-dogs about their premises to preserve their poultry, &c. from being purloined—luckless bull-dogs! luckless farmers, that dwell in the neighborhood of Eton! many have been the untimely deaths of the one, and the irreparable losses of the other.

For at least a week previous to the coronation, the shrubbery round about was searched again and again for sticks of hard and durable materials: every young cherry-tree, in particular, was rooted from its cradle to serve the purposes of the belligerents. Lead, too, was in very great demand at that time, for we were actually ferocious enough to melt it and pour it into a hole at each end of our stick, made on purpose for its reception. The adoption of this severe measure, arose from a bargeman having been seen with one of similar substance, having a huge nail driven cross ways through the end of it, thereby forming a weapon of very formidable appearance, and one still more formidable to encounter. These preparations on our part were carried on with the utmost secrecy, in order that the townsmen might receive, at least, a Roland for their Oliver.—At length, "expectata dies aderat," the long wished-for day arrived: of course a complete holiday. The morning had scarcely "peeped from the window of the east," before the manifestations of our loyalty began: but the chief source of our delight was in making active preparation and arrangements for the night. We amounted then, in number, to about six hundred and fifty active, strong, and spirited young men, totally reckless of consequences. The proudest titles that the country boasted, were among us, and foremost in the fight. A council of war was held in the college hall, where, by the by, I have breakfasted on certain occasions with five thousand people, and yet there is not a pillar in it. It was pretty confidently believed that Windsor bridge would be the scene of action, inasmuch as its neighborhood was very advantageous to the bargemen for concealment; nor were we wrong in our conjectures. After mature deliberation as to the best mode of arranging ourselves, it was agreed that we should form three divisions, each division so disposed as to be nearly equal in numbers and strength. The first was ordered to attack the bridge on Eton side; the second to cross the river as silently as possible in boats, and to bring up their force on the Windsor side, at the same moment; the third to scale the bridge from the river, and make directly for the enemy's center. This bridge crosses the Thames, and separates Eton from Windsor, and at that time, was of a very mean description, being built entirely of wood, very old, and low, therefore, easily to be scaled by active youths in the daily habit of practising such feats for amusement. Spies were set upon the motions of the townsmen, who were seen equally busy in preparing themselves for the event. Our boats were all put in order, each man taking care to supply himself with such means of defence as he could use to the best advantage. As the sun gradually declined and the darkness began to favor the illuminations, every house in college that did not exhibit demonstrations of loyalty, was instantly pelted and so defaced, as to be left without a sound window in it. One poor man in the town, suffered severely from a very imprudent, though a well meaning measure. Having in his possession, rather a large, full-length portrait of the lamented princess Charlotte, he thoughtlessly placed it in one of his higher windows; it was naturally enough, at such a time, mistaken for that of the queen, and in five minutes, I am sure, there was not two square inches of glass to be seen in any part of his house, while the lady herself was injured "past all surgery." Upon the truth being ascertained the next day, however, we immediately collected a sum, sufficient, to satisfy the man for the damage he had sustained, with no trifling bonus into the bargain. The darkness of night had now completely set in, and at every hundred yards, with one simultaneous shout, rending the air with commingling sounds of every gradation, from boyhood to manhood, we exclaimed, "God save the king—hurrah, hurrah, hurrah!" As we gradually drew nearer and nearer the bridge, persons were seen peeping from the corners of the streets before us, and then darting away rapidly again, as if afraid of being recognised or caught. We took the hint, and immediately separated, each to his appointed station. Our first care was to land safely and as clandestinely as possible the division, whose duty it was to attack the enemy from the opposite side of the bridge: this was effected, though not without some slight difficulty. As the party were going to their boats, already in attendance, they perceived a few men employed in cutting them from their moorings, and thrusting them into the middle of the stream. This would have been a death-blow to our hopes of success, had it succeeded; for to ford the river was impossible, and to scale the bridge, would have been equally so without them. To our dismay, three or four were already moving away with the tide fast beyond our reach: some of us instantly waded up to our necks—some jumped into those remaining, to row after those that had been pushed off, while three or four engaged hand to hand the fellows who were thus quietly occupied in doing us so much mischief. They were stout athletic men, and though not equal to their adversaries in point of agility, had decidedly the advantage as to strength. Owing, however, entirely, to the activity of our men, we were enabled to give and evade many very severe blows. During this contest, the rest of the party had secured and returned with the boats—our enemies quickly took to their heels—were pursued, captured, bound hands and feet, gagged, and left on the shore "to chew the cud of sweet and bitter fancy." We lost no time in making up for this unexpected delay; but crossed the river as rapidly as possible, under the favor of a dark night, and muffled oars—landed without further obstruction, and concealed ourselves among the bushes and trees that thickly grew on that side of the river. Here we were to wait, patiently, the signal for attack, which was to be the ascent of a rocket. It is true, the bridge was not higher than twenty feet from the surface of the river, yet it was by no means a pleasant thing to be plunged head first, even from that height, at night time into the rapid tide below. However, we thought the less of that, from our being constantly in the habit of practising it as a feat, which had then become as common as the acquirement of the pons asinorum in Euclid. We were now at a stand still, and demurred whether we should be the first to advance or wait the arrival of the enemy. It was at length decided that a part of the first division should move on for the purpose of leading out our opponents, and then practice the celebrated Norman deceit of a sham retreat, with the hope that they would follow us. I must not forget to mention that every sixth man of the scaling division, was ordered to carry a torch and fire-box, with which to light it upon the word being given. Our stratagem succeeded well; as we advanced, the enemy came forward in a dense mass to meet us. Not a word was spoken on either side, nor was any thing heard, but the tramp of our feet upon the gravelly road. Upon coming within reach of each other, we turned suddenly round and fled; they followed with wild shouts and scornful laughs, which were soon changed for those of a different nature. As they rushed furiously past the foot of the bridge, they were as furiously met, shoulder to shoulder, by that part of the first division which had remained behind for the purpose. The rocket, here, went off, and on came our second division from the other side of the bridge, with all the force and impetuosity of youthful temerity. At the same moment the bridge was scaled, and the torches flamed in every direction. The enemy, for the moment, seemed doubtful whether to fly or stand; but finding which way soever they turned that they were opposed, they returned to the charge with double ferocity. Never did an army in the field fight for their own honor and that of their country more vigorously, than did the Etonians on that memorable night. We were met by the Civilians at every point: some tried to prevent our ascent from the bridge, where the battle soon became the hottest, while others were engaged in repelling our instantaneous attack on them from front and rear. They were undoubtedly taken much by surprise, and thrown into great confusion, which at length gave us the victory. The glaring torches shed their dusky light on the objects around, now illumining this part now that, rendering the scene actually horrible, I might say infernal; for the huge bargemen with long and shaggy hair, faces unshaved for many days, looked more like creatures of the nether world, than of this—as the flickering gleams of the torches fell upon their harsh and rugged features and stalworth forms, mingling in the fight. Here you might see, rolling in the mud, and grasping each other's throats, Etonians, bargemen, and butcher-boys; the tortuous writhing of the body, and hurried gasping for breath, portraying the violence of their struggle—here a man lying on his back stunned, and gazing fixedly and weltering in blood—here an Etonian supporting, in agony, his bruised arm, and groaning beneath the severe infliction—another limping, another sprawling on all fours, while blows, thick and heavy, whizzed on all sides round. But the centre of the bridge was the principal scene of action. The flaring of the torches; the struggling of those engaged in close contest; the cries of the wounded; the heavy splashing of those who were hurled into the water; the cries of the king forever on our side, that of the queen on theirs—to the rescue—they fly—throw him over—no quarter—down with him—victory! the king forever—hurrah, hurrah, hurrah! presented a spectacle more animated than I have known on any other occasion. In the midst of all our joy and vociferations of loyalty, the majestic and hollow-toned college bell recalled us within our walls. That was a sound which all instantly and instinctively obeyed; and having collected ourselves again into one body, we re-entered our castles with hearts swelling with the pride of victory. We ascertained to our delight that the enemy had suffered severely; and except some very bad bruises and two or three broken arms, our injury was but trifling. Need I say the following day passed in recapitulating our gallant deeds.

The great aversion which the students of Eton bore towards the inhabitants of Windsor and its vicinity, as well as that of the latter towards the former, was so well known, that the duke of York, at the close of the interesting ceremony of laying the first stone of the new bridge, at Windsor, terminated his address with the following appropriate words:—

"May the great Architect of the universe bless the work this day commenced, and may this structure conduce to the harmony of the towns of Windsor and Eton." M.

PAIN OF LIVING CREATURES.

"The poor beetle that we tread upon,
In corporal suffering, feels a pang as great
As when a giant dies."

This opinion of the celebrated poet has been so frequently quoted, as to be familiar to all the reading classes of the community. It evidently sprang from that thoughtful study of nature which is the great parent of benevolence, and does honor to the writer's heart; yet, like many beautiful theories, both in prose and poetry, I do not believe it to be founded in fact. In youth, when the mind is more curious to inquire and more ready to believe than to reason, we receive instruction with a general credulity, and without ever pausing to examine into its origin. Impressions so made are confirmed by time, which deepens the prejudices which it fails to destroy. I esteem this to be one, among other errors of a more serious kind, which the world fall into, as it were, blind-folded; and in which they are contented to grope, when by merely exercising the senses with which nature has endued them, they might detect the path of truth.

Let my readers reflect for a moment, upon the acknowledgment which they make, by endorsing, with their approbation, the remark of the poet:

"The poor beetle that we tread upon,
In corporal suffering, feels a pang as great
As when a giant dies."

In naming the "the poor beetle," I presume the writer means to include all living creatures on the face of the globe, or beneath the ground, or in the deep, or the air. The mass of agony for which this admission makes nature responsible, is shocking, and beyond credit. The death of every creature which supplies our table with food, would, in such case, be a massacre, and we should shrink from an oyster supper with horror unutterable. What appetite should we derive from witnessing a human being placed upon the rack, his limbs torn quivering and bleeding from his body, his eyes wrenched from their sockets, his heart cut out from his panting breast, or his head twisted off before life had left the mangled trunk; and yet, if those forms of life which are evidently intended to serve the purposes of nutrition to human beings,

"In corporal suffering, feel a pang as great

even such is the exquisite torture inflicted upon every oyster that is eaten, upon every fish that is brought up trembling from the depths of the stream, and every bird which falls fluttering and bloody at the fowler's feet.

Besides the creatures which are useful as the food of man, there are myriads of others which swarm about his steps, and die in countless numbers by accident—while others are intentionally destroyed as offensive. If death is to all these what it is to a human being, it would be no affectation of sensibility to confess that I could not put my foot on a spider, nor witness the struggles of a drowning fly, without a thrill of painful compassion.

I have no doubt that all creatures gifted with life, are, also, endued with a sufficient susceptibility of pain, and instinctive dread of it, to answer the general purpose of self-preservation; but, when we behold the difference between the organization of an oyster, a fly, or a beetle and a man, it is impossible to conceive that their systems can admit of an equal degree either of pain or pleasure. Both sensations must be to them something dull and vague; and inasmuch as their sphere of existence is more contracted, and their formation meaner, so their capacities are all dim and small, and their lives comparatively worthless. You may watch a fly upon the table, perambulating briskly in search of food. True, if you catch him, he makes a great noise, although uninjured; but set him free again, and after convincing himself by a few aerial circumvolutions of the fact that so important a personage is actually released without a ransom, he will return to the table and go on with his epicurean researches. Cut off his legs, and his wings, and sometimes I have seen his body rather unceremoniously divided for the sake of the experiment. The patient was evidently incommode by the loss, and performed certain involuntary evolutions, but presently, on arriving at a crumb of sugar, he commenced regaling himself as usual, body or no body, and afterwards cleansed the remainder of his wings with the fragments of his legs, and hobbled off till he found and partook of some more sugar.

The fisherman takes the worm from the earth, tears its helpless form into pieces; each one of which he fastens upon the barbed hook. The imagination recoils from the idea of such an experiment upon one of our race, yet if similar pain be suffered by the worm, it is equally cruel. Fish taken from the water, remain alive many hours. If we suppose them gifted with a human susceptibility of bodily torture, what agony can be more excruciating than theirs?

The destruction which we necessarily commit among the inferior living creation, although presenting a vast and gloomy picture of suffering, would form but a part of the great system of anguish offered to the contemplation of the naturalist. He beholds all the brute creation continually engaged, from their nature, in destroying each other. The lion is tearing his victim; the vulture is pouncing upon his prey; the whale is swallowing shoals of lesser fish—altogether, the earth would afford a prospect painful to dwell upon, and inconsistent with the principles of benevolence which form the leading features in the creation and government of the world. I am, therefore, compelled to believe, that although the creatures over which man is the lord, are capable of sufferings to a certain degree, yet, that their pain is very different from the torture of human beings. The essence, which we call life, might have been breathed into matter much finer and purer, and more capable of every species of emotion, than that of which we are at present constructed. The nerves of the tooth, for example, how exquisitely delicate, and with what a refined agony do they resent the softest touch? The same power that spread these fibres through the teeth, might have created us all nerve, so that the breathing of the air upon our uncovered bodies would have thus afflicted us, or perhaps overcome us with an equal consciousness of delight. The nerves which in us are productive of such acute sensation, are wanting in the fly, the oyster, the beetle, &c. or are composed of a different material, and we may, therefore, justly conclude are governed by different rules. The more nature is studied the more the harsh and gloomy features in her aspect are softened down into kindness and beauty; and however painful insects may find the act by which their lives are extinguished, I must differ in opinion from the author of the lines at the head of this article. Beasts and insects are as incapable of our sufferings as they are of our enjoyments. F.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Ninth volume.—We this week issue the first number of the ninth volume of the NEW-YORK MIRROR. The rapid and steady increase of the subscription list, and several important additions to our previous sources of obtaining ORIGINAL articles, have induced us to give it an enlarged form. Care has been taken, however, that this should not interfere with the uniformity of the series; as the numbers for the ensuing year may be bound in a volume of nearly the same size as those already published, by diminishing the breadth of the margin. The only object of this arrangement is, notwithstanding the expense, to repay the liberality of our readers with a more varied collection of matter.

An original Stanza by Lord Byron.—We are indebted to the politeness of a friend for the following little relic of the distinguished and unfortunate bard. From the lateness of the hour at which it was received, we are compelled to insert it in our own department.

The celebrated lines of Lord Byron, "To a lady weeping," which in 1812 occasioned so much excitement in England, must be well known to your readers. There is one stanza, however, which has never been printed. I copied it from the manuscript of Lord Byron, and enclose it to you with the poem itself. The first verse is the original one. The others are to be found in his works. It may be proper to state that there can be no possible doubt respecting the authenticity of the manuscript. It is accompanied by a note from Mr. Drury himself. The word "happy" in the first line of the first verse has been erased, and "brilliant" interlined. It is probable that the opening four lines were composed while copying the others. Nearly all the manuscripts of Lord Byron are at present in possession of Mr. Murray, his publisher, in London, with the exception of one canto of "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage," which is the property of Mr. Drury, and for which he has refused three thousand guineas. They are said to be very curious specimens of chirography, crowded with erasures, interlineations, and marginal notes. The copy from which the subjoined stanzas are taken, bear strong marks of the rapidity and manner of the author, and is accompanied by the following note, commencing at the bottom of the page, and meandering along the margin of the side and top. "Copied for my friend Rev. H. Drury, February 14th, 1814, in the midst of the clash of paragraphs, and the conflict of newspapers, occasioned by the republication of the foregoing stanzas."

Blest omens of a brilliant reign
In bright succession hourly rise;
Forsaken friends—vows made in vain—
A daughter's tears—a nation's sighs!
Weep, daughter of a royal line,
A sire's disgrace, a realm's decay;
Ah, happy! if each tear of thine
Could wash a father's fault away!
Weep—for thy tears are virtue's tears
Auspicious to these suffering isles!
And be each drop, in future years,
Repaid thee by thy people's smiles.

Letters from London.—Our correspondent C. writes by the last packet that he has been absent from London for some time, "scouring the country round," and promises communications soon. We extract a few lines from his epistle:

"I was much pleased to hear of the extraordinary success of Cinderella, and under such adverse circumstances, amid the unusual rage for sleighing and Burkeing. You have the advantage with your Cinderella over the Londoners. A new opera has been produced at Covent-garden, 'Aza and Zemira,' founded on the old 'Story of Beauty and the Beast,' music by Spohr. It went off very flatly. Miss Inverarity, of course, was Beauty, and Wilson the Beast. It had rather a ludicrous effect to see the lover and hero running about as a beast, singing love ditties, and placing his paw upon his hairy carcass, about the region of the heart, to express the tender feelings. The worst of it is, he is not transformed till the last scene. I went the other evening to see Pasta in Medea, and Taglione, and will attempt an article about them."

To publishers.—We would apologize to the gentlemen who have politely furnished us with new publications, if a resolution not to review and give an opinion upon works without a careful reading required an apology. As we wish the literary notices appearing in this journal to be, at least, marked with candor, and founded upon examination, it is impossible for us to comply immediately with all the wishes of our literary friends. "Patience, the young and rose-lipped cherub," whom we often invoke in the course of our perusals, must assist them in waiting till we can do justice to their various favors.

Mr. Monroe.—The death of this venerable patriot has called forth posthumous attention which his country was but too tardy in bestowing during his existence. The occurrence of the event on our great national festival, when taken in consideration with the fact that his illustrious confederates, Jefferson and Adams, closed their earthly labors on the same day of the year, has certainly the appearance of a singular coincidence; but the exclamations of several of the press, that some general rule of nature has been violated, that Mr. Monroe might expire on the fourth instead of the third, is a supposition springing rather from a love of the marvellous than the dictates of reason.

Mr. Monroe joined the army of the revolution in the fall or winter of 1776 as a volunteer, and brought with him from Virginia a company of artillery, which he raised and commanded, and of which the late William Washington was lieutenant. Captain (afterwards colonel) Monroe sought the post of danger at the battle of Trenton, on the twenty-sixth of December, 1776, and greatly distinguished himself as an officer in that action, in which he was severely wounded, having been shot through the breast, and by which he was disabled for nearly a year. After his recovery he was appointed aide-de-camp to Major-General Lord Sterling, and continued in his staff for some time. He was subsequently elected a member of the continental congress, and was a member in the year 1783, when General Washington resigned his commission to that body.

After the war Colonel Monroe was named by General Washington minister plenipotentiary to the court of France; was subsequently appointed secretary of state under Mr. Madison, and held the last office from 1811 to the fall of 1814; when, in consequence of the war with Great Britain, in which the United States were then engaged, and to give greater vigor to the operations of the war department, he was appointed secretary of war, and held that office until the peace of 1815, when he was again placed by Mr. Madison at the head of the department of state.

Mr. Monroe was installed president of the United States on the fourth of March, 1817, and remained in that high and dignified office for two terms.

Typography.—The increased attention of our fellow citizens to every thing connected with the fine arts, is manifested in the neat and elegant dress in which literary works are now issued from the press, as clearly as in music and engraving. The pamphlet, entitled "Remarks on the character of Napoleon," just published by Hopkins and Son, Nassau-street, is a very fair specimen of American printing. The superior quality of the paper, the lightness and beauty of the type, and the general care and scrupulous attention evidently bestowed upon the proof, are very creditable to these gentlemen, and will stand the test of a critical comparison with the generality of the best English publications.

Improvement in theatricals.—A drama of a singular kind has been brought out in the Cirque Olympique in Paris, entitled Les Lions de Mysore, in which real lions perform their parts to the great delight of crowded houses—even kangaroos, boas, and other wild animals have been tamed, and taught to bear their parts. It is not mentioned of what species of animals the audience was composed, but a reader of ordinary sagacity will not be without his own opinion upon the subject.

A brilliant spectacle has been produced in London, entitled Napoleon Bonaparte. This is probably the first of an endless series of dramatic exhibitions, in which the wonderful "little corporal" will figure for the edification of future ages.

New class of brokers.—Among the new establishments in Paris, a city so fertile in novelties, is one "for the mutual exchange of goods of all descriptions."

The Niger.—The grand problem respecting the course of this river has been solved by British courage and perseverance. A letter from Mr. Alexander Fisher, known to the world for his interesting voyages and travels, communicates the important information to the public through the columns of the London Literary Gazette. The party embarked on the Niger at Youri, and came down the stream until they reached the sea in the Bight of Biafra.

HERE DO WE MEET.

A BALLAD—WRITTEN AND COMPOSED BY J. A. WADE, ESQ.

Sadly.

Here do we meet a - gain, but bro - ken heart-ed,

These are not like the tears wept when we part - ed; Oh! no, those drops were like ev'-ning's calm sor-row, The dews that fall weep-ing, but pro-mise sweet mor-row! Here do we meet a - gain, but bro - ken heart - ed, These are not like the tears wept when we part - ed.

2d—Here do we meet again, but, oh! how faded
All the sweet flowers that youth and love braided!
Not one dear link of those garlands around us,

In which the hope-dream of our fancy had bound us!
Here do we meet again, but broken-hearted,
These are not like the tears wept when we parted!

3d—Yet thus to meet again, though 'tis in tears, love!
Something of joy, even rapture appears, love!
Oh! the cold grave, how much dearer we'd find it

Than that living death our farewell left behind it!
Here do we meet again, but broken-hearted,
These are not like the tears wept when we parted!

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

THE SABBATH BELL.

BY LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

WHERE mid the crowded city glide
The gorgeous trains of pomp and pride,
Till even the laboring pavement groans
As folly's surges wear the stones,
And through the reeking air doth rise
The tide of fashion's heartless sighs,
What speaks from tower and turret fair
With solemn knell,
To break the tyranny of care,
And fearless warn the proud to prayer?—
The Sabbath bell.

From yonder cottage-homes where meet
Round the low eaves the woodbine sweet,
And the young vine-flower peering through
The rustic rose-hedge, rich with dew,
Pours on each passing zephyr's breast
A gush of fragrance pure and blest,
What lures gay childhood's throng away?
Why quit they thus at morning's ray
Their sweet sequester'd dell?
What guides them to God's temple-door,
Their holy lessons conning o'er?—
The Sabbath bell.

The chaste'n'd spirit worn with care,
That scarce can lift its burden'd prayer
Above the host of ill that thrust
Its broken pinion down to dust,
That loves the path where faith doth rise
In contemplation to the skies,
Yet crushed beneath a rugged chain
Betakes it to its task again,
What bids its sacred rapture swell,
And brings, though sorrow lift the rod
Communion with its Father-God?—
The Sabbath bell.

And thou, whose glance of rapid ray
Does lightly scan this simple lay,
When to thine eye yon astral spark,
And earthly skies and suns are dark,
What to the fair and lighted hall
Where cherish'd friends hold festival,
What to the pensive, listening ear
The tidings of thy death shall tell?
And summon to thy lowly bier
The bursting sigh, the bitter tear?—
The Sabbath bell.

BENEFITS BESTOWED AND BENEFITS RECEIVED.
—One day the Caliph Almansor was surveying
the ocean, as its waves broke hollowly on the shore, in company with the philosopher Ebon Walid. As they were admiring the magnificent immensity of the vast expanse of waters, and their eternal motion, they beheld two men, one of whom was writing on the sands, over which the tide was about to roll, the other upon a rock.

"You who can penetrate the actions of mortals, tell me what can these men be doing?" said the caliph.
"Commander of the Faithful," replied Ebon Walid; "he who is writing on the sands is doubtless recording the favors he has received, while the other is engraving on the imperishable adamant the benefits he has bestowed on others."

AN EXCELLENT SPEECH.—When Louis the fourteenth visited Rheims, the mayor brought with him some bottles of wine, and some fine preserved pears, and addressed him as follows: "Sire, we offer you our wine, our pears, and our hearts, which are the best things our city can boast of." Louis tapped the mayor on the shoulder familiarly, and replied, "Mr.
Mayor, I thank you heartily for your harangue."

STANZAS

TO THE MEMORY OF JAMES OTIS ROCKWELL.

BY J. F. ROGERS.

Let me not mutely pass the grave of him
Whose spirit was ethereal:—though his lyre
Be low and broken, and his glory dim,
Earth stifeth not life's essence—and the fire
Of genius shall be fed by kindred song,
In tribute, loud and long.
Even now thou art before me, as in youth
We strayed by flowery hill and winding stream—
Or at our parting, when in sterner truth,
Manhood had stol'n upon us like a dream;
When fate gives each a different path to roam,
And points to a far home.
Yet thou hast battled with this life's cold storm,
And sunk, alas! too early into rest;
And death hath changed the features of that form,
And quench'd the lightning of thy noble breast;
There will be tears above thy grave, and mine
Shall be upon that shrine.
Why dreams the mind of an immortal sphere
Rich with fresh laurels,—where to gather back
The hopes and visions which were bonded here,
Within the narrowness of earth,—to track
The invisible paths of glory, and reclaim
A crown, and victor's name?
Behold how strong and silently that tomb
Locks up its fallen victim!—let him not
Be as those flowers that waste their early bloom
In the same dust,—his glory be forgot
Like yesterday's lost sunshine, nor his power
Be absent in this hour:—
For influence dies not with us. He may rest
In death a while, yet resting he may fling
An impulse to the world;—even his lone breast
Like a rich incense-vase, may swiftly bring Itself to ashes, but the sweet perfume
Will rise, and not consume.

There are some spirits that pursue the goal,
Yet striding forth they seem too proud and tall
For earth's contracted limits; and thy soul
Was temper'd with this fire. Alas! they fall,
And genius breaks its prison,—see it soar
Upward, to fall no more!
Give tribute to the dead,—bring fresh green flowers
From vale and forest, and meteors from the sky;
Bring from the ocean gifts of coral bowers,
And from the earth those gems that never die—
And songs—bid memory number not its years;—
Bring all, and with them—tears!

EXTRAORDINARY TRIUMPH OF ELOQUENCE.—A certain town in Italy sent a deputation to Urban fifth, who was very ill, soliciting some favor. The orator, without any mercy to the sick man, made a long tedious discourse. "Have you any thing more to say?" asked his holiness, impatiently.
"Nothing," replied the orator, "except that if you do not grant our request, I am instructed to recite my speech over again." His holiness immediately ordered that all his demands should be freely and instantaneously complied with.

GRANTING MORE THAN IS ASKED.—A pious lady had offered up a petition to St. Rabboni, for the conversion of her husband. A few days afterwards the good gentleman departed this life. The widow exclaimed in a fervent tone of gratitude, "What an excellent and gracious saint is Rabboni, he even grants us more than we pray for!"

A MOTHER'S LAMENT.

BY THYRA.

ELIZABETH! Elizabeth, thou'rt sleeping in thy shroud,
And silent tears flow over thee, and wailings "deep and loud;"
But on thy face, my perished flower! thy mother may not dare
To gaze and read the fearful change that death has written there.

Elizabeth, my gentle babe! thou wert not made for earth—
A mournful look thy calm sweet face hath worn e'en from thy birth;
I felt that thou wert doomed, and yet as stunning is the blow
As if I ne'er had deemed that thou away from me could'st go.

They bid me come and look upon thy fair but lifeless face,
And the moveless limbs, so playful once, where death has left his trace;
Oh! think they that my stricken heart a sight like this could brook?
No—on that rigid brow of thine for worlds I would not look!

They tell me there is beauty still in that pale cheek of thine,
And the waxen hands which helplessly do by thy sides recline;
But no—I will not look on thee, for oh! I could not bear
To gaze upon thy face and seek the smile that is not there!

To gaze with aching heart upon thy changeless countenance,
Yearning from that closed eye to meet its well-remembered glance;
Those sweet imperfect sounds to catch, for which my thirsting ear
Would yield up all earth's melodies, but once again to hear!

Elizabeth, my beautiful! how could I bear to press
My lips to thy unconscious ones, in all their iciness?
I have beheld thy face too oft in beauty and in bloom,
To view it now when cold and pale, and destined for the tomb.

Too fearful is the thought to me of coffin, shroud, and pall—
Oh! not arrayed in these, my babe! would I thy form recall,
But in thy living loveliness and smiles of infant glee,
Oh! thus may thy remembrance, sweet, forever visit me!

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

CITY RAMBLES.

DID you ever read any thing more delightful in their way, Messrs. Editors, than Miss Mitford's sketches? How thoroughly they are embued with the genuine taste for the poetic and beautiful in nature. There is a summer brightness and luxuriance in her imagination, and, to me, it is as delicious to escape from the triste pomposity of more learned writers, to the brilliancy and freshness of her pages, as it is to steal from the eternal jangle of business, and all the jostle and din of the city, and to sit down on some grassy bank where the whirring of the bird's wing, and the warble of his song are heard with the sound of the many branches, and where some dimpling and transparent brook, leaps on its course with the silvery bubbles floating and flashing on its surface, and the dash of its tiny waves bursting out like the laughter of a beautiful and happy child. The influence of such a writer upon the moral world is inestimable. She imparts not the mysteries of science; she teaches happiness. She directs the attention to the picturesque groupings which are continually forming and breaking away around us. Her sadness is like the shadow of a cloud, which, if dissolved into the shower, only leaves the heavens bluer, the grass and woods greener, and all nature more animated than before. I never met a mind more susceptible of every varying and delicate influence. It is a finely toned instrument upon which every passing event makes music. Her tenderness is that of the poet, or the woman, while her mirth has the irrepressibility, (if I may say so) the unchecked revelry of health and youth. Her delineations of character are transcripts from nature. I should deem them drawn in a moral camara obscura. In her portfolio, bright heads of children, and animated forms of dogs delight you like the fine imaginative decorations of a painter's room; but when she roams over the country, when she watches the opening graces of spring, the flash and gaiety of summer, the quiet golden richness, and lavish abundance of autumn, or the iciness, and the desolation of winter—while she approaches, in excellence and feeling, the author of the "Seasons," she surpasses him in versatility and irresistible humor. In these qualities she is nearer Washington Irving. I fancy I see her pause on the summit of a hill to catch the effect of a fine landscape, to contemplate the coloring of the sky, trace the winding of the silvery river, or the outline of the blue aerial mountain, the streaming of the sunset light through the illumined grove, and the long shadow upon the lawn, or to muse, peradventure, upon the spirited attitude of a sweet, unconscious child, or an old beggar, or a wearied out angular rosinante before a dilapidated antique cart, or the sunny face of a girl, or any of the graceful and beautiful things from the admiration of which a man of poetic temperament drinks draughts of delight, almost sufficient to compensate him for the ruggedness of his own path, the loneliness of his own bosom. Then her sketches are so evidently drawn from nature; so free from pedantry, Latin and Greek, business and bookishness. So fresh and original! By original I do not mean a very extraordinary manner of relating incidents which no being ever dreamed of before. No startling theories, no trap-doors, dungeons, and other horrors; but I mean that what she writes is the result of her own feeling and observation, not of her reading.

After this opinion of the fair essayist, would you not think "much learning had made me mad" should I audaciously presume to offer you a composition written in something of the same plan? If she has discovered so many admirable themes for thought and description in her secluded village, it is but probable that a city like ours cannot be destitute of materials equally valuable for either the pencil or the pen. It was but the other evening that I was awakened from a deep slumber by a cry of fire. There is something singularly expressive in the human voice. The same shout frequently breaks the stillness of the night and my sleep, without exciting my attention sufficient to induce me to rise. But this one was sudden, distinct and startling, with something in it of emotion which convinced me it was uttered by one who beheld the flames. I accordingly hastened to the window. It was a quiet, starry night. The houses on the opposite side of the street in which I resided, and apparently within a quarter of a mile of my dwelling, reflected a brilliant glare of light, and volumes of fiery smoke rolled upwards with the motion of heavy billows towards the reddening sky. The shout multiplied from all quarters—the deep-toned bells began to toll—figures here and there rushed rapidly towards the scene of action—an engine thundered over the pavements—beneath my window the forms of the firemen in their huge caps and jackets shown like demons in the red dusky gleams of the torches—hoarse voices, with shouts and imprecations, urged each other onward. Hastily clothing myself, I sallied forth and hurried to the conflagration.

There is nothing in nature more beautiful than fire, and more terrible in its beauty. When thus arrayed for purposes of ruin, it conveys to me an impression similar to that which I receive from the sight of a powerful serpent. There is the same fatal brilliancy, the same fearful grace and relentless spirit of destruction, and the same admirable fitness as emblems of the infernal regions. In darkness this wonderful element exhibits its grandeur with a more magnificent effect. The roofs of lofty buildings, and summits of chimneys; the tall steeples and swelling domes, shone vividly in the distance, painted by the lurid glare. Dense masses of smoke in the intervals of a slight breeze, shrouded the blaze and darkened the scene, till leaping and glistening, through the gloom like a sheet of lightning from the brooding cloud, the flame again dazzled the eye, and made the "darkness visible" with a radiant but dim and melancholy lustre. The conflagration had burst forth in a stable in the rear of a large wooden church, and in the midst of a closely crowded block of buildings, mostly of the same materials. A long season of intensely hot weather, without rain, had rendered them uncommonly combustible. The wind was sufficiently strong to increase the fury of the element into an ungovernable rage that resembled madness; and the cry went forth through the crowd that there was no water to be obtained, till the engines could form a line to the river, the distance to which was great: in the meantime, the flame was running rapidly along the roof of the church, at first gently curling, and gradually extending to the rear and front. The crowd collected—the wind increased—the frame building was soon blazing with incalculable fury, and the flame communicated to the several adjoining houses. In less than half an hour, the rear of the church was completely consumed: a vast sheet of fire washed over it like an ocean—the interior was brightly visible; the pews, bannisters, galleries, carved columns and white ceilings, yielded rapidly to the intense heat—timber crackling—walls crashing—chimneys falling—furniture tumbling from windows—men shouting through trumpets—engines thundering—women screaming—glass breaking—earth trembling beneath our feet—the vast multitude swarming like bees in their hive, rocking and heaving in the narrow streets, and clustering on the steps, lamps, windows, and the broad arch of heaven burning and glowing above, all formed a scene of sublime grandeur.

The city cannot be too grateful to the body of daring firemen who nightly risk their lives in defence of our property. The soldier who exposes himself in the battle for his country, scarcely incurs more peril, or deserves more praise. The confusion continues. Here you may behold a heap of furniture, there a group of persons just escaped from the flames. Mark yonder building with the brick front, and nearly destroyed—the ravenous blaze is feeding on the ruins in which fancy pictures many a group of domestic peace and hope. The frame work is consumed—the front totters—the firemen place their long heavy ladders against it.—Hark!—crash!—up to the sky flash the expiring flames, and then sink with the heap of crumbled ruin. That poor dwelling belonged to a widow with a large family nearly dependent upon her exertions. She was even too indigent to get it insured. With what feelings will she greet the returning day. A fine boy has escaped from his home, and is eagerly yielding to the excitement of the scene. He dashes fearlessly through the crowd and seizes the rope of the engine; but, his foot slips—he falls—the dreadful machine rushes on—a smothered scream is faintly heard amid the dreadful surrounding din, and now a trampled and bleeding body is born senseless through the crowd to blast some fond mother's sight, and strike her bosom with horror and anguish unutterable.**

The heavens are shining again with all their stars. The vast city is wrapped in shadows. The pealing bells have ceased. Silence is in the streets: all, except a low confused sound from the spot where death and destruction have been at work. You may hear the faint hum, like the subdued roar of the sea, when the storm has passed away, or the hush of the field of battle after the conflict. Wearied and exhausted firemen are slowly dragging home their engines. Morning breaks in the east!**

The noonday sky overspreads the gay Broadway. Steeds are prancing, and flashing chariots glittering in the sun. The voice of youth and pleasure is around me: forms of beauty and splendor, dazzling jewelry, tempting pictures, sunny eyes, and slender feet. The wealthy are purchasing luxuries, the joyous giving loose to mirth. Why at such a moment should my melancholy thoughts steal back to the wreck and the ruin—to the desolate dwelling of the widow, the mangled form of that fearless boy, and to the family at whose festive board, hereafter, his bright head must be missed? SEDLEY.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The New-England Magazine. No. L. July, 1831. By J. T. & E. Buckingham. Boston, Munroe & Francis. New-York, Charles S. Francis. 8vo. pp. 96.

ATTEMPTS have been frequently and unsuccessfully made to establish American monthly reviews. We trust this well-printed and well-written work will not share the fate of its predecessors. It is impossible to form an accurate opinion from the first number of any publication; but this, under the auspices of the Messrs. Buckingham, promises very fair. By promises we do not mean it pledges itself to excel every thing else of the kind, for its prospectus is as sensible and modest as a youth of sixteen; but the character of the matter is decidedly good. We relished, among others, an article on Lord Byron, independent, firm, and rational; and a pleasant hit at the times, which we extract, entitled

THE PROGRESS OF EXAGGERATION.

The rapidity which a story, like a snow-ball, gains in its progress, has been frequently illustrated. The tendency to exaggeration was never more manifest than at the present day. A trifling skirmish of outposts, by the time it has undergone a translation through one or two newspapers, gets to be a bloody engagement; and a riot is sometimes magnified into a revolution. The characters of men are subject to the same process; and the most ordinary partizan, raised to an office by political intrigue, by the time his name has gone the rounds of the newspapers, gets to be a man of talent and worth—equally to his own astonishment and that of the public. We have seldom seen this tendency to add a little to the current report, at each repetition, acted upon with less scruple, than in the following extracts, which we give to our readers as we find them.

NUMBER ONE.

It is well known, that the common domestic fowl is remarkably fond of rose-bugs. The abundance of this insect, the present season, promises a rich repast to the tenants of the poultry yard.—Massachusetts Farmer, for June the fifteenth.

NUMBER TWO.

We see it remarked in the Massachusetts Farmer that, as the common domestic fowl is remarkably fond of rose-bugs, a rich repast will be enjoyed by this portion of the feathered race, the present season, the insect alluded to being quite abundant. It has occurred to us, that it might be a matter of economy, worth attending to by those who keep fowls for the market, to collect these insects, as an article of food, as they must be considerably cheaper than Indian meal; and, as it is said, in consequence of the horny nature of their wings, no addition of gravel is required for the purposes of digestion.—New-England Husbandman.

NUMBER THREE.

IMPORTANT TO AGRICULTURISTS.—We observe it stated in substance, in the Massachusetts Farmer of June fifteenth, that the attention of one class of our husbandmen has lately been called to a subject which is likely to turn out of the very first importance, both to the farmers and to the inhabitants of our cities. It is well known that good fowls are a very important article of supply, in the domestic economy; but that, in consequence of the dearthness of Indian corn, their price has of late been so much enhanced, as to place them beyond the reach of a considerable portion of our citizens, who are consequently reduced to an unsatisfactory diet of beef and mutton-chops. It appears that, in consequence of the great abundance of rose-bugs the present season, and the known fondness of the domestic fowl for this insect, our farmers have set about collecting them, as an article of food for their poultry; and, as we understand, the fowls never came into market so plump and fat. An incidental advantage of considerable importance is, that, in consequence of the horny nature of the wings of the rose-bug, the fowls require no gravel. This interesting fact will not escape the attention of those who are curious in their gravel-walks, and who wish to preserve them from the dilapidation produced by their being promiscuously frequented by domestic poultry.—American Economist.

NUMBER FOUR.

SOMETHING NEW.—The Massachusetts Farmer of the fifteenth of June informs us, that a considerable reduction has taken place in the price of southern corn, in consequence of the abundance of rose-bugs, which our farmers, in all directions, are collecting for their poultry. Dough is now served out in the farm-yard only on Sunday mornings; the remainder of the week the fowls are kept to the bug, and are found to thrive remarkably well. Letters from some of the principal houses on Long-wharf have gone on to the south, countermanding their orders for shipments of corn, the demand for which is already nominal. We also learn from the same paper, that as the hard wings of the rose-bug are found to take the place of gravel, the destruction of gravel-walks by the poultry has entirely ceased, and the sale of the hammerings of granite, at the state prison, which have been extensively used in repairing gravel-walks, has been almost wholly arrested. Whether any disturbances are likely to take place at the prison, in consequence of the convicts being thus, in part, thrown out of employ, we are uninformed. Should this be the case, we trust that the sagacity of some of our distinguished citizens will be exerted, to devise some way in which the safety of the prison can be reconciled to the reduction of the demand for hammerings, consequent upon the abundance of rose-bugs.

Since writing the above remarks, we learn that boys are out in every direction collecting the bug.—Mass. Agriculturist.

NUMBER FIVE.

THE ENTOMOLOGICAL SYSTEM.—Our friends have doubtless heard of the Tullian system, (not Marcus but Jethro,) and the soiling system in agriculture; but we believe the entomological system is likely to prove of more importance than either. We perceive a brief sketch of it in the Massachusetts Farmer for June fifteenth, where it is described, as practised by a distinguished agriculturist of Massachusetts. It has long been a fact, well known to practical farmers, that the common domestic fowl, (gallus gallinaceus), is remarkably fond of rose-bugs. Many of our readers have doubtless witnessed the mode, in which even the young chicken seizes a bug in his beak, rubs him once or twice on the ground, and then swallows him, and catches at another. In consequence of the abundance of rose-bugs the present year, it has occurred to some of our enterprising husbandmen, to make a business of collecting the bug, as food for their poultry. The idle boys, of which unfortunately too many are found in every community, have been, in general, employed for this purpose, and paid a cent a pint for as many as they could collect. A pint, it was found, was adequate food for two fowls for a day, without requiring any gravel, in consequence of the horny nature of the wings. Our readers will perceive the vast importance of this discovery to the trade in southern corn. We hear that the demand for it has nearly ceased. In consequence of this new diet, it has also been found that the poultry have ceased their depredations on the gravel-walks, and the hammerings of the granite have ceased to be called for at the state prison. Some doubts existing as to the precise cause of the marked abstinence of the poultry from the gravel-walks, an intelligent and scientific agriculturist constructed two coops, each twenty feet long, four wide, and two high, and placed them on each side of his front door, on two gravel-walks, forming the approach to his house. Four dozen fowls were enclosed in each, and fed in one coop, with bugs, in their natural state, and in the other with bugs whose wings had been removed. At the end of a week the coops were removed; the walk beneath the former was untouched, while beneath the latter every particle of gravel had disappeared. These few facts seem to show that the entomological system is likely to produce the most astonishing effects on the industry of the community. We wait for further developments with anxiety.—United States Thrasher.

NUMBER SIX.

SOMETHING SINGULAR.—We notice in the Massachusetts Farmer for June fifteenth, a brief reference to some very curious and important facts. Our readers are generally acquainted with the change which has taken place in the feeding of poultry; the introduction of the entomological diet, as it has been happily called; the consequent reduction in the price of corn, the almost entire suspension of the demand for granite hammerings; and the employment given to a large number of poor children, in collecting rose-bugs, at a cent a pint. Very curious details on this subject are contained in the Massachusetts Farmer for June fifteenth. The subject is one of importance; but we have not time, at present, to go deeply into details. We understand that an intelligent and enterprising husbandman has undertaken to furnish good fowls in the market at ninepence a pair. The eggs are to be hatched in furnaces, gently heated with Lehigh coal, and the chickens immediately supplied with the new food. All the eggs in the vicinity have been purchased for this new establishment, and a custard-pudding is no where to be seen, not even at our best tables. This is a privation to which, we trust, our citizens will cheerfully submit, as they will shortly be much more than recompensed by the reduced price of poultry. Nor is it to be forgotten that, in consequence of the collection of the rose-bugs, as food for the chickens, the rose-bushes will escape their ravages, and that we shall immediately be able to buy our distilled rose-water and conserve of roses at a much reduced price.

We feel it, however, our duty, as faithful journalists, to advert to an unforeseen check, which has been encountered by the enterprising husbandman alluded to. About five pecks of rose-bugs were emptied into his farm-yard on Monday morning, where five or six dozen of chickens are kept. The bugs were mostly alive, and having been kept long without food, were themselves naturally hungry. The yard presented no verdure on which they could fix themselves, and the consequence was, that while the chickens were employed in picking them up, a portion of the bugs from the large heaps, into which they were thrown in the yard, fastened on the chickens, and when our paper went to press the latter had the worst of it.

P. S. We understand that one chicken, naturally feeble, has given out, and retreated to one corner of the yard, covered with the insects.—The Ploughman's Friend.

NUMBER SEVEN.

UNPLEASANT.—We always experience a sentiment of regret at being called, as conductors of a public press, to record the obstacles which occasionally present themselves in the execution of the most sagacious plans. Our readers are, in general, apprized that a new system of husbandry was bidding fair (and we will not permit ourselves to doubt, still bids fair) to be introduced among us, superseding the demand for southern corn, and enabling the farmer to afford our own corn at a cheap rate, furnishing us the minor poultry in greater abundance, and at a much reduced price, securing our gravel-walks, affording employment to poor children, and placing rose-water within the reach of the most limited resources. The numerous establishments already commenced for raising poultry on this system are well known, and have been hailed by the good wishes of the community. We are concerned, however, to record an adverse circumstance, of an unpleasant character, which has occurred in the first and largest of these establishments; and which, for the moment, has considerably checked the public enthusiasm, and raised the price of southern corn. It is generally known that Mr. Chickenwell had turned his extensive enclosures into a fowlsery, and constructed a range of furnaces for hatching the eggs by artificial heat. He had already brought forward six hundred dozen of chickens in this way, and the indigent population of the neighboring towns was principally employed in collecting the bugs. The demand for the chickens promised to be so great, that the enterprising undertaker felt able to pay the handsome price of a cent a peck for the bugs.

It is unnecessary to dwell upon the importance of the relief afforded to our country towns in this way, in the support of their poor. So many hands have been taken off by this new occupation, that the price of oakum at our neighboring almshouses has been sensibly enhanced, and it is feared the shipping interest may suffer, in the article of calking. We learn from the Massachusetts Farmer of June fifteenth, that on the fifth instant a large waggon load of the rose-bugs was driven into the fowlsery, and emptied on the ground, where they, of course, would have furnished food to the stock for several weeks. The supply having been short for a few days previous, the fowls (as our readers will readily believe) went to work upon the tempting heap, with no little alacrity, and were soon satiated. Meantime, however, the rose-bugs themselves, as might perhaps have been anticipated from the large number collected, and the proportionate length of time they had been in the waggon, were operated upon by the stimulus of appetite; and, in the absence of any other more appropriate food, began to attach themselves, by means of their antennae and legs (of which they have three pairs, furnished with barbs, by which the insect is enabled to adhere with considerable tenacity to foreign substances) to the bodies of the fowls. At first, and while the poultry were busily occupied in enjoying the profuse banquet spread before them, the fowls appeared to pay no attention to the insects with which they were covered. A vigorous shake of their wings and ruffling of their feathers were sufficient to disengage the rose-bugs. In proportion, however, as the fowls became inactive, by repletion, it was observed that their annoyance from the insects increased; although, from the absolute singularity of such an occurrence, neither the fowls themselves, nor the persons who happened to be spectators, seemed to regard it as of any consequence. Meantime, large quantities of the insects, still remaining without food, were constantly emerging from the heap, and fastening on the chickens, who began to manifest signs of fatigue. They retired towards the sides of the yard, rolled themselves frequently in the dust, fluttered their wings, and assumed a ruffled appearance. Some anxiety now began to be entertained in Mr. Chickenwell's establishment as to the result. But it was generally and not irrationally concluded, by the members of his family, that when the usual time for feeding the poultry should arrive, and they should again feel the stimulus of hunger, they would renew their attack upon the rose-bugs with a vigor that would be decisive in its effects. It happened, however, unfortunately, but naturally enough, that the chickens were thrown into a fever, by the irritation and exhaustion occasioned by the rose-bugs, and gave no signs of returning appetite. The usual period of feeding was watched by Mr. Chickenwell's overseer with considerable solicitude; and when it was found that the fowls remained listless, and cowering in the corners of the yard, and evinced no sensation of hunger, the alarm became great, and began to spread itself through the neighborhood. The event proved that it was but too well founded; the fowls refused to eat; new swarms of rose-bugs continued to break loose from the heap, and proceeded to break-fast on their feathered adversary, whose power of resistance grew fainter and fainter. Before long the smaller and less vigorous chickens were destroyed; and it was sufficiently evident that those which had been the stoutest and most active would soon share their fate. We cannot too much applaud the energetic and discreet course pursued by Mr. Chickenwell's overseer. Servants were immediately despatched over the extensive farm, and throughout the neighborhood, to assemble all the full-grown cocks and hens that could be obtained. These were collected in the vicinity of the poultry-yard, placed under the direction of an experienced game-cock, and introduced at once into the enclosure. They instantly hopped forward towards the heap, picking their way with great eagerness. It happened, unfortunately, that the yard was strewn with such of the insects as had been crushed by the chickens in the commencement of the day; these were hastily devoured by the new comers, whose appetite was thereby considerably blunted. A large portion of the heap still remained in its original state, a living, crawling mass of rose-bugs, about two feet high, eight long, and four wide; and the cock-of-the-walk, in advancing toward it, with the sagacity of an experienced combatant, slackened his pace, by way of reconnoitring the strange appearance before him. The other cocks and hens rallied, somewhat cautiously, behind him, as a dove of swine is said to do when attacked by the wolves. The famished insects, meantime, several of which had been four days without food, began to creep forward, en masse, towards this new enemy; the cocks and hens, on their part, trod cautiously, and lifting up their legs, but steadily forward, till at length their leader, having given the signal by crowing and flapping his wings, they all rose in the air, about a foot, flew over the midst of the heap, and settled down upon it. And then began a trampling, scratching, picking, fluttering, flapping, crowing, and cackling, such as probably were never witnessed before. Thousands of the bugs were thrown up into the air; tens of thousands trodden under foot; pulled to pieces; unwinged, deformed, disantennated, and destroyed. But the ravages of the cocks and hens served but to make a sort of hole in the living heap, into which, as the valiant crowsers and cacklers sunk, new swarms of their hungry enemy closed over them, till at length the tallest cocks were almost buried in the crawling mass, and a few combs only reared themselves so as to be visible. These, at length, began, one by one, to sink down and disappear, till nothing was left but the solitary crest of the cock-of-the-walk, occasionally pushed up through the superincumbent load of the insects, and uttering a wild and faint crow,

Advanced, forced back, now high, now low,
The pennon sunk and rose;
As bends the bark's mast in the gale,
When rent are rigging, shrouds, and sail,
It wavered mid the foes.

The moment had now arrived when it was to be definitely settled whether the undisputed mastery of the poultry-yard should be surrendered up to the rose-bugs. The brood of chickens was entirely destroyed; and the cocks and hens, surfeited, exhausted, buried under a ravenous heap of unsatiated insects, must soon follow their fate. What was of still greater moment, the reputation of the entomological diet was at stake. It was a crisis of equal importance and terror; and we must do Mr. Chickenwell the credit to say, that he met it with firmness.

Near the poultry-yard, where this appalling scene was acted, he had raised and kept a large flock of Bremen geese, (anser bremenensis) a stout, voracious, powerful animal, ravenous after insects. Mr. Chickenwell, with a promptness and valor, which did him infinite credit, resolved to charge into the poultry-yard himself, in the rear of his Bremen geese. Arming himself with a long pole, at the end of which a white rag was attached, he mustered the flock before him; addressed them with several animated clucks, waved his rag, caused the gates to be thrown open, and fluttered in. At this moment five or six of the cockerels, by a last convulsive effort, flapped themselves up from the heap, with long thick swarms of the bugs hanging to them, uttered a sound, half scream and half crow, beat the air heavily a moment, and fell down again. The geese were dismayed and panic struck. Mr. Chickenwell (though, to tell the truth, a little staggered himself) clucked forward, but in vain. Not a goose would go up to the scratch against such a portentous adversary. The head gander himself was bewildered at the sight:

Non tulit hanc speciem furiale mente coræbus hanc;

and set up a frightful quake, in which the whole flock joined. At the same moment, they wheeled round, spread their broad wings, rose upon the toes of their webbed feet, and drove Mr. Chickenwell before them out of the yard. The alarm now became general. A turkey-cock who, with widespread tail, erected comb, and distended wattles, was gobbling and strutting down, to inquire into the disturbance, shut up his tail feathers, and joined the flight. A pair of peacocks slanted screeching up to the roof of the house; a tame mocking-bird, in a cage, ran hastily through his gamut of imitation, dogs barked; and a loquacious parrot crooked his bill round, into a sort of note of interrogation, as much as to say—"Is any thing expected of Poll?" The panic spread to the free tribes of air; the quail, in the deep forest, heard the clang, and gathered her fledglings under her wings; a flock of wild ducks, that was hurrying along to the south, contracted its serried phalanx into closer order;

Far, far aloof the affrighted ravens sail,
The famished eagle screams and passes by.

The fate of the system seemed sealed. The news spread to the metropolis; corn and granite-gravel rose, oakum fell, holders of poultry showed an aversion to part with their property at any price, and a general and feverish state of excitement was visible on 'change. Such was the position of things, when we went to press. We shall not fail to keep our readers apprised of the events, which may disclose themselves in the progress of this novel and highly interesting movement of affairs.—The Atlantic Ploughboy.

NUMBER EIGHT.

We omitted in our last paper to apprise our readers that rose-bugs must be boiled before they are given to poultry. Some accidents, we understand, have occurred for want of this precaution.—Massachusetts Farmer of June twenty-second.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

WASHINGTON IRVING.

THE late singular attack upon this gentleman has called forth the following morceau from the Oswego Palladium. Nothing more clearly marks the universal popularity of this writer than the general disgust with which the allegations against him are received. It must be gratifying to him to perceive that where he possesses one enemy, he has thousands of friends.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RICHMOND WHIG.

ON my passage through this place (Oswego) to the Falls, I was infinitely gratified in perusing the literary, moral, and political character of Washington Irving, as sketched by you in a late paper. It is now clear that Mr. Irving has written and lived for nearly a quarter of a century, and in all that time has contrived to cheat the world into a foolish admiration of his talents, and a false estimate of his character and principles.

When the profession of republicanism, in our sense of the word, and in this country, was likely to get more kicks than coppers, Mr. Irving was a mere professor. Now, that in England, reform is approximating its institutions to our own, Wash, as we used to call him, has turned aristocrat and courtier. My old acquaintance formerly was puffed off as a man of temper, though kind and conciliating, yet firm and true. He now appears to be a sycofant and a toad-eater; gad, as old Dennis was wont to say of Addison and Pope, it is not unlikely—I always thought so. Some amongst us on this side of the Atlantic affected to be tickled very early with Knickerbocker's humor, others went so far as to say that in America there might be found even elegance of diction; a class of literary masons secretly revered Knick, as a stock book, until emboldened by its European success, they openly approved it. In the interim, in contempt of rule and criticism, the book ran the round of this continent as if the deuce had been barking at its heels. I recollect being at Longworth's, lounging like a lazy dog my time away, when in comes a respectable matron to ask for Knickerbocker. Longworth, you must know, lived then in Broadway, near the theatre and opposite the Park. By and by in came a three-cornered Dutch hat to inquire for

"—cum quiz et jokezez,
Et roastern, toastern, smoken folkesez,
Fee, faw, yuin."

"What the deuce, Long," said I, "is it they ask for?" "Why, a book written by some one at this place; but I don't think much of it, though there has been a ran for it." "Let me look at it," says I. "There it is," says he, throwing it down on the counter very carelessly. "It will never succeed," says I, after a slight glance. "No," says he, "it has not solidity in it—nothing in it about Burke, or Bony, or Euripid, or federalism, or democracy, or Jefferson, or Adams, or Hamilton, and such like." "Oh," says I, taking another look at it, "sad stuff; an attempt at humor," with a slight elevation of the eyebrows. "Stop," says I again, "here is something about an Indian burning out from the woods, in full dress, with the war whoop, and startling old Hudson, as he sails down the river for the first time. No," says I, "this will not succeed—it is an attempt at fine writing—foolish fellow. That staple cannot be worked up to account in our country." "Well, now," says Long, "I'll tell whose it is if you won't peach." "Not I," says I; so Long whispers— "You don't say so. I might have guessed at Jack, or either of the other brothers, but that thing is too raw. A good fellow, I allow, but I pity him, Longworth;" and turning on my heel, I walk off to read Burke, Aristides, and the Federalist.

Well, about two months after, meeting my old friend Longworth—"You have a decent literary nose for some kind of things," said he, "but that there book is out of your line; why zooks, man, I have had orders for another edition, and another, and another." "Well," says I, feeling devilish mad, and somewhat annoyed, "we shall see." "Oh, but," says Long, "it brings in the pence—why I have not chinked so much cunzie," said he, "since Washington's farewell." "Well," says I, pettishly, "I may be mistaken, but he never graduated; he is neither Grecian, Roman, nor French." "That may be," says he, "but they continue to read him, I believe, out of spite." "Not unlikely," says I, "but I must to the office."

Well, sir, I sailed some years after to Europe to finish my education, and, to my further mortification, at Edinburgh, going into Constable's, I saw Walter Scott with a book in his hand, behind the counter, with his face wrinkled with laughter, "like a wet cloak ill laid up." And what do you think he was reading? Pope, or Swift, or Rabelais, or Gifford? No! by heaven! it was Knickerbocker! "Why, surely, Mr. Scott," says I, "you cannot be amused at that trash—why, sir, it is an American production." "It is, nevertheless, both a humorous and a powerful offe; so much so," replied the bard, "that I have not yet been able to lay it down, nor can I until I have finished." "Strange!" thinks I to myself; "who would have thought it?"

Well, sir, next week I got squeezed or smuggled to a party, at which Jeffrey dined with Scott and other prime swells. Thinking now I had a real authority to smash Scott with, "Sir," said I to the reviewer, in a kind of sneaking, toad-eating, sycofant-like manner, for I was afraid of Jeffrey, "I was surprised, sir, yesterday, to find Mr. Scott highly amused with one of our trashy, namby-pamby, American works." "And pray what might it be?" returned the Edinburgh. "Why, a silly thing, written by a stripling, and called Knickerbocker." Jeffrey's lips curled; he turned up his nose, or his nose turned up, I never could tell which. "Saul of my body, sir," said he, "I must cordially concur with Mr. Scott; and begin to think the time is fast arriving when we shall import something else from your country besides lumber and bread stuffs;" at which coarse jest the company, and particularly Mr. Scott, laughed most unconvincingly. Well, sir, though somewhat puzzled, I was no wise convinced.—Why? Because I knew that Wash was entirely ignorant of the canons of criticism, and had not been used to good studies.

Shortly after, in Italy, I saw Lord Byron, who put on one of his most enchanting smiles when I was introduced to him as an American, and seemed to court my acquaintance. As my ill luck would have it, I said something slightly of old "William-street," i. e. Wash. Gad, sir, his lordship gave me his back—tipped me the cold shoulder—and marched off with a look of immeasurable scorn; and, though I tried hard again to see him, to satisfy him I was right, no one would venture again to present me.

At London, a year afterwards, I got, through our friend Rush, an invite to the Duke of Devonshire's, where, who should I meet but Wash? inter nous, may I be burned never as I then burned with rage, at the fools and aristocrats. Why, sir, they paid no more attention to our accredited minister and plenipotentiary than they did to me. But it was all the time, "Mr. Irving, will you take wine with me?" "Mr. Irving, shall I have the honor?" "Mr. Irving, a slice of this venison?" "Mr. Irving," says a beautiful young lady, "I will take wine with you, if you will allow me the honor!"—"Hang the fellow," says I, "he must carry some drug about him—he has dragged them into actual love of him." This absurd admiration offended me much then, and has astonished me much more since I have lately compared the silly toad-eating namby pamby, with Rush's superb lights on masonry, which you and I so cordially admire. But, sir, it is true, his excellency Rush and I were no more then noticed than the decanters, nor half so much. In going home with the minister, I ventured to express my surprise and mortification. In his usual soft and amiable manner, the minister smiled and nodded, but said nothing, from which I inferred a vaal deal. You know that the ex-secretary is deep—deep, sir, too deep, thinks I to myself, to waste many words on Wash. However, thinks I to myself, I am sure Mr. Rush accords with me. At parting, in his sweetest manner, the minister asked, "Will you wine with me to-morrow?" "Certainly," says I; "where?" "At the Lonnon," says he. So, at eight precisely, I was there, and there again was Mr. Irving, with his affected unpretending air of aristocratic humility. "Well," says I, "this time I can show to whig, radical and tory, what's what. Pray," says I, in a pretty loud, sonorous voice, "Mr. Irving, what is your opinion of the Federalist?" The gentlemen looked up, and the ladies looked curious, and down, and Wash began to blush. "Gad," thinks I to myself, "I've worked him." After an embarrassed pause, "My countrymen," says Mr. Irving, in a low voice, "have already judged so truly, and rank so highly the production you mention, that my opinion cannot add to its established—" "But, sir," returned I, "I ask your opinion; I don't want your countrymen's. Now," said I, "out—out—out with it, Mr. Irving; no shuffling." Gad, sir, he blushed again like a blue blanket, and was completely bamboozled. In truth, it was evident to all the company, who seemed to feel for him, that he was put down. Even our friend Rush was distressed, and tried to draw me off; but I was just hitting Wash again, when Mr. George Lafayette, who happened there at the time, took Irving away from mere pity.

Now, my dear editor, I have come back, and regret to say, that I find the same ridiculous prejudice, the same absurd national pride of Irving's literary character, to prevail. But the time will come when Mr. Irving, like Mr. Pope, will find his level, for Pope is now considered rather low in England, and I am confident that Irving will fall as low here before long.

Permit me, in conclusion, to congratulate you on this, your noble effort to disabuse the public. I sincerely believe that you are the only man in the country whose heart is firm enough, and whose head is hard enough to make the first attempt. May you be as successful as you were against Jackson, in this necessary attack upon an absent individual. It may tend to lower him in the estimation of literary men abroad, as sure as it must at home. But stick to him like a burr, and never mind what the world thinks or says to the contrary, or how passionately mad it be. There are many like us with whom Irving is unpopular; and I have heard numbers, even in our city, say, "God send him a plentiful harvest of such unsavory disfavor as that of the Richmond Whig!" and then they stopped their noses. Yours, TIMOTHY RIGGS.

THE DRAMA.

NEW-YORK THEATRICALS.

NOTWITHSTANDING the termination of the regular season of the Park theatre, the public have been gratified with several well acted pieces, in which Mr. Finn gave great satisfaction. His Mawworm was greeted with animated and lengthened plaudits, particularly from several local allusions in his closing speech to divers late and unpopular events. Mr. Finn's style of playing is broadly ludicrous. His delineations are sketched with a strong and masterly hand, and are generally correct, though sometimes rough likenesses. His conception is original. His Paul Pry elicits much approbation, although quite a different thing from Hilson's admirable personation of the same character. The taste of our theatrical community has been so long fed with the most high-seasoned novelties, Forrest, the two Keans, Macready, Clara Fisher, Burke, Cinderella, and a list of et ceteras, that many never dream of going to witness the mere efforts of our stock company in a known sterling comedy. Yet we were truly amused the other evening by the spirit and humor which was displayed in the "Cure for the Heart Ache." However fashionable it may be to find fault, the entertainment was received with convulsions of laughter, and, if it did not draw an overflowing house, it was not for the want of a most efficient cast. Barnes, as Old Rapid, defies gravity and all his imps. It is one of his best parts, and will yet bear many repetitions. How fine his mixture of vulgar embarrassment and chuckling delight when he finds himself gallanting Miss Vortex—his universal and exuberant servility and overflowing good humor on entering the fashionable circles of the nabob. Mr. Simpson's Young Rapid was, as it always has been, excellent and ludicrous. Placide, as Frank Oatland, spirited, finished, and truly natural. Richings, as Charles Stanley, perfectly at ease—and Blakely made a nabob above mediocrity. We think Field will one day be a useful actor. He has improved much lately. Then where is a Miss Vortex like Mrs. Wheatley? And Mrs. Sharpe, as Jessie Oatland, looked and played well. This lady's part however, in the Hypocrite is better adapted to her powers. She sustained it the other evening with unusual effect.

Whoever wishes to witness a proper exhibition of the tragic muse, and be, "like Niobe, all tears," must go to the Bowery. Mr. Hamblin is presenting a succession of sterling tragedies, for the support of which he has obtained a most efficient company. They possess there one or two "bright particular stars," and also several very visible orbs of the second and third magnitude, and their women are pretty and melancholy. Every lover of legitimate acting—every reverencer of the bard of Avon, must feel interested in the success of this well managed and thriving establishment.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

A WHISPERING GALLERY.—Herschel, in his "Treatise on Sound," informs us, that in the cathedral of Girgenti, in Sicily, the lightest whisper is borne with perfect distinctness from the great western door to the cornice behind the high altar, a distance of two hundred feet. By a most unlucky coincidence, the precise focus of divergence at the former station was chosen for the place of the confessionals. Secrets never intended for the public ear thus became known, to the dismay of the confessors and the scandal of the people, by the resort of the curious to the opposite point—which seems to have been discovered accidentally—till at length one listener, having had his curiosity somewhat over gratified, this tell-tale peculiarity became generally known, and the confessional was removed.

GALVANIC APPLICATION.—An apparatus has lately been invented in England, by means of which the action of galvanism on patients can be so graduated as to allow it to be applied daily either in the same degree or with a gradual increase of intensity. The inventor attributes the small advantages hitherto derived from the application of galvanism in medicine to the fact of the apparatus not having been so disposed as to allow of comparative results being obtained.

HISTORY OF HATS.—At a recent meeting of the London society of Antiquaries, Mr. Repton communicated a very curious and interesting paper on the history of hats, accompanied by eight sheets of drawings of hats and caps, in an infinity of shapes and fashions, from the time of Richard II. up to 1784. He observed, the name hat was derived from a Saxon word, meaning a covering for the head, in which general sense it had been used by early authors, and applied to the helmets of steel. Hats and caps were anciently made of felt, woollen, silk, straw, and various other materials, and were as diversified in their colors. In the time of Elizabeth the common people generally wore woollen caps, and some acts were passed in her reign to encourage the manufacture of them. The broad brims were introduced by the cardinals to their scarlet hats, and followed by the clergy. The inconvenience of the broad brims all round, caused the turning of one side, then two sides were turned up, and, at last, turning up three sides introduced the cocked hat. The high-crowned hat was first worn in the time of Elizabeth, and declined in the reign of Charles II. Mr. Repton then noticed the ornaments of hats, such as feathers, brooches, and bands. Henry VIII. is described, on his entry into Calais, as wearing feathers from India four feet long; and men wore feathers in their hats as late as the reign of Queen Anne. Yew is mentioned as placed in the hat to denote mourning for a deceased relative and friend. The paper contained numerous curious and amusing quotations on the subject from a great variety of authors.

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—Captain King's paper on the coast of South America was concluded at the last meeting of this society. The charts of the coast, and the authorities from which they are drawn, were skillfully criticized, and an interesting account given of the gradual declination towards the south of the high ridge of the Cordilleras, from Chimborazo down to the Cheviot-like hills of the strait of Magalhães. Several discoveries have been made, by Captain King. The climate is very singular, and several proofs are given of its uncommon character. One is the extraordinary warmth of the sea near its surface, compared with the state of the atmosphere. In the month of June, a difference of thirty degrees was found between the temperature of each; the consequence of which is, that the sea is covered with a cloud of steam, and may in some measure account for the prevalence of fogs. Another curious circumstance relating to the climate is, that parrots and humming-birds, generally the inhabitants of warm regions, are numerous in the southern and western parts of the strait—they were even observed on the wing during a snow shower, and after a constant succession of rain, snow and sleet; the latter have been seen sucking the sweets of the fuschia and other flowers, while the thermometer was at the freezing point.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

BAD HABITS.

As perfection is not to be found on earth, it is not surprising that there should be no one free from some of the various ways of speaking and acting which have a tendency to render us, all on some occasions, disagreeable or ridiculous. It is, however, curious to note what keen eyes many have for the inadvertencies of others, while they are not only absolutely blind to their own, but will fly into a great passion, or settle down into a secret enmity against such as insult them by detecting any of their bad habits. How much wiser and happier the world would be, if, instead of ferreting out and railing against the faults of others, each individual would seriously occupy himself in correcting his own. It is so difficult for the most benevolent and best meaning person to exist without contracting some peculiarity which custom fastens upon him without the sanction of reason, that we may safely pronounce it an impossibility. This is a sad truth, however mortifying it may be to our vanity. If we dwell in solitude, the most abominable and awkward errors will creep into our manners and minds, and if we associate with the crowd, we will insensibly imitate their ways and catch their propensities, and will soon familiarize us to practices, which at first were disgusting and frightful. Thus we entirely overlook the most glaring violations of good taste and propriety in ourselves, while we wonder at the blindness and folly of other people.

"That monster custom, which all sense doth eat

I could extend my researches touching the moral aberrations of the world, into a very long article, but my business at present is rather with the petty instances of bad habits which interfere with the comfort and convenience of the social circle, and are both more frequent and more undisguised from the fact that they are not regarded as absolutely guilty or disgraceful.

I have one friend who, by way of a salutation, grasps my hand with the force of a vice, and when I writhe under his iron grip, exhibits tokens of sly pleasure at my involuntary and extorted acknowledgments of his muscular powers. Another, when he sees me in the street, invariably steals up behind me, and startles me with such a slap on the shoulder as seriously qualifies my pleasure in the meeting. "What a vile habit," said a friend of mine, the other evening, at the theatre, and in a loud tone of voice, while I was extremely interested in what was passing on the stage; "what a vile habit it is for gentlemen to sit in the boxes with their hats on. It is astonishing that people cannot consult the rules of propriety and the feelings of others"—and so I lost the sweetest part of a piece of music which I had come on purpose to hear. One man, after having swallowed enough at dinner to satisfy the natural appetite of half a dozen, exhorts his friends to join the temperance societies as the only means of promoting health and saving the nation from ruin; while you may see another cadaverous consumptive looking youth, who is especially careful in regard to diet, cramming his mouth with huge masses of filthy tobacco, ruining carpets, inundating theatre boxes, and making slippery the floors of public places.

I was the other day relating what I deemed an interesting story, to a companion in the street, at his particular request. In the midst of my recital he observed—"Here comes the finest horse in the city. He belongs to Tom I.—, who bought him of —, and so forth. I beg your pardon for interrupting you, but," and so forth. And here let me take occasion to remark, that this genteel method of committing an impertinent action is doubly provoking, inasmuch as it proves the offender to have erred, not from ignorance but carelessness.

I am acquainted with a gentleman who has fallen into a practice really peculiar and laughable. He appears to conceive every body eagerly interested in knowing precisely where he has been, what he has done, and the causes of all his actions. He will entertain you for an hour with a detail of the minutest circumstances respecting himself, his feelings, his diseases, the books he has been reading, his opinions respecting every body, and every thing. For instance, I was hurrying down to one of the steamboats, and fearful of being left, when I met him, and he made at me, as usual, with a general confession.

"I have just been down in Washington street," said he. "I went there yesterday to Mr. Rogers's store, and left my umbrella, and I could not think where the deuce it was. First I thought it was stolen, then that I had left it at the lecture room, then somewhere else. I had no idea of losing it. It cost me five dollars, and I've had it two years come next September. I am going to have"—and so forth.

When one gets clear of such a worthy, he feels as if he had been liberated from the stocks.

Yesterday I was in company with one who makes it a point to get into a fit of impatience a hundred times a day. Every interruption to his will flings him into a frenzy. We were detained by business until our usual dinner hour was past, and he invited me into an ordinary, where he called for a steak and some salad. The waiter disappeared, and several minutes elapsed before my friend was seized with his usual disorder.

"Is our steak done, waiter?"

"Not quite, sir."

I was much amused by watching the symptoms of his disease increase upon him. First he crossed his arms, and looked up to the ceiling, as if resolved to restrain himself, cost what it would; then he changed his position, thrust his hands into his pockets, and patted his foot with a quick motion upon the floor; then he hummed a tune and drummed with his fingers upon the table, repeating at short intervals—"steak ready?"

"Ready in a moment, sir."

Till at length he started up, with an oath, and a resolution to seek his meal elsewhere, when he was arrested in his flight by the appearance of the wished-for object.

There are two extremes into which people fall, and to either of which it would be difficult to award the preference. The one, the habit of slovenliness in dress and general manner: the other, that of over nicety. The victim of the first of these may be frequently encountered. He may be soon detected by the carelessness of his appearance, and the negligence with which he transacts his affairs. He always appears in dishabille—his chin unshaven, and his garments unbrushed. He forgets to scrape his feet when he enters the drawing-room, and leaves a track of mud upon the carpet. If you lend him a book, it will never be returned, or in place of your neat, unsoiled volume, you are vexed with one soiled, and warped, half unbound, and full of dog's-ears. His room, if he is a bachelor, is a curious exhibition of useless expense, abominable waste, and ludicrous confusion; for, while such characters spend twice as much as other people upon their persons, they are strangers to comfort, and are either unable to find what they want, or, when they accidentally lay their hands upon it, discover that it is unfit for use. I could not but smile on being ushered by the servant, into the sleeping apartment of a lazy friend at about nine o'clock, A.M. He was just completing his toilet. A couple of wet towels were splashed down on the carpet, and a new blue coat was lying on the bed. The clothes-brush leaned against the candlestick, and his shaving apparatus figured between a splendid edition of Shakespeare and a volume of the Waverley novels. In one corner of the room was a heap of superannuated old boots and shoes, too good to throw away, and which he had neglected to have repaired, and every chair was occupied with something or other, so that I could not find a seat.

Others, of the opposite description, are not unfrequently seen, who concentrate nearly all the energies of their minds upon their personal accommodation. Neatness is so charming a quality, it is so closely associated in the estimation of all, with purity of character, and delicacy of mind and heart, that even the excess of it I censure with diffidence. Nevertheless every virtue may become a vice by being carried too far. Generosity degenerates into extravagance, courage into rashness, wit into impertinence, and modesty into weakness. So neatness, in many, dwindles down into nervous fastidiousness. I have now in my eye an example of this latter class. A youth of independent fortune, yet whose instinctive propensity to preserve whatever chances to belong to him, makes him avaricious, and whose ceaseless desire to arrange his dress has rendered him, at length, both vain and foppish. His neatness is not the care of a gentleman, but the raving of a fool after admiration, or the selfishness of a miser. He has a library which he will not read himself, for fear of spoiling the books; and his case, therefore, is always locked. He watches the fashions with more attention than he does passing events of the greatest importance, and appears dissatisfied if he has not about his person some article of apparel calculated to attract the notice even of the street-passengers. The breast of his frock-coat is covered with tawdry lace, his pantaloons are not unlike a Scotch plaid, and he has lately absolutely started a fashion of wearing stockings outrageously speckled, or striped in a manner really scandalous. I observed the other day, in one of the fashionable stores in Broadway, a hat quartered into four distinct colors, red, white, green, and black; and I have little doubt when he perceives such a laudable and dignified opportunity of rendering himself conspicuous, he will possess himself of the same, and, perhaps, succeed in entailing upon the sober inhabitants of the town the necessity of wearing such a libel upon republicanism. He has already adopted a diamond ring, and a slender ivory-handled whalebone cane, which never touches the ground, and although he is a true born New-Yorker, (the more the pity) his father having been an honest and respectable grocer, down in South-street, not satisfied with check shirt collars instead of linen, he has actually had the brazen-faced audacity to insult the memory of his ancestors with a pair of monstrous mustachios.

"A fine, sallow, sublime sort of Werter-faced man,
With mustachios which gave (what we read of so oft.)
The dear corsair expression, half savage, half soft,—
As hyenas in love may be fancied to look, or
As something between Abelard and old Blucher."

I hate a bigot upon any subject as a species of monster, or wretches attacked with the hydrophobia; yet, by Hercules, when I meet this thing in the street, I am sorely haunted with a hankering after a horse-whip.

silent, he was never disdainful. On the contrary, one would have thought that in him the qualities of the heart alone had survived the wreck of all others.

I strove to cultivate his acquaintance; but, in spite of that intimacy which generally exists between passengers at sea, I made no progress whatever. Whenever I addressed any questions to him, he answered them, and, if they bore no reference to the secret sentiments of the heart, he sometimes qualified his remarks with occasional reflections. But whenever I touched upon the passions, upon the sufferings of the soul, he instantly relapsed into silence, and, in such cases, the gloom of his countenance prevented me from urging any farther a subject so obviously painful. His judgment was always accurate, because vanity made no part of it. He was the most independent man I ever knew: he was just, because he was impartial, and impartial, because every thing to him was equally indifferent. I easily discerned that his mental faculties were highly cultivated; but, during the whole passage, he never opened a book; apparently, nothing seemed to dissipate, for him, the tedium which weighed heavily on every one else. He used to sit for hours at the stern of the vessel, leaning over the rail, and looking attentively upon the waters as we glided through them. One day he observed:

"How emblematic of life! Thus we pursue our course through the sorrows of this world, and thus do they close again upon our steps."

"How is it possible," said I, "that, at your time of life, you can look upon the world through so dark a medium?"

"He has grown old, indeed, who has outlived hope!"

"But," resumed I, "cannot hope revive?"

"Never!" answered he: then turning upon me a look of the most touching sorrow, he continued: "you feel for me, I know you do; believe me, your compassion touches me nearly, but I cannot unfold to you the secrets of my bosom; do not even desire it; my grief is inconsolable, and every thing, even a friend, would now be useless to me."

So saying, he turned away and left me.

A few days afterwards, I resumed the same topic. I spoke to him of an adventure of my youth, in which the advice of a friend had saved me from committing a grievous fault.

"I should be happy," said I, "to be of equal service to you."

"You are too good," said he, seizing my hand; "but you know not what you ask. You wish to do me a kindness and you would be doing me an injury: real grief needs no confidant: in order to feel the want of a friend's interest, it is necessary to have some glimpse of hope. I have none! Life has no charms for me, and I sometimes almost doubt that I exist."

We soon entered the warm latitudes. It is impossible to describe the beauty of the nights we then enjoyed; the spangled firmament was mirrored in the placid wave. The young passenger observed one evening this magnificent spectacle.

"Infinity is every where. It is there," said he, pointing to heaven; "it is here!" laying his hand on his heart. "And yet how incomprehensible is its mystery! Death indeed may reveal all, or, perhaps, in death all may be forgotten—all! all!" added he, in a trembling tone.

"You do not seriously entertain so guilty a thought?" asked I.

"No!" said he; "who could doubt the existence of God, while looking upon that beautiful sky? God is sovereignly good. I inveigh, not against his dispensations, but against the institutions of mankind."

I frequently endeavored to penetrate the mysterious veil with which he studiously wrapped himself, but my efforts were always fruitless. At length we arrived at Baltimore. The young passenger was enrolled, at his request, as a volunteer in my regiment, under the single name of Edward. We soon took the field, and, in the very first affair we had with the enemy, I perceived that he exposed his life as if he wished to rid himself of it.

"Edward," said I to him one day, "is it impossible for me to be of any service to you?"

"Oh! leave me," said he; "I do not wish that life should have any happiness in store for me."

Soon afterwards, we attacked a fort on the banks of the Schuylkill. Edward, at the head of a mere handful of soldiers, carried the redoubt, sword in hand. I followed all his motions; I know not what secret presentiment made me fear that he had fixed upon that day to meet the end he had long desired. I saw him throw himself in the midst of the enemy's ranks who were defending the inner works of the fort. Wholly engrossed with the idea of saving his life, and giving no thought to my own safety, I received a shot that was aimed at him. Reinforcements came up and saved us from extermination. Edward raised me in his arms, carried me into the fort, bandaged my wound, and supported my drooping head until the arrival of the surgeon. When the wound was declared not to be mortal, the tears flowed from his eyes. He strained me to his heart, saying that I had twice saved his life. From that day until my recovery he never quitted my side; his solicitude and attentions were incessant. Though always serious, Edward sometimes sought to amuse me; the piquancy of his wit never failed to excite hilarity, but he alone seemed insensible to the mirth himself had created. In his attentions to me, during my illness, there was mingled that peaceful tenderness which is generally considered to be the characteristic of female devotedness. He was, however, still silent with respect to himself, and my curiosity began to decrease, for I now feared more to afflict him than I desired to know his history. His elevated sentiments, his polished manners, confirmed me in my opinion that he must have moved in the first circles of society, and I sometimes was surprised that I had never met with him at Paris. I made this observation to him one day, and he answered:

FOREIGN LITERATURE.

Translated from the French for the New-York Mirror.

EDWARD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF OURIKA.

IN TWO PARTS—PART ONE.

I WAS about to return to Baltimore to join my regiment, which formed a part of the French troops employed in the American war, and, for the sake of despatch, I had embarked at L'Orient, on board an armed merchantman. Including myself, the passengers were four in number. One of them interested me from the very moment I saw him. He was a tall young man, and his manners were as unostentatious as his countenance was striking. His pale features, and the unaffected melancholy with which his thoughts, words and actions seemed always imbued, excited in every one a degree of curiosity which he seemed far from being willing to satisfy. Though invariably

"I can refuse you nothing now; but do not expect me to relate my story, I will endeavor to transcribe it."

I soon had cause to regret that I had accepted his offer, for he again fell into the melancholy which his anxiety for me had momentarily dispelled. Soon afterwards he entered my apartment with some papers.

"My task is over," said he; "it has been painful indeed: the passions that but slumbered, I deemed dead. In recalling to my mind the details of the past, I have suffered unutterable torture; but no more of that at present. All I have to entreat of you is, that my privacy may be uninterrupted for this day. We will meet once more, perhaps for the last time."

He retired, and I perused his manuscript. It was as follows:

I am the son of a celebrated lawyer of Paris; my parents were from Lyons, and for many years my ancestors had occupied the most honorable offices to which the better class of bourgeois can aspire. One of my grandfathers fell a victim to the epidemic disease which desolated Lyons in the year 1748. His memory is still revered by his fellow-citizens. My father was destined to the bar, where he highly distinguished himself; so much so, that it was customary never to settle any important transaction until it had been previously submitted to him. As I was his only child, he wished to take upon himself the sole charge of my education, and, when I was ten years of age, he left Paris, with my mother and myself, and retired to Lyons, in order to devote his whole attention to the purpose of instructing me. In some respects, I more than realized his expectations; in others, I fell far beneath them. As I learned with uncommon facility, I derived no benefit whatever from the knowledge I acquired. I loved solitude; above all, I loved to behold the setting sun. I could have spent entire days, at the extremity of the peninsula upon which Lyons is situated, contemplating the waters of the Saone and Rhone, as they united, and feeling as if my thoughts and my existence mingled with their currents. When called to my studies, I applied myself to them without disgust indeed, but also without zeal. My father sometimes endeavored to draw me into conversation, but it was my memory alone that answered; my mother sought to read my heart, by the most insinuating tenderness; but, even in her affectionate embrace, I felt at the bottom of my soul a vacuum, which nothing could supply.

My father possessed, amid the mountains of Forez, some forges and a dwelling. We used to spend there the two holiday months, which always glided by too soon for me. The situation of the spot might be termed romantic. The river, by means of which the forge was worked, descended rapidly and foamingly into a basin, immediately above the works, where it formed an expanded sheet of water; below, it turned suddenly aside, and disappeared between two pine-clad hills. The village was situated two miles above, on the banks of the stream; and every morning its population, almost wholly composed of mechanics attached to the works, might be seen wending their way to the toils of the day. Their sooty brows and tattered garments formed a singular contrast with their unconstrained mirth, their dances, and their songs. This forge was for me, in the country, what had been at Lyons the extremity of the peninsula, and the majestic river Rhone. It was impossible to entice me away from my musing at night, when the forge was in its fullest splendor; torrents of fire escaping from the furnaces, like flames from the crater of a volcano, threw a ruddy light upon the surrounding scenery, and gave to every object an almost spectral appearance, while ever and anon the workmen seemed to flit along, recalling to my mind the fabled satellites of Vulcan at their work. I woke from these meditations as others do from dreams.

Notwithstanding, I was no stranger to the sports of infancy. I chiefly delighted in those where peril was incurred. I scaled the most inaccessible rocks, I climbed the loftiest trees. I associated with myself other boys in my enterprises; I was their leader, and I felt proud to surpass them in boldness and address. Sometimes I prohibited their imitating my example, and danger lost its zest for me when I saw that it was shared by another.

I was now about fourteen years old; I was far advanced in my studies, but still the acquisition of knowledge brought me no solid advantage. My father already despaired of awakening in me that intellectual ardor, without which all that the mind can acquire is but a useless treasure, when a circumstance, apparently trivial in itself, touched the secret chord to which my heart responded, and opened to me a new existence.

I have already spoken of my juvenile amusements; one of these was crossing the river, by jumping from rock to rock. The danger was great; for, on nearing the forge, the stream being compressed rushed violently over a precipice upon the wheels, which it set in motion. One day a boy, younger than myself, said to me,

"What you are doing is not so difficult."

"Try it, then," said I.

He sprang forward, made a few steps, slipped, and disappeared in the basin. I unhesitatingly plunged in, and seized him. My strength soon began to fail me, and we were already within a short distance of the wheels, when the workmen came to our assistance. My father and mother tenderly embraced me, and I felt my young heart beat as I returned their caresses.

I returned to my studies with renewed energy; I now understood what before I had only heard. I learned to admire what was good, to be animated by what was great. It seemed to me that I had never yet fully comprehended my father's soul. Thus a young tree, that has long been stunted in its growth, suddenly extends its branches, shoots up, and we are astonished at the beauty of its foliage; it is because it has found the stratum of earth best adapted to its subsistence; and so it was with me; I had encountered the soil most congenial to myself, I had risked my life to save another's.

My father, encouraged by my successes in my studies, opened to me the regions that are traversed by the imagination alone. Law was my chief study; but, from the manner in which it was conducted, it embraced all others. Laws were made for men and morals of every age; necessity created them; they are the companions of history, and the solution to every enigma; they contain no mystery for those who can study them, no contradiction for those who can understand them.

My father was the most amiable of men; he possessed in the highest degree the art of extracting mirth from reason, and of exposing the ridiculousness of fallacy when opposed to common sense.

I now dreamed of glory, admiration, and happiness, but I never looked for them beyond the limits of my intended profession. Noble profession! that espouses the cause of the oppressed against the oppressor, that confounds crime, and makes innocence triumph over guilt. My reveries, which now assumed a more substantial appearance, continually placed before my mind the opportunities I should have of distinguishing myself; and I created wrongs in imagination, that I might have the happiness to redress them.

Although a total change had taken place in my disposition, my tastes still remained the same. As I had always done before, I still eschewed society; I could not associate with persons, highly respectable, no doubt, but still who did not approach the beau ideal I had chosen as a model for myself, and which was no other than my father.

My mother was possessed of much penetration; she had a great respect for received opinions. I never knew her to differ from my father but upon one point. Alas! I now find that she was right! My father owed the most of his talents and celebrity to a profound knowledge of the human heart. I have heard him say that his briefs seldom went as far in establishing his opinion of a suit as the insight which he never failed to have into the hearts of the parties interested. This penetration and this tact were qualities which he endeavored to instill into me. He wished to lay society before my eyes, as soon as he should have perceived that a love of what was good, a rectitude of purpose, and my faculty of observation should have been sufficiently matured to derive from a knowledge of the world the advantage he hoped I would obtain.

My father had the good fortune to save, in a celebrated suit, both the fortune and the honor of the Marshal d'Olonne. The relations which this affair had established between them gave rise to a friendship, which, for the space of thirty years, had never suffered diminution. Notwithstanding the difference of their ranks, their intimacy had continued the same, so true it is that equality of minds alone constitutes the only real bonds in life. An animated correspondence prevented their intimacy from growing cool; never did a month elapse without my father's receiving letters from the marshal, and the most unreserved confidence existed between them. It was in his elevated sphere that my father intended to introduce me, as soon as I should have attained my twentieth year. My mother endeavored to dissuade him from his purpose.

"Why introduce Edward," she was accustomed to say, "into society which will give him a distaste for our peaceful home?"

"A lawyer," my father would reply, "should be acquainted with all ranks, and early become accustomed to the urbanity of a court, so as not to be dazzled by it. It is in the world alone that he can acquire both purity of language and gracefulness of conversation. Society teaches the respect that is due from one individual to another; as well as that indefinite science of tact, which, while it acknowledges no fixed principles, is nevertheless looked upon as something, an ignorance of which would be an unpardonable defect."

"What you say is true," replied my mother, "but I should prefer that Edward should remain in ignorance of all the refined laws of etiquette, if their possession can only be obtained at the expense of happiness."

"Among unequals, no society can sort."

"Your quotation is very applicable," interrupted my father, "but the poet alludes to equality of minds, not equality of rank, and I perfectly agree with him on this point."

These discussions were frequently renewed; but as I really wished to go, my mother was at length induced, though with unfeigned reluctance, to submit.

I shall rapidly pass over the two years that elapsed before the arrival of this period. My time was employed in serious studies, such as law, mathematics, and the sciences; yet still, passing strange as it may appear, this arid labor, which ought to have calmed my buoyant temper, left me as it found me, such as nature formed me, and such as I shall continue to the last.

I looked eagerly for happiness at the age of twenty, but instead of it, fate dealt me her sternest blow. On the eve of our departure for Paris my fond mother was taken ill, and, after languishing for six months, she expired in my arms. Providence spared her the agony of witnessing my unhappiness, and me that of rending her heart. She did not live to see me fall into that snare which her experience had discovered, and from which she in vain had endeavored to warn me. Alas! even now, can I say that I regret the loss of peace of mind, or that I wish for that tranquil existence she hoped I would enjoy? Certainly not; the despair that has settled upon me is dearer than all the common joys of life. It shall be my glory in death, as it has constituted the charm of my youth; at the age of twenty-three all that remains to me of life is but the memory of my gone days of felicity; my life draws near its close, and if the future for me has no joys, at least it has no terrors.

In the month of November we started for Paris, and went to the house of one of my uncles. Unfortunately the Marshal d'Olonne was at Fontainebleau, and was to return only in a fortnight. This interval my uncle employed in showing me all the sights of Paris, the theatres, concerts, Mademoiselle Arnould, &c. &c. I was already well nigh weary of the metropolis, when my father received a note from the marshal, informing him of the latter's arrival in town, and inviting him to dinner that day, and concluding with the expression of his desire to see me. How gratifying to my self-love was this attention on his part!

I shall relate my first visit to the hotel d'Olonne, because it made a forcible impression upon me. I had been accustomed to magnificence at my uncle's, Mr. d'Herbelot, but all the luxury of a wealthy farmer-general's dwelling bore no analogy to the noble simplicity of the marshal's mansion. The past served as ornament to the present; family portraits, bearing names celebrated in history, and dear to France, adorned most of the apartments. I felt a certain sentiment of respect in beholding this vast abode, where numberless generations had succeeded each other, imparting additional lustre to wealth and rank, rather than deriving honor from their possession. I recollect the minutest circumstances of this my first visit, because then I examined every thing with a lively curiosity; all that has succeeded is concentrated in one sole thought.

There were but five or six persons in the drawing-room when we entered. The marshal was in conversation, leaning on the mantelpiece; he immediately walked up to my father, and took both his hands.

"My friend, my excellent friend," exclaimed he, "at length you have come. And your son, too; how kind! Edward, do you know that you have come to see the man who, of all others, most loves your father, most honors his virtues, and owes him the deepest gratitude?"

I replied that I had been accustomed to hear the praises of the Marshal d'Olonne.

"And have you been told," continued he, "that I was to have been a second father to you, if you had not been so happy as to preserve your own?"

"Sir, I needed not that misfortune to teach me gratitude."

He took occasion from these few words to praise my appearance and manner to my father; for he knew well that by so doing he could not better flatter a parent's pride.

The conversation was resumed. I heard the names of the gentlemen present; they were celebrated scientific and literary characters, and one was an Englishman, a distinguished member of the opposition. The conversation turned upon criminal jurisprudence, as it exists in England. I confess I felt a sensation of pride when I saw how much importance was attached to my father's opinion on any question of moment. He was listened to with attention and respect. The superiority of his mind seemed to have placed him suddenly above those who surrounded him, and his venerable gray hairs added authority and dignity to all his words. It is the fashion to admire England. The Marshal d'Olonne supported that side of the question which was favorable to the institutions of England, and those who maintained the reverse opinion had chosen a bad ground for their defence. My father instantly placed the question in its proper light. He represented the jury as a venerable monument of the ancient Germanic customs, and demonstrated the spirit of preservation among the English; and their respect for the past, by the fact of the institutions, which they inherited from their forefathers, being the same at present as they are found to have originally existed; but he likewise represented our judiciary system as the masterpiece of civilization.

"Our magistracy," said he, "is based upon honor and consideration, the moving-springs of all monarchies."*

He even went so far as to defend the venality of those offices which the Englishman was continually attacking.

"Admirable institution!" exclaimed my father, "that estimates at so high a price the right of sacrificing all the pleasures of life to the happiness of serving the state: but let us not, however, wrong France; the magistracy that has produced such men as Mole, Lamoignon, and d'Aguesseau, need envy no other; and if the jury in England is renowned for the equity of its decisions, it is because the class of which it is composed is especially remarkable for its knowledge and integrity. There the institution rests upon the nation; here, it is from it that the nation derives its lustre and its consideration."

"It may be," continued he in conclusion, "that their institutions answer better for England than ours would: indeed, it is impossible that it should be otherwise. Each nation creates its own laws, and these laws are so essentially the result of the morals and genius of the nation, that the people set more value upon them than upon aught else—they will lose their independence, their very name, ere they will part with their laws. I am confident that the phrase, 'to submit to the law of the victor,' has a much more extended sense than, in its general acceptation, it is supposed to possess. It is the last degree of defeat to be obliged to obey the laws of another people; and the Normans, who, in England, have almost triumphed over the nation's language, have never yet conquered the nation's laws."

I have been thus circumstantial in the above details, because I wished to show you the footing upon which my father stood in the society of which the marshal d'Olonne was the head. Could I be otherwise than happy in a place where he was respected and honored by all as he was by me? I seemed more at ease here than at my uncle's. Alas! I little thought then, it would be still more endeared to me than the place of my nativity.

"Natalie has remained at Fontainebleau," said the marshal to my father; "I expect her this evening—you will find her somewhat grown," added he, smiling. "Do you recollect, you once observed that she would never resemble any one, and yet pleased more than any one? At that time she was only in her ninth year."

* Montesquieu.

"The duchess of Nevers," answered my father, "promised, even at that tender age, all that she has since become."

"Yes," resumed the marshal, "she is charming; but she will not soon again marry. I have already spoken to you of my regret on this subject, but her determination is fixed."

My father replied in a few words, and we took our leave.

"I am of Madame de Nevers' opinion," said my father to me;—"married at the age of twelve, she never saw but at the altar a husband who, from all accounts, was little deserving of her. He immediately set out upon his voyages, and death prevented his return. A widow at the age of twenty, beautiful and free, she can now marry whom she pleases; she is in the right not to be precipitated, and to choose before she again suffers herself to be made a sacrifice to ambition."

I spoke severely against these matches of children.

"Custom authorizes them," observed my father; "but I never could approve of them."

It was on the day after the above conversation took place, that I was introduced to Madame de Nevers. Ah! my friend, how shall I describe her to you? If she were merely beautiful, merely amiable, I might attempt to portray this celestial being. But how can I depict those various charms, the concentration of which was perfectly irresistible? At once I saw my fate; and although my forebodings told me but too plainly that it would be a dark one, I felt an inexpressible emotion of happiness on beholding her. The fever, the unhappiness, the pining that had so long preyed upon my heart, vanished in a moment. Do not speak to me of my folly or imprudence; I excuse nothing; I am about to atone with my life for my presumption in loving her. Destiny separated me from her; she would have degraded herself by an alliance with me; the venom of slander would have embittered her existence. But at least, I have loved her as none other could love, and since I could not live for her, at least for her shall I have the consolation to die.

She seemed wholly intent upon paying attentions to my father; she wished to prove to him that she recollected all he had formerly taught her; she repeated his grave lessons, and the choice of her expressions seemed to make new ideas of them. My father observed this, and spoke of the charm which words give to thoughts.

"All has been said," continued he; "but the manner of saying is inexhaustible."

Madame de Nevers used to take part in this conversation: I recollect she remarked that she was born distrustful, and believed only the accent and countenance of those who addressed her. So saying, she looked at me—I blushed, and she smiled; perhaps she found in me at that moment a proof of the truth of her observation.

From that day I was a constant visitor at the hotel d'Olonne. Naturally diffident, I had no reason for dissimulation; for my father did not even dream of the possibility of my loving the duchess. He attributed my visits to my taste for the polished society to be found at the marshal's, and he was pleased with them. My father certainly did not want penetration; but he had long since passed the age of passions; and he never had been of an imaginative turn of mind. Add to this, that his respect for the regulations of society was scarce more circumscribed than that which religion, morality, and honor inspire. Moreover, I felt how ridiculous it would appear in me to seem too attentive to Madame de Nevers; and I resolved to conceal a passion that was hourly acquiring additional force.

I know not if there are women more beautiful than Madame de Nevers; but at least I never found but in her so many charms contrasted by no single defect: delicacy of mind, simplicity of heart, dignity of bearing and affectionate kindness in her manner; the first every where; she no where excited envy; she possessed that superiority which no one presumes to dispute; she seemed the especial favorite of the fairies, so numberless were her charms. Her voice penetrated my heart, carrying there the softest delights. Ah! what is life to him who has felt what she can inspire?

It became my rank in the world to take but little part in the conversation. The marshal, out of respect to my father, sometimes reproached me with the silence I usually preferred keeping, and I confess I did not always resist the desire of showing Madame de Nevers I had a soul, and that, perhaps, I was capable of understanding her own. But I always preferred listening to her; I heard her with joy; I divined what she was about to say, and saw in her countenance the reflected impression of the same emotions as I myself experienced. One of the principal charms of society is the certainty of being thus understood. It was not long before I perceived that the duchess felt that nothing she said was lost to me; she seldom spoke directly to me, but she always prevented the conversation from turning upon topics or society with which I was unacquainted; she spoke of literature, of France in general, of Lyons and Auvergne; she questioned me concerning our mountains, and the truth of d'Urfé's descriptions. I know not why, but it was painful for me to see her so attentive to me. The gentlemen surrounding her were exceedingly polite, and I was involuntarily hurt by the consciousness of it. A nameless suffering seized upon me, as soon as I found myself the object of attention. I would have wished to have been left alone to myself and my silence, to hear and admire Madame de Nevers.

Among the young gentlemen who daily visited the hotel d'Olonne, there were two who particularly attracted my notice, the duke of L—, and the prince of Enrichemont. The latter belonged to the house of Bethune, and was a descendant of the renowned Sully; he possessed an immense fortune, and I knew that the marshal wished to have him for his son-in-law. I do not see what there was to object to in the prince, but neither do I find that there was anything to admire. He was uniformly polite; he never said anything but what was exceedingly correct and agreeably phrased; but, on the other hand, never did any spark of enthusiasm betray that there was any thing else in his soul but what education and a habit of living in the world had placed there. He would not have been mistaken as to the exact quantity of praise or dispraise due to a great action or an enormous crime; but even his very admiration was factitious, and one remained unmoved before his passion, and unexcited by his mirth.

With all his faults, I preferred the Duke of L—. Thoughtless and imprudent in his jests, he nevertheless loved what was good, and his countenance always expressed with fidelity the impressions of his mind; as he was volatile to excess, these were generally not very lasting, but at all events, he was able to understand the feelings of others. One would have thought that he looked upon life as a holiday, so intent was he upon pleasure; always in motion, he attached as much importance to the rapidity of his journeys, as if he were engaged in the most momentous business. He was always too late, and yet he was never more than fifty minutes coming from Versailles. He would enter the drawing-room, watch-in-hand, telling some ridiculous story, or some ludicrous anecdote, that excited bursts of laughter from his hearers. Generous and magnificent, the Duke of L— despised both money and life; and though he lavished both the one and the other in a manner frequently unworthy of the sacrifice I confess, to my shame, that I was seduced by his contempt for what men value so highly. It looks noble in a man not to admit of any obstacle to his will, and when he exposes his life gaily in a race, or risks his fortune on a card, we can with difficulty believe that he would not hazard both the one and the other when called to do so in a serious affair. The elegance of the duke of L— suited me somewhat better than the somewhat stiff manners of the prince of Enrichemont.

The kindness of the Marshal d'Olonne had induced him to place me in his society in such a situation as to make me feel as little as possible my inferiority of rank; this had scarcely occurred to my mind at first, but now it began to weigh upon me. It was easy for me, however, to forget myself while thinking of Madame de Nevers, and I thought of her at every moment of my existence.

One day, the conversation had turned for a length of time upon the heroism of Madame de B—, who had affectionately attended upon her friend, Madame d'Anville, who was dying of an infectious disorder. The company had extolled this action, and made mention of several other instances of friendship, worthy of being classed with the above. I was standing at the time near the fire-place, and behind the sofa on which Madame de Nevers was seated.

"I do not see that you have any intimate friend," said I.

"Oh! you are mistaken," she replied. "I have one who is very dear to me. I allude to the sister of the duke of L—. Our friendship was contracted in infancy; but I fear that we shall be separated for a long time. The marquis of C—, her husband, is minister to Holland, and she has been at the Hague for the last six months."

"Does she resemble her brother?"

"Not in the least," continued the duchess; "she is as calm and composed as he is volatile and gay. I regret her absence deeply, for no one is so necessary to me as Madame de C—; she is my reason, and I never cared to have any other; and now that I am alone, I know not upon what to decide."

"I should never have ascribed so much indecision to you," said I.

"Ah! it is so easy to conceal one's defects in public! Every one wears nearly the same dress, and we seldom take the trouble to observe that countenances differ."

"I thank heaven that I have been educated in a very unsophisticated state of simplicity; it has frequently occurred to me that no two persons resemble each other."

"That," replied Madame de Nevers, "is because you take the trouble to examine more closely. But," added she, smiling, "when one comes from Versailles in fifty minutes, how can you expect that one can have more than a superficial view of objects?"

"But if one did," said I, "one should certainly stop on the road!"

"What do I hear? gallantry from you?"

"Ah!" exclaimed I, "you know the contrary."

She turned and spoke to some one near her. I was in agony, for I feared that every one was about to discover my secret.

The next day my father was unwell: we were to dine at the Marshal's hotel, and, as he did not wish me to lose that pleasure, he made an effort and went out with me. His conversational powers had never appeared to better advantage than on that day. Several strangers who were at dinner, loudly expressed their admiration of his talents, and I overheard them say that such a man in England would enjoy the first offices in the state. The conversation lasted some time, at length the company separated; my father was the last to remain, and, on bidding him farewell, the Marshal d'Olonne made him promise to return on the morrow. Alas! there was to be no morrow for him! While crossing the vestibule, my father complained of indisposition. He leaned upon me and swooned. I called for assistance, and he was placed upon a bed; the marshal sent for the family-physician, and Madame de Nevers issued the necessary orders with admirable presence of mind. He was bled, and his senses returned. He opened his eyes, and their dying beams fell upon me. An expression of painful anxiety passed over his countenance. The marshal understood his look; he seized my hand.

"My dear friend," said he, "do not be uneasy; Edward shall be my son."

A look of gratitude lighted up his features; the expression passed away and the spirit fled. I shall not describe the horrors I felt; I fainted upon the lifeless body, and when I recovered my senses I found myself in the parlor, where Madame de Nevers was in tears. The Marshal d'Olonne essayed the tenderest means to console me, but I could only reply to his kindness by my tears. It was resolved that I should thenceforward consider the Marshal's hotel as my home.

I retired to an apartment prepared for me, and for many hours I gave full vent to my grief. But even in the fullness of my sorrow, the recollection of Madame de Nevers's sympathy brought some consolation to my mind.

My father had expressed in his will the wish to be interred by the side of my mother. The discharge of this duty relieved my heart. Leaving the duchess seemed to me an atonement for the happiness I experienced in her society even after my recent loss. I had not yet made my preparations for my departure, and still I looked eagerly forward to the moment of my return to a spot which had long since been dearer to me than all the world beside.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 114.

"Duncan is in his grave;
After life's fitful fever, he sleeps well;
Nor steel, nor poison,
Malice domestic, foreign levy, nothing
Can touch him further."

I SAT at my window to watch the break of day. How the soul sympathizes with the magnificence of nature. To me there is nothing more impressive and sublime than silence. And then to reflect that in this deep universal hush, the stupendous globe, and the interminable system of flashing worlds, are for ever performing their revolutions. There is more morality in this than in a homily. It disenfranchises the soul from every artificial excitement, and affords the heart an opportunity to speak its own eloquence. Music hath its charm, and so hath the revel, and the flash and dazzle of fashion and beauty; and, under their thrilling influences, the young and the ardent, with unwithered hopes and passions, might tread boldly into the perilous battle. But it seems to me, that if some dark accident should startle me with the conviction that my last hour had come, I should require no sublimer preparation than a time spent in the perfect solitude—the vast stillness, the grandeur, the glory of the opening day.

"By your leave, sleepless and thoughtful student," said the voice of the Genius, "let me break your meditations."

His sudden interruption was rendered more striking by the images which suddenly rose up in the mirror. I beheld a Danish island in the midst of the ocean. Nature had blessed the country with beauty and abundance. Vegetation expanded into larger forms—the fruit displayed greater varieties—breathed richer fragrance, and glowed with deeper colors than those to which I had been accustomed. Every thing discovered luxuriance and plenty.

Upon a pleasant knoll, that overlooked a lovely scene, stood a youth. He was tall, athletic, and noble in person. His soul caught a spark of fire from the beauty of nature, and he said,

"Strange, that they who tread these scented fields should be slaves! Are they destined to be so for ever? It cannot be. The love of freedom is a principle in the character of man, and its possession is his birthright. His spirit is as the ocean; dam it up as you may, it will eventually heave and swell, and overflow its banks, and carry before it the fragments of that which opposed it: or it resembles fire in the bosom of the volcano; though its surface is green and tranquil, and fair to look on, the hidden flame will one day burst forth with overwhelming fury. What accident has made men slaves? Strange, that against their happiness and their nature, they will kneel down tamely, and suffer a human being to place his foot upon their necks. Strange, that while they have eyes to see the sun and stars, the blue ocean, the luxuriant hills and valleys that undulate this rolling ball, and all the bright forms of physical nature, they are destitute of moral sight to distinguish their own strength. It is conceivable why the elephant, however monstrous in size and strength, should suffer a puny man to be his master, to bid him kneel and rise, to weary him with heavy loads, and drive him into danger, even when by an exertion of his power he could fling his petty tyrant into the air, and dash him to pieces against the earth. But it is unaccountable how a few audacious reptiles can lord it over the nations, who, knew they but their own strength, and felt they but their own degradation, might harness them up, and make them draw like beasts of burthen."

This simple burst of feeling was overheard by a spy, a hireling creature—a slave himself, and paid for being the instrument to make slaves of others—a reptile which nature had created of her coarsest material, as if made to be trodden down into the dust, but whom accident had clothed with authority and blessed with the good things of life. Insolent and cruel—and, worst of all, ignorant: for I can conceive of no keener punishment than that could be inflicted upon these crawling things—these tools of human tyranny—thus gloating and fattening on the wreck and ruin of their fellow-creatures, than a clear power to behold themselves as they are, and yet to be so still. This would be a mental torture, more refined than any in their ownquisition.

The culprit was dragged by rough hands before what was termed a tribunal of justice. He had dared to look into his own soul, and was accused of plotting against the government. A heavy fine was the result.

"I will leave this wretched country," he said, and gathered together his property for that purpose; but another spy had detected his intention, and he was again dragged before the police.

"I confiscate your estate," said a bloated disgusting wretch. The criminal forgot he was in a country of slaves. His face revealed the indignation that boiled in his veins.

"As the stream late conceal'd
By the fringe of its willows,
Where it rushes reveal'd
In the light of its billows;
As the bolt bursts on high
From the black cloud that bound it,
Flash'd the soul of that eye
Through the long lashes round it."

"Thou art a tyrant," exclaimed the youth, "and I spit upon thee."

"To the dungeon—the deepest and the darkest," said the judge, and I saw him no more.

"Can such things be?" said I.

"Ay," replied my companion. "Thus it hath been for ages, in the fairest portions of the globe. Behold!"

I started, and nearly screamed, at the revelation of the glass. It displayed the interior of a gloomy building—the dreadful inquisition. My pen shrinks from the task of depicting the horrors of that sight. In a long and subterranean hall, lighted with the struggling rays of a few dim torches, sat men—demons in the shape of men—to superintend the tortures of the criminals. The fiends were clothed in black mantles and cowls, with the image of the cross upon their bosoms. They spoke no word, moved with a stealthy step, and preserved a meek humility in their countenances and demeanor, when contrasted with the hellish cruelties of their occupation, more repulsive and diabolical than the most convulsive paroxysms of rage and hate. Their victims presented a spectacle so exquisitely piteous, and yet so terrible, that the apprehension and agony with which I beheld them could have been heightened by no other incident than the heart-withering discovery that they consisted of the young—the noble—the virtuous—the brave—the beautiful of the earth. One was bound to the rack, and his limbs distended until his glaring eye-balls started from their sockets, and he was relieved, not from the blessed dictate of mercy; oh no! the marble rock, the raging fire, would feel its influence as soon as these; but lest, by being too much tortured, death should snatch the exhausted and now senseless victim from more protracted agonies. Another fair youth was convicted of having been overcome by compassion for a wretched female who had suffered under the ban of their institution, and for having given the dying wretch a little food. He was stripped, bathed with oil, extended upon an iron horizontal grate, and chained; a slow fire was lighted beneath. A lovely woman had assisted in the escape of her husband. For this atrocious deed her wrists were bound together behind her back, and by a cord attached to them in that position she was suspended from the ceiling. The air was rent with her shrieks. But my attention was diverted by the sight of another, also a female, confined in a large cage, the interior of which was covered with sharp steel points, so that which ever way she sought repose, they should pierce her feet or body. Others had their teeth extracted at short intervals, were fastened to infernal machines, and driven into excruciating pains—hideous diseases—madness—till at length death freed them from the earth.

"This," said the Genius, "is slavery. They deserve it who bear it. They doubly deserve it, who, having been once free, permit themselves to be again enthralled. The establishment of universal liberty should be the object, if not the greatest earthly object, of all human beings. Private vices are lost in those which injure this general cause. Virtue becomes infinitely more valuable and beautiful when it facilitates this grand plan. No man deserves the name, not ready to support it with pen, tongue, and sword. What does the glass discover now?"

"The gloomy scene of human woe is gone," said I. "A crowd of people are assembled beneath a summer heaven."

"And hear you nothing?"

"Ay, the tolling of bells, the thundering of cannon, bursts of enlivening music, the shuffling footsteps of millions, seem mingled from the paved city—from the grassy field—from the hill and the valley—from the inland forests and the shores of the sea."

"It is the sound of happiness and glory," said the Genius. "Your nation celebrates the birthday of that freedom which passes over the crumbling thrones of tyrants and the broken arches of the inquisition, as the lava and the ocean wave have buried ancient cities. The sight is imposing."

"Yea," said I, "the glitter of the soldiery—the vastness of the multitude—the grandeur of the processions—present a spectacle to be long remembered."

"It is not from these," said my companion, "that it derives its splendor: for they might grace the birthday of a tyrant as well. It is the moral grandeur of a people assembled to offer up their grateful joy to heaven for the sublimest of human blessings. It is glorious as a testimony that the inquisition and the spirit which reared, or which permitted it, can never contaminate the broad fields, the growing cities, and the old mountains of the west. Freedom dwells here—not protected by forts—not venturing abroad tremblingly, but in the feelings, the character of the people. And may she never be driven from this last hold, till your cataracts shall hush their thunders, your gray rocks crumble, your broad rivers dwindle into narrow streams, for shame that the earth hath no foothold for her, and that man will ever be contented to bow the neck, kiss the chain, and be a slave from choice, as he need never be from necessity. And yet so spake Greece once, and so spake Rome, and still their people have been debased. The voice of Brutus is hushed in the forum; the moonlight streams down upon the melancholy ruins. Truly hath the voice of the bard exclaimed,

"The Goth, the Christian, time, war, flood, and fire,
Have dealt upon the seven-hill'd city's pride;

She saw her glories, star by star, expire,
And up the steep barbarian monarchs ride,
Where the car climbed the capitol; far and wide
Temple and tower went down, nor left a site—
Chaos of ruins!"

"But hark—the voice of mirth and joy hath changed its tone. What sudden shadow is upon the nation—passing as a cloud over a sunny hill?"

"A silence hath gone forth," said I. "The same crowd are there but not in the revelry. The bells toll—but with muffled sound, and slow repeated and melancholy peal. The cheerful music hath saddened into mournful breathings—there are soldiers, but with reversed arms and gloomy faces. The thronging thousands are still as night, as the dark procession moves slowly onward—windows and doors are crowded—a sea of human beings that but now rolled in a mighty tide through the streets, are motionless—all breaths are hushed, all eyes fixed on the sable bier and nodding plume."

"Yes," said the Genius, "death is there. It hath sealed the wrinkled brow, and laid its hand on the silver head. The lips that once boldly proclaimed the rights of man—the bosom that has beaten and bled for your country, alas, alas, they are cold and still as the marble. Grateful eyes shall never again rest on his venerable form, all hallowed as it was by spirit-stirring associations. Ay, gaze on, ye breathless thousands—breathless—not tearless."

"And yet wherefore," said I, "wherefore should they weep? It is but meet that the aged should die. We bend to the expected decree of fate. The unconscious object of all this pomp filled up the measure of his life—of his glory. His departure is not terrible, as when the young and the gay are suddenly called to the grave. The death of such an one is but the fulfilling of nature's ordinance. It is but as the subsiding of the swollen stream—the cutting down of the golden ripe harvest—the glorious setting of the summer sun. Wherefore should they weep?"

"Not for the dead, master student. He sleeps in peace—but mourn for the absence of those whose mind has shaped the destiny of your country. Mourn that an unworthy spirit of parsimony has withheld from him a proper expression of sympathy and gratitude, while yet he lingered among you—and, most of all, mourn lest the passing away of these high toned characters of other years shall leave the nation a prey to selfish parties and cunning demagogues—to weakness—avarice—luxury—and perhaps to bondage."

"Tell me," said I, "you who can look into futurity, can this ever be? Will the glory of our beloved country ever be shaded? In what shape will the incubus appear?"

I received no answer. I was again alone, and my eyes were turned towards the beautiful east. Streaks of orange purple and gold "laced the severing clouds;" the moon and stars faded like my own visions, and the long silent streets began once more to be thronged with the children of toil and pleasure. THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Conversations of the week.—The public are in a ferment. The duldest frequenters of fashionable circles, accustomed to palm off silence for sense and gravity for wisdom, finds food for wonder in the general effervescence, "opens his marble jaws," and expresses interest and utters opinions. In the first place there is "the dog law," which has received the stamp of general reprobation. Some people associate with dogs almost on equal terms. These regard the mild sages of the city as so many savages, read over Byron's inscription,

"Ye! who perchance behold this simple urn,
Pass on—it honors none you wish to mourn:
To mark a friend's remains these stones arise,
I never had but one, and here he lies."

and regard every accidentally wandering quadruped victim of injustice with exclamations of compassion. Scarcely, however, has the canine race been exterminated, "Tray, Blanche, and Sweet-heart—little dogs and all," when the "Magdalen Society Report" bursts over our heads like a thunderbolt from a blue sky;

"And if our quarrels should rip up old stories,
And help them with a lie or two additional,
I'm not to blame, as you well know, no more is Any one else—they were become traditional;
Besides, their resurrection aids our glories
By contrast, which is what we just were wishing all;
And science profits by this resurrection,
Dead scandals form good subjects for dissection."

A burst of indignation has simultaneously broken from the community at this injudicious and ill-managed matter, which renders comment unnecessary. As fathers and brothers we cannot, however, refrain from adding our disapprobation. The Magdalen Report no sooner makes its exit from the stage of debate than the wrongs of the Courier and Enquirer demand the notice of our fellow-citizens. He fights bravely under the banners of "independence of the press" against the Journal of Commerce and the board of aldermen. He has, however, the 'popular body' on his side. From them we turn to the bloody form of murder, who seems to have stalked abroad, waving her red arm. The ratio in which this awful crime is increasing among us is extraordinary and appalling. Five or six have lately been committed.

An article in another page renders any description of the solemn pageant which attended the remains of our distinguished and venerable patriot to the tomb unnecessary.

Among the wonders of the present day is the fact that the Londoners are quizzing Paganini. How the celebrated master will brook the honest and well-meant railery of John Bull, we cannot say. The ridicule must, however, be pointed indeed, if it counterbalances the favorable notices of him published in several of the London prints; for instance, the following is from the Literary Gazette, translated from "Le Globe:"

"Paganini and his violin enter. A universal clapping welcomes his appearance on the stage. He advances several paces with embarrassment, and bows; and the applause re-commences. He proceeds with a gait still more and more awkward, and is again applauded. He bows repeatedly, and endeavors to throw into his countenance a smile of acknowledgment, which is soon, however, replaced by an icy coldness of expression.

"He stops, and in a position in which he seems still more constrained than in his walk and his salutations, he seizes his violin, places it between his chin and his breast, and casts on it a proud look, at once piercing and sweet. He stands thus for several seconds, leaving the public time to observe and to examine his strange originality; to gaze with curiosity at his lank body, his long arms and fingers, his chestnut colored hair flowing over his shoulders, the illness and suffering imprinted on his whole person, his sunken mouth, his long hawk-nose, his pale and hollow cheeks, his large, fine, and open forehead, which Dr. Gall would love to contemplate; and under that forehead, eyes, hidden as if in shade, but every instant darting forth lightning."

"Suddenly his looks descend from his violin to the orchestra. He gives the signal, and abruptly raising his hand in the air, lets his bow fall upon his violin. You expect that all the strings are about to be broken. Nothing of the sort. You are surprised by the lightest, the most delicate, the finest of sounds. For several instants he continues to play with your anticipations, and to provoke you. All the caprices which occur to him are employed to rouse you from the indifference which he supposes you to feel. He runs, he leaps from tones to tones, from octaves to octaves, passes with incredible swiftness and precision the widest distances; ascends and descends natural and chromatic gamuts; produces every where harmonic chords; draws forth the most extraordinary sounds of which the violin is capable; makes it speak, sing, complain; now there is a murmuring of waves, now a breeze of wind, now a chirping of birds."

"This great artist has, however, other resources than such fantasies for the captivation of the public. To this musical phantasmagoria presently succeeds a broad, grand, and harmonious simplicity. Pure, sweet, brilliant, tuneful chords flow from his bow: sounds which seem to proceed from the heart, and which plunge you into a state of delicious feeling. Then come vague sighings of melancholy and self-abandonment. While you are sympathizing with the touching and melodious performer, a sudden access of violent grief, a sort of shuddering and rage seizes him; and cries, which penetrate the depths of your soul, alarm and freeze you, and make you tremble for the unfortunate being whom you see and hear."

Paganini, as Caleb Quotem would say, reminds us of music, music of love, love of turtle-doves, turtle-doves of turtle-soup, turtle-soup of Hoboken, and Hoboken of the Messrs. Stevens. The enterprise of these gentlemen has not been unrequited. Their steam-boats and their pleasure-grounds are in a style of princely magnificence. Their property on the opposite Jersey shore, from Hoboken to Weehawken, has been by them generously appropriated as a place of recreation for their fellow-citizens. Whoever has not visited Turtle-grove and the Elysian-fields, has neglected to indulge himself with a delightful gratification. These gentlemen have lately effected changes there which, for rural beauty, would do no discredit to the taste of Pope himself, who is said to have been the father of English gardening. Forests have been trimmed, underbrush cleared away, lawns turfed, a superb pavilion erected, and every thing done which could contribute to render it one of the very pleasantest of all pleasant places; and, among other wonders, workmen are employed in constructing a rail-road from the ferry, for a mile and a half along the shore, to the pavilion.

On Monday last a fete was given by these gentlemen to the corporation, the editors and other literati, &c. The guests assembled at the interesting hour of three, on board the steamboat Chief Justice Marshal—a much better boat than Charon's—which conducted the distinguished medley of literature and politics across the river to the fields of Elysium. The day was cloudless and calm, and the scene of course charming. The boat floated to the strains of a fine martial band, among which we recognized many airs from the public's pet musical favorite, Cinderella. A right hospitable banquet was spread out in Turtle-grove, where the scent of the fresh grass was mixed with the savory fumes of innumerable tureens, which would have made the soul of honest Sancho Panza leap for joy; and where the music of the birds and waters was considerably improved by certain emphatic pops, which, like Macbeth's curses, sounded to the heart "not loud but deep." We never observed, in so small a company, such a mass of talent, and such a powerful inclination towards eating and drinking. The hilarity of the scene was heightened by the presence of the New-York and New-Jersey Boat Clubs, in sailor uniform, who reached the spot in their barges, and immediately plunged in medias res. Some sweet singing and facetious toasts ushered in the evening, when the nautical gentlemen hailed each other, gave the word of command, and bided to their boats.

"Rudit iter liquidum celeres."

We withdrew silently and discreetly from the merry scene, leaving divers worthies in excellent spirits, where, for aught we know to the contrary, they may be at this very moment, offering up libations to the jolliest of all the divinities.

Literary.—The Harpers have published Haverhill, which we shall notice in our next. We learn with pleasure that the Dutchman's Fireside continues to sell briskly. Three heavy editions have been already printed.

Notice to the public.—I take this method of stating that Samuel Marshal, who has been for some time employed by me as an agent for the New-York Mirror, will not be, from this date, connected with it in any way whatever. GEORGE P. MORRIS.

"Delightful task! to rear the tender thought,
To teach the young idea how to shoot,
To pour the fresh instruction o'er the mind,
To breathe the enlivening spirit, and to fix
The generous purpose in the glowing breast."—Thomson.

Poets, they say, are privileged—
Perhaps 'tis very right,
But some small probability
'Twere well to keep in sight—
Now this was surely not the case
In Jamie Thomson's fight.

"Delightful task!"—A task indeed!
At least I found it so;
I kept a famed academy
Not many years ago,
But though I toil'd for it, I ne'er
That same delight could know.

The "tender thought," alas, is in
The rearing prone to die,
The "young idea" is apt to "shoot"
Provokingly awry,
And will not bear the proper fruit—
There is no knowing why.

The "fresh instruction," poured so oft,
Becomes at last quite stale;
The "enlivening spirit" oft o'ersteps
Of liveliness the pale,
And "breathes" so much of "spirit" that Order and quiet fail.

"To fix the purpose in the breast,"
Pshaw! fix a weather-vane—
Who does not know the fickle moods
Of childhood's restless brain?
Aught in a breast so volatile
To fix we strive in vain.

Oh! bard inspired and eloquent!
Thy favored country's boast,
'Tis well for us, a teacher's lot
Thou knew'st not to thy cost,
Or this fine burst of eloquence
The world had surely lost.

CLARENCE.

CÆDICIVS, a Roman tribune, having once undertaken to perform a service of extreme danger, addressed his soldiers as follows: "My friends, it is necessary for the safety of the army that we should march to yonder station. It is not necessary that we should return." The army was saved, but every one of the followers of Cædicivus perished. He himself was found desperately wounded.

POPULAR JUDGMENT.—Men of learning are very apt to undervalue the taste and judgment of the vulgar, as they are called, especially in the fine arts. Yet no persons are more familiar with nature than people of this class. The best pictures and statues are those which are the most natural. Apelles was accustomed to expose his paintings in public that he might hear the criticisms of the passers by, of which he often availed himself. Malherbe consulted his servant, an old woman, on the music of his verses; and Moliere, his housekeeper, on the propriety of his characters. It is related by Annibal Caracci that he formed his opinion of two pictures of the martyrdom of St. Andrew, by Dominichino, and Francisco Albani, from seeing an aged female and her daughter standing a long time surveying the picture of Dominichino, and passing that of Albani without notice. One thing is certain, the common people are not led astray by fashion, which is as often the parent of a bad taste as of a good one.

BOOK-MAKING.—The Abbé de Marolles was so fond of book-making, that he published the names of all his friends and all their acquaintance in a catalogue at his own expense. This gentleman said to one of his companions, "My verses cost me very little." "They cost you as much as they are worth," replied his friend.

SOLITUDE.—Zimmerman, who was physician to the king of Prussia, and lived at court, has written a vast deal of nonsense about solitude. The wish to be always alone shows the disposition of a ferocious beast of prey, and carries with it the melancholy darkness of the tomb. The effect is described in the ancient phrase, "Cor suum edens," eating his own heart. Man is too feeble, too dependant a being to subsist by himself.

SANNAZARIUS.—He was the author of the following epigram, which has been indifferently translated from the original Latin:

"Neptune saw Venice on the Adria stand,
Firm as a rock, and did the sea command.
'Think'st thou, O Jove,' said he, 'Rome's walls excel?
Or that proud cliff whence false Tarpeia fell?
Grant Tiber best, view both, and you will say,
That men did those, gods these foundations lay.'"

The people of Venice presented Sannazarius with six thousand golden crowns for this composition. This beats Sir Walter Scott and the London booksellers.

DEDICATIONS.—Some writer observes in reference to the miserable and abject language formerly used on these occasions, "That the first inventor of dedications must certainly have been a beggar."

URBAN THE EIGHTH.—This pope was a man of wit, a fine scholar, and an excellent magistrate. "No pope," he was used to say, "could ever boast of such extraordinary nephews as I can. Cardinal Barberini has reformation always in his mouth, but I cannot find that he grows any better; he is certainly a saint, but I never heard any of his miracles. Cardinal Antonio is generous and munificent, but he never gives away any thing of his own. Maffeo is certainly a great general and commander of the ecclesiastical troops, but he never goes to war."

CRITICISM.—If men of genius were to express their own opinions of their works, they would prove the severest critics. Boileau once said, "Of all criticisms, those which hurt me the most, are such as my own judgment makes on my own works."

EPITAPHS.—Charpentier has the following eloquent passage on this subject. "Whenever," says he, "I cast my eyes on ostentatious epitaphs, I feel a wish to write under them, 'As man is composed of pride and infirmities, passenger, you here behold them fully exemplified. This tomb indicates the feebleness, and this epitaph the pride of his nature.' How just a picture is this of the character of the deceased person when alive! Under robes of silk and embroidery he concealed from the eyes of the world the weakness and diseases of his decaying body. A wounded conscience, a feeble understanding, and eternal toil of solicitude and sorrows, were hidden beneath the mask of a tranquil countenance, a steady and penetrating eye."

PHILOSOPHERS AND TRADESMEN.—Philosophers sport with the follies of mankind; tradesmen make money by them. Which is the wiser of the two?

CICERO.—Macrobius has recorded a good jest of Cicero on Caninius Bevilus, who was consul only for one day. "We have had," says he, "a consul of such extraordinary vigilance, that he has not slept one single night during the term of his consulship."

A TWILIGHT SCENE, NEAR THE HIGHLANDS.

BY WILLIAM P. PALMER.

O, scenes there are of beauty
In this desert world of ours,
Oases-like, all redolent
Of fountains and of flowers;
Where the lonely heart, forgetting
O'er its exile lot to grieve,
In their lovely presence findeth
An Eden and an Eve!

And such a scene surrounds us,
My friend, long tried and dear;
Methinks with thee for ever
I could joy to linger here;
Nor sigh for other beauties,
For other pleasures pine,
Which in gayer hours we've courted
Mid the city's mirth and wine.

Look up—the west is gleaming
Like a sea of molten gold,
With crimson clouds o'ercurtained
In many a gorgeous fold;
While the highland peaks around us,
In that soft and mellow light,
Seem like monarchs of the genii world
In living rainbows dight.

And mark you glorious river,
As it sweeps before the lawn;
By cliff and beetling headland,
How it gallantly bears on!
While the mountain breezes gaily
Toss its curling waves to spray,
Like wild and wanton childhood
With a giant's locks at play.

Ay, view that airy pennant
Above the green isle's height;
One moment—and the bounding bark
Comes dashing into sight!
From distant lands returning
Through billowy wilds of foam,
Warm beating hearts she's bearing
To friendship and to home.

How fond the twilight lingers
Along the purple skies,
As if 'twere loth to leave behind
So fair a paradise;
While the jealous stars above us
Their heavenly emblems show,
Lest we gaze, alas! too fondly
On the fading scenes below.

How gaily, too, thro' yonder bowers,
Where free the moss-rose flings
Its perfume on the dewy air,
The laugh of childhood rings,
And blending with the boatman's song
In yon lone listening bay,
Awakes the echo's mimic tongue
In the far woods away.

And hark! from yonder casement,
Where the leafy shadow falls
In moonlight-checked loveliness
O'er Elmwood's snowy walls,
A voice of liquid sweetness
Steals forth upon the ear,
Like some aerial melody
From night's most tuneful sphere.

And on the broad piazza,
With flowering woodbines lined,
Fair forms are lightly moving,
While arms in arms entwined;
With motions free and graceful,
And eyes as softly bright,
As the willow's breezy wavings,
And the fire-fly's magic light.

O, scenes there are of beauty
In this desert world of ours,
Oases-like, all redolent
Of fountains and of flowers;
Where the lonely heart, forgetting
O'er its exile lot to grieve,
In their lovely presence findeth
An Eden and an Eve!

EDWARD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF OURIKA.

IN TWO PARTS—PART SECOND.

THE day previous to my departure, the marshal was absent. With the exception of an old abbot, who had for many years enjoyed the protection of the family, Madame de Nevers and myself were alone at dinner. When the table was cleared, the abbot, seeing that the duchess had no skeins of silk for him to unravel, quietly installed himself in an arm-chair and fell asleep. I was thus left titte-à-tite with the object of my secret affection. I ought to have felt happy, but I did not. I cast down my eyes and remained silent. She was the first to speak.

"At what o'clock do you start to-morrow?"

"At five in the morning. If I were to delay any longer, I fear I should be unable to go at all."

"And when do you return?"

"I must fulfill my father's last wishes; but I think they will not detain me more than a fortnight; and time will pass so slowly that I am confident I shall not be in want of more."

"Do you intend visiting Torez?"

"I shall go through it on my way back."

"Do you not long to see it again? It is so natural for us to love the scenes of our childhood."

"I know not what has happened to me; but it seems that I have no recollection whatever of the past."

"Try to recollect it. Will you not relate your history? Now that you are the son of my father, I should be ignorant of nothing that concerns you."

"I have forgotten every thing. I have only commenced my existence since the last two months."

Madame de Nevers was silent for a moment, and then asked if the world had so soon obliterated all memory of my youth?

"It is not the world."

She blushed, and continued:

"I do not resemble you in that particular, for the spot in which I passed my earliest years is still green in my memory. Do make an effort, and I am certain that you will be able to recall the recollection of your younger days."

I complied with her request; she listened with attention, and as I was about to conclude, the abbot awoke. The marshal entered at the same moment, and, bidding me hasten my return, he retired. Madame de Nevers likewise withdrew, and I thought I discerned a look of interest in her eye as she noticed my salutation. I was, moreover, satisfied with myself, for I had as yet confessed nothing to her. The thought that she might suspect my passion, was enough to chill me with apprehension, for I felt that my only safety lay in prudence.

I fulfilled the obligations imposed upon me, and was at liberty to return. The joy I felt on once more beholding the hotel d' Olonne was soon converted into disappointment when I heard that Madame de Nevers was about to start for the Hague, to visit her friend Madame de C. She seemed melancholy, scarcely spoke, and was extremely reserved. I knew not to what I should attribute this alteration in her conduct.

When she was gone, the marshal, ascribing my dejectedness to the death of my father, said,

"The duchess has severely felt our loss; she has not yet recovered from it. Holland is beautiful in the spring, and I am glad she has gone there; for I hope that a change of air may produce a favorable effect upon her enfeebled spirits."

This remark was far from relieving my anxiety, and, with his natural kind-heartedness, he endeavored to console me. He also entrusted to my keeping the secret affairs and correspondence in which he was engaged, by reason of his being the friend of the duke of A., at that time one of the most influential noblemen at court. I endeavored to prove myself worthy of this mark of confidence on his part, and he appeared gratified by the attachment I evinced for him.

Madame de Nevers was now hourly expected. My heart beat with joy at the thoughts of beholding her again. I fondly hoped that her reserve would have disappeared. I was cruelly deceived, for on the very evening of her arrival I experienced from her the coldest and most distant reception. She despised me, said I to myself; she spurns me; but I cannot live without loving her. I will leave this house, and never more submit myself to the galling fetters of society.

The next day, however, her manner was much softened; but she invariably went out to balls and concerts every evening, and when I used to see her with all her dazzling charms go into society where I could not follow her, I would retire to my apartment and devour my humiliation and regret. It was not without a most flattering sensation that I thought I discovered in her countenance an expression of indifference as to the pleasures in which, since her return, she had passed so much of her time. On one occasion, as she was going to a ball, she said,

"Do you not attend the play?"

"No; my pleasures are over for to-night."

"Why? It is but eight o'clock."

"Are not you going to amuse yourself?"

She sighed, and said with a melancholy smile,

"I had rather remain."

No sooner was she in her carriage than I retired to my chamber. None but those who have truly, deeply loved, can conceive the refined sensations of happiness, so exquisitely keen, that their excess almost amounts to a sense of pain, which a diffident lover experiences when the hope, the certainty beams upon his desolate heart, that his passion is not entirely unrequited. Repelling the thought that, had she remained longer in conversation with me, her very next words might have undone the happiness which her last had created, I recalled to my mind her words, her tone, her look, her sigh, more eloquent than all. I passed a restless and agitated night, and the next morning I was informed that the Marshal d' Olonne desired my attendance in his cabinet. I felt that it was incumbent on me to conceal all outward signs of happiness, and I endeavored to subdue and calm the expression of my countenance. Dissimulation was unnecessary, for I perceived that the duchess had again become distant, silent, and reserved.

She was invited to a ball in the evening, and before the hour arrived at which she usually left the hotel, her severity had vanished, or at least was much softened. I was convinced that she read my heart, that perhaps she compassionated my sufferings, and that, though my passion was unreturned, at least it met not with contempt.

I had never seen the duchess dance, and I had often wished to behold her, myself remaining unseen, at those assemblies where she was the chief object of admiration. It is the custom to admit spectators to the festivities of the great, where balconies are disposed around for their accommodation. The company to be met with there are generally those of the middle class, and they are separated from the guests by a palisade. I felt some reluctance to mingle with those of a rank from which I had lately estranged myself; but as I hoped to enjoy the happiness of seeing her without being seen, I could not resist the temptation, and I accordingly procured a ticket for the ball to be given by the English ambassador. I had seated myself in one of the balconies, behind a curtain, and shortly afterwards Madame de Nevers entered the saloon. She approached the place where I had, as I thought, concealed myself, and would have proceeded without noticing me, had not the ever-laughing duke of L., upon whose arm she was leaning, discovered me and called out my name. The duchess looked up and exclaimed,

"Is it possible? You here?"

"Yes," I answered. "I wished to see you dance. I had hoped to have remained unknown!"

She seated herself beneath the balcony, and, separated only by the palisade, I continued to converse with her. The ambassador came up, and asked who I was. The duchess introduced me as the son of Mr. G., recalling to the ambassador's mind that he had dined with my father about a year since at the marshal's.

"I never met with a man of more surprising talents," said he; and then turning to me, he continued: "I regret, sir, that the duchess of Nevers has not earlier procured me the pleasure of your acquaintance. I beg of you to descend into the room."

After I had complied with his request, he continued:

"The profession of the bar is one of the most honored in England—it leads to every thing. The present grand chancellor, Lord D., commenced his career by practising the law, and he now stands among the foremost in the realm. His son married a lady of your acquaintance, madam," added he, to the duchess. "I allude to lady Sarah Benmore, eldest daughter to the duke of Sunderland. Do you recollect that I once remarked that she bore a striking likeness to you?"

When the ambassador left us, Madame de Nevers addressed me.

"How pale you look! What is the matter?"

"I shall take charge of him," said the duke of L.

Thereupon the lively nobleman took my arm and sauntered with me through the rooms, naming half the company, and criticizing the whole. I felt unhappy, because I imagined that every one would be astonished at seeing me there. I managed to escape from the duke, returned to the place where Madame de Nevers was dancing, and seated myself upon the sofa which she had just left. I was reflecting upon what the ambassador had told me. How I admired that land where every avenue was open to merit, where nothing was too arduous for talent to accomplish, or for perseverance to surmount! Raising my eyes, I saw standing before me, Madame de Nevers. She approached me with one of her most fascinating smiles.

"What are you thinking of?"

"Of England," answered I; "that country where nothing is impossible."

"I was sure of it," rejoined she. "But do you not intend to dance?"

"I am afraid it would be improper."

"Why so? You are invited. But whom do you intend to choose for a partner?"

"I dare not engage you; I should be charged with presumption."

"Again!" said she; "this is really proud humility."

"Ah! in England I would be a candidate for that honor."

The duchess blushed at my words; I resumed:

"I must tear myself from society; I was not formed for it; I suffer in it; I will go to the bar; no one will question my right of being there. I will plead causes; will you entrust me with yours? Believe me, I will gain them all."

"But I must gain this one first," said she; "will you dance with me?"

The temptation was irresistible; I seized her hand which, until now, I had never touched. That moment was worth an age of misery. But I soon passed from the happiness of being so near her to the mortification of thinking that all eyes were fixed in amazement upon me. The transition struck daggers to my heart. Just as the quadrille was drawing near its close, the marshal came up. Surprise and displeasure were portrayed in his countenance. The duchess extricated me from my painful dilemma by whispering something in his ear. The cloud vanished from his brow, and he said,

"I am very glad the ambassador invited you; it was kind in him;" meaning, doubtless, that I owed the favor to the emissary's wish to oblige the marshal.

For some time after I was haunted by reflections whose bitterness was soothed only by the remembrance of the manner in which Madame de Nevers had conducted herself towards me at the ball. As I was thinking of the necessity of leaving the marshal's hotel, a misfortune occurred to him which no human prescience could have foreseen. The duke of A. lost his influence at court, and the marshal shared his adversity, without having partaken of his power. He was banished from Paris to Faverange. I tendered him my services, which he frankly accepted.

One day I was walking with Madame de Nevers in the garden adjacent to the marshal's dwelling, and speaking of her father's noble qualities.

"You have all that is requisite," said she, "to make you understand him. He is attached to you, because we never fail to become so towards those whose sentiments resemble our own."

"I think I could prove the contrary."

"Perhaps what you are about to say would confirm me in my opinion, but I will not listen to you;" and under some pretence or other, she left me to myself and my thoughts, the worst society for me. It was impossible for her not to perceive that I adored her; and not only did I enjoy the happiness of seeing her, hearing her, walking at her side, and feeling the weight of her arm on mine, but I even hoped that a day would dawn when I might sue for the honor of her hand. Again, when a look from her convinced me that she was not insensible to the ardor of a passion which I am confident has been felt by few, and when that conviction should have made me the happiest, it made me the most miserable of men. What—had I then treacherously insinuated myself into the good graces of the marshal—had I no other return to make for his generosity and confidence towards me but a base abuse of the opportunities which circumstances had afforded me of fomenting a passion which the existing laws of society prevented from meeting with consummation or return? I could not bear the thought of such ingratitude. Moreover, I was not certain that I was loved, or at best, the love that springs from pity is but an unenviable treasure.

One evening, when the heat was intense, and the windows of the parlor had been left open to admit the fresh air that began to move the foliage of the trees at the setting of the sun, the marshal and some gentlemen from a neighboring town were discussing some question concerning political economy, and seemed wholly intent upon the subject of their debate, Madame de Nevers was seated in the recess of the window, I was standing a few paces behind her and gazing upon her profile as it appeared against the azure of the sky. My reflections were bitter in the extreme.

"How I love her! and yet we are separated for ever. I pass my days in this 'babbling hermitage,' she reads my heart, knows my sentiments, and though she does not scorn them, we never can be taught to either—never! The barrier that separates us is insurmountable. I can only love her in secret, for even would she consent to be mine, contempt would reach her even in my arms. And yet our hearts were formed to be united.——Was it not that she meant in the garden?"

I was irresistibly impelled towards her. I seated myself by the same window with her, and leaned upon the balcony; my heart was full—I could not speak.

"Edward," said she, "what is the matter with you?"

"Do you not know?" asked I.

She was silent for a moment, and resumed:

"It is true, I do; but if you do not wish to afflict me, do not be so unhappy. Do you not know that I sympathize with your sufferings?"

"What you tell me," said I, "should overwhelm me with joy; but, I know not why, I cannot feel otherwise than miserable."

"Could you be unhappy if we were to spend the remainder of our lives as we have passed the last two months?"

I wished to answer in the affirmative, but feared to trust myself with words. I gathered some leaves from the jessamine shrubs that surrounded her, gave them to her, retook them, covered them with kisses, and bedewed them with tears. She was violently agitated.

"If you are unhappy," I said, "how guilty am I! Must I then fly from you?"

"Ah!" exclaimed she, "it is too late now."

Just then, the servant entered with lights. I left the parlor and strolled over the grounds. I was in an ecstasy of delight—the fever rioted in my veins. I perceived a light in a window of a tower that formed one of the angles of the building. It was the favorite boudoir of Madame de Nevers. A winding staircase led to it from the garden, and, fatigued by my rambles, I seated myself upon the steps. The door was open, and smothering all sensation of fear to dispel her, I resolved to ascend. Hearing my steps, and thinking that they were those of her maid, she approached the door.

"Will you forgive me?" said I, in breathless haste.

"Edward," replied the duchess, "come in; I intended to write to you, but it is better that I should speak what I should long since have expressed."

I perceived that she had been in tears.

"I know that I offend you by my love," said I, "but I hope for nothing, I ask for nothing; I know full well that misery is all that awaits me. But tell me, if fate had made me your equal in rank, would you have rejected the homage of my heart?"

"Can you think it?" said she; "can you doubt my love? Our hearts have been long since exchanged, but at once I saw the necessity of not giving way to my affection. I went to Holland to rejoin my friend, and learn from her experience how to forget. I returned, armed with her wisdom, not my own. I went into society: but did you feel, Edward, that when my person was absent, my soul was hovering near you?"

To this affectionate appeal, for the tone in which it was spoken corrected what might have appeared too open and unveiled, I had but cold words to reply. I assured her again and again that I was happy—that I would pass my life in love and obedience to her.

"I have but one command to impose upon you," said she; "and that is—prudence. I need not tell you that, should my father discover out attachment, the peace of our lives would be irretrievably lost. I have now said more, much more than I should," added she, while the mantling blushes burned on her cheek; "but now that we know each other's hearts, we ought no longer to be seen alone."

"I am going," interrupted I; "do not repent of having made me happy."

The intoxication of delight in which I revelled for some days after this conversation would have been complete, had not the marshal one evening been pleased to lavish his praises upon me in the presence of several gentlemen assembled in his saloon. He extolled my delicacy, my gratitude and devotion to him. I was stung to the quick by the consciousness of how little I deserved this eulogium, and my remorse was extreme. But I consoled myself by the knowledge that the marshal was ignorant of those sentiments, the force of which now began to have a serious and detrimental influence upon my frame.

We usually past our mornings in the library. The marshal had just received from Paris a beautiful globe; Madame de Nevers and myself were alone, and gazing upon the innumerable spots representing the Society Islands, in the Pacific Ocean. I described one in particular, as Cook had painted it.

"This one," said I, "is uninhabited, but does not deserve to remain so. The climate is a perpetual spring. Providence has there distributed its blessings with an unsparing hand; fruits and flowers are to be met with in endless variety; but the former are never culled, and the latter 'waste their sweetness on the desert air.' There, nothing disturbs the repose of nature, or breaks the silence that has reigned since creation, save the warbling of the feathered tribe or the murmurs of some pebbled brook. In that wilderness, all is harmony, all is happiness. Ah!" continued I, "it should be a home for those who love, since lovers would never need to stifle the pure flame of disinterested affection in a clime where aristocracy of rank or inferiority of birth are equally unknown."

I sank upon a chair, and buried my face in my hands. Madame de Nevers came near me.

"Edward!" said she, in broken accents, "you surely cannot mean to reproach me. Think you that I would look upon an alliance with you as a degradation? Do you not know that I would never have hesitated, had it not been for my father?"

"Forgive me!" cried I; "you cannot imagine the torments I undergo; but if you pity me, I may support my anguish."

As I was one evening returning home from a protracted ramble, I seated myself at the extremity of a long avenue, shaded by two rows of trees. I perceived Madame de Nevers approaching me; she was in a profound reverie, of which I dared to think myself the subject. She held her hat in her hand, and her beautiful hair streamed down in profusion upon her shoulders. So elastic was her step, the downy moss scarce yielded to the pressure of her slender foot.

"Where have you been?" asked she, as she seated herself at my side; "do you not fear that my father will take umbrage at your repeated absence?"

"It is immaterial," I replied; "my absence will soon be eternal."

"Edward!" exclaimed she, "is it thus you keep the promises you have made?"

"I know not what I have promised," replied I. "I am weary of life, for I shall never find repose but in the grave. Why do you start? Death will be kinder to me than life has been, for it levels all ranks. But at least the soul dies not: it loves beyond the harsh tomb, it loves through eternity. Shall we not, ah! tell me, sweetest, shall we not be united in another world?"

"We shall be, in this," answered she, and her charms brightened as she spoke; "but tell me that you will no longer look pale and ghastly as you have of late; say that you will return to life and hope, say that you will be happy."

"Never!" exclaimed I. "Merciful heaven! must I then dash from my lips the full cup of bliss! Shall I make you the object of scorn, tempt you to exchange the lustre of rank for obscurity like mine, and make you wear my almost unknown name?"

"But if I choose to make the exchange," said she, "there is no sacrifice on my part. Edward, do not refuse to be happy."

"Mention not happiness to me," said I; "happiness and shame are incompatible. How could I look your injured father in the face when men would stigmatize me as the abaser of your inexperience? Dishonor! no, nothing for me at that price."

"Then, Edward, must we part?"

"We must," cried I. "I shall soon leave you—I'll follow the profession of arms. Rank is not indispensable to become a soldier. I had spoken the last words in bitterness of heart, and with downcast eyes; I looked up and found that Madame de Nevers, overcome by her emotions, had swooned."

After some days, during which we incessantly combated each other's opinions, the duchess maintaining that it was I, not she, who made the sacrifice, and I assuring her it was honor prevented me from enjoying a happiness I would otherwise have willingly purchased at the price of my life, we were favored by the visit of two noblemen, the prince of Enrichemont and the duke of L. As the marshal had declined receiving any visits from his Parisian friends during his exile, their presence announced the news, joyful to all except myself, that he was recalled. The prince of Enrichemont was correct to a fault in his enthusiasm, but his more mercurial companion, the duke, informed the marshal of the fortunate change that had suddenly taken place in his circumstances, with the frankness and grace that characterized all his actions. Two days afterwards we left Faverange. I took a last farewell of the scenes consecrated by the remembrance of the duchess' avowal of her love, and I was once more established at the marshal's hotel, performing the duties of a secretary as well as I could. I was compelled to disguise the aching of my heart, to feign a spirit of gaiety; and this dissimulation was so revolting to me that I assumed it only through fear of exposing Madame de Nevers. I had latterly perceived that the prince of Enrichemont and the duke of L. had both changed their conduct towards me. The former assumed a haughtier look, the latter a turn of irony, that hurt me the more that I could assign no reason for this unexpected alteration. The marshal alone retained his usual kindness of behavior.

The marshal was obliged to leave Paris for Versailles; after supper, the duchess and myself found ourselves alone.

"Edward," said she, "I must blame you for your continual alterations with the prince of Enrichemont; I overheard you yesterday addressing to him the severest and most piquant remarks."

"Do you take his part?" said I. "I confess I hate him, for he aspires to you, and yet without presumption."

"Are you jealous of him?" said she. "I offer you what I refuse to his solicitations, and you will not accept it."

"Oh! make me an emperor," exclaimed I, "and I will woo you to be my bride."

"You are unwilling to receive that which you are willing to bestow!" "Have mercy on me," cried I; "do not continually place before my eyes the vision of a happiness I cannot enjoy, the temptation is too strong."

"I would it were irresistible."

"You kill me. Now listen: the sacrifice you ask of me is that of my honor; would you consent to the same to save my life?"

She understood me but too well.

"Edward," said she, in a hollow tone, "is it your voice I heard?"

I retired to the opposite end of the room; her words had pierced my heart. She approached me and wished to take my hand.

"Leave me," said I; "do not altogether deprive me of reason."

"I cannot think, Edward, that it is necessary for you to fly me in order to respect me."

I knelt before her.

"I adore, I venerate you. But I cannot live without you—we cannot be united. Death then is the only alternative; we will meet in another world; but tell me, will you there be as lovely, as beautiful as you now are? Will you there keep your vows of love?"

"Edward, I cannot survive you."

She burst into tears, I clasped her in my arms and imprinted a kiss upon her willing lips. She extricated herself from my embrace, and I retired to my apartment to spend the night in sleepless agitation. The next day Madame de Nevers succeeded in convincing me that our marriage would not be ill-omened, and as I could not longer exist in my present state of agony, I concerted with her a plan of escape to America as soon as our union should be solemnized at the altar. In the full tide of happiness, my hopes were at once blasted, when I heard that the tongue of slander and the breath of calumny conspired to blacken the fair fame of a being too pure for earth. As yet these rumors were vague, but by degrees they assumed a more palpable shape, and my blood was chilled with horror, when, after repeated efforts to trace the report to its fountain-head, I found that it had been circulated by the duke of L., than whom none knew better the innocence he attempted to destroy. My brain burned with living fire, my heart throbbed for revenge. I was on the point of setting out to meet him, when I was informed that Madame de Nevers was dangerously ill. Regardless of all consequences, I rushed into the apartment where she lay, senselessly extended upon a sofa. Her head was supported by a lady, who was in tears. The marshal came up to me.

"You will oblige me, sir," said he, "by leaving the room."

"No," said I, "I live or die with her."

I threw myself at the foot of the sofa; the marshal raised me up.

"You cannot remain here," said he; "retire to your apartment; I shall meet you presently."

I heeded not his words; but the lady assured me that the sight of me might be fatal to the duchess.

"In that case," said I, "I obey."

I was met in the entry by one of the servants.

"Good Mr. Edward," said he, "you will kill yourself; lean on my arm."

As I was about to comply, the marshal came out.

"Still here," cried he, in a voice almost choked by passion; "follow me, sir."

"He cannot walk," said the kind-hearted servant.

"You are mistaken," said I; and, collecting all my prostrated energies, I followed the marshal. He began:

"Explanations, sir, are unnecessary between us. My daughter has confessed all; her friend, Madame C., sooner informed than myself of the slanderous imputations cast upon my daughter, came hither from Holland to save her from impending ruin. You are doubtless aware of the harm you have done her reputation, and your conduct is the more culpable that it is out of your power to repair the injury. It is my pleasure that you quit my house instantly. I shall not altogether abandon the son of a valued friend, however unworthy of my protection he may have proved himself. I will obtain for you the situation of secretary to an embassy at a foreign court. You will repair without delay to Lyons, and there await your nomination."

"I am in need of nothing," answered I. "Allow me, sir, the privilege of refusing your offer; to-morrow I shall not be here!"

"Where do you intend going?"

"I know not."

"What are your prospects?"

"I have none."

"Do not think that a life of hopeless love is a desirable existence."

"I wish for no other."

"But what can I do for you?"

"Nothing."

"Edward, you lacerate my heart; I cannot long continue severe with you, but you must perceive that you cannot marry my daughter."

"I know it, sir; allow me to withdraw."

"Not thus," said he. "Am I not your second father?"

"Ah! you are the father of Madame de Nevers; be kind and affectionate to her, console her when I am gone."

I left him, and the thoughts of suicide occurred to me. I defer-

ed the commission of this crime until I had consummated my revenge. My rage against the duke of L. knew no bounds; for he had seen enough of me to know that my love for Madame de Nevers was at least equalled by my respect, and he could have pretended to consider me her lover only through a wantonness of malice, malice that merited the severest chastisement. I went to his house, and after some delay, was admitted into his chamber.

Without farther preface, I revealed to him my purpose.

"I come, sir, to call you to account for the insult you have put upon me, as well as for the slanderous reports you have circulated respecting Madame de Nevers and myself."

"I would willingly comply with your request, for I believe you know, sir, that these affairs are a perfect matter of indifference to me, but, unfortunately, in this case it is impossible."

"Impossible!" cried I, "we will see that presently. Do not think, sir, I will suffer you to calumniate virtue with impunity."

"As to calumny," said the duke of L., smiling, "you will allow me not to consider the question in that light. I thought you were the gallant of Madame de Nevers, and I think so still, and I have said it. Really I do not see what great offence there is in that; I give you the prettiest woman in all Paris, and you are displeased. There are many who would be glad to be in your place, and myself among the first."

"And I, sir, should blush to be in yours. Madame de Nevers is pure, she is unimpeachable. I demand from you satisfaction for the reports you have spread."

"As to that," resumed the duke, "I will spread whatever reports I think correct. You may deny your good-fortune if you please; it is handsome in you to do so, but at the same time it is not exactly the fashion with men of the world at the present day. As to fighting with you, I give you my word and honor I desire it as much as yourself, but, though very much of a gentleman, still you are not a gentilhomme, and I should cover myself with ridicule by agreeing to what you propose. Such are the existing prejudices. I am sorry for it," added he, in a milder tone; "believe me, sir, I esteem you from my soul, and I should have been delighted to fight with you. You grow pale! I pity you, for I know that you are a man of honor. I assure you I look upon this prejudice as barbarous and absurd. I am sorry for what has happened; but do not mistake a friend for an enemy. Are there no other means of atoning for an imprudent word or two?"

"None!" cried I. "Do you refuse me the satisfaction I demand?"

"It is with reluctance that I answer yes."

"Then," said I, "you are a villain and a coward; for none but a villain can insult a woman, and none but a coward will refuse satisfaction to her defender."

I retired from the duke's apartment, and was proceeding to put an end to my miseries at once, when my progress was arrested by a carriage which I recognised to be that of the duchess. She alighted at a church and entered. I followed her, fell upon my knees, prayed for her and myself, and in despair returned to the marshal's. Thus were my criminal intentions frustrated by a glimpse of that being from whom I was separated by the insurmountable barrier of public opinion. Madame de Nevers passed the night at a neighboring convent, and the next morning I started early, and travelled post-haste till I arrived at Lorient, where I embarked for America. *****

Here the manuscript ended. Months passed away, and the period arrived when an attack was to be made on the English camp. Though still enfeebled with my recent wound, I mounted my horse and joined the army. Edward was soon by my side. He had brooded over his mournful recollections till melancholy had become desperation, and, as he lifted his languid eyes to mine, I saw that he was sick at heart and weary of life. I conversed with him long, and attempted to direct his mind to more cheerful prospects; but nothing aroused him till I spoke of the battle, which we anticipated on the ensuing morning. Then his form grew more erect, and his shaded eyes flashed, and his whole face assumed an expression which I had never before witnessed.

"Come, my friend," I exclaimed, "to-morrow will see us victors, and you shall lose all memory of misery in the excitement and glory which await you."

"I will lose it in my grave," said he, in a low, but deep voice. "This dim and weary existence I will bear no longer. Inquire for me to-morrow, and they will point you to a bloody bier, and the eyes which now gaze on you will be closed forever."

As he spoke, he bent down his head and hid his face with his hands, but was aroused by a messenger, who placed in his hands a packet. He received it with apathy, and was in the act of flinging it aside, when his eye fell on the superscription, and an electric feeling of surprise and pleasure seemed to thrill through his whole body. He tore open the letter, and exclaimed incoherently:

"Here! She in America? On her passage? Expected daily. Gracious Providence, am I dreaming? Boy," he continued, almost breathless with the violence of his own emotion, "who gave you this letter? Who?"

The messenger stood quietly, and as I gazed I thought he was strangely beautiful in his appearance. He uncovered his head, and a few ringlets fell over his eyes—in an instant they were clasped in each other's arms. It was Madame de Nevers.

The first flush and fever of surprise and joy having passed away, the interrogations natural to the occasion were put and answered with an absorbing earnestness and eager rapidity which gave me ample opportunity to observe them at my leisure.

"And whence came you?"

"From France."

"And your object?"

"To pass my life with you."

"And your rank—your friends?"

"I left them all for you. What are they to happiness? Rather let me dwell here in this western seclusion with you, than move in the revel and splendor of Europe, wretched and heart-broken."

I need not continue the story. The battle on the morrow found Edward brave, not rash; and the next evening, instead of being stretched out on a bloody bier, he sat with his affianced bride drawing prospects of felicity, such as are more frequently sketched by love and youth than sanctioned by reason or realized by experience.

THE DRAMA.

GRAND HISTORICAL AND MILITARY SPECTACLE,

IN PREPARATION AT THE PARK THEATRE.

WE understand the managers are making every exertion to produce the new spectacle called "Napoleon Buonaparte, Captain of Artillery, General and First Consul, Emperor and Exile," (so successfully performed for a number of nights at Covent Garden theatre,) with, to use the language of the green-room, "unrivalled splendor." The piece, it is estimated, will cost about six thousand dollars. It will, it is said, flood the stage with a splendid variety of new scenery, dresses, banners, eagles, et cetera, copied from the best authorities. Among the dramatis personæ, are nineteen generals, independent of the staff, a military band, and two hundred supernumeraries as imperial guard, infantry, artillery, &c. The passage of Mount St. Bernard will be an imposing display of histrionic grandeur. Upwards of fifty additional hands have been employed since the twentieth of June last in preparations for this interesting spectacle. The effect of embodying upon the stage celebrated pictures of great events, is striking and beautiful to the spectator, and the public will doubtless on this occasion be highly gratified. The annexed notice, elicited by its first representation in England, we copy from the London Times:

"The new piece, which has been expected with so much curiosity and speculation, and which may be considered a sort of dramatic diorama of the life of Napoleon Bonaparte, has been produced at the Covent Garden theatre. Although it comes in a most questionable shape, yet do we feel little inclined to question it. With a conciliating modesty or timidity, it makes no pretension to the title of comedy, or tragedy, or melodrama, or even of the generic drama, but simply appears before us as an historical and military spectacle. Our Gallic neighbors, to whom we have latterly abandoned the embarrassing labor of originality in these matters, have taught us to laugh at the old pedantry of playwrights, and to feel that there may be a very sufficient interest awakened in our breasts by a prolonged action, in which the venerable unities are treated with supreme contempt. Thus much may be hazarded in assertion on so delicate a matter, that whatever may be subtracted by these lawless innovations from intensity or concentration of emotion, is compensated for in no small degree by the greater variety of those excitements of feeling in which we are so well pleased to indulge. If, however, we at all suffer the existence of this new principle of theatric composition, it must be confessed that it could not be applied to a more appropriate subject than that of his life, whose entire career presented a connected series of extraordinary events, forming, when contemplated as a whole, a combination of epic grandeur and effect. To connect the various most prominently remarkable of these events judiciously, to invest them with the moral importance which originally was associated with them, and to lead them with a gradual expansion of interest to a denouement, was the great difficulty which their dramatic arranger had to encounter; and in regard to it he has been very successful in the undertaking, which has attracted this notice. Its various acts, with the exception of the last, are essentially spectacular, and are very much disjointed. In the first, we are introduced suddenly and skilfully into the animation of the French camp before Toulon, where the young officer of artillery has already attracted the admiration and confidence of the shrewd soldiery—shows various symptoms of the restless genius by which he is possessed—obtains the sanction of Duromier for those plans which the stultified Doppet had rejected, and erects his celebrated battery which decided the fate of Toulon, which, to the great edification of a houseful of cockneys, was, on this occasion, veritably worked upon the stage. In this act is also introduced an interesting and lively sutler, Victoria, (Miss Taylor) who predicts to Napoleon his future fortunes, and appears episodically in the subsequent part of the piece. The second act brings us so far on in Napoleon's career as the passage of Mount St. Bernard in May 1800. This is all spectacular, but well and picturesquely arranged, giving a not inadequate idea of the toils which the French soldiery had to encounter in that stupendous expedition. The convent is here introduced, Napoleon on his horse, and the well known incident of his ordering the charge to be beaten when he wished to animate his almost exhausted troops to continued exertion. The effect of the first part of this act, in which he addresses his army on its commencement of the ascent, is diminished for want of a sufficient number of men on the stage. The latter part is free from this objection, and is highly interesting in its way. We next pass on to the capture of Vienna, in 1809, when Napoleon is emperor of the French and king of Italy. Here we have a review of the guards at Thonbrun. The interest of this act chiefly turns on the attempt at the assassination of the emperor by the German student, who is condemned to be shot, but is afterwards pardoned. Then comes the abdication and farewell at Fontainebleau; in which latter scene the arrangement of Vernet's picture is adhered to as nearly as possible. The piece finishes with a long act in St. Helena, ending with Napoleon's death. Its chief interest was, of course, concentrated in Mr. Warde; and it would be doing great injustice to that gentleman not to add, that it was sustained with a power which very few had anticipated from him in so difficult a task. His personal appearance, particularly from the third part downwards, was singularly fortunate in its resemblance to the great original. In the two first scenes it was not equally so:—the strongly marked, thin, and austere countenance of Bonaparte which is seen in all portraits of him, even during the consulship, not having been well imitated. In his action, we should have thought Mr. Warde too mincing and abrupt. A similar remark we should apply to his manner of speaking; it was too unvaryingly sharp, quick, and epigrammatic. This is not consistent with the accounts given of him when emperor. As his frame became more rounded and fat, his voice became more mellowly toned, and was, except when particularly excited, destitute of harshness, while his manner was mild and prepossessing, more especially at St. Helena. Here, indeed, lay the chief fault in Mr. Warde's performance, because he could not disguise his style of speaking, as he did his person; and his well known incorrect mode of accentuation broke in upon the correctness of his living portraiture. The last scene is injured considerably by this blemish, and the more so because in it the whole interest is thrown upon the man alone—the philosopher. Independent of this, however, the scene is too long, and tried the patience of the audience considerably. The other characters in the piece are sufficiently well represented to aid the general effect. Miss Taylor's Victoria is distinguished by her usual talent. Mr. Warde was obliged to appear at the fall of the curtain, and receive a well merited compliment for his performance."

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

MEXICAN DOMESTIC BEES.—Two hives, constructed by these bees, have recently been presented to the Linnean Society of London. They are formed of hollow trees, a portion of which, of between two and three feet in length, has been cut off, and a hole is bored through the sides into the hollows at about the middle, and the ends of the hives stopped up with clay. These hives are usually suspended on a tree, in a horizontal position, with the opening into the cavity directed also horizontally, and are speedily taken possession of by the bees. Their interior arrangement differs materially from that of the European bee, some of the layers of the comb assuming a vertical, and some a horizontal position, the cells of the latter being most numerous. All the combs, both vertical and horizontal, are composed of a single series of cells applied laterally to each other, and not, as in the European bee-hive, of two series, the one applied against the extremities of the other. The cells appear destined solely for the habitation of the young bees. The combs are placed together, at some distance from the opening of the hives; and surrounding them are several layers of wax, as thin as paper, irregular in their form, and placed at some little distance from each other; externally to these are placed the sacs for containing the honey, which are generally large and rounded in form. They vary in size, some of them exceeding an inch and a half in diameter. They are supported by processes of wax from the wood of the cavity, or from each other, and are frequently placed side by side; but their indisposition is altogether irregular, and bears some resemblance to that of a bunch of grapes. Some of the honey sacs are placed apart from the others, and form a distinct cluster.

From this irregular position of the honey sacs, a most important advantage is gained by the cultivators of the Mexican hive bee, as, in order to possess themselves of the honey, all that is necessary is to remove the plug from the end of the cavity employed as a hive, and to introduce the hand and withdraw the honey. The store of the laborious bee is thus transferred to the proprietor of the hive without injuring, and almost without disturbing, its inhabitants. The end of the hive is then again stopped up, and the bees hasten to lay in a fresh store of honey. A hive treated in this way affords, during the summer, at least two harvests.

The bee itself, by which this nest is constructed, is smaller than the European hive bee; its abdomen, especially, being much shorter.

Some curious anecdotes are related by the possessors as to the manners of these bees, one of which deserves to be recorded. They assert that at the entrance of each hive a sentinel is placed to watch the outgoing and incoming of his fellows, and that this sentinel is relieved at the expiration of twenty-four hours, when another assumes his post and duties for the same period. Of the duration of this guard some doubts may be reasonably entertained; but of its existence ample evidence has been obtained by repeated observation. At all times a single bee was seen occupying the hole leading to the nest, who, on the approach of another, withdrew himself within a small cavity, apparently made for this purpose, on the left-hand side of the aperture; and thus allowed the passage of the individual entering or quitting the hive, the sentinel constantly resuming the station immediately after the passage had been effected. During how long a time the same individual remained on duty could not be ascertained; for, although many attempts were made to mark him, by introducing a pencil tipped with paint, he constantly eluded the aim taken. With the paint thus attempted to be applied to the bee the margin of the opening was soiled, and the sentinel, as soon as he was free from the annoyance he suffered from the thrusts repeatedly made at his body, approached the foreign substance to taste it, and, evidently disliking the material, he withdrew into his hive. A troop of bees was soon observed to advance towards the place, each individual bearing a small particle of wax, or of propolis, in his mandibles, which he deposited in his turn upon the soiled part of the wood. The little laborers then returned to the hive, and repeated the operation until a small pile rose above the blemished part, and consequently relieved the inhabitants from the annoyance.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 115.

IN almost every class of society reform is the paramount object of interest. We may with reason hope to dwell soon in the meridian splendors of the golden age. Nothing can be more truly gratifying than that these sagacious and stupendous schemes should have originated in our own country. I have observed with pleasure the rapid and general spread of the spirit of improvement. It pervades all branches of political and domestic economy, and each regenerated citizen lends his labors, or at least his name, to establish a state of society which shall be perfect.

I was engaged the other evening in reading a British author, of some renown, when—but as the page which occupied my attention seemed, in some measure, connected with what subsequently occurred, I shall take the liberty of introducing it here. It is in the form of a letter, and, as the reader will perceive, very short:

"I am one of that sickly tribe who are commonly known by the name of valetudinarians; and do confess to you that I first contracted this ill habit of body, or rather of mind, by the study of physic. I no sooner began to peruse books of this nature, but I found my pulse was irregular; and scarce ever read the account of any disease that I did not fancy myself afflicted with. Dr. Sydenham's learned treatise of fevers threw me into a lingering hectic, which hung upon me all the while I was reading that excellent piece. I then applied myself to the study of several authors, who have written upon phthisical distempers, and by that means fell into a consumption; till at length, growing very fat, I was in a manner ashamed out of that imagination. Not long after this I found in myself all the symptoms of the gout, except pain; but was cured of it by a treatise upon the ague, written by a very ingenious author. I at length studied myself into a complication of distempers; but accidentally taking into my hand that ingenious discourse written by Sanctiorius, I was resolved to direct myself by a scheme of rules, which I had collected from his observations. The learned world are very well acquainted with that gentleman's invention; who, for the better carrying on his experiments, contrived a certain mathematical chair, which was so artificially hung upon springs, that it would weigh any thing as well as a pair of scales.

"Having provided myself with this chair, I used to study, eat, drink and sleep in it; inasmuch, that I may be said, for these last three years, to have lived in a pair of scales. I compute myself, when I am in full health, to be precisely two hundred weight, falling short of it about a pound after a day's fast, and exceeding it as much after a very full meal; so that it is my continual employment to trim the balance between these two volatile pounds in my constitution. In my ordinary meals I fetch myself up to two hundred weight and half a pound; and if, after having dined, I find myself fall short of it, I drink just so much small beer, or eat such a quantity of bread, as is sufficient to make me weight. In my greatest excesses I do not transgress more than the other half pound; which, for my health's sake, I do the first Monday in every month. As soon as I find myself duly poised after dinner, I walk till I have perspired five ounces and four scruples; and when I discover, by my chair, that I am so far reduced, I fall to my books, and study away three ounces more. As for the remaining parts of the pound, I keep no account of them. I do not dine and sup by the clock, but by my chair; for when that informs me my pound of food is exhausted, I conclude myself to be hungry, and lay in another with all diligence. In my days of abstinence I lose a pound and a half, and on solemn fasts am two pounds lighter than on the other days in the year.

"I allow myself, one night with another, a quarter of a pound of sleep, within a few grains more or less; and if, upon my rising, I find that I have not consumed my whole quantity, I take out the rest in my chair. Upon an exact calculation of what I expended and received the last year, which I always register in a book, I find the medium to be two hundred weight, so that I cannot discover that I am impaired one ounce in my health during a whole twelvemonth. And yet, notwithstanding this my great care to ballast myself equally every day, and to keep my body in its proper poise, so if is, that I find myself in a sick and languishing condition. My complexion is grown very sallow, my pulse low, and my body hydropical."

Notwithstanding the usual seriousness of my disposition, the dilemma of this writer provoked a smile, which was not repressed by the expression that lighted the countenance of the Little Genius, who seemed to share my mirth.

"Oh ho, sir student, dreaming still over the ways of men. Art thou not weary of thus plodding for ever in one dull round—of studying human nature, only to smile at its weakness?"

"Thou hast even read my heart," said I. "Fatigue often overcomes me, and my spirit mourns in its narrow prison—this dungeon, wherein the intellect lies obscured in the feeble light which gleams in upon it fitfully. I have become the victim of useless wishes. I envy the leviathan serpent his gigantic power to sweep the ocean from shore to shore, and to search beneath its untrodden depths; and the eagle his proud wing and unshrinking eye, and loneliness of nature, that I might take my flight from this poor world."

"Thou art a good fellow, master student, though not especially encumbered with wisdom," said my companion; "but come, thou shalt have thy wish. Prepare thyself for a flight."

"Whither wilt thou conduct me?" inquired I.

He beckoned me to the window. It was the middle hour of a summer night. The round moon was riding high in heaven, with one brilliant star by her side. It flashed with a trembling lustre from its distant sphere.

"What say'st thou to a trip to yonder gem? Nay, start not, but place thy hand in mine."

I obeyed, and suddenly the earth seemed to withdraw itself, as if falling into the immeasurable depths of space. Dimly in the distance I could trace the land and the ocean, then but a dark circle, and at length it disappeared among the shadows. In turning my straining eyes from the point where the vanished earth, with its millions of beings, had last met my gaze, and looking towards the star which had but now dazzled my eyes from the window, I found myself falling, with a gentle and regulated motion, towards a verdant plain, luxuriant in the warmth of a summer day.

"Why, we are again on the earth!" I exclaimed with surprise.

"No, you are in error," replied my companion; "we are descending upon the surface of the little star which you but now saw in the distance. Come, let us alight."

As he spoke we passed with a pleasant motion in an oblique direction over two or three groves, till we reached the ground on the top of a hill.

"Wonderful!" said I, strongly excited with the novelty of this expedition, and the strange appearance of the surrounding objects. "It is nearly impossible for me to realize that I am not on the earth; yet it would be almost equally so to believe that I was."

"Reality," said the Genius, "is widely different from your previous conception of it. You believe in many things implicitly, at the discovery of the truth of which you are strangely surprised. How often have you wandered in your little planet, cast your eyes towards this orb, and thought, 'how sublime thus to behold a mighty world hanging in my sight!' yet you start with incredulity when experience confirms the dictate of reason."

"And where is my little planet," asked I, "with its oceans and mountains, its leaping cataracts and silver rivers, its murmuring cities and waving woods, and its myriads of beings, whom I loved or despised?"

"Ay, gaze around upon the magnificence of this scene. The petty globe, whence thou hast surveyed the heavens, is not now visible to thee; but forget it for a moment, with its tyrants and its bigots, its canting demagogues and their slavish disciples, and the few of good and great who look on and smile, or weep or wonder in silence, and let us observe the spot which we have travelled so far to visit. You must know this world was once like yours. Its inhabitants were separated into different nations, each governed by their own laws, and speaking their own language. They grew up, as the mortals of the earth have done, under the influence of nature and reason. A thriving commerce crowded their shores with business, and covered the sea with ships; universal industry spread among the people, and populous cities arose and magnificent temples; the car shot along the rail-road with the velocity of the wind; steam-boats ploughed the waves, and conveyed precious products from distant countries, as if they were connected together; communities were naturally divided into different classes of society: there were the good and the bad, the rich and the poor, the idle and the industrious, the prosperous and the unfortunate; and the evils incident to human nature, of course, accompanied the advantages and alloyed the blessings. Notwithstanding this, however, the great mass of the nations seemed about as happy as man ever has been, or probably ever will be—for Providence hath every where drawn a limit to human enjoyment as to human pain. Even virtue, after having reached a certain point, finds its consciousness degenerating into pride. Its conviction of its own perfection and importance grows exaggerated and monstrous: it loses its character of meekness and modesty, becomes bigoted and domineering, imagines itself gifted with exorbitant powers over others, released from the rules of courtesy, the laws of justice, the dictates of mercy, and all the signs of respect and love which one frail human being, however good and great in his own estimation, should pay to another. In the pursuit of the most laudable objects it thus, with an absurdity and inconsistency disgustingly glaring to all but itself, resorts to the vilest and the wickedest means; and yet the delusion is so complete as, in the opinion of many, to sanction the exercise of fraud, the violation of truth, the practice of cruelty, till at length it enlists under its own banners vices more hideous than those which they are intended to exterminate. What pity, that fruit is no sooner ripe than it begins to rot: but wherefore do you start?"

"I was shocked to perceive the silence and destruction of yonder city," said I. "Its houses are ruined, its statues lie in fragments, ivy has crept over the broken arches of its temples, and grass and moss have grown up among its pavements, the streets are deserted, ships are mouldering on the water—what can this mean?"

"This world, once happy and free, is now under the dominion of a tyrant."

"What dazzling soldier," asked I, "has had the genius in war to overcome so great a people? What an army he must have commanded; what unknown weapons he must have used; what fatal engines; what—"

"Alas! thou art again in error. No physical power could do this: no cannon, no sword, no fire, no chain: for whatever wreck and ruin the gaunt and bloody figure of ordinary war may leave behind it; however towns may be burnt, plains desolated, and nations dispersed, there is a principle of re-action and remedy in nature, which will re-build the cities, improve the plains, and awaken the nations to hope and industry. But this tyrant has worked with moral weapons; his attacks have been made against the mind and heart. He has prostrated hope and pride, he has taken away the incentive to human actions. Instead of making men virtuous, he has made them weak and idle."

"And who," exclaimed I, "may this despot be?"

"His name is Reform. Come, he holds a court to-day; we will visit him."

We travelled on, and presently arrived in a vast amphitheatre, where the monarch sat on his lofty seat. He was of a youthful appearance, with a sweet look and winning voice. His words were specious and irresistible: he repeatedly laid his hand on his heart, and his eyes in speaking immediately filled with tears.

A criminal was dragged before him.

"What is his crime?" inquired the king.

"We have detected him," said his accuser, "in having invented a machine to diminish labor."

"Monstrous. What, cast your fellow-creatures out of employ, that you may realize the advantage? Destroy his machinery, and conduct him to execution. The man who could inflict an injury upon the rights of another deserves to die."

"What has this fair creature committed that she is dragged before us?"

A coarse and awkward fellow, in filthy garments, with a discordant voice and bloated countenance, stepped forward and spoke:

"High and mighty sovereign of this enlightened spot, dispenser at once of happiness, virtue, and justice, and protector of the rights of man; thou who hast established equality among human beings, and made them free, I tremble and kiss the earth before thee! How shall I name the crime of this seeming angel?—She is guilty of music. She hath an instrument, a relic of the bad age; she made it sound, and displayed a wicked delight in the abomination."

"Wretch," said Reform, "what hast thou done? Music! As well mightest thou fondle in thy bosom the serpent that tempted man. It is poison—contamination—it melts thy firmness like snow in the sun; it awakens all the licentious passions of thy degraded nature; thou art an easy and a willing victim; thus corrupted, death is thy doom—away."

"Great asserter of universal independence!" said another, "I am pale with horror; we have discovered—"

"Speak, I charge ye!"

"We have discovered a conspiracy, of the most black and diabolical nature. A society of rebels have been in the habit of assembling to eat and drink—food and liquor not sanctioned by thy wise and just laws. In every way these reprobates scorn thee. They follow not the fashion of our goodly brethren, who thou knowest have their hair, that type of vanity, shaven from their heads, are clothed in scanty garments, and never smile, or speak above a whisper! There may be heard the horrid sounds of laughter, and inhaled the savor of villainous dishes—the flesh of beeves and the juice of the grape."

The scrupulous silence of the assembly was here broken by groans of compassion and anger. Reform, who, I found, kept a well-disciplined standing army for his own use, ordered a company to bring the offenders into his presence. I anticipated much amusement from the trial of the malefactors, who seemed hale, hearty looking gentlemen, with a goodly rotundity of person, which was immediately noted as a strong evidence of guilt, but I was interrupted by my companion.

"You see, master student, by this brief observation of the principles of Reform, and the general stagnation of his kingdom, that he has done more evil than good. He hath checked commerce, because it leads to corruption; steam-boats are not permitted to ply, from the danger which attends the use of steam. The press is destroyed, from the fear that it would circulate error; and the people do every thing according to law."

We walked a little further. Long tables were set out under trees; a huge bell was rung, and the hungry populace thronged to partake of the banquet. It consisted of cracked roasted corn and water.

"These, I presume, are the paupers?" said I.

"No, the first citizens," said the Genius. "This is the only meal the law allows, and no other material is permitted. But come, let us to earth again: thou hast seen enough; go tell to the inhabitants of thy planet how much they are excelled by their neighbors."

As he spoke we rose and sailed over the table, where the spiritless, lank disciples of the despotic Reform were mincing their cracked corn in mournful silence, when, with a sudden start, I raised my head and found I had been sleeping over the complaints of the unsuccessful valetudinarian.

THE FINE ARTS.

ORGANS.

To all amateurs of the musical art, the progress of sacred music should be interesting, for although part of the community affect to regard the theatres as so many "Golgothas," and look upon the whole race of persons who make sweet sounds upon stringed and wind instruments, as children of darkness; yet we, who are not so violently afflicted, but have a strong partiality for the men of catgut and the inflators of wood, nevertheless feel deeply interested in the musical affairs of the church. In all countries, excepting America, the church is the nursery of dramatic vocal talent. In England, and throughout Europe, the concert-rooms and the stage are supplied from that source, and it would be extremely difficult to collect a chorus from any other class of persons. This state of things will arrive at the same point in this country in due time; and as reform is now the fashionable watchword every where, we think in this case it will be attended by improvement. But to our subject. An organ of large dimensions has been erected in St. Thomas's church, by Henry Erben, of this city; and although we are not prepared to state that it is a faultless instrument, yet we consider that it is one highly creditable to the artificer. We were present when several amateurs and professors attended, by invitation, and essayed its powers, and we had an opportunity of making an examination of its qualities, which leads us to consider it worthy of the handsome case in which it is enclosed, and an appropriate ornament to the neat church in which it is erected. We understand that Mr. Hance is appointed organist, and we trust that he may be supported by a good choir, for after the organ at St. Paul's church, we have no hesitation in pronouncing it the best in New-York. In giving an opinion on such a subject, we are, of course, guided by the recollection of other organs which we have heard in many parts of Europe; but on this occasion we cannot follow the example of sundry contemptible snarlers who have wandered to this country, and who affect to awe the astonished natives by dint of effrontery into believing that nothing can be good here because they have heard something better there. "Ah, pooh! say these empirics, a concert! call that a concert! If you had heard a concert at Berlin, as I have! An opera! stuff and nonsense—do you pretend to have heard an opera here? You have never heard an opera at Prague, as I have! An organ! Do you call that an organ which Mr. Blondell plays on at St. Paul's church? Pahaw—if you had heard my friend Thumpenhause play on the great organ at Haerlem, as I have!" In the mean time, if the subject were investigated, in all probability, the grandiloquent gentleman would be found to have blown the bellows to some maestro di capella, or to have carried the violin-case of some professor in those cities—if indeed he had ever been there. Generally speaking we prefer the quality of tone of the English organs to those of the continent, the diapasons being more full and rich, and the reed-stops less harsh, although organs on the continent have frequently more power. The most esteemed in England are by Smith, usually called old Father Smith, from the early date at which he flourished; Avery, and England, also commonly called old England. The work put in by these artificers was so excellent that it has endured for a vast number of years, and at the present day their organs are unrivalled. Smith particularly excelled in fabricating the trumpet stop—and that stop of the great organ (in contradistinction to the choir organ and swell) in the instrument erected by him, and now in use at the cathedral chapel of Christ church, Oxford, is the admiration of all professors. By many it has been imagined that Handel, when he wrote those extraordinary and most difficult divisions for the trumpet in many of his songs, originally played them as obligato passages on the organ by the use of such a stop—this, however, is mere matter of speculation, and as such we leave it.

The organ at St. Paul's church in this city is built by England, and, from that circumstance, would be held in as much estimation by the curious in organs as an original by Titian, Rembrandt, or Annibal Caracci would be revered by the dilettanti in paintings. The instrument, indeed, although not of the largest calibre, fully establishes the reputation of its maker. At the present day, among the most reputed organ-builders in England are Gray, Elliot, Byfield and Green, and Flight and Robson. Gray's organs are remarkable for their extreme delicacy, and his choir organs generally possess the stop diapason, the flute, and the dulciana in great perfection; for this reason, he is generally preferred for chamber organs; and some magnificent specimens of his workmanship are to be found throughout England, in the houses of private individuals. Among the most remarkable is an organ at Uxbridge-house, in London, the property of Lord Anglesea; a beautiful specimen also is to be found in the new Mary-le-bone church, and at Drury-lane theatre; the price of the latter was three thousand guineas. Elliot, with Byfield and Green, are hardly less successful. Flight and Robson are probably the greatest musical mechanics of the age, and are remarkable for having brought to perfection the barrel-organ. A self-playing instrument of this species, which likewise possessed keys, was built for the late Lord Kirkwall, and first established their fame; its execution of the overture to Il flauto magico was almost perfect. An organ also built by them for the present duke of Leinster, is another curious specimen of the art. It not only plays by means of a barrel, but is so constructed as to fill up an interstice in the wall between two chambers, presenting an ornamental front and a row of keys in either. Since then they have erected, and are part proprietors of a gigantic instrument of this description, the primary cost of which was ten thousand pounds sterling; it is exhibited as the "Apollonicon," in St. Martin's-lane; and a first-rate organist, Purkiss, who is stone blind, on appointed days gives performances on the keyed part of the instrument, which are attended by all the fashion of London, and have proved a most lucrative speculation. To afford an idea of the power and gravity of the lower notes is impossible; suffice it to say, that the drums and bellows of the mechanical part of the instrument are acted upon by a small steam-engine. Messrs. Flight and Robson, a few years ago, built a splendid organ for some church in Calcutta, which we had an opportunity of inspecting: it had the peculiarity of quarter-tones, a mode of building which formerly existed, but is now disused: indeed the conformation of the ear must be fine to attach importance, or even reality, to such sounds; and, as an instrument so formed requires a different and more perplexed scale, it has been very generally abandoned. The only organ which we ever inspected with quarter-tones, in addition to this, is in the curious old chapel of the Temple; and, if we mistake not, it was built by England. In conclusion, it remains for us to notice the general use, or rather the abuse of this noble instrument. We fearlessly assert, that in no country has the organ had equal justice done to it as in England, which is fairly attributable not to superiority of tact or musical knowledge on the part of the natives, but to the superiority of their organ music. To lay before our readers proof of this assertion is easy. The great composers who have written for the service of the catholic church in other countries have invariably written in score for a full band, and the organ is but a minor consideration to them; in short, we seldom find Haydn, Mozart, Pergolesi, Guglielmi, Sarti, and a whole host of great masters, contemplating the organ, except as giving harmony to the thorough bass. In England, on the contrary, the sublime service of the cathedral depends entirely on the organ, and has been so written by every composer, from Bird and Travis down to Dr. Crotch. Let any amateur take up the beautiful masses of the catholic church, and play them on the organ, as arranged by Latrobe or Novello; they will be found to contain troops of demi-semi-quavers and staccato passages, in allegro time; which species of music is not only ineffective but disgusting on the organ, although charming when played by a band. Let him then take up some of the services, or even anthems, of the protestant church, and the long holding notes and fine modulation of the slow movements, followed by the bold and steady fugue, will admit of that grasp being laid on the instrument, without which its chief beauties are lost. At the same time we are perfectly free to confess that, for the study of the organist, the fugues written as exercises by the Bachs, particularly by Sebastian Bach, are models of perfection; and we likewise must add that, giving the preference to the service of the English cathedral, as a school for correct organ-playing, we by no means forget that numerous talented organists are to be found in Germany, whose treatment of the instrument is worthy of all praise. In Italy this is not so common. In Spain and Portugal bad taste generally prevails; and in France, particularly in country towns, it is deplorable; the organists literally amusing their congregations with the overtures of Grétry, Boieldieu, Auber, and Rossini; and at marriages and christenings they actually play cotillions and the contré-dances, and that, too, generally upon the great organ; while at funerals this pathetic instrument is seldom used, but in place of it two or three lusty priests roar a "de profundis" to the coarse notes of the military serpent or trombone.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

LETTER FROM BOSTON.

It is some time since you have heard, my dear public, from my old friend Peregrine George. Meanwhile you have probably forgotten his existence, and you will read his epistle as from the pen of an utter stranger. Be it so! names die into echoes, and faces, except the few "old and familiar ones," are soon forgotten. Four weeks, as times go, form a considerable immortality, and particularly blessed is the writer not entirely dead and buried in six. Since you last read a line from my pen, now I fear some two months since, what revolutions have marked the face of the globe! The medium through which my own poor paragraphs have reached you, with the change and improvement of things about it, has also been improved and changed—and when, for the future, you meet me in the columns of the Mirror, it will be as an old friend with a new face.

Manifold and marvellous have been the matters which have disturbed within the last two weeks the little spot from which I date. We have just had a plan for a beautiful cemetery in the neighborhood of the city, proposed and carried on; two or three noble celebrations of the fourth; a prosecution for a libel begun, carried on, and dropped, and perhaps another interesting item or so, of which more in the subsequent paragraphs.

The proposed cemetery, which is about to be established under the direction of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, is to be situated in a beautiful spot a few miles from Boston, known by the name of Sweet Auburn. It is a noble place, standing by a fine sweep of Charles River, with every variety of surface, and covered with a vigorous growth of wood. The ground selected is about seventy-two acres in extent, and those parts of it best adapted to that purpose are to be divided into lots of two hundred or more square feet, to be used by individuals becoming proprietors of them for places of burial; the remaining portions are to be appropriated to gardens. "It will be at the option of those interested to build tombs of the usual construction on these lots, or to make graves in them when occasion may require; identifying the lot by a single monument, or the graves by separate stones, or leaving the whole without any other ornament than the green turf and the overshadowing trees."

The propriety and advantages of a burial-place of this description in the neighborhood of a populous city are too obvious to need recapitulation. The remarkable beauty of the site chosen for this cemetery, its vicinity to our venerable university, combined with the good taste and careful art which will be used in its arrangement, will make it in a few years one of the most interesting greens in New England. "In a spot like this," says the article from which we have quoted in the preceding paragraph, "were laid the remains of the patriarchs of Israel. In the neighborhood of their great towns the ancient Egyptians established extensive receptacles for the dead, and the Greeks and Romans erected the monuments of the departed by the road-side, on the approach to their cities, or in pleasant groves in their suburbs. A part of the grove of Academus, near Athens, famous for the school of Plato, was appropriated to the sepulchres of their men of renown; and it was a saying of Themistocles, that the monuments he beheld there would not allow him to sleep. The Appian-way was lined with the monuments of the heroes and sages of Rome. In modern times the Turkish people are eminent for that respectful care of the places of sepulture, which forms an interesting trait of the oriental character. At the head and foot of each grave a cypress tree is planted, so that the grave-yard becomes, in a few years, a deep and shady grove. These sacred precincts are never violated; they form the most beautiful suburbs to the cities, and not unfrequently when the city of the living has been swept away by the political vicissitudes, frequent under that government, the grove of cypress remains, spreading its sacred shelter over that of the dead."

Have you seen the first number of the New England Magazine, published and edited by the Messrs. Buckingham? It promises to be really a good thing, and will enlist no inconsiderable share of talent in its pages.

Among other strangers of distinction in the city is an ourang outang, who, on the fourth of July held a levee crowded with fashionable visitors. She has been sitting for a full-length portrait, which is to be engraved on wood for a work on natural history, now in the course of publication by Messrs. Gray and Bowen!

You have, no doubt, seen a paragraph going the rounds about a little vagrant by the name of Yorke, who says that he sailed from Fairfield, Maine, in an open boat, entirely alone. He was picked up by a party of fishermen beyond our light-house, on Sunday last. I saw him on Wednesday, and was much amused. He is a small, Cape Codish-looking fellow, brown as a nutmeg, short and impudent. He swears pretty considerably, and is not afraid of the emperor of darkness himself. The printed paragraph is accurate. He was without compass or quadrant, and subsisted principally on live fish; occasionally stopping at some town on his way for fresh food and water. This, at least is his own statement. "Once," said he, "I thought I was gone for it. A pretty d—d big fish came prowling about, and was after swallowing me alive—boat and all." The chap is an old one. Under what star was he born? I feel quite an interest in the fellow, and should like to be able to cast his horoscope. He may yet live to be an admiral.

Peter has just brought me in the first number of the ninth volume of the Mirror from the post-office. He tells me there was quite a crowd there, and that it was with difficulty he could procure it. He saw a great many bearing off the new Mirror in triumph, and infers from this circumstance that your improved appearance, and the admirable dramatic sketch on the first page, were the occasion of the excitement. Whether it was that, or some other important matter, I will not undertake to determine. Peter is a philosopher and a scholar, and his opinion is well worth two or three of mine. P. G.

LETTER FROM A LADY.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—I am sorry to observe that you have ceased the castigations with which, several months ago, you were wont to lash the prevailing follies of the times. Are there no more follies, or do the satirists despair of ever shaming or whipping them out of existence? I should regret to see them lay aside the thong, for there are many practices which are ridiculous, and many which interrupt the peace and happiness of social life. Among these latter, permit me to direct your attention to one which is both ludicrous and disagreeable. Nobody loves my brother Charles more than I; yet, with all his admirable qualities of head and heart, he is the passive victim of one weakness, which I am resolved to reveal to the world. Perhaps when he beholds himself figuring away at full length in the Mirror, he may rouse up sufficient resolution to correct the error.

You must know he is haunted by a demon in the shape of the toothache. I need not tell you how unwelcome is this terrible and execrable intruder into the domestic circle. Sometimes we are all at dinner, laughing and talking, when Charles springs up as if he had been bitten by a rattlesnake, and darts up and down the room with both his hands pressed against his cheek, and there is an end for him of all pleasure for that day. It seems to me that we never accept an invitation to spend an evening abroad but, just as we are dressed and ready for a sally, poor Charles may be seen writhing with the agony of his dreadful disease, with flushed cheeks and drooping lids, and thus the party is broken up. It attacks him with the same unrelenting virulence on all occasions—drives him from his necessary business, breaks his slumbers, arouses the whole family in the middle of the night, and disturbs every body in the house as well as himself. Then we have such a medley of specifics, drops, panaceas, nostrums, and knick-knacks to overlook in order to afford him relief. Out come handkerchiefs, cotton, brandy, laudanum, this, that, and the other. Here's a vial of the essence of cloves, and here of slum and spirits of nitre. Here's Mr. Snubb's cure, and Mr. Peterson's cure, and the immediate and certain remedy introduced by Monsieur Le Foi, dentist to his majesty, from Paris. He smokes a pipe, and steams his face with vinegar and hot bricks; binds hot mashed potatoes on his cheeks, or a mustard and pepper blister behind his ear. Still the torture goes on aching, aching, aching, and we go on pitying, pitying, pitying, and all to no purpose, for the pain takes its departure just when it pleases, its retreat being not at all accelerated by the innumerable "certain cures" offered by the quacks.

Notwithstanding this continual and excruciating anguish which thus, while it almost overcomes the sufferer, plunges a whole family into confusion, no one has sufficient eloquence to induce him to have it out. We have tried all means, have particularly recommended him to call on some dentist acquainted with his business, and read to him your appropriate notice of "Mr. Parmy's Treatise," in a late number; yet, with a singular perversity and cowardice he holds on to the miserable stump, as if it were a source of happiness instead of misery. I should also add that his other teeth, which were recently in excellent order, are beginning to decay, in consequence of the frequent application of powerful stimuli. Please publish this unvarnished statement, and oblige yours,

PORTIA.

P. S. Charles has just come in, almost distracted with his old agony. He looks in a dying condition. I must get the cotton, the laudanum, the—heigho! I wonder how a man dare be such a coward.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Baverhill; or Memoirs of an Officer in the army of Wolfe. By James A. Jones, author of the "Tales of an Indian Camp." Two vols. 12mo. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

THE "Tales of an Indian Camp," written with much vigor, were well received. The author's reputation will suffer nothing by the present publication. As a complete story, it is not above criticism; for it sometimes approaches so nearly the limits of probability, as at least to induce the inquiry if it has not overstepped them. It contains, however, much really good writing. There are both philosophy and lively humor in the account of the cause of the hero's first attempts at study:

"I take pleasure in declaring that my pride was first roused, and my attention first drawn to books and learning by the sarcasms of a female; and that I was continued in the study, and afterward confirmed in the love of these 'mute oracles of truth' by the same lovely and gentle being. I shall never forget the hour when I made the unpleasant discovery, that a pair of the brightest eyes that ever lighted up the human face were weeping from very laughter at my mis-spelling the word 'nose—nose on your face,' by spelling it as though it were the plural of the negation. I did not before think that I should feel so much chagrin at any gibe which did not tax me with being flogged by an equal in years, or otherwise rivalled in pugilistic or gymnastic exercises. I remember well that there was a loud and general titter, which finally swelled into a deafening peal of laughter; and further remember, and shall never forget, that when I hung my head for shame, and tears rushed to my eyes, kind, good, sweet little Mary Danvers looked up, with a countenance in which visible sympathy with my suffering and regret for having participated in causing it, were struggling with a strong wish to join in the merriment which was pervading the rest of the school. It was her laugh which had vexed me. *****

"In ill-regulated country schools there is usually a strife to see who shall first leave the school-house, and as much hustling takes place as there does among a crowd of London pickpockets on Lord-mayor's day. On this day I made great exertions to get out, not so much for the honor of mastery, as to avoid Mary. Hitherto it had been my invariable custom to wait at the door until she had adjusted her cloak or her shawl, as the season demanded one or the other, and put on her bonnet and gloves, that I might lend her my assistance to cross the rude bridge thrown over the neighboring streamlet. To-day I made no pause, but I heard from the noisy crowd of giddy urchins behind me shouts of 'the bridge, Lynn, the bridge; help Mary Danvers over the bridge;' coupled with other cries of 'nose—nose on your face,' and mixed with the noisy remonstrances of the few who kindly clung to my fallen fortunes, and defended me from the taunts and reproaches so liberally showered upon me. But I was fleet of foot, almost as fleet as the wild colt, and soon left both friends and foes far behind me. I could see them, however, for minutes after I had ceased to hear them, throwing their caps and hats into the air, with as much joy at my discomfiture as a nation of the old world would have testified for the death of a tyrant—or the birth of one.

"As the usual road to my home was much too public for one laboring under a consciousness of deserved disgrace, I took an unfrequented path, which would screen me in some measure from observation. It was true it led over a morass, an almost impassable morass; but what were bogs and quagmires, wet feet and fevers, to meeting Mary, or hearing the dreadful sound—'nose on your face.' I proceeded in this seldom-trodden path till I came to the edge of the bog, and then secure, as I thought, from interruption, gave myself up to grief. It was not a usual thing for me to shed tears; the last three years, boy as I yet was, had not witnessed the occurrence half a dozen times, but now I shed them as plentifully as Niobe, or Rachel weeping for her children. I had wept long enough to get somewhat tired of the pastime, and, with swollen but dried eyes, was amusing myself with making a hedge of whortleberry bushes around an ant-hill, when a soft voice, which never spoke but it sent a thrill—of what? I am sure I could not have told then, I only knew it was sweetly painful—through my bosom, whispered at my shoulder, 'Lynn!'

"I looked up hastily, and there stood Mary Danvers. I was not well pleased to be caught in this situation, with the traces of tears on my cheek, and so idly employed; but there was something in her countenance, and more—I knew not what—in my own heart, which forbade me showing a sulky feeling. And, then, had she not come a long way out of her own path, and dared snakes, and toads, and bats, and jack-o'-lanterns, and other things which a girl of eleven by no means looks upon as trifles? My pleasure at finding myself the object of such deep interest to the charming little girl was very great, nor was I practised enough in deceit to disguise it.

"You are angry with me, Lynn, because I laughed," said she, her bright eyes glistening with tears, and her cheeks glowing with blushes; "but I could not help it. I am sorry I laughed. If it were to be done again I would sooner cry than laugh."

"I know you could not help laughing, Mary," said I. "I do not blame you for laughing. I am, as they say, a great booby," and my tears flowed in spite of my endeavors to control them, and my sobs became deep and frequent. "You need not be sor—sorry that you laughed: to laugh at a—booby is what no one need be ashamed of."

"Ah, but, Lynn, why will you not strive to sink that name in one which shall mean and sound something better? It is a bad word—booby. It is, believe me, quite as easy for you to acquire a name for learning as for ignorance; you may become as celebrated for your industry and good behaviour in school, as you have been for good behaviour, barring your mad pranks, out of it. Read and study, as you work and play, and you will soon become a great scholar. The same diligence which has caused you to be first in whatever manual pursuit you have undertaken, exerted upon books, would place you at the head of your class in a very few weeks, at the head of the school in a very few months."

"I cannot learn, Mary."
"You will not learn, Lynn."
"No, I cannot learn."
"Did you ever try?"
"Yes," and I held down my head, sheepishly, with a fear of being probed further.

"When?"
"Last Monday."
"Thought, maybe, to finish your education by Tuesday, We'n'sday morning at farthest? Oh, Lynn. But I will not add to your griefs. That you have made so little progress in learning is not because your Maker has withheld talents from you, but because you are—I don't wish to grieve you, Lynn, but I must speak the truth—a very idle boy, as regards learning, not in any thing else—oh no, not idle in any thing else—and spend in play and mischief—why will you do so, Lynn?—the hours which, properly employed, would, papa says, make a very great man of you by and by."

"Mary, I asked, 'did your papa say this of me? if he did he's a kind old gentleman, and the next time I go into his meadows with the scythe I'll cut so much grass that he'll think Old Nick has helped me. But, did he say so?"

"Did you ever know me to tell an untruth?"
"Never. Oh, yes, I forget, once."
"Me fib, Lynn! how dare you say it?"
"You said that never while you lived would you forgive me for sending purblind Jo two miles to shoot the rabbit-skin I had stuffed with straw."

"Well, I did wrong, I am sure, to forgive one so very wild and naughty; but I won't repent of having done so now."

"No, don't—but your father?"
"He was talking with yours the last time he came to bring us fish, and was questioning him about his children; how many he had, what they particularly excelled in, what were their dispositions, and many other things; for, you know, it is my dear papa's foible to appear to be ignorant of the condition of all who are not in the same sphere of life with himself. I did not hear much of what they said till they came to you, and then, by dint of elbowing, and at the expense of a reprimand from papa for my rudeness, I got near enough to hear all they said."

"And what did they say, Mary? I long to know."
"Be very quiet, and don't interrupt me, and I will tell you. Your father said you were a good child to your parents, and so expert a fisher, that though you were not fifteen years of age, you 'went shares' with Harlow Crosby, and Jethro Ripley, and Henry Butler, and other experienced fishermen. Then papa says to your father, 'Sure you do not think, neighbor Simon'—papa very seldom calls any body neighbor; he must be very good-natured when he does so—'you don't think, neighbor Simon, of tying that noble boy down to a fish-boat always, do you? He was born, I am sure, for something better.'"

"What did my father answer?"
"Oh, I don't know," he said, "Lynn hates books, and Mr. Kendall says he is the greatest dunce in the school. I fear he will never be any thing better than a fisherman."

"Pity, pity," said my father; "if he would but take to learning, he would become a great man by and by." Why will you not become that great man, Lynn?"

"I am too old and big to learn now, Mary; I am almost fifteen, and among the tallest boys in the school. I cannot now undertake to master the contents of all the books which James Willis is studying; and then I am so big that I am ashamed to do it."

"No, you are not too old to learn now, nor too big, and as it is not expected that you will go, like James Willis, to college, you will not have, like him, to fill your satchel with musty old Greek and Latin books. Strive to excel in those branches of learning which will be of every-day use to you; learn to read, write, cipher, (the curl of her little ruby lip hinted at the next word,) above all, learn to—spell, she could scarce restrain her laughter, even while her eyes were full of tears,) and you may become a great man—no, not a very great man, without other study or acquirement than these."

There are other lively sketches, and an Indian story in the second volume, of more than ordinary interest and beauty.

A charge of plagiarism has been alleged against this author, with the particulars of which we are not sufficiently acquainted to form a satisfactory decision.

Museum of Foreign Literature, Science, and Art. No. XIX. New series, with a plate to each number. Published monthly, 12mo. pp. 120. Philadelphia. E. Littell. New-York. G. & C. & H. Carvill. July, 1831.

The Museum is a truly valuable work, the failure of which would be an unpleasant comment upon the discernment of the public. It is greatly enlarged, is printed with accuracy and neatness, and furnishes in a form convenient for preservation, an abundance of matter, selected with taste and judgment, from the best journals extant. Among these are Blackwood's Magazine, the Edinburgh Quarterly, Foreign Quarterly, and Westminster Reviews, the New Monthly (Campbell's), Metropolitan, and many others of universally acknowledged superiority. An engraving is given with each number. The present is accompanied by a spirited full-length sketch of John Wilson, the editor of Blackwood's Magazine.

Dr. Clark's Commentary on the New Testament. New-York. S. Hoyt & Co. Two volumes in one. 8vo. pp. 546.

This is a new and improved edition of a work which has long been before the christian world, and which is duly appreciated by all whose religious sentiments are in unison with those of the reverend author. It is published in two volumes, (the copy before us, however, is bound in one, which is the most convenient mode,) impressed with new type, on paper of a durable quality. Numerous errors, which have crept into former editions, have been carefully corrected in this; and as the pages are printed from stereotype plates, these corrections must be permanent. The Old Testament is now preparing for the press, in the same style and form, comprising four volumes, which may be bound in two, corresponding in size with the one before us.

The Persian Adventurer; being the Sequel of the "Kuzilbash." By J. B. Frazer, Esq. author of a Tour to the Himala Mountains, Travels in Persia, &c. Two vols. 12mo. pp. 322, 317. Philadelphia. Cary & Lea. 1831.

The public press have united in praise of this work. It is a story calculated to afford general satisfaction.

The plays of Philip Massinger. Adapted for family reading, and the use of young persons, by the omission of objectionable passages. Dramatic series. Nos. 1, 2, and 3. 18mo. 3 vols. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

These volumes form the first number of the dramatic series of the Family Library. They are accompanied by explanatory notes and adorned with a portrait of the author. The introduction of these sterling old British dramatists into our country, is an epoch to be regarded by the lovers of poetry and the drama with much satisfaction. These distinguished writers have been hitherto for many reasons beyond the reach of our reading public. Massinger's plays will be succeeded by those of Beaumont and Fletcher, Ford, Shirley, Webster, Middleton, and others. It is truly said of these productions, that they abound in wit and fancy, in force and copiousness of expression, and in truth and variety of character. The plan pursued by the Harpers is an excellent one, and will command attention and success. We would also suggest the republication of a few native plays. If carefully selected, they would form a volume not without interest, both in this country and Europe.

Life of Robert Burns. By J. G. Lockhart, LL.B.; with an Essay on his Writings, prepared for this edition. New-York. William Stoddart and C. S. Francis. One vol. 12mo. 1831.

In the publication of this little duodecimo the object of Mr. Lockhart appears to have been to compress, within the limits of a single volume, the substance of materials already open to the world. How well he has completed his task we have not yet had leisure to determine; but it has been praised by the Edinburgh Review. It is embellished with an engraved frontispiece and a portrait of Burns.

Domestic Happiness Portrayed.

Mr. William M. Dunning, of this city, is about publishing, by subscription, a volume on the duties and felicities of the married life, to be entitled as above, compiled from the writings of Addison, Johnson, Hawkesworth, Steele, Newton, Witherspoon, and other English writers of equal celebrity. Mr. Dunning has offered premiums, of forty dollars each, for two original essays on the following subjects, viz.: first, "Domestic Happiness, or a contrast between a state of matrimony and that of celibacy." Second, "The necessity of virtue and religion to constitute happiness in the marriage state." Each of these essays is to comprise about six pages duodecimo, and must be forwarded, in the usual form, on or before the twentieth of August.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

POPPING THE QUESTION.

THERE is no more delicate step in life than the operation designated by the elegant phrase I have selected for the title of my present lubrication. Much winding, and caution, and previous sounding, is necessary when you have got a favor to ask of a great man. It is ten chances to one that he takes it into his head to consider your request exorbitant, and to make this the pretext for shaking off what he naturally considers a cumbersome appendage to his state—a man who has a claim upon his good offices. But this hazard is nothing in comparison with the risk you run in laying yourself at the mercy of a young gipsy, fonder of fun and frolic than any thing in life. Even though she love you with the whole of her little heart, she possesses a flow of spirits, and woman's ready knack of preserving appearances; and though her bosom may heave responsive to your stammering tale, she will lure you on with kind, complacent looks, until you have told "your pitiful story," and then laugh in your face for your pains!

It is not this either that I mean to express. Men are not cowards because they see distinctly the danger that lies before them. When a person has coolness sufficient to appreciate its full extent, he has in general either self-possession enough to back out of the scrape, or if it is inevitable, to march with due resignation to meet his fate. In like manner, it is not that poor Pilgrick, the lover, has a clear notion (persons in his condition are rarely troubled with clear notions) of what awaits him, but he feels a kind of choking about the neck of his heart, a hang-dog inclination to go backwards instead of forwards, a check, a sudden stop in all his functions. He knows not how to look, or what to say. His fine plan, arranged with so much happy enthusiasm, when sitting alone in his arm-chair, after a good dinner, and two or three glasses of wine, in the uncertain glimmering of twilight, with his feet upon the fender, proves quite impracticable. Either it has escaped his memory altogether, or the conversation perversely takes a turn totally different from that by which he hoped to lead the fair one from indifferent topics to thoughts of a tenderer complexion, and thus, by fine degrees (he watching all the time how she was affected, in order to be sure of his depth before he makes the plunge) to insinuate his confession, just at the moment that he knows it will be well received.

The desperate struggles and flounders by which some endeavor to get out of their embarrassment, are amusing enough. We remember to have been much delighted the first time we heard the history of the wooing of a noble lord, now no more, related. His lordship was a man of talents and enterprise, of stainless pedigree, and a fair rent-roll, but the veriest slave of bashfulness. Like all timid and quiet men, he was very susceptible and very constant, as long as he was in the habit of seeing the object of his affections daily. He chanced, at the beginning of an Edinburgh winter, to lose his heart to Miss —; and as their families were in habits of intimacy, he had frequent opportunities of meeting with her. He gazed and sighed incessantly—a very Dumbiedike, but that he had a larger allowance of brain—he followed every where; he felt jealous, uncomfortable, savage, if she looked even civilly at another; and yet notwithstanding the encouragement afforded him by the lady, a woman of sense, who saw what his lordship would be at, esteemed his character, was superior to girlish affectation, and made every advance consistent with woman's delicacy—the winter was fast fading into spring, and he had not yet got his mouth opened! Mamma at last lost all patience; and one day, when his lordship was taking his usual lounge in the drawing-room, silent, or uttering an occasional monosyllable, the good lady abruptly left the room and locked the pair in alone. When his lordship, on assaying to take his leave, discovered the predicament in which he stood, a desperate fit of resolution seized him. Miss — sat bending most assiduously over her needle, a deep blush on her cheek. His lordship advanced towards her, but losing heart by the way, passed on in silence to the other end of the room. He returned to the charge, but again without effect. At last, nerving himself like one about to spring a powder mine, he stopped short before her—"Miss —, will you marry me?"—"With the greatest pleasure, my lord," was the answer, given in a low, somewhat timid, but unfaltering voice, while a deeper crimson suffused the face of the speaker. And a right good wife she made to him.

Some gentlemen, equally nervous, and unaided by such a discriminating and ingenious mamma, have recourse to the plan of wooing by proxy. This is a system which I can by no means recommend.

Day, the philosopher, had a freak of educating a wife for himself. He got two orphan girls intrusted to his care, on entering into recognizances to educate and provide for them. One proved too mulish to make any thing of. The other grew up every thing he could have wished. And yet he gave up the idea of marrying her because she one day purchased a handkerchief more gaudy than accorded with his philosophical notions. Of course, it never came to a declaration. I wish it had, that one might have seen with what degree of grace a man could divest himself of the grave and commanding characters of papa and pedagogue, to assume the insinuating deportment of the lover.

There is a set of men, whose success in wooing—and it is un-failing—I cannot comprehend. Grave, emaciated, sallow divines, who never look the person in the face whom they address—who never speak above their breath—who sit on the uttermost edge of their chairs, a full yard distant from the dinner-table! I have never known one of these scarecrows fail in getting a good and a rich wife. How is it, heaven knows! Can it be that the ladies ask them? One thing is certain, that I myself have never been able to "pop the question."

ORIGIN OF THE VEIL.

The origin of the veil is referred by the Greeks to modesty and bashfulness, properties which partake equally of timidity. They used to tell a pleasant story on the subject, for which we are indebted to Pausanias. About thirty furlongs from the city of Sparta, Icarus placed a statue of Modesty, for the purpose of perpetuating the following incident:—"Icarus having married his daughter to Ulysses, solicited his son-in-law to fix his household in Sparta, and remain there with his wife, to which Ulysses would not consent. Frustrated in his application to the husband, he made the like request to his daughter, conjuring her not to abandon him; but, seeing her ready to depart with Ulysses for Ithaca, he redoubled his efforts to retain her, nor could he be prevailed upon to desist from following the chariot on the way. Ulysses, shocked at the desperate situation of his father-in-law, and wearied with his importunities, addressed his wife:—"You can answer this request: it is yours to determine whether you will remain with your father at Sparta, or depart with your husband for Ithaca: you are mistress of the decision." The beautiful Penelope, finding herself in this dilemma, blushed, and, without making the least reply, drew the veil over her face, thereby intimating a denial of her father's request, and sunk in the arms of her husband. Icarus, very sensibly affected by this behavior, and being desirous of transmitting it, consecrated a statue of modesty on the very spot where Penelope had thrown the veil over her face, that, after her, it might be a universal symbol of delicacy with the fair sex."

A MOORISH BEAUTY.

The Moorish ideas of female beauty differ from our notions on that point in one considerable respect. With us a slender waist and graceful figure add very greatly to other personal charms, and fat people, though much respected, are not so much admired. This is the very antipodes of Moorish criterion. A really handsome woman ought not to be able to walk, corpulence and comeliness being synonymous, and the extreme of the one being considered the height of the other. A woman of a ton weight is, in the opinion of a Moor, a beauty fit for the sultan; and instead of the waspish proportion of a modern waist, which is laced in as tightly as possible, a Moorish shape, "if shape that can be called which shape hath none," is considered, in the opinion of these connoisseurs, as nearly approaching to perfection when it resembles, or rather exceeds, the circumference of a butt, pipe, or any other large measure.

Brooke's Travels.

GEORGE THE THIRD.

Croly, in his life of George the Fourth, states what we do not remember to have read elsewhere, that George the Third, in the height of his popularity, became so sensitive to the attacks made upon him by the opposition, in consequence of the appointment of Lord Bute as prime minister, that he is said to have conceived the idea of abandoning England, and retiring to Hanover. At one time his inclination to take this step was so great, that he communicated it to the Lord Chancellor Thurlow, who honestly told him that, "though it might be easy to go to Hanover, it might be difficult to return to England."

LUTHER'S OPINION OF MUSIC.

"Whoever despises music," said Martin Luther, "I am displeased with him. Next to theology, I give a place to music; for thereby all anger is forgotten, the devil is driven away, and melancholy, and many tribulations and evil thoughts are expelled."

ANTIGONUS AND ALEXANDER.

When Antigonus, the conqueror, followed his rival, Cassander, into Asia, he exacted enormous tribute: and, on the inhabitants reminding him that Alexander did not behave so oppressively, he replied, "that may be, for Alexander reaped Asia, and I am only gleaning after him."

THE COUNTRY DANCE.

BY T. H. BAYLY.

I stood amid the glittering throng—
I heard a voice: its tones were sweet.
I turn'd to see from whence they came,
And gazed on all I longed to meet.
She was a fair and gentle girl,
Her bright smile greeted me by chance!
I whispered low—I took her hand—
I led her forth to dance.

There was but little space to move,
So closely all were drawn;
Yet she was light of heart and step,
And graceful as a fawn.
A virgin flower gemm'd her hair,
Her beauty to enhance;
She was the star of all who stood
In that close cottage dance.

I've moved since then in stately halls,
I tread them even now;
I hold in mine the hand of one
With coronet'd brow;
And I may seem to court her smile,
And seem to heed her glance;
But my heart and thoughts still wander
To that sweet country dance.

Oh when I sleep, a melody
Comes rushing on my brain;
And the light music of that night
Is greeting me again;
I take her still small hand in mine,
Amid my blissful trance;
And once more, visions worth my life,
I lead her forth to dance.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Conversations of the week.—The tranquil surface of the literary world has been slightly rippled since our last, by an advertisement of Mr. Halleck's intention to undertake the editorial superintendence of a new monthly review:

We are requested by Messrs. Peabody & Co. to say, that "the announcement was premature, and without the knowledge of Mr. Halleck, and originated in a misunderstanding. They, however, have such a work in contemplation, and hope to procure his aid, and that of several other distinguished American writers, in carrying it on."

This same sudden monthly review, thus edited, we confess we regarded with some incredulity. In the first place, it bore evident marks of too much haste. Mr. Halleck never does any thing in a hurry—and there is nothing into which he would be less likely to precipitate himself than the responsibilities of such an undertaking. The establishment of a NEW LITERARY MAGAZINE, like the building of Rome, is not the work of a day. It requires study, plan, and capital. Six or seven able and punctual writers should be engaged, and such a remuneration offered to some gifted and thoroughly well-disciplined scholar, as would induce him to surrender the superior pecuniary advantages which await such men in other departments. That this may be done we do not doubt, and that it will be done we sincerely desire. There is no satisfactory reason why New-York should not support an efficient quarterly review as well as Charleston, Philadelphia, or Boston. But it should be reared on a firmly-laid foundation, or the whole superstructure will come tumbling to the ground: when once thus established, Mr. Halleck's name would be a host; but he is not likely to embark in any precarious adventure. When he announces himself as the editor of a journal, the public may depend upon its being both a durable and a good one.

The famous Magdalen Record continues to agitate the public mind. The committee seem inclined to shuffle off the responsibility from one to another; while others deem the weight (and, by our lady, it is a heavy one) may be more easily borne by being divided among the whole. A Mr. David M. Reese, late of Baltimore, has been rather unceremoniously dragged into the glare of public notice, but denies having made the offensive calculations. The general burst of feeling upon this topic is manly, and speaks well for the community. Here people understand it and reprobate it; but, we believe, the echoes of this officious report will never have done dying away in the neighborhood. They are stigmatizing us to the right and left: some laughing, some wondering. Articles like the following are going the rounds of the United States, and will find their way into the European journals, where, probably our explanations and indignation will never be known. "Alas! poor country!" We extract a paragraph from the American:

"This report is, we observe, hawked about the streets by little boys, at twenty-five cents a copy. How much the indiscreet and ill-judging men who sanctioned its publication have to answer for! Copies of it have, we know, been sent to London and Paris, in proof of the state of our morals! and we shall doubtless, ere long, have its statistics re-echoed on our shores in the pages of the Quarterly."

We present one more well-written article, from the Philadelphia Gazette, and hope we may never hereafter have occasion to recur to the subject:

"It is gratifying to contemplate the contrast between the operations of the New-York and Philadelphia Magdalen Societies. Among the many excellent institutions with which this city abounds, there is not one more praiseworthy than the Philadelphia Magdalen Society. Its objects have never been paraded before the world; secrecy, and the diffusion of that unseen charity which is twice blessed of heaven, have been its chief characteristics. The designs of the institution, the incalculable importance of which has never for a moment been questioned by any good man, are carried out into unostentatious efficiency, and a vast good is thereby continually accomplished. There is no charity more deserving of approbation; and when properly conducted, as it has been in this city, its benefits are beyond computation in this world. So long as the movements of the society are managed with due privacy, they cannot be too highly extolled; and we speak from knowledge when we say, that the effects and misrepresentations of the New-York report have been deeply reprobated by sundry members of a similar society in Philadelphia; a society composed of some of our best citizens, who have already accomplished much good, in a quiet and creditable way; and who, if they are duly assisted, will yet perform wonders of benevolence, without the bold blazon of their benefactions, or the character of those on whom they were bestowed, to the world."

A suicide, of a most distressing nature, is related in a Pittsfield paper. It was committed by Mrs. Laura Holcomb. The verdict of the coroner's jury state, that she was driven to the fatal act by mental derangement, "caused by religious excitement!"

From these unpleasant events among ourselves we turn to more grateful scenes abroad. The brave Poles are pouring out, in every possible manner, their high character and heroic love of liberty. We subjoin an account of a lively and animating ceremony, which recently took place at Warsaw:

"On the eleventh of May last, a superb colossal bronze statue, which had been erected to the memory of Copernicus, was first unveiled to the public. The Philomathic Society, after attending divine service in the church of the holy cross, adjourned to the open place, when the venerable Julian Ursyn Niemcewicz, from the raised platform of the monument, addressed the assembled multitude with singular eloquence and power; and his words, falling from the lips of a man of more than eighty, moved whole masses of the listeners, now to enthusiastic plaudits, and anon to tears. He said that three centuries had passed since Copernicus had been gathered to the bosom of that earth whose motion round the central sun he had revealed. That the forgetfulness of the great services of the great was usually succeeded by the outbursts of grateful remembrance, and that posterity often dragged forth to immortal memory the names which had been resting in temporary oblivion. He spoke of this as the fate of Copernicus, and he honored with deserved plaudits Staszyc, who had defrayed half the expenses of the statue. He mentioned Thorwaldsen, who had modelled it. "Now," said he, "after ten years' lingerings, shall every Polish heart vibrate with the satisfaction that beams from every Polish eye; and the sun, on which Copernicus turned in perpetual gazing, shall for the first time visit his image with its glorious beams." At this moment the tapestry fell which covered the statue, and he continued—"Henceforward ever present wilt thou be. Highest, happiest of the eternal! The honor of thy country—the glory of thy race. Let thy influence, watching over the temple of the national muses, guard it from all degradation, and aid the propagation of all knowledge and all truth. And how infinitely happy am I in the privilege of having lived to extreme old age, to perform this honorable office—nunc dimitte, Domine, errorem tuum." Every head was uncovered—every face turned towards the statue—and the heavens, which for three days had been cloudy and dark, broke out into sudden brightness and sunshine. There was a burst among the people as if a miracle had really been wrought, in celebration of the great festival; and a band of musicians and singers suddenly broke forth from the cupola of the Philomathic Society's edifice, with a hymn, of which what follows is a close translation:

"O sun of glory! Let that glory shed
Its most concentrated radiance on his head—
On him the orbits of the stars who drew,
And nature's mystic lore and language knew:
Illustrious man! Marmatia's grateful tongue
Has to the echoing world thy honors sung:
Though Lechian voices loudest speak—yet all
In blending accents hail thy festival."

The latest advices continue to encourage the hope, that this gallant and heroic people may be permanently triumphant over their oppressors. The Russian leaders seem to have been completely out-generalled. Arrivals from Europe are now watched with intense interest, as some important crisis must soon occur.

New papers.—Badger's Weekly Messenger merits the commendation with which it has been noticed by the press. It is a capacious and well printed sheet, and contains a variety of interesting matter. The "Amateur, a Cabinet of Science, Literature, and the Fine Arts," has made its appearance in this city in a very neat form. The engraving of New-York from Weehawk is beautiful, as are all executed by Smillie. It is drawn from a painting by W. G. Wall. We observe among its correspondents the name of Sumner L. Fairfield.

FLY AWAY, PRETTY MOTH.

POETRY AND MELODY BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY, ESQ.

Moderato.

Fly a-way, pret-ty moth, to the shade Of the leaf where you slum-ber'd all day; Be con-tent with the moon and the stars, pret-ty moth, And make use of your wings while you may; Though you glit-ter-ing light may have daz-zled you quite, Tho' the gold of yon lamp may be gay, Ma-n-y things in this world that look bright, pret-ty moth, On-ly daz-zle to lead us a-stray. Ma-n-y things in this world that look bright, pret-ty moth, On-ly daz-zle to lead us a-stray.

SECOND VERSE.

I have seen, pretty moth, in the world
Some as wild as yourself and as gay,
Who, bewitch'd by the sweet fascination of eyes,
Flitted round them by night and by day;
But though dreams of delight
May have dazzled them quite,
They at last found it dangerous play!
Many things in this world that look bright, pretty moth,
Only dazzle to lead us astray.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM A FRENCH ARTIST AT LISLE.

A FIRST SITTING.

Oh, my dear Deveria! I think of the life of a poor painter of portraits, running after customers through England and Holland. It is the life of a perfect straggler, haunting public-houses, flying about, gipsy-like, from one place to another; all confusion, dust, and disorder. At morning in the ante-chamber of a retired dealer in charcoal; at evening inhaling the lazy smoke of an inn-parlor, to catch, for some five or six louis, the blooming face of a purse-filled sailor; it is, throughout, a scene of rudeness and derangement. How much reason have I to regret Paris, with its smoke and dirt, its bustle and your friendship! If I had the manner of Charlet, what sketches of buffoonery I would send you! It is a queer people, and they have some amusing heads among them.

Take your crayon, and sketch as I write.

I have under my hand at this moment a pretty neighbor of mine, whose manners are young, in spite of her age, and who could assist in the introduction of more than one contraband article into this frontier city. Imagine her with the form of a woman, and the head of a child; simple manners, and a sweet countenance, with the very air of the holy virgin. She persecutes me to take her portrait. I believe there is some little trick of gallantry about it; and her companion, a pretty babbling creature, is trying to drive me to the asking of an indiscreet question. The artist, however, is as wise as a confessor; and I will make no inquiries as to the designs of our lady, notwithstanding there is a young officer, with fair cheeks, who sings a lamentation every evening before our house. I wish he would sing more in tune!

See now what art is, and judge for yourself how happy the man must be who binds himself to it. Imagine me in my gallery.

She enters this morning, with the following scene:

"Oh, sir, I disturb you?"

"Oh, no, madam, certainly not."

"What! are you going to place me in that great chair? I shall be afraid to look you in the face, I am so timid. The very sight of a man makes me tremble. Is it not so, Henrietta?"

"Yes, madam, always."

"I give you notice beforehand, sir, that I desire a likeness, that shall be an exact likeness, without the least flattery. I want a perfect resemblance."

"Flattery, madam, would be quite impossible; altogether out of the question. The finest mirror shall not be more faithful than my canvass. You would certainly be a loser if my pencil were untrue." After a few preliminaries, such as selecting an attitude, obtaining a favorable light, composing her features agreeably, and smiling sweetly with considerable effort, the affair made rapid progress. It was a full-length picture. I sketched the whole figure very roughly; while my fair visitor favored me with a flow of chit-chat, very soporific, to which I paid very little attention.

"O!" she exclaimed suddenly, on observing the manner in which I was arranging some articles of her dress, "I have put on a beautiful new stomacher, and you have taken no notice of it." I found it was necessary for me to lie, and I lied.

"The slight redness that I have under the eye this morning is a mere accident, and will pass away immediately," she observed a little while after.

"Very probably," was my reply.

"Is not my eye a little smaller than usual?" This question was put to her sewing maid. "I have passed a very ill night, and slept very little, and my eyes have suffered a good deal from it."

"Very much so, indeed, madam. I thought of mentioning it myself. Madam's eyes are much smaller than usual," replied the docile domestic, biting her lip.

"How very provoking it is. A few weeks ago I had a fine head of hair, and fine flowing curls; my mother's death, however, has caused all this. The physician assures me they will grow out again. Do you think so, sir?"

"I have seen numerous instances of it," I replied, suiting my action to the word, and doubling the locks of her hair.

"Don't you think, Henrietta, that my lips are very pale this morning?"

"Rather so, madam."

"The merest trifle troubles me so. The volunteers passed under my window this morning, and I thought there was an insurrection. The fright has made me quite pale."

I took some carmine on the end of my brush.

"Did not some one ring at my door, Henrietta?"

"No, madam, I believe not."

"I am expecting my milliner. How very provoking to be left in a robe which depresses my shoulders so much. It looks as if I had not any. One likes, under such circumstances, to appear to the best advantage."

"It is very natural," I replied, without laughing.

"Hand me the mirror, Henrietta. Don't you think, sir, that the reflection of this dead light is unfavorable to my complexion?"

I smiled.

"One might almost think it was taken by candle-light."

"I can put on a red drapery, if you prefer it."

"You are very kind, sir. Do any thing you please—only be sure not to flatter me."

She at length rose, and casting her eye upon the confused masses of color, thrown at hazard upon the canvass during the first sitting,

"Good heavens!" she exclaimed, "Henrietta, does this monster look like me?"

"There is some little resemblance," she replied, with considerable sang froid.

Oh, Deveria! happy is he who can cultivate the arts at Paris, and impart his spleen at the follies of the world to those who are neither their slaves nor their victims! H.

NOT AT HOME.—Some one observed to Jerome Rignon, that Rome was the mansion of piety. "Very true," he replied, "but piety resembles other great personages, one can never find them at home."

PRaise.—Voiture truly says, "That praise is more affecting which proceeds from the mouths of the common people, than that which flows from the pens of poets."

THE SATIRIST'S FUNERAL EULOGY.—A great number of friends attended the funeral of Boileau. An old woman of the lower class, seeing the multitude that filled the street, observed, "The man had a great many friends, and yet they say he spoke ill of every body."

A RUSSIAN.—It was a saying of Napoleon, that if you scratched the skin of a Russian, you would instantly discern the barbarian.

A SKETCH.

A PERUSAL of the "sketches from the diary of a physician," so widely circulated in this country, reminded me of one something similar, which a friend of mine lately read to me from his own common-place book. I have obtained permission to copy it for the Mirror. It is as follows:

One of the most extraordinary instances of delusion which ever came under my observation, was presented in the person of young Edward N—. The name of insanity, in the minds of most people, is connected with ideas of delirium and danger, of the barred cell, or shaded apartment, nearly as awful to the chilled soul of the spectator as the chamber of death itself. Those, however, whose mental aberrations are glaring to all, form but a small part of the many who, although mingling in society, and conforming to its ceremonies, are nevertheless haunted by some dreadful thought, some apparition in the shape of a fancy, which they are unable to banish, and which, in reality, constitutes a lunacy as distinct, and perhaps as dangerous, as that of the raving wretch, whose peals of hysteric laughter are heard mingling with the clank of his chains. Edward was not my intimate friend, but I had known and admired him. His health was not apparently impaired, and he had never dreamed of requiring my professional aid, although I perceived that he was naturally of that nervous and irritable state of body and mind which most easily falls a prey to hypochondriacal imaginations. His talents were dazzling—indeed brilliantly so; and after having completed a very finished course of classical education, he had entered upon the study of the legal profession, with the ardor of youth and conscious genius. In person I never knew any more perfectly noble; and his manners exercised a fascinating influence over every circle. He was the ornament, the charm, the life of every company. I never saw in any one perceptions of the beautiful more continually awake. I had gained some insight into his character, however, which surprised me, by some stanzas shown me, and ascribed to him. They were totally irreconcilable with his general liveliness of demeanor, and seemed poured forth in an agonizing spirit of wretchedness, which I could scarcely contemplate with unmoistened eyes.

One evening I accompanied him to a rather brilliant fete at B—'s. Habituated as I was to his animated manner in society, even I was astonished at the perpetual sparkles of wit and merriment, which drew upon him the eyes of all present. As he stood by the piano, in the act of singing, I was struck with his lofty and elegant form, the expression which flashed from his large black eyes, and the mellow richness and perfect sweetness of his voice. A fair young girl, who had been gazing with a dangerous earnestness, blushed as she perceived I noticed her; and yet, with a look of glowing admiration, whispered me, while the lids of her glistening eyes drooped, as if she were saying something which she felt to the innermost core of her heart.

"Edward N— ought to be the happiest man in the world."

The next morning I was called in to see him. I absolutely started on beholding his fine countenance, now unlighted by any expression but that of a dim weariness, an apathy, as of one sick of life. I had never yet thus accompanied him behind the scenes, and as I took his dry, feverish hand, and felt his pulse, he read my astonishment in my looks, and said,

"Well, doctor, you think I am sick?"

"You have certainly exposed yourself since last night," said I.

"Oh, a slight shower," he answered.

"But that was not till late; besides, you returned in a carriage."

"Ay, doctor, but I walked out again."

"Walked out again?" exclaimed I. "What! after two o'clock, and those heated rooms! Walk out again in a shower? You deserve some pain for such carelessness. What was the matter? Any accident?"

He raised his languid eyes.

"Doctor, I have often had a mind to confess to you, but, some how or other, a fear, a silly fear, has prevented me."

"Confess! What?"

His face assumed an expression of horror, and a momentary paleness overspread it.

"Doctor, I am a wretch! a blighted, scathed outcast; life is a curse. Since Providence first created man, this puny creature, this reptile, the basest and meanest of all his productions; he never formed one so low, so unfortunate, so—

"Why, Edward," I said, chilled through with the singular earnestness, and the apparent agony with which he spoke, "what nonsense has mastered you this morning? You are slightly indisposed—with cold, and a touch of the blues; to-morrow you will be as merry as ever."

"To-morrow! he echoed bitterly and sarcastically; "merry—oh,

yes. This is a momentary feeling, I suppose. This withering agony, which rankled in my bosom for years. Oh no, doctor; the flashes of brief cheerfulness, which you have noted in society, are a species of intoxication; wine, women, the upspringing of the mind from protracted and gloomy depression—the natural brightness of my nature gleaming out fitfully; but, when the excitement has passed away, heavens! the slimy toad in the dungeon, the hideous light-hating owl, are not more lonely, dark, and miserable than I."

"And for what, pray, Edward?" said I, smiling.

My incredulity appeared to vex him, and to urge him on to be more communicative than he had at first purposed.

"Doctor, I am laboring under a curse—a hideous, blasting, unshunnable ban from some demon. It follows me like a shadow, everywhere, everywhere, everywhere. It crosses me in all my plans. It falls like a thunderbolt on all my budding hopes. Every thing I undertake fails; every one I love dies or turns traitor. I have knelt down and prayed that the lightning might strike me, that disease might touch me, or that some sudden accident might break this nightmare dream of existence."

I at once perceived my friend was afflicted with hypochondriacism.

"And how long have you supposed yourself so unfortunate?"

"Since my boyhood—it has ever been thus. I am permitted to hope, to believe myself happy. The most delicious and tempting prospects are spread out before my eyes, but when I would approach, just as I have, or as I think I have reached the summit of my desires, the demon strikes—wrenches my heart—stabs, stabs with a dagger, which agonizes for ever, but cannot kill."

I endeavored to persuade him of the impossibility of his suspicion. I urged that all human beings were subject to disappointments, and that while he felt his own, those of others were concealed from his examination.

"Go abroad," continued I; "walk forth through the churchyard. It is crowded with mossy stones and stately monuments. The names of sweet women and children, of fathers, mothers; all are written there in melancholy silence. Each one of those has wrenched fond hearts, has left wrecked hopes and affections. Thousands throng the streets of this great city, whose souls yearn for that unbroken repose; besides, in dwelling too intensely upon your miseries you overlook innumerable blessings. Everybody believes you to be happy. You have health, education, personal advantages, accomplishments, youth, and wealth."

He smiled mournfully.

"Alas, alas! What are these when the heart is a void. All these I could despise, if in their stead I possessed affections, occupied and successful. But the curse of my life has been that these should be always disappointed. I am forever rolling the rock to the summit to behold it again cast down."

I hinted to him, with an attempt to rouse him into some mirth, that bacheloriem was his disease.

"You are surrounded," said I, "by young and beautiful women."

"Ay," said he, "but who loves me? I know that if I should dare to fix my outpouring passion upon any one, it would be singling her out for heaven's wrath, from all the crowd about her. Either she would hate me, or I should be the means of leading her into some misery, now unforeseen and inconceivable. Disease would strike her, or some wintry grief would freeze the current of her sparkling joy."

"Ridiculous," said I, for I noticed that he seemed to waver in his anguish, that the turn which the conversation had taken had touched some string in his bosom, whose vibrations stirred within him more agreeable emotions. With difficulty I persuaded him to unbosom himself to me, and I learned, with the most pleasing surprise that he had conceived a determined passion for the lady who, on the previous evening, had betrayed such a decided interest in him. I mentioned the circumstance; it thrilled him with pleasure. We parted—weeks passed away; and, after the customary preliminaries, their mutual partiality was mutually understood, and they were married. I attended the joyful ceremony, on the completion of which the party set out on a little tour, usual on such occasions, and I required no powerful persuasions to accompany them. Edward's spirits were high. He never appeared to so much advantage. I could perceive how the influence of such circumstances would at length have re-established his mind, and restored the elasticity of his broken spirits. I am rather too far advanced in life to fall into raptures about a face, or a form, be it male or female; for the years which sprinkle snow on a man's forehead also chill the heart, and sober down the restless fancy. But the unusual loveliness of the happy bride, the grace and propriety of her deportment, and the evidently favorable sway with which she controlled the wayward gloom of my friend, elicited both pleasure and hope.

"She beams upon him," I thought, "as the spring sun upon the late frozen earth, and his bosom will change from a desert to a garden clothed with luxuriant verdure. Accustomed, as I am, to the dark accidents of life, the dream that this latest and most specious plan of happiness which my friend had ever formed, might also be broken, never entered my mind. Gloomy, indeed, are the ways of the world. I tremble and shudder to look abroad."

It was proposed by Edward that the party should deviate a day's journey from their route, for the purpose of visiting a romantic cataract, embosomed among towering cliffs, and presenting a scene of uncommon grandeur and beauty.

Mary objected. It was strange. She stated no reason, but that she had a fear of that precipitous style of scenery.

"You little coward," said Edward. "She wants your assistance, doctor. You have cured me, you know, and now you shall her."

We accordingly started for the — falls.

It was one of those glowing, tranquil summer afternoons, when we reached the scene, which casts a subdued splendor over all nature. The red beams of the declining sun streamed through the green forest, as we wandered down the broken rocks to the spot whence the roar of the cataract proceeded.

Mary had forgotten her fears, and was the liveliest of the company. The sound of her sweet laugh yet rings in my ears; her eyes sparkling with the excitement and exercise, her cheeks glowing, and all her looks and words compelled me to murmur a prayer of gratitude, that two whom I so loved were so completely blessed.

"Come, Mary," said Edward, "let us walk to yonder rock. Come, doctor."

"We shall get wet with the spray," said Mary.

"Who cares," replied Edward; "no one with a soul can take cold with such a scene before his eyes. Come along, you coward! What are you afraid of?"

Our voices were lost in the deafening roar of the heavy body of water which swept beautifully over the precipice, and poured splendidly flashing, in one unbroken sheet of green, white, and gold. Our path was narrow, and led along the very bank of the river, which, after the leap, lapsed by with a silent swiftness, presenting a broad black current of extraordinary depth and power. We picked our road over the broken ledges. I was foremost, Edward next, and lastly the dear, the beautiful, and beloved companion of our journey; the path being too narrow to admit of any other method of reaching the point proposed. The rest of the company had pursued a different direction.

I looked back once. Edward was stooping to pick up a shell. Mary flung a little pebble at me, and shook her head laughingly. I turned away, and in a moment again looked back. Never shall I forget the shock—the horror that thrilled through every nerve of my body, at the sight which then blasted my view. Edward was standing in an attitude of frenzy, his eyes starting from their sockets, his hands clasped convulsively together, his lips quivering, and his face terribly pale. Mary was no where to be seen. Her bonnet and plume floated on the water. It would be agonizing to pursue the narration further. Months have elapsed. Edward is in Europe. He writes me sometimes, and reasons with me on my disbelief in his awful doom!

SEDLEY.

THE CARELESS MAN.

"It's dreadful! it's wonderful! there is no reliance to be placed on any thing he says or does. If you lend him a book, you might as well fling it into the fire. Whatever he touches he destroys; and if you call his aid in any matter of importance, you may set it down as a failure, of course. There is a fatality about him which brings trouble and confusion wherever he goes. He is the best-hearted fellow you ever saw; would not do any one an injury for the world, if he could help it, and would sooner die than be guilty of a deliberate falsehood; yet he is, as matters stand, a most untrustworthy and unfortunate reprobate of a gentleman, and wastes his whole life in awkward blunders."

This eulogy was intended, fair reader, for your humble servant, the unhappy author of this very discourse. Yes! alas that it should be so, I am that wretch; shunned by all—a careless man. I am not afflicted with that what essayists denominate absent-mindedness. That is generally excused, as it seems pardon is more easily procured for the greatest crimes. I do not swallow my dice and fling my wine on the backgammon-board; nor inquire for letters at the post-office, without being able to recollect my name: but my disease occupies the middle point between that, and what, it seems, ought to be the character of a gentleman and man of the world. Now concerning the reason of this crack in my brain, I am most lamentably in the dark. Is it organization, or is it habit? If the former, why should I be censured; if the latter, why have not I been successful in my long and repeated efforts to remedy the error? You will suggest, perhaps, that I have not been sufficiently persevering in my endeavors; or that my parents and instructors have not superintended my education with proper care. No; I assure you in confidence, if scolding and brow-beating could have done it—if hearing my fault rung into my wearied ears, from my earliest boyhood to the present moment—if the consciousness that I am regarded with a suspicious eye by all my friends, in matters of moment—if mortification, ridicule, disappointment, and many a school-boy beating could have ground this stain from my character, I should now be a pattern of punctuality and prudence. Alas! the more they bullied and beat, and the more in after life I have writhed under the unpleasant consequences of my provoking propensity, the more confirmed it seems to be; the more miserable, the more intolerable.

At school I was noted, and bore the blame for every accident which occurred, whether in reality I was guilty or not.

"Take care, Peter," said my master to me one day as I was just completing a copy, with more than ordinary neatness; "take care, Peter! My son, that's very well; that's the best thing you have done this week."

I was very proud of his approbation, and before his eyes were off the book I executed a little flourish with my pen; the demon that presides over my destiny brought my elbow in contact with the inkstand, and, how I know not, swept the full contents exactly across the page, and liberally sprinkled the white dress of my rash admirer.

"Take care, or you'll break it, Peter," said another, as I was volunteering to carry a pitcher of hot coffee across the eating-room.

"Take care, or you'll break it."

"Oh no, ma'am; no danger."

My foot struck against something on the floor, and the crash and splash which succeeded need no comment. Innumerable were the accidents which I suffered from this woful lack of presence of mind and attention. If we walked abroad for pleasure, and any one stepped into a ditch, it was I; if we went to skait, and one fell into the awfully cold water, (oh! the breathless sensation of a sudden sowse into a wintry pond—the surprise and horror as the cracking and slippery cakes of ice splinter and shiver, and give way beneath your feet—the convulsive struggles to avoid your fate—the desperate conviction that you are in, and the reckless exertions to get out again,) I was sure to be the one. It seemed that even in cases which could not possibly have been influenced by any carelessness of mine, I was sure to be the victim. The bees all stung me; the snakes chased me; thunder-showers waited for me to go out, and then poured down their unexpected floods, when I was exactly at a point the farthest from home; and if by chance any one gave me an umbrella, or, resolved to escape without a ducking, I ran my breath fairly out of my body, I could no sooner get safely ensconced under some protecting shed, than the whole heavens would be sure to brighten up, and the clouds break away. You may smile, if you please, incredulous reader, but, as Jack Falstaff says, "is not the truth—the truth?" Why, I was once chased round the corner by a sky-rocket. I am a much abused man. I never poke the fire without (not a polite but an expressive word) bumping my head; and if there is a barrel with a nail sticking out from it in all New-York, or a newly painted entry, or a ship just tarred, circumstances occur so that I am mysteriously led into contact with them. In conversation I am the same; and am equally certain to run my boat upon every rock and quicksand which lurk under the surface of society, visible to all but myself. We were talking of a famous beauty, who had just left the room.

"She is certainly a fine-looking woman," said a lady, who herself made pretensions to elegance of person.

"Yes, but," added I, "she has red hair. I can't endure red hair. A woman might be as beautiful as Venus, and if she had red hair I could never—"

"Never what?" said my companion, in a voice so snappish and changed, that it arrested my discourse at once.

I looked up. Her hair was beautiful, fine, and silky, but the tinge which I was deprecating preponderated in a most unequivocal manner.

I stammered, looked silly, and felt a feverish flush mount up into my cheeks and forehead.

I tremble to reflect upon the number of albums I have spoiled; of illegible letters I have written; of choice dresses I have ruined by spattering gravy to the right and left, when elected by the suffrages of my companions to fill the distinguished office of carver. I lately spent a week at a celebrated place of summer resort, where I accompanied several ladies and gentlemen, whose acquaintance I had there made, upon a fishing excursion. To rig out such a medley of nautical inexperience and timid beauty for action is a job about as intricate and difficult as to fit a man-of-war for sea; at length, however, all arrangements were completed, the boat was luvien, pushed off, rowed out to a spot famous as the haunt of the finest fish. Sleeves were tucked up, seats selected, jokes passed, and divers important preliminaries settled. The ladies admired the blueness of the distant shore, the gentlemen pronounced the day auspicious for the sport, as the brightness of the heavens was softened by a few light clouds, which spread themselves out like a gauze over its azure bosom. Our wit had made a pun, (there is always sure to be a wit on such occasions,) and our poet had given vent to his anticipations in divers quotations, and particularly those exquisite lines of Thomson:

"If yet too young, and easily deceived,
A worthless prey scarce bends your pliant rod,
Him, piteous of his youth, and the short time
He has enjoyed the vital light of heaven,
Soft disengage, and back into the stream
The speckled captive throw."

"But come," said the wit, who also in this instance happened to be a thorough-bred sportsman, and had rather catch a bass than hear that the Poles had beaten the Russians, "come," said he, "in my opinion you had better catch your fish before you dispose of them." "To cook a dolphin," you know, "catch a dolphin"—eh—ha, ha, ha! "Tom, sit in the stern—we shall make a glorious day of it. Harry, where are the lines?"

"I put them all together in a little basket," said Harry, "and gave them to Tom."

"Where are they, Tom?"

"I gave them to Peter."

He turned to me—my heart sunk—I had brought no basket. I recollected some one's having handed me something at the hotel—and there I had left it.

A general expression of disappointment burst forth. I had to stand the reproachful glances of three or four pair of brilliant eyes, besides the woful hammerings of my own conscience.

I was subpoenaed some time ago to give my testimony in a cause of importance, in which I could have served a valued friend if I had attended to my duty. It seems the whole trial turned upon the point which it was supposed I was about to elucidate.

"Now, gentlemen of the jury," said the counsellor, with a sly, triumphant air, passing the palm of his hand across his chin, "I'll call one more witness. He was present during the whole time, gentlemen; and as my learned friend and opponent has demanded, if the words were said, where are our witnesses, we answer confidently, here—and will abide by his testimony. Officer, call me Peter N."

I had just arrived in court, in obedience to the subpoena, and with as little knowledge of the matter as any one present.

I responded with due deliberation to the usual prefatory interrogations, as—"Is your name Peter N.?" "Do you know the parties," &c. &c.

"And now, Mr. N. do you remember having been requested by the defendant in this case to accompany him to the house of the plaintiff, in order to hear what passed between them?"

"I do, sir."

"And you went?"

"I did, sir."

"Now, please to tell the jury what you heard upon that occasion. Mr. N., gentlemen of the jury, is a respectable citizen. His statement is to be depended upon."

There was a situation. I recollected to have gone to the house, but while the parties were discussing matters together, my attention had been attracted by a beautiful tortoise-shell kitten. I took forth my pocket handkerchief, and proceeded to provoke the gambols of the pretty pet, without the slightest regard to what was passing around.

I stammered. The lawyer looked surprised, displeased, and whispered to his client; the gentlemen of the jury put their heads together, and a titter ran through the crowd, while the calm encouragement of the judge—"Go on, Mr. N. speak up," sounded to me like a knell. And thus my friend lost his cause for a kitten.

I have confined myself in this communication exclusively to the consequences of my fault in trifles. The task of illustrating its effects in more important matters would be too laborious at present; but, as far as trifles can tend to ruffle the tranquillity of life, they disturb mine. Among the thousand by which I am continually injured, I have at this moment painful recollections of gloves and umbrellas left—no one knows where; sabbies made into the street, with a pen behind my ear; mysterious separations from keys, pencil-cases, and pen-knives; blotting letters, or writing over the place intended for the superscription; running against lamp-posts, and treading into mud-puddles; leaving open private letters and journals in mixed companies, and amusing myself during an unavoidably protracted absence, with exaggerated fancies respecting the number of "good-natured friends" who may while away a leisure hour, by peeping into the same; and, after hurrying through the fiercely glaring heat of a summer day, to meet a party for an excursion of pleasure, arriving just as the steam-boat has separated three yards from the dock, with all your friends' faces, and some two or three hundred strangers gazing at your fruitless exhaustion, without taking any particular pains to disguise their amusement. I could enlarge, Messrs. Editors, upon these miseries; I could work them up, till they would bring tears into your eyes; but I have dropped a fine new pen, and put my foot on it, my penknife I lent to somebody last night, and I write these last few lines with a pencil, which is just worn down to the end.

IRON STOCKINGS; OR THE VILLAGE GAZETTE.

You have heard of the iron mask, my good reader, and of the iron boot; you may not be ignorant also of the azure hose; but did you ever before hear of iron hose? Doubtless your first impulse will be to set it down as some instrument of torture from the inquisition, to extort from the miserable slaves and victims confessions of crimes by themselves or friends of which till that moment they never heard. No such thing. You are wide of the mark.

The weekly gazette of the village of — is published on Saturday afternoon, and distributed to the anxious readers who have, perhaps, gone through their customary avocations with more than ordinary haste in order to enjoy ample leisure for the perusal of their sole political literary periodical soon after the dinner hour.

It was now the fall of the year, and the dealers of the place were daily receiving their new supply of the various articles which comprise the stock of a country store, and these, as a matter of course, were all to be advertised for the information of their "friends and the public." This alone would have been sufficient to heighten the usual anxiety to see the gazette. Besides this, a long talk of ball was about to take place, for which the village belles were exceedingly anxious to provide themselves with new dresses.

On the Saturday to which we now particularly refer, masses of heavy clouds had been gradually overspreading the heavens; at length the sun was obscured. The wind whistled and rattled the windows in their frames, and at times whirled forth the smoke in eddies from the fire-place into the parlor of Mrs. Horston, the wife of a thriving counsellor at law of the village—drawing from the careful matron sundry expressions of uneasiness and impatience, partly from the extremely agreeable sensation which that article produces to the eyes, and partly from the fear of its consequences to the snow white ceiling, the tasty paper, and damask curtains which imparted such an air of neatness and comfort to the room.

These were the aristocracy of the village, or at least wished to be considered so, notwithstanding the pretensions of others who dressed with much more splendor, tossed their heads more haughtily, and thought themselves "as good as some folks," whatever might be the opinions of Mrs. Horston or her mincing daughters.

It was near two hours past the time when the paper usually arrived, and what with the gloominess of the weather, the persecution of the smoke, and the delay of the newspaper carrier, even the rosy lips of Harriette and Louisa uttered peevish words.

"That stupid carrier," said Harriette, "what can keep him so long?"

"I wonder if Mr. Mount has received his goods?" said Louisa. "I will go this very afternoon and buy—"

The task of following a lively young girl, and a belle, through the incomprehensible catalogue of articles necessary to complete that great tout ensemble, a ball-dress, is beyond my powers. She, however, dashed through her recital, (as a pert schoolboy declines bonus, or a lawyer opens a case, crowding upon the bewildered jury a swarm of technicalities) which at length dwindled into a plain English climax of silk figured stockings. As she finished, the sudden rap at the door, which could only belong to a dun, or a carrier, announced the arrival of the wished-for journal.

Who that ever lived in the country does not know the value of the newspaper? With what an exaggerated importance it is invested? Its vast complication of heterogeneous materials—its deaths and marriages—its love and murders—its politics and news—and the voices of all quarters of the globe reaching us through its narrow columns.

"Now," said Harriette.

"Now," said Louisa, "we shall see," and even the old lady looked over her spectacles as the damp sheet was unfolded, held before the fire to dry, and at length displayed on the table with two pair of eyes bent upon its unconscious type with such inquiring glances as would have made the heart of many an honest swain leap in his bosom.

"Here we have it," said Louisa. "Bank nots table—whereas William Cook has conducted himself—pshaw—drugs and medicines—paints and oils—dissolution of partnership—ourang outang—Poland—Jackson—lotteries—letters—accident—by virtue of a writ of feri facias—"

"Nonsense, look for Mr. Mount," said Harriette.

"Cash for rags—butter and cheese—oh here it is. Mr. Mount—splendid assortment—but expected daily."

"Look for Harris," said Harriette.

"Here it is—silks, laces, ribbons, veils, artificial flowers, china cut glass, and—oh dear, mother, what's this—also just received an entirely new article—confidently recommended—never before offered to the public—a large and valuable assortment of iron hose, on an improved principle."

"Iron stockings?" said Harriette. "Heavens, did you ever hear of such a thing?"

"Why, Harriette," said Louisa, "don't you understand? It's only a name. You cannot think they are actually made of real iron?"

"And why not?" said the mother. "They may be some great improvement—something economical—when we travel sixty miles an hour on rail-roads, we should not suffer ourselves to be surprised by hearing of any improvement in stockings. I suspect they are intended for the lower classes."

"I will go this very minute," said Harriette, "and see what they are; and if they are anything fine, I will have a pair for the ball."

"But it rains," said the mother.

"Well, then I'll go early Monday morning. I shall not rest till I find out what sort of things these iron stockings are."

Sunday morning came. The sun gleamed and glistened brightly over the fresh green wet herbage. The family of "the Horstons" seated themselves in the church—the mother with her mind fixed on the sacred duties of the day, the daughters' heads running on iron stockings. They even looked slyly down at the many pretty slender feet which came in lightly, and twinkled from under the fine ample folds of the silken garments. The customs of this degenerate town had not reached the quiet and secluded village of —. But had the fresh, sweet-looking, demure maidens been arrayed in all the audacious elegance of New-York fashions, though many a splendidly figured silken stocking might have arrested the wandering eyes, you would have looked in vain, as the young ladies did, for any constructed of iron.

After the services were concluded, some of the congregation assembled on the green before the overshadowed and antiquated building where the humble inhabitants and their ancestors for many a long vanished year had assembled to offer up their grateful praises to their Maker.

Nothing is more touchingly beautiful to me than a village church, with its quiet, silent, natural look of humility; its groups of old elms, oaks, or willows; its green lawns; its rich grassy picturesque grave-yard, dotted with broken and aged moss-grown stones, sacred for the sake of the beloved dead. I am truly a moralist in a country church-yard. I could lie down to death as to a sleep in the shadow of its waving branches.

Free from these reflections were the gay groups who lingered beneath the immense oak on the hill side, after the sermon. Something was said of the text and the weather, inquiries of each other's health, and several attempts made to be prim and hypocritical, but it would not do, and their secret thoughts at length popped out like the cork of newly bottled cider, and the cherry mouths fairly overflowed with wonder and admiration at Mr. Harris and his iron stockings! It was certainly very provoking and mysterious.

Monday came. At an early hour several ladies met, and also several beaux, by appointment, to go (that ne plus ultra of female occupations) "a-shopping."

"And what do you think, Mr. Smith, of the iron hose?" inquired Harriette.

Mr. Smith was a young clerk from New-York, and might be supposed to know as much as other people, if not more.

"My opinion," said Mr. Smith, "is that they are some splendid article worn last winter in New-York at the masquerades, and that Mr. Harris has bought them to get up masquerades here."

"Oh delightful!" said Louisa.

"I should like dearly to go to a masquerade," said several at once.

Whereupon, with that deep sagacity which characterizes the human race in general, and village belles in particular, they all began to name the character which they should assume, and to describe the dresses they would wear. One would be a Swiss girl, as seen in the annual—one would be Lady Macbeth. No character, however, seemed so generally a favorite as that of a fairy, with her magic wand bringing sighing mortals to her feet. The possession of this was insisted on by Miss Polly Higgins, the blacksmith's daughter, who, under the rose, dear reader, and between you and me, might as well have appeared as one of her father's sledge hammers. So wrapt were they in fanciful ideas that the plain matter of fact business which brought them together, was nearly forgotten. One, less visionary than the rest, and who had not selected any character for the masquerade, at length recalled it to their attention. The iron hose were once again the theme of discussion—conjecture was exhausted.

"Come along," said Harriette, "we shall soon know what they are."

Away they went, but Mr. Harris had never heard of iron stockings, and the printer had put hose for hoses! So fades many a human anticipation.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

A RECLUSE.

THE following particulars of the habits and death of Francis Abbott, who for the last two years has lived in a secluded and unhappy manner, on and near the islands at the Falls of Niagara, were furnished by the politeness of a gentleman residing at that place, to the editor of the Lockport Balance.

In the afternoon of the eighteenth of June, 1829, a tall, well-built and handsome man, dressed in a long loose gown or cloak, of a chocolate color, was seen passing through the principal street of the village of Niagara Falls, on the American side. He had under his arm a roll of blankets, a flute, a port-folio, and a large book; in his right hand he carried a small stick. He advanced towards the Eagle-hotel, attracting the gaze of the visitors and others about the house by his eccentric appearance. With elastic step and animated motion, he passed along, heeded not the inquiring gaze of the idle multitude, but erect and proudly bent his course to the small and lowly inn of Ebenezer O'Kelly. He at once entered into stipulations with his host, that the room he occupied should be solely his own; that he should have his table to himself, and only certain parts of his cooking should be done by Mrs. O'Kelly. He made the usual inquiries as to the localities of the Falls, and wished to know if there was a library, or reading-room in the village. On being informed that there was a library, he immediately repaired to the individual by whom it was kept, deposited three dollars and took out a book; purchased a violin, borrowed music books, informed the librarian that his name was Francis Abbot, and that he should remain a few days at the Falls. He conversed with him on various subjects, and his language was delivered with great ease and ability. The next day he returned to the same person—expatiated largely upon the beautiful scenery of the Falls, the grand views of the cascades and cataracts, and of that most sublime spectacle, the Falls themselves. In all his travels, he said, he had never met with any thing that would compare with it, for sublimity, except Mount Ætna during an eruption. He said he should remain at least a week: observing, that as well might a traveller in two days examine in detail the various museums and curiosities of Paris, as to become acquainted with the splendid scenery of Niagara in the same space of time. He was informed that visitors at the Falls frequently remained but a day or two, and he expressed his astonishment that they should be so little interested in the grand and beautiful works of nature, as to spend only so short a period there.

In a few days he called again—again expatiated upon the beauties of the Falls, and said he had concluded to remain a month at least, and perhaps six months. In a short time after this, he determined to fix his abode upon Goat or Iris Island, and was desirous of erecting a rustic hut for the purpose of abstracting himself from all society, and becoming a solitary hermit. The proprietor of the island did not think proper to grant him the privilege of erecting a building for such a use, but permitted him to occupy a small room in the only residence on the island. In this house there lived a family, who furnished him occasionally with bread and milk. But he generally dispensed with these, providing himself with other articles, and always doing his own cooking. This was his permanent residence for about twenty months. Last winter the family removed, and to those few persons with whom he held any communication, he expressed his great satisfaction of having it in his power to live alone. For some months he seemed to enjoy himself very much, until another family entered the house. He then concluded to erect a cottage of his own, and as he could not build it on the island, he determined to build it on the main shore. It yet stands about thirty rods from the grand fall on the bank of the river. He occupied it about two months.

On Friday, the tenth of June last, he went twice to the river to bathe, and was seen to go the third time; at that time the ferryman saw him in the water. It was about two o'clock in the afternoon; the ferryman did not see him return, and his clothes were observed where he had deposited them. An examination was immediately made, but his body could not be discovered. On the twenty-first it was taken up at Fort Niagara, and on the next day it was removed to, and interred decently at the burial ground at Niagara Falls.

Thus has terminated the career of the unfortunate Francis Abbott—little, indeed, known to those near whom he has spent the last two years of his life. Some few gleanings can alone be given. He was an English gentleman, of a respectable family, of highly cultivated mind and manners. He had a finished education, was not only master of the languages and deeply read in the arts and sciences, but possessed all the minor accomplishments of the gentleman—colloquial powers in an eminent degree, and music and drawing in great perfection. Many years of his life had been spent in travelling. He had visited Egypt and Palestine, had travelled through Turkey, Greece, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and France, and had resided for considerable periods of time in Rome, Naples, and Paris. While at the Falls, business brought him in contact with some of the inhabitants; with a few of these he would sometimes be sociable—to all others he was distant and reserved. At such times his conversation would be of the most interesting kind, and his descriptions of people and countries were highly glowing and animated. But at times even with those he would hold no conversation, but communicated his wishes on a slate, and would request that nothing might be said to him. Sometimes for three or four months he would go unshaved, often with no covering on his head, his body enveloped in a blanket, shunning all, and seeking the deepest solitude of Iris Island. He composed much, and generally in Latin; but destroyed his compositions as fast almost as he produced them. When his little cot was examined, hopes were entertained that some manuscript or memorial might be found of his own composition, but he had left nothing of the kind. His faithful dog guarded his door, and was with difficulty persuaded aside while it was opened. His cat occupied the place appropriated as his bed. His guitar, his violin, and flutes, and music books were scattered around in confusion. There was a port-folio, and the leaves of a large book; but not a word, not even his name was written in any of them.

Many spots on Iris Island are consecrated to the memory of Francis Abbott. On the upper end of the island he had established his walk, and at one place it has become hard and well beaten, like that on which a sentinel performs his tour of duty. Between Iris Island and Moss Isle, there is embowered in seclusion and shade one of the most charming waterfalls or cascades imaginable. This was his favorite retreat for bathing. Here he resorted at all seasons of the year. In the coldest weather, even when there was snow on the ground and ice in the river, he continued to bathe in the Niagara.

At the lower extremity of the island is a bridge leading to what is called the Terrapin rocks; from this bridge extends a single piece of timber some twelve or fifteen feet over the precipice. On this bridge it was his daily practice to walk: with a quick step he would pass the bridge, advance on the timber to the extreme point, turn quickly on his heel, and walk back, and continue thus engaged for hours together. Sometimes he would let himself down at the end of the timber, and hang under it by his hands and feet over the terrific precipice for fifteen minutes at a time! To the inquiry why he would thus expose himself, he would reply, that in crossing the ocean he had frequently seen the sea-boy perform far more perilous acts, and as he should probably again pass the sea himself, he wished to inure himself to such dangers. If the nerves of others were disturbed, his were not. In the wildest hours of the night he was often found walking alone and fearless in the most dangerous places near the Falls; and at such times he would shun approach as if he had a dread of men. He had a stipend allowed him of about five dollars a week. He always attended to the state of his accounts very carefully, was economical in the expenditure of money for his own immediate use, and was generous in paying for all favors and services, never receiving any thing without making immediate payment. He had a deep and abiding sense of religious duties and decorum; was mild in his behavior, and inoffensive in his conduct. Religion was a subject he well understood and highly appreciated. The charity he asked from others, he extended to all mankind.

What, it will be asked, could have broken up and destroyed such a mind as Francis Abbott's? What could have driven him from the society he was so well qualified to adorn—and what transform him, noble in person and in intellect, into an isolated anchorite, shunning the association of his fellow-men? The history of his misfortunes is not known, and the cause of his unhappiness and seclusion will, undoubtedly, to us be ever a mystery. He was about twenty-eight years of age at the time of his death. He was perfectly infatuated with the scenery of the Falls, and expressed himself in ecstasies with the romantic retreats of Iris Island.

EXTRACT FROM A TRANSLATION OF

"LE DERNIER CHANT DU PELERINAGE D'HAROLD."

BY ALPHONSE DE LA MARTINE.

Muse of these latter days, who dost not rest
On time-worn mounts, in fabulous song renowned,
But raisest up thine altar in the breast
Of earth's sublimest spirits—and hast crown'd
Thy brow with light unfading;—and around
Thy lyre hast strung the martyr's palmy wreath,
And made the halls of tyranny resound
With thy stern watchword—liberty or death!
Vouchsafe thine inspiration till my latest breath.

To thee at length my heart has offered up,
(Thou more than human feeling deified!)
Of bitter sorrows past, the mantling cup,
Error dethroned, and passions which have died—
As manhood's nobler feelings cast aside
The foolish toys of careless infancy—
Olympus sees no more, with nostrils wide,
Phœbus' swift steeds with flowing rein pass by,
And in Jove's hands his thunderbolts neglected lie!

The Nile bears onward through the desert strand
The broken monuments of Memnon's line;
The shrines of Delos now no longer stand,
Nor Pythia's oracles are deemed divine:
Temple and tripod, overthrown by time,
No more shall claim the worship of mankind—
In Rome's proud ashes seek her gods sublime.
All past, save two, the idols of the mind!
Yes! love and liberty do linger yet behind.

Love! I have sung thee, when in days gone by Thy name alone could wake to ecstasies;
When I could melt 'neath glance of beauty's eye,
As melts the snow-wreath under summer skies.
I loved and was beloved! let that suffice;
And when I die, I would not that they rear
The costly tomb—let but a stone arise
With this, my epitaph, engraven there—
And as he reads each care-worn wight let fall a tear!

Oh thou, whose birth was when th' eternal voice
Bade the young earth in pristine bloom be drest—
Freedom! beneath whose sway all hearts rejoice—
Deep is thine impress made in man's proud breast!
And thy vast power by nature's self confessed.
Oh thou pure air, which art the breath of life,
By thy bland influence care is lull'd to rest;
Though oft, alas! vain mortals darkly strive,
From their own fellow-man this precious boon to rive!

More cruel far than fate, what God hath made
Free as the mountain-breeze, man doth enchain—
And from her throne proud reason they degrade—
And e'en in thee have found a crime, a shame,
Oh liberty! and dare condemn thy name;
But as in flint a latent fire may be,
Thou dost e'en in cold hearts unseen remain,
Till falls the iron rod of tyranny—
Then forth th' electric spark doth leap, and earth is free!

The train is fired now! from Argos' strand
Dost hear that war-cry wafted o'er the wave?
The name of liberty wakes up the land!
Prolonged in echoes from each honor'd grave,
Where sleep in glory's breast the storied brave,
The voice of thousands forms one single cry!
A cry which sweeps beyond the seas which lave
That native land for which they swear to die,
Or free her hallowed soil from slavery for aye.

See! 't thou where yonder fleet at anchor rides—
Secured from all alarm they fondly deem—
But, like a wily snake, the fire-ship glides,
And soon on high the mantling flashes gleam!
Such lights around their altars ever beam,
Thou stern avenger of the suffering band!
Thou, whom proud despots dare to call a dream!
The torch hath done its work—now seize the brand,
And from these butchering tyrants purge the groaning land!

But where is Harold, the world's pilgrim, now?
Whose onward course I thus have followed long—
To time or toil doth he, faint-hearted, bow!
Or in fair beauty's arms his pastime doth prolong?
Have I then lost this link of my sad song?
The idol'd image, into which I breathed
My tale of deep and unrequited wrong;
While round his brow I silently enwreathed
The mournful cypress-crown which fate to me bequeathed!

Myself the hero of my wayward rhyme!
Yes! Harold's heart but beat in unison
With feelings, thoughts, and passions all of mine!
But since the Cesar's palaces were won,
Where Tiber leaped to greet song's favorite son;
Thence turned his footsteps towards those summits blue;
And ye might deem his pilgrimage were done,
When from Albano ocean met his view,
And there he murmured forth that last, sublime adieu!

Then died the accents on his trembling tongue—
But earth still listened with attentive ear,
To catch the words which yet suspended hung
Upon those lips they hoped again to hear;
Even as we pause some holy temple near,
To catch the dying fall of melody,
Which through the long-drawn aisle so softly rung—
By rock or faithless wave where lingereth he?
Where'er his path, O muse! his footsteps follow we!

He who knows how to govern himself, always becomes a favorite with society.

SELFISHNESS: OR THE HUNCHBACK.

CHAPTER I.

Showing how Mendoza lost his horse, and what followed thereupon.

Two travellers, the one mounted on a mule loaded with a huge portmanteau, the other on a noble Andalusian courser, were slowly following the road from Valdepeñas to Calatrava. The first wore a tasteful, rather than gaudy livery, and the little net which confined his black hair under a narrow laced hat, increased the sinister expression of a face naturally repulsive. His master, wrapped in the folds of his mantle, seemed absorbed in melancholy reverie.

The mule of the valet turned by a sort of instinct to a little inn by the roadside.

"Señor Mendoza Perez," said his rider, halting at the door, "you have had no nourishment since we left Valdepeñas; take my advice—let us rest here a moment."

He leapt from his mule without waiting for an answer, and Mendoza followed his example mechanically.

The tavern displayed all the trouble and confusion which the unexpected arrival of a stranger of importance usually occasions. The hostess was screaming out contradictory orders to two swarthy kitchen maids and a ragged stable boy, while a child, crouching in the chimney corner, was preparing to turn the spit on which the host was putting a fowl, whose feathers, scattered over the floor, betrayed the recentness of his murder. He interrupted his employment to advance to meet Mendoza.

"Cavalier," said he, "I regret exceedingly that all my provisions are engaged by the noble strangers whose carriage you saw at my gate; but if you can put up with an excellent omelet, an olla podrida, and some of the best wine made in La Mancha—"

"I will be satisfied with whatever you can give me," said Mendoza, abstractedly, and, seating himself on a wooden bench near the chimney, he did not even observe that he was forced to wait an hour for the wretched omelet that was at last set before him.

When he had finished his humble meal, he ordered the host to call his valet.

"Your valet?" answered the innkeeper, "he has gone off with his mule and your horse to bespeak lodgings for you at Calatrava, though you would have been just as well off in the house of your humble servant, Gregorio Gonzalez."

"Gone! gone off with my horse!" said Perez, roused from his dreams. "I have been cheated by a scoundrel. Find me a horse, a mule, anything to overtake the rascal."

He felt for his purse in his girdle, but in vain—it had gone to Calatrava with the horse and mule.

It would be difficult to paint the consternation of Mendoza, and the expression of mean triumph which suddenly lighted up the features of Gregorio.

"Don't think to deceive me with these airs," cried he, sharply; "you have conspired with your sham valet to rob me, but by San Gregorio, my patron saint, it shall not be so: you shall not stir a step hence till you have paid me every maravedi; by the way here is something that will secure me;" and at the same time he seized hold of the mantle, which Mendoza had laid on a chair during his meal.

"What will become of me?" said the unhappy young man: "how can I return to Toledo without money, without a horse! and, to complete my degradation, I must endure this wretch's insolent suspicions. Fatal journey! Oh Inesilla, Inesilla, into what an abyss of suffering and misfortune has my ill-starred love for you thrown me!"

And letting his head fall on the table, he covered his face with his hands to hide the tears he could not restrain.

"What means all this noise?" said another traveller, suddenly coming out of the next room. "You insolent rogue, how dare you address a young stranger in this way, and take such advantage of the difficulty into which a rascal has thrown him? Cavalier," he added, turning to Mendoza, "I offer you my purse; and though I have not the honor to be known to you, I hope you will spare me the mortification of a refusal. Would you hesitate to make me the same offer if I was in the same difficulty? Certainly not; I entreat you then to grant me the same favor."

Mendoza removed his hands and turned his eyes on the stranger who addressed him. He was a little man—perhaps sixty years old, but hardly four feet high, and nature, in one of her freaks, had placed his bald head in the very middle of his shoulders. His animated look and regular pleasing features announced talent and a glowing imagination; but his smile was peculiar, it resembled at the same time that which curls the lips when we are insulted by one we despise, and that sort of convulsive contraction which distorts the face of the unsuccessful gambler. He saw in Mendoza's countenance how painful it was to him to have recourse to the purse of a stranger, and renewed his offers with such tact and delicacy that Mendoza could not refuse them; and when the servants announced that Count Alvarez de la Ribeira's carriage was ready, the two new friends entered it together.

CHAPTER II.

Containing an account of what happened at the count's castle, Mendoza's narrative, and a dissertation on selfishness.

Left alone in the apartment which his kind host had prepared for him, Mendoza gave a free course to his tears, and yielded himself up to the violence of his grief. Don Alvarez overheard his extravagances, and fearing the consequence of his despair, paid him a second visit, and taking a seat by his side,

"Señor Mendoza," said he, "I know not what can thus afflict you; but the feelings of youth are quick, and your sorrows are perhaps less overwhelming, less real, than you imagine. I am old, I have some influence, and if my advice and my experience—"

"My lord," said Mendoza, "my sufferings are beyond all cure. If you will deign to listen to me, I will narrate my sad story. I can acknowledge my sense of your kindness in no other way than by giving you this mark of my confidence; besides, I feel a mournful pleasure in pouring out my sorrows into the bosom of the generous friend whom my good fortune raised up for me in you—it is the only solace now left to the unhappy Mendoza."

"My name is Mendoza Perez. I am the only son of a rich merchant of Toledo. My father associated me in business with himself at the age of eighteen, and I led a life quiet, peaceable, uniform, and consequently happy, when one evening, at the corner of a by-street, I saw an old man and a young girl attacked by two bravos. I flew upon the ruffians, sword in hand; one expired beneath my blows, the other fled. 'Brave cavalier,' said the old man, 'I am a stranger, called to Toledo by business of importance. My name is Don Garcia de Puebla, and the king has been pleased to bestow on me the post of commander of Merida. My lodging is hard by, and I must insist on your accompanying us thither to shelter yourself from punishment for the murder of the ruffian you slew in our defence.'

"Urged by a strong desire to see more of the young lady who was hanging on Don Garcia's arm, I accepted the invitation. But how shall I describe my astonishment and agitation when the lady, raising her veil, exposed to my enraptured gaze features of dazzling beauty! No, nothing can equal Inesilla's charms. Her winning graces, the sweetness of her features—"

Mendoza was about to draw his mistress' portrait, according to the custom of lovers in such cases, when casting his eyes on the hunchback, he saw he was endeavoring to suppress a smile, and I have already said his smile had something extraordinary in it which disconcerted our hero; he stopped short, and after a moment's pause, continued his story as follows:

"When they left Toledo I followed them to Merida; but, sir, would you believe it, neither the recollection of the service I had done him, nor the violence of my love, nor Inesilla's tears, could make Don Garcia consent to our union. 'Inesilla is necessary to my old age,' said he; 'I cannot do without her.' 'But,' exclaimed I, 'I am rich, come and live with me, come and dwell at Toledo with your daughter.' 'What, renounce the honorable station the king has confided to me,' answered the cruel old man, 'and put myself at the mercy of a son-in-law? No, Mendoza, never; abandon such idle schemes.' The next day I again sought to move him; the ungrateful wretch refused to see me, and I was on my return to Toledo, deploring my unhappy love and the revolting selfishness of Don Garcia, when you so kindly rescued me from the awkward situation in which my valet's roguery had placed me."

"Señor Mendoza," said the Count de la Ribeira, "I am not like most old men, who cannot commiserate the sorrows of youth because they no longer feel them themselves. Those sorrows, whether well grounded or not, are not the less violent. True, you are unhappy, but time will soon soften, I would even say, did I not fear you would accuse me of blasphemy, will soon cure your grief. Let not that grief, however, make you unjust. You accuse Don Garcia of selfishness; are you less selfish than him in wishing an old man, at the expense of his happiness, to deprive himself of a beloved daughter; to give her to a stranger, whose enticements have inspired that daughter with a passion which he disapproves of? Have you not abused the rights of hospitality? Have you not deceived the confidence he reposed in you? But do not let the reproach of selfishness affect you. It is a sentiment implanted by nature in the heart of all men. They act for themselves, for themselves alone; if they do good, it is because divine wisdom makes painful remorse the consequence of evil doing, and heartfelt and exalted joy the reward of a good action. Examine with care the most hideous vices as well as the most elevated virtues—all have their origin in selfishness."

The desire of showing himself grateful, or at least polite to Don Alvarez, could not draw Mendoza from his reverie; yet still as soon as he heard an opinion contrary to his own advanced, he hastened to oppose it, so natural to man is the spirit of contradiction.

"But, señor," exclaimed he, "such a paradox is not even specious. How can you attribute to selfishness love and friendship—those emotions which make the most painful sacrifice easy, benevolence which denies itself to assist others, and glory to which we sacrifice wealth, happiness, and life itself?"

"Love!" said Alvarez, kindling as he spoke, "love! is anything so selfish as this madness? Do we not require that the object of our love shall renounce all other affections? Do we not tremble involuntarily with rage and fear when another even lets his eyes rest on the object of our passion? Friendship! It is the desire of filling up the craving void within the breast, of dissipating that ennui which alone makes us seek the company of our fellows, and were it not for which, we would live solitary and savage. If we are beneficent, it is in order to enjoy the pleasure attached to it, finally; strip glory of its brilliant halo, and what is it? mere vanity."

"What a revolting system!" said Mendoza. "It hardens the heart and degrades us from the dignity of men. I cannot believe it, it is too hateful to be true."

"Such are men," said Alvarez; "they open their eyes and they complain because the strong light hurts their feeble vision, and because they no longer find that imaginary charm with which they, in their blindness, delighted to clothe every object. Señor Mendoza," said he, in a melancholy tone, and conducting him to a window, "your illusions will soon be dissipated, and then the world will seem to you like this moon-lit landscape. In spring the thick foliage hid these gloomy abysses and masses of rocks, the musical accents of the nightingale charmed the listening ear, and the shepherds danced on the green to the sound of the guitar, singing their rustic seguidillas. Now winter has come, the fields are deserted; no more birds, no more songs, no more joyous fandangos! But the eye can penetrate through the black and naked branches into yon horrid depths, or rest with terror on the shapeless and barren masses of rock which frown around us. Young and inexperienced, you will not believe the sad truths I have just explained to you. But I have traversed nearly the whole of the path of life, and what I have said is the result of sixty years' meditations and sufferings. I will likewise confide to you the story of my life, and when you shall have heard it, you will declare with me that vile selfishness is the moving spring of all human actions."

As Alvarez said this, he left Mendoza without giving him time to answer him. He, perhaps, did not regret this, for after all, it is not very pleasant to contradict a rich nobleman who lodges you in his house, receives you at his table, lends you his purse, and is besides, commander of the order of Calatrava; as my learned friend, Doctor Geronimo Valerio, says very justly, "such a man cannot possibly be altogether in the wrong."

CHAPTER III.

The Hunchback tells his story.

The slumbers of lovers, and above all, of unhappy lovers, are seldom peaceful or long-continued. It was, however, late ere Mendoza arose. He revolved a long time in his mind the various events of the last few days, and at last rejoined his host, whom he found conversing with two cavaliers, richly dressed, whose attentions to the count were so prodigal as to seem servile and despicable. "My guest, these are Don Fernando del Lunas, and Don Gabriel de Riboza, my distant relations—and my only heirs." These last words were accompanied by that strange smile of his with, as Mendoza thought, an expression of double bitterness. He was astonished also to see that during breakfast Don Alvarez seemed to delight in wounding their self-love by reciprocating none of the attentions with which they overwhelmed him. This, however, they did not observe, or at least, they pretended not to do so, and redoubled their protestations and embraces when they came to take leave of their relative.

Alvarez remained sunk in thought for some time after their departure; then suddenly turning towards Mendoza, as though ashamed of being detected in his reverie, "I promised you yesterday," said he, "an account of my adventures; that promise I will now fulfil. The story will be some consolation to you, for so selfish is man that he feels his own sorrows less when he sees a fellow-creature more miserable than himself."

"My mother, Doña Bianca, belonged to a poor, but not noble family of Calatrava. A grandee of Spain, Don Antonio de la Ribeira, smitten with her beauty, formed a secret union with her, of which I am the fruit. The deformity which has disfigured me since my birth, inspired my father with such aversion, that he always refused to see me, or to acknowledge a marriage which gave him a hunchback for his heir. This unjust behavior affected my mother so deeply as to cause her death but a few months after I saw the light."

"Don Antonio soon contracted a new marriage, and I was, by his orders, placed in a convent, under the name of Pedrillo, while the children of his second wife received a finished education, suitable to the rank their father thought me unworthy of. I languished, abandoned and destitute; an old monk took pity on me, nursed my frail and weak childhood, taught me what little Latin he knew, and when I had reached my sixteenth year, advised me to take orders. I was about to follow his advice when I was told that I was son of a grandee of Spain, and that my father, the noble Conde de la Ribeira, had sent for me. I wept on leaving the good monk, my benefactor. Alas! he was the only being that ever really loved me."

"All the count's children were dead. No one remained to inherit his proud titles and immense wealth, but the poor despised hunchback; and the same pride which at first had made him deny me even the name of my ancestors, now induced him to send for me that his vast possessions might not pass into the hand of a stranger. A year after, he died in my arms; and while I wept by his side, I saw that he even then could not overcome the repugnance he felt for the deformed monster whom he never called his son. At eighteen I was left possessor of an immense fortune, and absolute master of my actions. Isolated since my birth, I felt strongly the necessity of something to love, and soon became bound in friendship's strongest ties to Don Juan Salzedo, a young cavalier, an orphan like myself, but whose scanty fortune did not correspond to his high birth. We were inseparable, and our friendship was celebrated throughout the court and all over Madrid."

"I gave myself up wholly to the pleasures of this union, till a new sentiment agitated my heart. At a bull-fight I was seated near a young girl of extraordinary beauty—"

"Cavalier," said Alvarez with a smile, "I am no longer young, and am effectually cured of my passion, so I will not draw Doña Margarita's portrait, nor speak of the means by which I sought to please her. Enough, that I fancied myself beloved."

"While the preparations for our marriage were going on, one night, after a short absence from Madrid, I hastened to Doña Margarita's abode. The door stood half open; I entered, and my ear was greeted with shouts of laughter."

"My dear Juan," said a voice I knew but too well, 'you mimic admirably your modest friend, who, in his silly vanity, supposes that any one can love a monster for his own sake. My poverty forces me, against my will, to espouse him, but thy love—'

"I did not give her time to finish. I rushed upon them, sword in hand, and was about to destroy the traitors, who fled before me, when a mirror gave me a full view of my hideous deformity. This sight in a moment undeceived me. I felt that love and friendship could not exist for a miserable being, the outcast of nature; and I returned home, radically cured of my love, and estimating my friends at their true value.

"Another man, perhaps, would have regretted the loss of these delusions. I, on the contrary, congratulated myself on it. I began to despise mankind, and took no pains to hide the contempt I felt for them, which every day's observation strengthened more and more. I even found pleasure in debasing all whom they term great, noble, and virtuous, by showing or disclosing the selfishness which is their governing, moving principle; in a word, I forced men to see themselves as they are."

Don Alvarez would, doubtless, have continued his invectives longer, had he not been interrupted by the arrival of the alcalde, who came to inform him that the valet had been arrested at Calatrava, and that he would infallibly be condemned to the galleys. The young man imagined he was about to recover his portmanteau and his horse; but, as they were witnesses for the prosecution, the tribunal did not think it proper to part with them, and he heard nothing more of them. Afterwards, indeed, he saw at Toledo a grave and withered looking personage, who, he was informed, was one of the judges of the tribunal, and who was riding one of the witnesses for the prosecution, very much at his ease.

CHAPTER IV.

Death of the Hunchback, with a copy of his last will and testament.

Time is generally a sure cure for love, yet two years had elapsed since the events detailed in the last chapter, and Mendoza's love for Inesilla had lost none of its violence; and he wept with pleasure and pain whenever one of those old duennas, whom gold induces to take pity on the sufferings of true lovers, brought him a letter from the daughter of Don Garcias.

One day a carriage, with the armorial bearings of Don Alvarez, drove up to his door. Hoping it contained his generous benefactor, he hastened to meet it, when, to his great surprise, he saw only the count's two kinsmen, Don Ferdinand and Don Gabriel, dressed in the full livery of sorrow, and with all the external symptoms of profound grief. They informed him that their dear and worthy kinsman, Don Alvarez, was dead, and that he had named Mendoza his executor, and requested him to accompany them to Ribeira, to open his deceased friend's will. Mendoza, after paying the tribute of some natural and sincere tears to the count's memory, set off with his two visitors, who, during their journey, could not by all their efforts contain the joy they secretly felt. Their conversation turned incessantly either on the plans they had formed for embellishing the villa, of which they already saw themselves masters, or on the splendid figure their cousins' wealth would enable them to make at court. On their arrival at the castle the notary and alcalde were sent for, and the seals of the will broken in due form, when the man of law read, in his best pleading voice, as follows:

"I, Alvarez Antonio count de la Riveira, señor of Formosa, commander, &c. &c. justly appreciating the honorable character of my kinsmen Don Fernando del Lunes and Don Gabriel Riboza, declare that the tokens of affection they have lavished on me, and the numerous presents with which they have fairly loaded me—"

Here the two cousins were seen to wipe away a tear, and made a modest bow; the notary, whom this display of affection had interrupted, paused for a moment, and continued to read as follows:

"With which they have fairly loaded me have not deceived me, and that these two worthy gentlemen, having no legal claim to my fortune, shall never have a single maravedi of it.

"I appoint Don Luis Garcias de Puebla, commander of the fortress of Merida, my universal legatee, on condition that he gives up his command to live at Toledo, and gives his only daughter in marriage to my executor Mendoza Perez."

The reader may imagine for himself the rage and despair of the kinsmen, and the ungovernable joy of Mendoza. The latter, not daring to believe his ears, took the will from the notary to convince himself of the reality of his good fortune. All at once a blush of confusion and shame covered his face. He had read the following postscript, in the count's handwriting:

"Mendoza, are you now convinced that all men are selfish—that you yourself are selfish? I know the human heart well enough to be certain that you are now thinking only of your own marriage, and that you have not once remembered, I will not say to regret, the Hunchback, (men do not regret those whose heirs they are,) but even to bless his memory."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Life of Robert Burns. By J. G. Lockhart, LL.B.; with an Essay on his Writings, prepared for this edition. New-York. William Stoddart and C. S. Francis. One vol. 12mo. 1831.

SECOND NOTICE.

We mentioned in our last number that this little work had made its appearance here, after having been generally read and praised in Great Britain. We are constrained to say, however, that the volume itself is scarcely of sufficient importance to require a second notice, or an elaborate review, consisting, as it does, so much of quotations and large extracts from the letters of the poet himself, which have already been before the public. There is in it, however, a number of pages wherein Mr. Lockhart displays himself as a man of no inconsiderable talent, and a writer well accustomed to the pen. We lay before the reader two brief extracts, from which he will derive a tolerable idea of our author's power:

"The Cottar's Saturday Night is, perhaps, of all Burns' pieces

the one whose exclusion from the collection, were such things possible now-a-days, would be the most injurious, if not to the genius, at least to the character of the man. In spite of many feeble lines, and some heavy stanzas, it appears to me that even his genius would suffer more in estimation, by being contemplated in the absence of this poem, than of any other single performance he has left us. Loflier flights he certainly has made, but in these he remained but a short while on the wing, and effort is too often perceptible; here the motion is easy, gentle, placidly undulating. There is more of the conscious security of power than in any other of his serious pieces of considerable length; the whole has the appearance of coming in a full stream from the fountain of the heart—a stream that soothes the ear, and has no glare on the surface.

"It is delightful to turn from any of the pieces which present so great a genius as writhing under an inevitable burden, to this, where his buoyant energy seems not even to feel the pressure. The miseries of toil and penury, who shall affect to treat as unreal? Yet they shrunk to small dimensions in the presence of a spirit thus exalted at once, and softened, by the pieties of virgin love, filial reverence, and domestic devotion." *****

"Let us beware, however, of pushing our censure of a young poet, mad with the inspiration of the moment, from whatever source derived, too far. It can hardly be doubted that the author of the Cottar's Saturday Night had felt, in his time, all that any man can feel in the contemplation of the most sublime of the religious observances of his country; and as little, that had he taken up the subject of this rural sacrament in a solemn mood, he might have produced a piece as gravely beautiful as his Holy Fair is quaint, graphic, and picturesque. A scene of family worship, on the other hand, I can easily imagine to have come from his hand as pregnant with the ludicrous as that Holy Fair itself. The family prayers of Saturday night, and the rural celebration of the Eucharist, are parts of the same system—the system which has made the people of Scotland what they are—and what, it is to be hoped, they will continue to be. And when men ask of themselves what this great national poet really thought of a system in which minds immeasurably inferior to his can see so much to venerate, it is surely just that they should pay most attention to what he has delivered under the gravest sanction. In noble natures, we may be sure, the source of tears lies nearer the heart than that of smiles."

The essay prefixed to this edition, by a gentleman of this city, is written with fluency; and although it does not, as indeed it could not, start any new ideas upon the subject, it has compressed and presented in an attractive form much that will prove new to many, and interesting to all.

We take the occasion which this publication affords to add several ably written passages from the Edinburgh Review, elicited by the original publication of Mr. Lockhart's production in Great Britain, but which acquires additional interest and value from its enlarged views of the character and life of the gifted ploughman. We subjoin them without further comment.

"His former biographers have done something, no doubt, but by no means a great deal, to assist us. Dr. Currie and Mr. Walker, the principal of these writers, have both, we think, mistaken one essentially important thing: their own and the world's true relation to their author, and the style in which it became such men to think and to speak of such a man. Dr. Currie loved the poet truly; more, perhaps, than he avowed to his readers, or even to himself; yet he everywhere introduces him with a certain patronizing, apologetic air; as if the polite public might think it strange and half unwarrantable that he, a man of science, a scholar, and gentleman, should do such honor to a rustic. In all this, however, we readily admit that his fault was not want of love, but weakness of faith; and regret that the first and kindest of all our poet's biographers should not have seen farther, or believed more boldly what he saw. Mr. Walker offends more deeply in the same kind: and both err alike in presenting us with a detached catalogue of his several supposed attributes, virtues, and vices, instead of a delineation of the resulting character as a living unity. This, however, is not painting a portrait; but gauging the length and breadth of the several features, and jotting down their dimensions in arithmetical ciphers. Nay, it is not so much as this: for we are yet to learn by what arts or instruments the mind could be so measured and gauged.

"Mr. Lockhart, we are happy to say, has avoided both these errors. He uniformly treats Burns as the high and remarkable man the public voice has now pronounced him to be; and in delineating him, he has avoided the method of separate generalities, and rather sought for characteristic incidents, habits, actions, sayings; in a word, for aspects which exhibit the whole man, as he looked and lived among his fellows. The book, accordingly, with all its deficiencies, gives more insight, we think, into the true character of Burns, than any prior biography; though, being written on the very popular and condensed scheme of an article for Constable's Miscellany, it has less depth than we could have wished and expected from a writer of such power; and contains rather more, and more multifarious quotations, than belong of right to an original production. Indeed, Mr. Lockhart's own writing is generally so good, so clear, direct, and nervous, that we seldom wish to see it making place for another man's. However, the spirit of the work is throughout candid, tolerant, and anxiously conciliating; compliments and praises are liberally distributed, on all hands, to great and small; and, as Mr. Morris Birkbeck observes of the society in the backwoods of America, 'the courtesies of polite life are never lost sight of for a moment.' But there are better things than these in the volume; and we can safely testify, not only that it is easily and pleasantly read a first time, but may even be without difficulty read again.

"Nevertheless, we are far from thinking that the problem of Burns'

biography has yet been adequately solved. We do not allude so much to deficiency of facts or documents—though of these we are still every day receiving some fresh accession—as to the limited and imperfect application of them to the great end of biography. Our notions upon this subject may perhaps appear extravagant; but if an individual is really of consequence enough to have his life and character recorded for public remembrance, we have always been of opinion, that the public ought to be made acquainted with all the inward springs and relations of his character. How did the world and man's life, from his particular position, represent themselves to his mind? How did co-existing circumstances modify him from without; how did he modify these from within? With what endeavors and what efficacy rule over them; with what resistance and what suffering sink under them? In one word, what and how produced was the effect of society on him; what and how produced was his effect on society? He who should answer these questions, in regard to any individual, would, as we believe, furnish a model of perfection in biography. Few individuals, indeed, can deserve such a study; and many lives will be written, and, for the gratification of innocent curiosity, ought to be written and read, and forgotten, which are not in this sense biographies. But Burns, if we mistake not, is one of these few individuals; and such a study, at least with such a result, he has not yet obtained. Our own contributions to it, we are aware, can be but scanty and feeble; but we offer them with good will, and trust they may meet with acceptance from those for whom they are intended.

"Burns first came upon the world as a prodigy; and was, in that character, entertained by it, in the usual fashion, with loud, vague, tumultuous wonder, speedily subsiding into censure and neglect, till his early and most mournful death again awakened an enthusiasm for him, which, especially as there was now nothing to be done, and much to be spoken, has prolonged itself even to our own time. It is true, the 'nine days' have long since elapsed; and the very continuance of this clamor proves that Burns was no vulgar wonder. Accordingly, even in sober judgments, where, as years passed by, he has come to rest more and more exclusively on his own intrinsic merits, and may now be well nigh shorn of that casual radiance, he appears not only as a true British poet, but as one of the most considerable British men of the eighteenth century. Let it not be objected that he did little. He did much if we consider where and how. If the work performed was small, we must remember that he had his very materials to discover; for the metal he worked in lay hid under the desert, where no eye but his had guessed its existence; and we may almost say that, with his own hand, he had to construct the tools for fashioning it. For he found himself in deepest obscurity, without help, without instruction, without model; or with models only of the meanest sort. An educated man stands, as it were, in the midst of a boundless arsenal and magazine, filled with all the weapons and engines which man's skill has been able to devise from the earliest time; and he works accordingly, with a strength borrowed from all past ages. How different is his state who stands on the outside of that storehouse, and feels that its gates must be stormed, or remain for ever shut against him! His means are the commonest and rudest; the mere work done is no measure of his strength. A dwarf behind his steam-engine may remove mountains; but no dwarf will hew them down with the pickaxe, and he must be a Titan that hurls them abroad with his arms.

"It is in this last shape that Burns presents himself. Born in an age the most prosaic Britain had yet seen, and in a condition the most disadvantageous, where his mind, if it had accomplished aught, must accomplish it under the pressure of continual bodily toil, nay, of penury and desponding apprehension of the worst evils, and with no furtherance but such knowledge as dwells in a poor man's hut, and the rhymes of a Ferguson or Ramsay for his standard of beauty, he sinks not under all these impediments. Through the fogs and darkness of that obscure region, his eagle eye discerns the true relations of the world and human life; he grows into intellectual strength, and trains himself up into intellectual expertness. Impelled by the irrepressible movement of his inward spirit, he struggles forward into the general view, and with haughty modesty lays down before us, as the fruit of his labor, a gift which time has now pronounced imperishable. Add to all this, that his darksome drudging childhood and youth was by far the kindest era of his whole life; and that he died in his thirty-seventh year: and then ask if it be strange that his poems are imperfect, and of small extent, or that his genius attained no mastery in its art? Alas, his sun shone as through a tropical tornado: and the pale shadow of death eclipsed it at noon! Shrouded in such baleful vapors, the genius of Burns was never seen in clear azure splendor, enlightening the world: but some beams from it did, by fits, pierce through; and it tinted those clouds with rainbow and orient colors into a glory and stern grandeur, which men silently gazed on with wonder and tears!

"We are anxious not to exaggerate; for it is exposition rather than admiration that our readers require of us here; and yet to avoid some tendency to that side is no easy matter. We love Burns, and we pity him; and love and pity are prone to magnify. Criticism, it is sometimes thought, should be a cold business; we are not so sure of this; but, at all events, our concern with Burns is not exclusively that of critics. True and genial as his poetry must appear, it is not chiefly as a poet, but as a man, that he interests and affects us. He was often advised to write a tragedy; time and means were not leant him for this; but through life he enacted a tragedy, and one of the deepest. We question whether the world has since witnessed so utterly sad a scene; whether Napoleon himself, left to brawl with Sir Hudson Lowe, and perish on his rock, 'amid the melancholy main,' presented to the reflecting mind such a 'spectacle of pity and fear,' as did this intrinsically nobler, gentler, and perhaps greater soul, wasting itself away in a hopeless struggle with base entanglements, which coiled closer and closer round him, till only death opened him an outlet. Conquerors are a race with whom the world could well dispense; nor can the hard intellect, the unsympathizing loftiness, and high but selfish enthusiasm of such persons, inspire us in general with any affection; at best, it may excite amazement; and their fall, like that of a pyramid, will be beheld with a certain sadness and awe. But a true poet, a man in whose heart resides some effluence of wisdom, some tone of the 'eternal melodies,' is the most precious gift that can be bestowed on a generation: we see in him a freer, purer development of whatever is noblest in ourselves; his life is a rich lesson to us, and we mourn his death, as that of a benefactor who loved and taught us.

"Such a gift had nature in her bounty bestowed on us in Robert Burns; but, with queenlike indifference, she cast it from her hand, like a thing of no moment; and it was defaced and torn asunder, as an idle bauble, before we recognized it. To the ill-starred Burns was given the power of making man's life more venerable, but that of wisely guiding his own was not given. Destiny—for so in our ignorance we must speak—his faults, the faults of others, proved too hard for him; and that spirit, which might have soared, could it but have walked, soon sank to the dust, its glorious faculties trodden under foot in the blossom, and died, we may almost say, without ever having lived. And so kind and warm a soul; so full of inborn riches, of love to all living and lifeless things! How his heart flows out in sympathy over universal nature; and in her bleakest provinces discerns a beauty and a meaning! The 'daisy' falls not unheeded under his ploughshare; nor the ruined nest of that 'wee, cowering, timorous beastie,' cast forth, after all its provident pains, to thole the sleety dribble, and cranreuch cauld. The 'hoar visage' of winter delights him: he dwells with a sad and oft-returning fondness in these scenes of solemn desolation; but the voice of the tempest becomes an anthem to his ears; he loves to walk in the sounding woods, for 'it raises his thoughts to Him that walketh on the wings of the wind.' A true poet-soul, for it needs but to be struck, and the sound it yields will be music! But observe him chiefly as he mingles with his brother men. What warm, all-comprehending fellow-feeling, what trustful, boundless love, what generous exaggeration of the object loved! His rustic friend, his nut-brown maiden, are no longer mean and homely, but a hero and a queen, whom he prizes as the paragons of earth. The rough scenes of Scottish life, not seen by him in any Arcadian illusion, but in the rude contradiction, in the smoke and soil of a too harsh reality, are still lovely to him; poverty is indeed his companion, but love also, and courage; the simple feelings, the worth, the nobleness, that dwell under the straw roof, are dear and venerable to his heart; and thus over the lowest provinces of man's existence, he pours the glory of his own soul: and they rise, in shadow and sunshine, softened and brightened into a beauty which other eyes discern not in the highest. He has a just self-consciousness, which too often degenerates into pride; yet it is a noble pride, for defence, not for offence; no cold, suspicious feeling, but a frank and social one. The peasant poet bears himself, we might say, like a king in exile; he is cast among the low, and feels himself equal to the highest; yet he claims no rank, that none may be disputed to him. The forward he can repel, the supercilious he can subdue; pretensions of wealth or ancestry are of no avail with him; there is a fire in that dark eye, under which the 'insolence of condescension' cannot thrive. In his abasement, in his extreme need, he forgets not for a moment the majesty of poetry and manhood. And yet, far as he feels himself above common men, he wanders not apart from them, but mixes warmly in their interests; nay, throws himself into their arms; and, as it were, entreates them to love him. It is moving to see how, in his darkest dependency, this proud being still seeks relief from friendship; unshoes himself, often to the unworthy; and, amid tears, strains to his glowing heart a heart that knows only the name of friendship. And yet he was 'quick to learn'; a man of keen vision, before whom common disguises afforded no concealment. His understanding saw through the hollowness even of accomplished deceivers; but there was a generous credulity in his heart. And so did our peasant show himself among us; 'a soul like an Æolian harp, in whose strings the vulgar wind, as it passed through them, changed itself into articulate melody.' And this was he for whom the world found no fitter business than quarreling with smugglers and vintners, computing excise dues upon tallow, and gauging alebarrels! In such toils was that mighty spirit sorrowfully wasted; and a hundred years may pass on before another such is given us to waste." *****

"Independently of the essential gift of poetic feeling, as we have now attempted to describe it, a certain rugged sterling worth pervades whatever Burns has written; a virtue, as of green fields and mountain breezes, dwells in his poetry; it is redolent of natural life, and hardy natural men. There is a decisive strength in him, and yet a sweet native gracefulness; he is tender, and he is vehement, yet without constraint or too visible effort; he melts the heart, or inflames it, with a power which seems habitual and familiar to him. We see in him the gentleness, the trembling pity of a woman, with the deep earnestness, the force and passionate ardor of a hero. Tears lie in him, and consuming fire; as lightning lurks in the drops of the summer cloud. He has a resonance in his bosom for every note of human feeling; the high and the low, the sad, the ludicrous, the joyful, are all welcome in their turns to his 'lightly-moved and all-conceiving spirit.' And observe with what a prompt and eager force he grasps his subject, be it what it may! How he fixes, as it were, the full image of the matter in his eye; full and clear in every lineament; and catches the real type and essence of it, amid a thousand accidents and superficial circumstances, no one of which misleads him! Is it of reason; some truth to be discovered? No sophistry, no vain surface-logic detains him; quick, resolute, unerring, he pierces through into the marrow of the question; and speaks his verdict with an emphasis that cannot be forgotten. Is it of description; some visual object to be represented? No poet of any age or nation is more graphic than Burns; the characteristic features disclose themselves to him at a glance; three lines from his hand, and we have a likeness. And in that rough dialect, in that rude, often awkward metre, so clear and definite a likeness! It seems a draftsman working with a burnt stick; and yet the burin of a Retach is not more expressive or exact." *****

"Force and fineness of understanding are often spoken of as something different from general force and fineness of nature, as something partly independent of them. The necessities of language probably require this; but in truth these qualities are not distinct and independent; except in special cases, and from special causes, they ever go together. A man of strong understanding is generally a man of strong character; neither is delicacy in the one kind often divided from delicacy in the other. No one, at all events, is ignorant that in the poetry of Burns, keenness of insight keeps pace with keenness of feeling; that his light is not more pervading than his warmth. He is a man of the most impassioned temper; with passions not strong only, but noble, and of the sort in which great virtues and great poems take their rise. It is reverence, it is love towards all nature that inspires him, that opens his eyes to its beauty, and makes heart and voice eloquent in its praise. There is a true old saying, that 'love furthers knowledge'; but above all, it is the living essence of that knowledge which makes poets; the first principle of its existence, increase, activity. Of Burns's fervid affection, his generous all-embracing love, we have spoken already, as of the grand distinction of his nature, seen equally in word and deed, in his life and in his writings. It were easy to multiply examples. Not man only, but all that environs man in the material and moral universe is lovely in his sight: 'the hoary hawthorn,' the 'troop of gray plover,' the 'solitary curlew,' all are dear to him; all live in this earth along with him, and to all he is knit as in mysterious brotherhood. How touching is it, for instance, that amidst the gloom of personal misery, brooding over the wintry desolation without him and within him, he thinks of the 'ourie cattle' and 'silly sheep,' and their sufferings in the pitiless storm!

'I thought me on the ourie cattle,
Or silly sheep, wha bide this brattle
O' wintry war;
Or thro' the drift, deep-lairing, sprattle,
Beneath a scaur.

Ilk happy bird, wee helpless thing,
That in the merry months o' spring
Delighted me to hear thee sing,
What comes o' thee?
Where wilt thou cow' thy chattering wing,
And close thy ee?

The tenant of the mean hut, with its 'ragged roof and chinky wall,' has a heart to pity even these! This is worth several homilies on mercy; for it is the voice of mercy herself. Burns, indeed, lives in sympathy; his soul rushes forth into all realms of being; nothing that has existence can be indifferent to him. The very devil he cannot hate with right orthodoxy!

'But fare ye weel, auld Nickie-ben;
O wad ye tak a thought and men!
Ye ablin's might—dinna ken—
Still hae a stake;
I'm wae to think up' ye den,
Even for your sake!

He did not know, probably, that Sterne had been beforehand with him. 'He is the father of curses and lies,' said Dr. Slop; 'and is cursed and damned already.' 'I am sorry for it,' quoth my uncle Toby! 'A poet without love were a physical and metaphysical impossibility.'

"Why should we speak of Scots who hae wi' Wallace bled, since all know it, from the king to the meanest of his subjects? This dithyrambic was composed on horseback; in riding in the middle of tempests, over the wildest Galloway moor, in company with a Mr. Syme, who, observing the poet's looks, forbore to speak—judiciously enough—for a man composing Bruce's Address might be unsafe to trifle with. Doubtless this stern hymn was singing itself, as he formed it, through the soul of Burns; but to the external ear, it should be sung with the throat of the whirlwind. So long as there is warm blood in the heart of Scotchman or man, it will move in fierce thrills under this war-ode, the best, we believe, that was ever written by any pen."

The Young Duke. By the author of "Vivian Grey." 2 vols. 12 mo. pp. 214. 223. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

This book is brilliant—full of wit not forced, and sentiment without affectation. We have rather a horror of novel reading in general: one gets tired of feasting perpetually on sweetmeats. We have gone through all the Waverleys two or three times, and have entrenched ourselves behind them, contented with our lore. Even Pelham and Devereux could scarcely win us from our apathy, and we were audacious enough not to peep into Vivian Grey. We thought then it was audacious, and one does not care for a charge of audacity; but the Young Duke has compelled us to set it down as folly, and that we despise, and shall hasten to repair the error. Every body must read the Young Duke. We have spoiled a neat copy writing "beautiful" and "superb" in the margin. It is full of poetry, though not exactly the nymph who dwells in the green woods, among the mountains, or the quiet rich valley, with its flashing brook and pleasant shadows; but as she is found in great cities, reposing in palaces, with her foot on an ottoman, or her radiant face beaming beneath a coronet of diamonds, or the shadow of nodding plumes. Still it is poetry—the poetry of fashion—and none but a choice spirit, with a most rare fancy and deep passions could have reflected a scene so magnificent as that presented in this story. The sentimentousness of Ossian is succeeded by the morality and voluminousness of Johnson. Every chapter advances the plot visibly, flings a new light and interest about the characters, and events follow each other with a "bright rapidity." It is a sort of book which one hates to read alone, but regrets that the quiet chairs and tables around have no comprehension for the graceful and fascinating eloquence which arouses him in almost every page. There runs through the whole an air that is delightful; a fine Byronic mixture of waggery and pathos, of wit and morality, set off with a curious felicity of expression. The tears have not fairly sprung into your eyes, before you are in a roar, and that is the pleasantest laughter in the world. If our publishers continue to send us such compositions as these, there is no better business than "reviewing," unless perhaps portrait painting in the style of Ingham, with such subjects as the White Plume. There are whole pages of vivid description like the following:

"There was a constant bustle kept up at Malthorpe, and the young duke was hourly permitted to observe, that, independent of all private feeling, it was impossible for the most distinguished nobleman to ally himself with a more considered family. There was a continual swell of guests, dashing down, and dashing away like the ocean—brilliant as its foam, numerous as its waves. But there was one permanent inhabitant of this princely mansion far more interesting to our hero than the evanescent crowds who rose like bubbles, glittered, broke, and disappeared." *****

"I hint at her faults. How shall I describe her virtues! Her unbounded generosity—her dignified simplicity—her graceful frankness—her true nobility of thought and feeling—her firmness—her courage and her truth—her kindness to her inferiors—her constant charity—her devotion to her parents—her sympathy with sorrow—her detestation of oppression—her pure unsullied thoughts—her delicate taste—her deep religion. All these combined would have formed a delightful character, even if unaccompanied with such brilliant talents and such brilliant beauty. Accustomed from an early age to the converse of courts, and the forms of the most polished circles, her manner became her blood, her beauty, and her mind. Yet she rather acted in unison with the spirit of society, than obeyed its minutest decree. She violated etiquette with a wilful grace, which made the outrage a precedent, and she mingled with princes without feeling her inferiority. Nature, and art, and fortune were the graces who had combined to form this girl. She was a jewel set in gold and worn by a king." *****

"Small feet are fitting in the mazy dance, and music winds with inspiring harmony through halls whose lofty mirrors multiply beauty, and add fresh lustre to the blazing lamps. May Dacre there is wandering like a peri in paradise, and Lady Aphrodite is glancing with her dazzling brow, yet an Asmodeus might detect an occasional gloom over her radiant face. It is but for an instant, yet it thrills. She looks like some favored sultana, who muses for a moment amid her splendor on her early love."

There is no dandyism in all the Pelham novels more exquisite than this:

"His grace had a taste for magnificence in costume; but he was handsome, young, and a duke. Pardon him. Yet to-day he was, on the whole, simple, and with the exception of the pink topaz buttons, which shed their rosy hue over his white silk waistcoat, he wore no jewels. Confident in a complexion whose pellucid lustre had not yielded to a season of dissipation, his grace did not dread the want of relief which a white face, a white cravat, and a white waistcoat would seem to imply; nevertheless, the interior of the waistcoat was imperceptibly lined with rose-colored silk, and a rich and flickering light was thus thrown over the soft beauties of the blonde. The effect, as the cause was concealed, was in a manner supernatural."

"Luigi advanced with a coat, of a color—remember, it was summer—stolen from the neck of Juno's peacock. While he fits it to the back, Spiridon arranges the ruffles, replaces on the favored finger the signet-ring, and presents his lord with a handkerchief, which assuredly must have been dropped on that immortal bank o'er which the south did breathe so sweetly! A hair chain set in diamonds, worn in memory of the absent Aphrodite, and to pique the present Dacre, is annexed to a glass, which reposed in the waistcoat pocket. This was the only weight that the duke of St. James ever carried. It was a bore, but it was indispensable."

"It is done. He stops one moment before the long pier-glass, and shoots a glance which would have read the mind of Talleyrand. It will do. He assumes the look, the air that befit the occasion: cordial, but dignified; sublime, but sweet. He descends like a deity from Olympus to a banquet of illustrious mortals." *****

We cannot close the article without one more extract:

"There is nothing more strange but nothing more certain, than the different influence which the seasons of night and day exercise upon the moods of our minds. Him whom the moon sends to bed with a head full of misty meaning, the sun will summon in the morning with a brain clear and lucid as his beam. Twilight makes us pensive; Aurora is the goddess of activity. Deepair curses at midnight; Hope blesses at noon."

"And the bright beams of Phœbus—why should this good old name be forgotten?—called up our duke, rather later than a monk at matins, in a less sublime disposition than that in which he had paced among the orange-trees of Dacre. His passion remained, but his poetry was gone. He was all confidence, and gaiety, and love, and panted for the moment when he could place his mother's coronet on the only head that was worthy to share the proud fortunes of Hauteville.

"Luigi, I will rise. What is going on to-day?"

"The gentlemen are all out, your grace."

"And the ladies?"

"Are going to the archery ground, your grace."

"Ah! she will be there, Luigi!"

"Yes, your grace."

"My robe, Luigi."

"Yes, your grace."

"I forgot what I was going to say.—Luigi!"

"Yes, your grace."

"Luigi, Luigi, Luigi," hummed the duke, perfectly unconscious, and beating time with his brush. His valet stared, but more when his lord, with eyes fixed on the ground, fell into a soliloquy, not a word of which was audible, except to my reader.

"How beautiful she looked yesterday upon the keep, when she tried to find Dacre! I never saw such eyes in my life! I must speak to Lawrence immediately. I think I must have her face painted in four positions, like that picture of Lady Alice Gordon, by Sir Joshua. Her full face is sublime; and yet there is a piquancy in the profile, which I am not sure—and yet again, when her countenance is a little bent towards you, and her neck gently turned, I think that is, after all—but then when her eyes meet yours, full—oh! yes! yes! yes! That first look at Doncaster! It is impressed upon my brain, like self-consciousness. I never can forget it. But then her smile! When she sang on Tuesday night—Pretty puss! By heavens!" he exclaimed aloud, "life with such a creature is immortality!"

"He advanced with rapid strides, with his razor in his hand. Luigi retreated—the duke pushed on—Luigi was in a corner—in a moment his throat must have been cut. He coughed: the duke started. "Ah! Luigi, am I up? Archery, eh? Then, I wear my green frock."

"About one o'clock the duke descended into empty chambers. Not a soul was to be seen. The birds had flown. He determined to go to the archery ground. He opened the door of the music-room. He found May Dacre alone at a table, writing. She looked up, and his heart yielded, as her eye met his.

"You do not join the nymphs?" asked the duke.

"I have lent my bow," she said, "to an able substitute."

"She resumed her task, which he perceived was copying music. He advanced, he seated himself at the table, and began playing with a pen. He gazed upon her, his soul thrilled with unwonted sensations, his frame shook with emotions which, for a moment, deprived him even of speech. At length he spoke, in a low and tremulous tone,

"I fear I am disturbing you, Miss Dacre?"

"By no means," she said with a courteous air; and then remembering she was a hostess, "is there any thing that your grace requires?"

"Much—more than I can hope. Oh! Miss Dacre, suffer me to tell you how much I admire, how much I love you!"

"She started, she stared at him with distended eyes, and her small mouth was open like a ring.

"My lord!"

"Yes!" he continued, in a rapid and impassioned tone; "I at length find an opportunity of giving way to feelings which it has been long difficult for me to control. Oh! beautiful being, tell me, tell me that I am blessed."

"My lord! I—I am most honored—pardon me if I say, most surprised."

"Yes! from the first moment that your ineffable loveliness rose on my vision, my mind has fed upon your image. Our acquaintance has only realized, of your character, all that my imagination had preconceived. Such unrivalled beauty, such unspeakable grace, could only have been the companions of that exquisite taste and that charming delicacy, which, even to witness, has added great felicity to my existence. Oh! tell me—tell me that they shall be for me something better than a transient spectacle. Condescend to share the fortune and the fate of one who only esteems his lot in life because it enables him to offer you a station not utterly unworthy of your transcendent excellence!"

"My lord, I have permitted you to proceed too far. For your for my own sake, I should sooner have interfered, but, in truth, I was so perfectly astounded at your unexpected address, that I have but just succeeded in recalling my scattered senses. Let me again express to you my acknowledgments for an honor which I feel is great; but permit me to regret, that for your offer of your hand and fortune, these acknowledgments are all I can return."

"Miss Dacre! am I then to wake to the misery of being rejected?"

"A little week ago, my lord, we were strangers. It would be hard if it were in the power of either of us now to deliver the other to misery."

"You are offended then, at the presumption which, on so slight an acquaintance, has aspired to your hand. It is indeed a high possession. I thought only of you, not of myself. Your perfections require no time for recognition. Perhaps my imperfections require time for indulgence. Let me then hope!"

"My lord, you have misconceived my meaning, and I regret that a foolish phrase should occasion you the trouble of fresh solicitude, and me the pain of renewed refusal. In a word, it is not in my power to accept your hand."

"He rose from the table, and stifled the groan which struggled in his throat. He paced up and down the room with an agitated step and a convulsed brow, which marked the contest of his passions. But he was not desperate. His heart was full of high resolves and mighty meanings, indefinite but great. He felt like some conqueror who, marking the battle going against him, proud in his infinite resources and invincible power, cannot credit the madness of a defeat. And the lady, she leaned her head upon her delicate arm, and screened her countenance from his scrutiny.

"He advanced."

"Miss Dacre! pardon this prolonged intrusion; forgive this renewed discourse. But let me only hope, that a more favored rival is the cause of my despair, and I will thank you—"

"My lord," she said, looking up with a faint blush, but with a flashing eye, and in an audible and even energetic tone—"the question you ask is neither fair nor manly; but as you choose to press me, I will say, that it requires no recollection of a third person to make we decline the honor which you intended me."

"Miss Dacre! you speak in anger, almost in bitterness. Believe me," he added, rather with an air of pique, "had I imagined from your conduct towards me that I was an object of dislike, I should have spared you this inconvenience, and myself this humiliation."

"My lord, as mistress of Castle Dacre, my conduct to all its inmates is the same. The duke of St. James, indeed, had both hereditary and personal claims to be considered here as something better than a mere inmate; but your grace has elected to dissolve all connection with our house, and I am not desirous of assisting you in again forming any."

"Harsh words, Miss Dacre!"

"Harsher truth, my lord duke," said Miss Dacre, rising from her seat, and twisting a pen with agitated energy.—"You have prolonged this interview, not I. Let it end, for I am not skilful in veiling my mind; and I should regret, here at least, to express what I have hitherto succeeded in concealing."

"It cannot end thus," said his grace; "let me, at any rate, know the worst. You have, if not too much kindness, at least too much candor, to part so!"

"I am at a loss to understand," said Miss Dacre, "what other object our conversation can have for your grace, than to ascertain my feelings, which I have already declared more than once upon a point, which you have already more than once urged. If I have not been sufficiently explicit or sufficiently clear, let me tell you, sir, that nothing but the request of a parent whom I adore, would have induced me even to speak to the person who had dared to treat him with contempt."

"Miss Dacre!"

"Your grace is moved, or you affect to be moved. 'Tis well:—if a word from a stranger can thus affect you, you may be better able to comprehend the feelings of that person whose affections you have so long outraged—your equal in blood, my lord duke, your superior in all other respects."

"Beautiful being!" said his grace, advancing, falling on his knee, and seizing her hand—"Pardon, pardon, pardon! Like your admirable sire, forgive—cast into oblivion all remembrance of my fatal youth. Is not your anger—is not this moment a bitter, an utter expiation for all my folly—all my thoughtless, all my inexperienced folly,—for it was no worse? On my knees, and in the face of heaven, let me pray you to be mine. I have staked my happiness upon this venture. In your power is my fate. On you it depends whether I shall discharge my duty to society, to the country to which I owe so much—or whether I shall move in it without an aim, an object, or a hope. Think—think only of the sympathy of our dispositions—the similarity of our tastes. Think—think only of the felicity that might be ours. Think of the universal good we might achieve! Is there any thing that human reason could require that we could not command?—any object which the human mind could imagine that we could not obtain? And as for myself, I swear I will be the creature of your will. Nay, nay!—oaths are mockery—vows are idle! Is it possible to share existence with you, beloved girl! without watching for every wish—without—"

"My lord, my lord, this must end. You do not recommend yourself to me by this rhapsody. What do you know of me, that you should feel all this? I am rather different from what you expected—that, that is all. Another week, and another woman may command a similar effusion. I do not believe you to be insincere. There would be more hope for you if you were. You act from impulse, and not from principle. This is your best excuse for your conduct to my father. It is one that I accept, but which will certainly ever prevent me from becoming your wife. Farewell!"

"Nay, nay! let us not part in enmity!"

"My lord, enmity and friendship are very strong words—words that are much abused. There is another, which must describe our feelings towards the majority of mankind, and mine towards you. Substitute for enmity—indifference."

"She quitted the room: he remained there for some minutes leaning on the mantel-piece, and then rushed into the park. He hurried for some miles with the rapid and uncertain step which betokens a tumultuous and disordered mind. At length he found himself among the ruins of Dacre Abbey. The silence and solemnity of the scene made him conscious, by the contrast, of his own agitated existence,—the desolation of the beautiful ruin accorded with his own crushed and beautiful hopes. He sat himself at the feet of the clustered columns, and covering his face with his hands, he wept."

We do not pretend to have given the best extracts which these volumes afford, as there are certainly others superior in interest, but of greater length. Detached sentences of much beauty strew the pages profusely, and whether ludicrous or sentimental, derive an additional effect from their contrast with each other. Many of the incidents are highly dramatic, and the dialogue is pointed, spirited, and elegant.

THE FINE ARTS.

VIEWS OF NEW-YORK AND ITS ENVIRONS.

THE second number of this publication has appeared. It is very neat and pretty, and contains four plates: the City Hall, the Navy Yard, Le Roy Place, and the Shot Tower. The engravings are creditable to the artist, and the general typographical execution of the work combined with its cheapness, gives it a just claim to extensive support. A ready sale will probably remunerate the publishers for their evident liberality. We have but one objection to make: there is rather too much puffery about the cover. But the publishers, we presume, must not be "out of fashion." Our friend Peabody no doubt recollects the sublime reply of the keeper of a lunatic asylum to a great philosopher. "Do you use coercion?" inquired the philosopher. "No, sir," said the keeper, "we use soft soap!"

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

The latest publications of Bourne are, "Up, Brothers, up," by Auber; "The Gascon Vespers," as sung by Madame Vestris; "Land of Liberty," recitative and song, by Mr. Jones of the Park theatre; "Cherubs took her from me," "Bouquet of waltzes and dances of various nations," with a letter press account of their style and origin; "Glide on my bark," with a landscape vignette; and "Parting Hymn," by Hance, words by bishop Heber, and a portrait.

THE DRAMA.

After a successful tour through the southern states, Miss Clara Fisher has returned, and appeared once in three popular characters, for the benefit of Mrs. Vernon. She was welcomed with applause long and loud by an uncommonly crowded and fashionable audience. The correctness and lively spirit which she throws into her performances, and the pleasure with which they are acknowledged by the public, continue unabated, and afford rich assurances for the future career of this deservedly favorite young girl. If there be any perceptible alteration in her style, it consists in a yet more skilful management of those singular powers with which nature has gifted her, and which have been so fully developed by education and practice. Mrs. Gilfert has sustained several parts with considerable effect. She has been celebrated for her successful tragic efforts in the history of our stage, and we sincerely trust has not appealed to her numerous admirers in vain. Tom and Jerry has been produced; but after a brief consultation with the thermometer, we denied ourselves the pleasure of witnessing that burlesque, especially as Mr. Parsloe also again afforded the enlightened classes of the community an opportunity of admiring his interesting personation of a monkey. This gentleman is a star; and it is really a refined delight after Cinderella, Clara Fisher, and little Burke, to sit out a sultry summer evening to see a man in a hairy dress, tumbling about the stage, scratching his back and kicking up his heels in the air. A love of truth, however, compels us to state, although we highly appreciate the taste of this ingenious candidate for histrionic honors, that his gambols bear about the same resemblance to a monkey's that they do to those of a pig, when that respectable animal is under the influence of spirituous liquor. The first representation this season of the French opera company of New Orleans, will be given on the first of August. The manager announces, that many new and popular operas, melo-dramas, &c. are in preparation.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Defeat of the Poles.—The engrossing subject of attention and regret for several days past has been the defeat of the heroic Poles. Week after week brought such rapidly succeeding accounts of their brilliant successes, that the most sceptical began to hope, while the ardent were eager to celebrate in advance the establishment of their independence. Few accustomed to regard public affairs with any degree of interest, could refrain from a lively sympathy with their anticipations, and an earnest prayer for their success; and it would be a consolation to that gallant nation to know what a feeling of general and real disappointment their unfortunate reverses have occasioned in this country.

Rail-roads.—Rail-roads are springing up every where. The Washington Telegraph says, "the contemplated rail-road from Charleston to the Mississippi will pass over a country possessing many advantages for manufacturing. Boston, New-York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, may find much of their commerce transferred to southern cities, and Lowell may find a rival in the healthy and well watered highlands of the Carolinas." A journal has been established at Rogersville, Tennessee, entitled the Rail-road Advocate.

Ladies' Magazine.—We have perused the last number of this well edited and neatly printed publication with pleasure. It consists entirely of original articles, and forms a most proper and desirable journal for the use of families. Its already established literary character should be alone sufficient to command for its proprietor an ample reward; but when we consider that it is edited by an intelligent and respected female, pursuing with the most unremitting toil this honorable method of educating her children, her claims upon the support of the public assume an importance which should not be slightly overlooked, especially by those of her own sex.

Columbia College.—The commencement of this institution will take place on Tuesday next, the second of August. On Monday, the first, at half-past five o'clock, P. M. Edward P. Livingston, Esq., our lieutenant-governor, will deliver the annual address before the alumni and two societies of the college.

YOUNG LUBIN LOVED THE FAIR LISETTE.

COMPOSED BY H. K. BISHOP.

Allegretto non presto.

Young Lu-bin loved the fair Li-sette, And tap-ping at her win-dow came, The sun had scarce-ly ri-sen yet, She peep'd, and cried, "O fy, for shame!" "Sweet maid," he cried, "'tis smi-ling May, Come let us rove;" "In-deed," said she "so soon? What will the neigh-bors say? Fi done! Fi done! ah, mon a - mi! Fi done, ah, mon a - mi! Fi done, ah, mon a - mi! Fi done, Fi done, Fi done, Fi done, ah, mon a - mi!

SECOND VERSE—Still Lubin soft persuasion tried,
And fair Lisette, at last content,
Forgot the neighbors, ceased to chide,
Stole out, and with him maying went!

And oft a stolen kiss he caught,
Lisette, no doubt, displeased would be,
Yet only said, whate'er she thought,
"Fi done! Fi done! ah, mon ami!"

THIRD VERSE—He talk'd of love, "come let's away;"
She cried, yet loiter'd, silly thing;
He press'd her, too, to fix the day,
And on her finger placed a ring;

She started, blush'd and hung her head,
Yet very angry tried to be;
But only sigh'd, and softly said,
"Fi done! Fi done! ah, mon ami!"

LINES ON THE DEATH OF A CHILD.

"Death lies on him, like an untimely frost
Upon the sweetest flow'r of all the field.—Shakespeare."

'Twas some few hours past noon;
Young spring had burst its fetters, and diffused
Its cheering and bland influences. Pure,
Fresh, and odorous came the balmy air,
Stolen from unnumber'd sweets just peeping forth
In rich and varied beauty. The earth was full
Of renovated life, and sent up streams
Of nurture and support. Each shrub, and flower, and tree
Imbued the precious moisture, and was clad
In the rich vesture of the vernal day.
Melodious voices from the woods gave out
That not alone from things inanimate
Swell'd the glad burst of nature's festival:
Each little throat pour'd out its orisons;
And the whole grove, rich with collected good,
Allured to taste the freshness and the shade.
The young, the grave, the gay, those of gray hairs
And those of tender age were there, alike
To breathe the inspiring fragrance, and to join
With universal nature in subdued
And silent thankfulness to Him who gave
The lily's beauty, and whose care relieves
The ravens when they cry. Amidst the throng
A little child, whose days were yet but few,
Attracted mute attention:—there was that
In his young playful gambols, which subdued
All hearts within their influence. His eye
Shone like the wild gazelle's—a lustrous black,
Fring'd with long silken lashes; and his locks,
Which wanton'd in the breeze, play'd o'er a brow
White as the sculptur'd marble; young buds and flowers
Were twin'd amidst his tresses; and he look'd

Like a pure habitant of air, just come
Awhile to sport within our sphere.

The sun had set
In purple and in gold—the hum of men
Died with its sinking radiance, and the calm
Of evening stole along the wide domain:
Silence profound reign'd through the still abode,
Whose halls were wont to echo with the sound
Of playful mirth and innocent enjoyment;
The jocund cry—the heart-inspiring laugh—
And the bright smile which radiated all
Were absent; all was gloom. Slow stealthy steps
Were fitting to and fro; the stifled sob,
The melancholy visage—the dimm'd eye
Betoken'd heartfelt sadness. Grief was there!
A feeble light stole through a spacious chamber.
Round a low couch, where a young infant lay,
Were gather'd its fond parents. Pale his lips
As rose-leaves are when dash'd from off the tree
By summer's thunder-shower; his slender frame
Had lost its sprightliness; the hue of health
Had droop'd away; languor was in his eye;
And the frail covering that enclosed his spirit
Seem'd wasted and o'ercome. Kind friends were there
To minister and soothe him; and the leech
Had exercised his skill—but all in vain!
A momentary gleam, a glance of recognition,
Which seem'd to be the harbinger of good,
Was but the farewell to his earthly home;
And then his spirit, unconfin'd and free,
Wing'd its fair flight to heaven.

'Tis midnight!

How solemn is the silence. Death is here—
The little child who lies a clay-cold corse,
At noon was buoyant as the gilded moth
That dances in the sunbeam. Short-lived flow'r,
How beautiful! This form would put to shame
The noblest work that came from Phidias' hands,

And instigate the modern to throw by
His chisel and his skill. How calm he looks!
As if he'd enter'd on "the way of life."
There is not that in death which superstition
And the bigot's fear have fenced around it:
It seems a placid sleep—a sacred rest;
Welcome to those whom weariness and pain,
And disappointed hopes, and deep distress,
Have sicken'd of the world:—to them 'tis life!
Peace—and a sure reward! The pure in heart
Find there the everlasting doors, which ope
To glory and to heaven; the little child
Shall meet maternal fondness, which no more
Shall know of pain, or parting, or decay,
But ripen into love eternally.
How holy is their rest who rest in youth!
Time has not scar'd their feelings, nor has care
Blench'd the pure vermilion of their rosy cheeks;
They are like angel-visitors, who glide
Full quickly past our vision, but yet leave
Their brightest scintillations far behind.
To Jesus they were friends—his thrilling words
Cling to the childless mother with a power
That nought on earth can weaken or subdue:
"Suffer these children, and deny them not,
Their spotless lives exhibit all my words,
And bear a just similitude to heaven!"

A LAWYER OUTWITTED.—Several years ago, a young gentleman went to consult a certain attorney, how he might carry off an heiress. "You cannot do it with safety," said the counsellor; "but I'll tell you what you may do—let her mount a horse, and hold a bridle and whip; do you then mount behind her, and you are safe—for she runs away with you." The counsellor, however, was sufficiently punished for his quibbling advice, when next day he found that it was his own daughter who had run away with his client!

A SKETCH.

BY WILLIAM PITT PALMER.

"And thou hast sought in starry eyes
Beams that were never meant for thine,
Another's wealth;—tame sacrifice
To a fond faith! Still dost thou pine?
Still dost thou hope that greeting hands,
Voice, looks, or lips may answer thy demands?"

THEIR parents had been playmates in their youth,
And they, the fair Ianthe and Eugene,
The sole inheritors of all their love,
From the first rising blush of childhood's morn,
Had lived amid life's freshly opening flowers
Like twins in heart together. At all hours
Between the cool and bright extremes of day,
The laugh, the footfall, or the cheerful song
Of either, heard in household-haunt or grove,
Bespoke the other's presence, as in spring
The first soft whisper of the sweet southwest
Tells that its mates, the social birds, are nigh.
Beneath a tall catalpa's breezy shade,
When skies were fair, upon a swarded seat
From the same page they conned the self-same task,
Cheered by the bright example of the bee,
That active toiled from bloom to bloom around;
Or, rising, sought in mossy dells sweet flowers,
And playful wreathed them in each other's hair.
Their homes were but parted by a lawn,
Whose sloping verdure lapped a silver lake
With radiant dimples smiling, half-embowered
Mid broad green elms that lined its pebbly marge.
Hers was allied to palaces, boudoirs,
And lofty halls with arabesques o'erwrought,
And airy balconies, and windows arched
With silken rainbows, spanning in their pride
White vases of the rarest, richest flowers,
And broad piazzas graced with many a shape
Of wreathing woodbine, formed Ianthe's home.
His could not boast such splendors, yet 'twas rich
In cottage beauties, and his gentle mate
Loved all its simple unobtrusive scenes
As fondly as she loved the pomp of charms
That beamed around her native paradise.
At length they parted, she to seek new grace,
And nicer polish mid the city's courts;
And he to spend long months of pleasing toil
In learning's storied cloisters deep immured,
Where oft the lonely student holds commune
With thoughts of old renown, till morning's star
Bedims the radiance of his wasted lamp.
They parted—ah, the memory of that hour
Is like a mother's blessing—like the breath
Of some sweet flower whose fragrance long survives
The freshness and the beauty of its bloom.
It was an eve in autumn, when they met
Beneath the trysting bower for love's farewell;
The moonlight trembled on Ianthe's brow,
As if it feared to soil its spotless snow,
Yet could but choose to linger fondly there;
And in her eyes, upraised in tearful prayer,
The watchful stars did seem to recognize
The long-lost sisters of their shining band.
They parted as the linked in soul do part,
When mutual vows have sealed the mutual love,
And faith reposes on the smiles of hope.
Years saw their absence, and when next they met,
It was within a proud and spacious hall
Where wealth, and fame, and fashion had convened
Their honored favorites, while a heaven of lamps
With starry splendor lit the sparkling scene.
Ianthe reigned the queen of that bright throng,
The worshiped of all worshipers, and wild
With thoughts of vanished days and those to come,
Her student lover trembling flew to her,
And bowed himself before his idol's shrine.
She knew him, yet she knew him not as one
She cared to know amid that courtly throng:
The eye so lavish of its gentle smiles,
For him so lavish erst, was changed to ice,
And the cold pressure of that careless hand,
Whose clasp was once so ivy-like and warm,
Would not have crushed the spring's most fragile flower.
He gazed at her one moment, proudly gazed,
While flashed the quick blood o'er his pale thin cheek,
Then turning to an alcove's lone recess,
He stood apart from all. No malison
Escaped his lip instinct with silent scorn,
As bitterly he marked her point him out
To one on whose obsequious arm she leaned,
And name his name with smiles of cold disdain.
From that sad hour they never met again,
Except, perchance, in sleep's unreal world,
Which wakes around us at the touch of dreams.
Awhile in maiden pride she brightly moved,
Then gave her hand, and with it her fair hopes,

To one of gentle birth, who soon became
In wealth, as love, a bankrupt and a curse.
He toiled to triumph o'er his humble lot,
Nor toiled in vain, for soon to him arose
A princely fortune and a far renown.
Yet, ah, what solace to a blighted heart
Can gold's poor dust administer? What charm
So sweet, so soothing in the breath of fame,
Can summon gladness to a lonely couch,
Or waken music in a childless hall?

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

HOPE—AN ALLEGORY.

THERE is nothing like hope. Dear hope—but before I proceed further, mark me, reader, and I will tell thee a story. Many thousand years ago, before steam-boats, rail-roads, books, cities, or even governments were dreamed of, a creature, curiously formed, sat beneath the shadow of a tree and wept. This strange being was inferior to all others. It wanted the bear's fur, the bird's wing, the lion's ferocious strength, the bee's ceaseless and contented industry, the speed of the deer, the fins of the fish. Nature, which had completed the accommodation of all the rest of creation, seemed to have cast this thing abroad unfinished. It was a timid, naked, defenceless, and unhappy creature—exposed to every sort of inconvenience and danger. The summer's heat poured fiercely on its head. Its limbs were chilled and trembled with the winter's cold. It was hungry, and scarcely knew where to seek for sustenance. It shrunk from the glaring eyes of the beasts of the fields. It longed for something, it knew not what. It remembered its miseries, it felt its destitution. A companion whom it had loved was lying cold and motionless by its side. Tears rolled down its cheeks, and sobs convulsed its bosom. It yielded itself to despair.

Suddenly a spirit stood by its side, with radiant wings unfolded from his shoulders, and a circle of light beaming around its forehead. "Mortal," said the stranger, "Jupiter pities thee. Thy lot is a hard one. We, the inhabitants of a better world look down on thee with interest and compassion. In obedience to the high and inscrutable plan of omnipotent wisdom thou art doomed to woe. That under which thou writest at present is but the commencement of years which will roll over thy devoted head full of gloom and tempests. Disease shall wound thy body and rack it with pangs, but these are nothing when compared with the stabs which must be inflicted on thy mind and thy soul. Nor is this awful fate confined to thee alone. Thy children, and thy children's children for thousands and thousands of years must succeed thee in thine agonies. When the vast earth, which now spreads around thee an untrodden wilderness, shall be swarmed with beings like thee, even as yonder forest is darkened with innumerable leaves—when wondrous cities shall usurp the place of the cataract, the wood, and the meadow, even then shall the cry of grief and wailing be heard, and the countless myriads shall groan and writhe and weep like thee. Their greatest enemies shall be each other. The spot whereon thou now reclinest shall be wet and crimsoned with blood, wasted in dreadful strife, where more wretches shall be struck down in death in an hour than thy imagination can number."

"Oh, heavy misery," said the mortal; "why did Jupiter awaken us to scenes so dreadful, and from which even he cannot rescue us?"

"What he can do, or what is best to be done, it is not for thee to know. But whether or not he can end thy woes, he can at least alleviate them, and I am sent to bestow upon thee a precious boon."

"What availeth reward to the unhappy?" said the mortal. "Oh what availeth even life?"

"And when the hunter pursues the fierce wild tiger," said the spirit, "and the beast turns and tears his bosom, is there no virtue in the balm which can heal the lacerated flesh, assuage his quivering pangs, cool his fevered and restless frame, and gently overcome him with a soft and grateful slumber?"

"Nothing like this hast thou with thee," said the mortal; "besides, an thou had'st, I wish it not. Oh, rather let me hasten to the savage embrace of the hungry tiger, that he may tear in pieces an unfortunate wretch, who must ever draw the breath of life in the bitter anguish till death comes fearfully and ends the pain."

"What I offer thee," said the spirit, "is no medicine for the body. But I am prepared to endow thee with a new mental faculty. Many sweet and glorious ones hast thou already. Many are thy subtle sources of joy, so that nearly all objects minister to thy pleasure. Behold the stirring of yonder clustering flowers. The wind is breathing among them, and now thou inhaledst the floating fragrance which creeps over thee with a delightful consciousness of gratification. Hark! yonder is a strain of aerial music, and tears of rapture are already glistening in thine eyes. When thou art hungry, here is fruit of a sweet taste; when fever riots in thy veins, go lave thy hot forehead in yonder pellucid stream, that falls with a murmur into the rocky basin; and through those two wonderful organs of sight which heaven has placed in thy head, what visions of light and beauty flow in upon thy soul? But hark! I hear again the music of my distant companions, and must quit thy side. Take then thy gift—the blessing which the indulgent father of men and gods bestows upon thee. From this time forth be hope in thy bosom."

The mortal was alone. A mountain has melted from his heart. His soul is shining in a light like that which falls from the heavens when the tempest has exhausted its fury, and the clouds are put to flight. He arose. What vigor animated his limbs—what joy thrilled through his nerves—what fire flashed from his eyes!

He looked down upon the body of his friend. Oh, she was beautiful as morning, and had ever been as welcome to his heart. In her absence he had trembled—in her presence he had rejoiced. He would rather that all the stars of heaven had been extinguished than this being torn from him. Her death left his soul in darkness as the wintry groves, when the sun goes down silently, and cloudy night comes on, and the wind whistles among their naked branches. He had seen her freshness fade away like a flower—her smiling lips grow pale and serious. Drooped over the radiant eyes the veined lids—and the dim glassy fixed orbs were half-seen through the long lashes which were no more to reveal the shaded brilliancy of life and love. Oh, she was dead. He bore her to the stream—he kissed her white, cold, unmoving lips, and the closed eyes which trembled no more beneath his ardent touch. He called aloud—and strangely his voice died away among the quiet forest glades, unanswered but by the dash of the fountain, the gentle wave of branches, or the rustling fall of a leaf. Agony was in his soul. A moment and his heart would have broken, when the same strain of music which had warned the bright spirit to depart, came to his ears as from a distance, swelling gradually on the breeze, and then dying away as if the invisible choir were floating slowly far off through the long aisles of the forest. Yes, it was the spirit. He felt the delight, the rapture of hope. Its dictates came up softly in his understanding, and opened new scenes to his contemplation. He thought he beheld her whom he mourned. She was the inhabitant of a better world. She was with the spirit who had visited him, and she said, "Hush, my beloved—hush the transports of grief. We shall meet again in a higher existence. Yield not to thy earthly sufferings—they are the sorrows of a day. I am happy—thou shalt be so too. Check thy weak tears. Go forth into the world. Thou mayest do good for my sake; 'and when thy life is at an end, that which thou hast esteemed a dread and a misery, will be a blessing.'"

He dried his eyes. He laid the sweet statue in the earth. Then as his serene face gazed upon her, a grief broke over it—the irrepressible agony of tortured nature—but it passed away. And where she lay, there rose a mound, green and overgrown with flowers. And he went and sat there—solitary and pensive—but happy. And thus does hope ever soften the harsh features of evil—change agony into bliss—irradiate with a glory the dark passages of existence, and, like a guardian angel, hover over the bleak and rugged path of the unhappy.

SEDLAY.

AMERICAN CHARACTER.

JAMES MONROE.

THE following is taken from "Letters of the British Spy," by William Wirt, first published about twenty-five years since:

"In his stature he is of the middle height of men, rather firmly set, with nothing further remarkable in his person, except his muscular compactness, and apparent ability to endure labor. His countenance when grave, has rather the expression of sternness and irascibility; a smile, however, (and a smile is not unusual with him in a social circle,) lights it up to very high advantage, and gives it a most impressive and engaging air of suavity and benevolence. Judging merely from his countenance, he is between the ages of forty-five and fifty years. His dress and personal appearance are those of a plain and modest gentleman. He is a man of soft, polite, and even assiduous attentions; but these, although they are always well-timed, judicious, and evidently the offspring of an obliging and philanthropic temper, are never performed with the striking and captivating graces of a Marlborough or a Bolingbroke. To be plain, there is often in his manner an inartificial and even an awkward simplicity, which, while it provokes the smile of a more polished person, forces him to the opinion, that Mr. Monroe is a man of a most sincere and artless soul.

"Nature has given him a mind neither rapid nor rich, and therefore he cannot shine on a subject which is entirely new to him. But, to compensate him for this, he is endowed with a spirit of testless and generous emulation, a judgment solid, strong, and clear; and a habit of application which no difficulties can shake, no labors tire. With these aids, simply, he has qualified himself for the first honors of this country; and presents a most happy illustration of the truth of the maxim, Quisque, sua fortuna faber. For his emulation has urged him to perpetual and unremitting inquiry; his patient and unwearied industry has concentrated before him all the lights which others have thrown on the subjects of his consideration, together with all those which his own mind, by repeated efforts, is enabled to strike; while his sober, steady, and faithful judgment has saved him from the common error of more quick and brilliant geniuses—the too hasty adoption of specious, but false conclusions.

"These qualities render him a safe and an able counsellor; and by their constant exertion he has amassed a store of knowledge which, having passed seven times through the crucible, is almost as highly corrected as human knowledge can be, and which certainly may be much more safely relied on than the spontaneous and luxuriant growth of a more fertile, but less chastened mind—'a wild, where weeds and flowers promiscuously shoot.' Having engaged very early, first in the life of a soldier, then of a statesman, then of a laborious practitioner of the law, and finally again of a politician, his intellectual operations have been almost entirely confined to juridical and political topics. Indeed it is easy to perceive, that the mind of a man engaged in so active a life, must possess more native suppleness, versatility, and vigor, than that of Mr. Monroe, to be able to make an advantageous tour of the sciences in the rare interval of importunate duties. It is possible that the early habit of contemplating subjects as expanded as the earth itself, with all the relative interests of the great nations thereof, may have inspired him with an indifference, perhaps an inaptitude, for mere points of literature. Algernon Sidney has said, that he deems all studies unworthy the serious regard of a man, except the study of the principles of just government; and Mr. Monroe, perhaps, concurs with our countryman in this as well as in his other principles. Whatever may have been the occasion, his acquaintance with the fine arts is certainly very limited and superficial; but, making allowances for his bias towards republicanism, he is a profound and even an eloquent statesman.

"Knowing him to be attached to that political party who, by their opponents, are sometimes called democrats, sometimes jacobins; and aware also that he was a man of warm and ardent temper, I dreaded much, when I first entered his company, that I should have been shocked and disgusted with the narrow, virulent, and rancorous invectives of party animosity. How agreeably, how delightfully, was I disappointed! Not one sentiment of intolerance polluted his lips. On the contrary, whether they be the offspring of rational induction, of the habit of surveying men and things on a great scale, of native magnanimity, or of a combination of all those causes, his principles, as far as they were exhibited to me, were forbearing, liberal, widely extended, and great. As the elevated ground which he already holds has been gained merely by the dint of application; as every new step which he mounts becomes a mean of increasing his powers still further, by opening a wider horizon to his view, and thus stimulating his enterprise afresh, re-invigorating his habits, multiplying the materials, and extending the range of his knowledge, it would be no matter of surprise to me, if before his death the world should see him at the head of the American administration. So much for the governor of the commonwealth of Virginia—a living, an honorable, an illustrious monument of self-created eminence, worth, and greatness!"

MYTHOLOGY.

THE MONTH OF AUGUST IN NEW-YORK.

THE eighth month of the year (counted the sixth by the ancients) was called August, in honor of Augustus Cæsar. The Saxons designated it by the term barn-month, as they then gathered their hay, &c. into barns. It has been distinguished by several remarkable events, a few of which are worthy of record in this place, viz., A. D. 1485, the battle of Bosworth-field, in which Richard III. was slain, took place on the twenty-second; 1502, Columbus discovered the continent of America on the first, and landed on the seventeenth, but lived and died under the impression that it was an island; 1676, the celebrated Indian chief, King Phillip, was surprised and slain on the twelfth; 1769, Bonaparte was born on the fifteenth; 1770, Chatterton, the poet, committed suicide, to prevent starvation on the eighteenth; 1776, battle of Long Island, twenty-seventh; 1798, battle of the Nile, on the first; 1802, Bonaparte declared first consul for life, on the second; 1803, Beattie, the poet, died on the eighteenth; 1804, Commodore Preble attacked the batteries of Tripoli on the third and several subsequent days, and finally, with the assistance of General Eaton, compelled the bashaw to behave himself decently; 1812, the frigate Essex captured the Alert on the thirteenth, the first British prize in the late war; three days afterwards, on the sixteenth, General Hull surrendered Detroit and the American army to the British; six days after this disgraceful act, on the nineteenth, the United States frigate Constitution captured and sunk the British frigate Guerriere; 1814, the city of Washington was entered by the British on the twenty-fourth; 1824, Lafayette, the "nation's guest," arrived at Fort Diamond, in the harbor of New-York, on the fifteenth, and landed in the city, at Castle-garden, on the following day, amid a splendid display of naval, military, and civic honors.

Nor is the month of August deficient in honorary days, set apart for some consecrated purpose. The first is called Lammas day, or more properly, lamb-mass; because, on that day, the tenants who held lands under the catholic church in York, (England) which was dedicated to St. Peter, ad vincula, were bound by their tenure to bring a live lamb into the church at high mass. These priests were doubtless fond of good eating; but a few score of bleating lambs must have made curious discords, when mingled with the solemn chants of the choristers.

The fifteenth of August is called Assumption day, "a high festival of the Romish church, which was formerly observed in many places with extraordinary rejoicings and pomp of theatrical worship, in representation of the assumption. The vast unoccupied space in the old European cathedrals, for which the modern spectator is sometimes unable to account, was the theatre wherein these spectacles and shows were performed by the monks, assisted by ponderous machinery, which required a capacious area for working it. On Assumption day it was customary to implore blessings upon herbs, plants, roots, and fruits, in allusion to which, Googe, translating from Naageorgus, has the following lines:

"The blessed virgin Marie's feast hath here his place and time,
Wherein, departing from the earth, she did the heavens climb;
Great bundles, then, of herbs, to church the people fast do bear,
The which against all hurtful things the priest doth hallow there;
Thus kindly they, and nourish still the people's wickedness,
And vainly make them to believe whatsoever they express;
For sundry witchcrafts by these herbs are wrought, and divers charms,
And, cast into the fire, are thought to drive away all harms."

"It is amusing," adds the author of Festivals, Games, and Amusements, from which we have here quoted, "to see Naageorgus condemning the ignorant people for their credulity, and yet implying his own belief in witchcraft. Thus each age laughs at the mistakes of its precursor, as each in turn will probably be laughed at by its successor."

The day succeeding Assumption is dedicated to St. Roche, who devoted himself to the sick, and was deemed the patron of all who were afflicted with the plague. The phrase, "sound as a roach," is thought to have been derived from the legends and attributes of this benevolent saint. His festival, on the sixteenth of August, was kept like a wake, or general harvest-home, with dances in the churchyard in the evening.

The twenty-fourth is dedicated to St. Bartholomew, one of the apostles, who preached the gospel in the Indies, in Ethiopia, and Lyconia. It is said that he suffered martyrdom in Armenia, where he was flayed alive! but this last assertion is not considered to be well founded. This day is also called the Fest of St. Louis, being instituted in honor of that great and good prince, Louis the ninth, king of France. In addition to these, the tenth of August is consecrated to St. Lawrence, the twenty-sixth to St. Augustine, and the twenty-seventh to St. John the Baptist.

On the twenty-third of this month the sun enters that sign of the zodiac which astronomers have denominated Virgo, or the virgin; said to be Erigone, the daughter of Icarus,

Who, when she saw she could not give relief
Unto her father, hang'd herself for grief.
The maid by whom is borne,
In her fair hands, the ripen'd ears of corn.

Icarus was an Athenian, and is said to have given wine to some peasants, or shepherds, who drank it with the greatest avidity, being ignorant of its intoxicating qualities. The natural consequence was, that they were soon deprived of their reason; while the fury and resentment of their friends and neighbors was immediately turned upon the indiscreet donor, who perished by their hands. Temperance societies, it seems, were not then in fashion; so that summary vengeance was rashly resorted to, instead of sober argument and stereotyped tracts. After his death, however, Icarus was honored with public festivals; and his daughter Erigone was led to discover the place of his interment by means of his faithful dog Mæra. She hung herself in despair, and was changed into a constellation, called Virgo. Icarus was also changed into the star Bootes, and the dog Mæra into the star Canis.

Summer now of the dog-star boasts,
Of angry constellations honored most.
Now bright Andromeda's refulgent sire
Shows to the world, under his hidden fire;
Now Procyon and the raging lion ways,
And Phœbus brings forth dry and parched days.
The shepherd dreads, with his faint flock doth hie,
To find cool shades, or troubled current nigh,
And rough Sylvanus' thickets, while the shore
Beckoned, stands from seas tumultuous roar.
The furious dog-star's heat
Upon the parched corn long since hath beat
With its fierce scalding influence, and made
The beasts to seek the spreading elm's cool shade.

In the city of New-York, the influence of August is not only seen and felt, but heard, smelt, and tasted. Business of every description is languishing, and almost entirely suspended. Every steam-boat that departs from our piers is loaded with human beings, of every age, sex, and condition, flying to purer airs and distant scenes, in search of health or pleasure. Houses are left either entirely empty, or in the charge of some faithful domestic; and even shops and stores, if not actually closed, become merely the lounging places for such victims of ennui as happen to stand on a familiar footing with the under clerks. All the schools are suspended for four or five weeks; the teachers "make the grand tour," and the happy urchins either accompany their parents to the country, or render the streets vocal with their noisy gambols. Even our worthy corporation can seldom form a quorum at this season; and the poor dogs skulk into corners, as if they thought the very old nick was to pay. All enjoy some respite from the din and noise of a city life, except editors, poets, and others who write for their daily bread. For them, alas! there is no vacation, no recess, no holiday! Their daily drudgery must be performed, despite of languor, hydrophobia, pestilence, and famine; while their fair readers are rambling through the woods, musing by the waterfall, or looking from the summit of some mountain upon the panoramic view below, this unfortunate class are plying their ceaseless labors—pen running, brain straining, ink flying, proof gathering, sun scorching, and devil crying for copy. Pity the editor in August.

BIOGRAPHY.

DEATH AND MEMOIR OF MRS. SIDDONS.

FOR the satisfaction of that portion of our readers who take an interest in the affairs of the drama, we exclude several original communications to make room for the subjoined memoir, from Bell's Weekly Messenger. The name of this extraordinary woman is nearly as familiar here as in London; every relic of her is, therefore, regarded with curiosity, and as such we present the annexed extract:

This lady, who, at no very distant period, was not less eminent for the splendor of her mental endowments, than for the towering majesty of her person and demeanor, paid the great debt of nature on the tenth of June last, at her residence in Upper Baker-street, Portman-square. We hear that her life was wholly despaired of by her medical attendants on Saturday last, since which, however, she rallied a little, and slight hopes were entertained by some of her friends that she might for a time longer be spared to them. The disorder for a little while manifested signs of abatement, but returned with accumulated force, and she sank under its effects on the day above stated.

Mrs. Siddons was the eldest daughter of Roger Kemble, and was born on July sixteenth, 1755, at a public-house, called the Shoulder of Mutton, at Brecknock, in Wales. Her father was the manager of a strolling company of comedians; her mother was the daughter of Mr. John Ward, in his line an actor of repute, and also the manager of a company of comedians. Her father was a catholic, but Mrs. Siddons was, we believe, bred up to the faith of her mother. Mrs. Siddons' early life was passed under her father's roof till her fifteenth year. She had at that time excited in her future husband, Mr. Siddons, an attachment of which her parents did not approve. Mr. Siddons was an actor of her father's company; and though he was respectable, both as a performer and as a man, her parents endeavored to break off the engagement. When the attachment was discovered, the effect of absence was tried, and Miss Kemble was placed as a companion or servant with a Mrs. Greathead, near Warwick. While she was there this lady informed Mr. Garrick who she was, and solicited his judgment of her abilities, and his protection. Garrick (says Mr. Boaden) seemed highly pleased with her utterance and her deportment, wondered how she had got rid of the old song, the ti-tum-ti; told her how his engagements stood with the established heroines, Yates and Young—admitted her merits—regretted that he could do nothing for her—and wished her a good morning. During her residence at Mrs. Greathead's, she kept up a correspondence with Mr. Siddons, and at length made up her mind to become an actress, and complete her union with Mr. Siddons by a trip to Scotland. The latter was probably averted by the consent of her parents, and before she had completed her eighteenth year her father gave her hand to Mr. Siddons. They joined a company then performing at Cheltenham, and both of them were immediately taken notice of by Lord Bruce, afterwards off Aylesbury, and his accomplished family. A recommendation to Garrick took place; the Rev. H. Bate, afterwards Sir Bate Dudley, was requested to examine and report concerning her performances. He saw and admired her, recommended her to Garrick, and on December twenty-ninth, 1775, when she was twenty years of age, Mrs. Siddons made her first appearance in London at Drury-lane, in the character of Portia, and was received with great applause. She had no articles of agreement and no salary; and her biographer speaks as if Garrick was even then insensible to her merits. At the close of her career, on May twenty-third, 1776, he revived The Suspicious Husband, and gave her the part of Mrs. Strickland, to play to his own Ranger. She added by it to her growing reputation. Her first appearance in tragedy was made in the part of Lady Anne, when Garrick revived Richard the Third. She there met Roscius in all his terrors, and hung back from timidity; his severe glance corrected the failure, and the reproach was, with extreme sensibility, long remembered. On June the fifth she played before their majesties as Lady Anne, but she seems then to have made no impression on Garrick. He soon after left the stage; she was dismissed, and retired from a scene that presented little but mortification. She was, however, immediately engaged by Mr. Richard Yates, the manager of the Birmingham company; and Henderson seeing her there, had the sagacity to predict her great success, and pronounce that she would never be surpassed. She was soon afterwards engaged at Bath, and there restored, by her great powers, the tragic muse to her honors, and established for herself the fame that carried her in a few years in triumph back to the metropolis. She played in the interval chiefly at Bath, but she also played at York and Manchester, and at the latter place performed Hamlet with great applause. It was in 1782-83, seven years after her first appearance at Drury-lane, that she was re-engaged at that theatre, and came out in the character of Isabella, on the tenth of October. She was, however, so much attached to Bath, and retained so lively a recollection of her failure at London, that she could hardly be induced to come. The manager would not raise her salary, and her increasing family compelled her to demand an additional income. On that not being granted—and a small increase would have been sufficient—she summoned her friends to the theatre, and there surrounded by her children, explained in verse of her own composition the reasons for quitting them. Displaying her children she said,

"These are the moles that heave me from your side,
Where I was rooted—where I could have died."

Her success at London was now as decisive, and her triumph as great, as her former reception had been mortifying. Her next character was Euphrasia, in The Grecian Daughter, and till then the vast power and extent of her voice were imperfectly appreciated.

Mrs. Siddons next most deeply interested the public by her Jane.

Shore. So affecting was she in this mistress of a prince, that at the end of the close of the play, where Shore sees her husband and breathes out the few dying words, "Forgive me, but forgive me," the sobs and shrieks of the women were distinctly audible; and even the other sex, who tried to suppress their tears, were obliged to weep. Several persons fainted, and the artificial grief of the actress gave rise to much alarm in the audience.

Her salary was at this time ten pounds a week, but she was allowed two benefits. For one of which she chose the character of Belvidere, in Venice Preserved, and was eminently successful. From this time her reputation was fully established. Their majesties honored her by seeing her in all her characters. Drury-lane closed on June the fifth, with Isabella, which Mrs. Siddons had played twenty-two times. The returning winter saw two of her brothers, Mr. Stephen and Mr. John Kemble, engaged in London; the former performed Othello, and failed; the latter was splendidly successful in Hamlet. The number of Mrs. Siddons's characters was this year, 1783-4, increased by Isabella, in Shakspeare's play of Measure for Measure; by Mrs. Beverley, in the Gamster; by Constance, in King John; and by Lady Randolph, in Douglas. In this year Mrs. Siddons also played Sigismunda, in Thomson's play of Tancred and Sigismunda; and it is supposed that her appearance in that character led Sir Joshua Reynolds to paint his noble picture of her in the character of the tragic muse, as that picture was painted in this year. Her second season closed, which was one of vast exertion, with great applause; and during the summer she visited Edinburgh, Dublin, and Cork. She was reported to have refused to play for Digges, though that was a work of charity, unless he paid her fifty pounds; and that she would not play for Brereton, though he had been Jaffier to her Belvidere, on any terms. These accusations were, however, publicly denied by her husband. Mrs. Siddons now added to her other characters Margaret of Anjou and Lady Macbeth. From this time forward, for many years, Mrs. Siddons continued to be the chief attraction at the theatres. Her empire over the public was divided, indeed, by Mrs. Jordan. Each had her partisans, each had her followers, and each her favorite critics. Her brother, John Kemble, became in 1787 stage manager of Drury-lane, which contributed much to his sister's happiness. In 1792 Mrs. Siddons played the Jealous Wife with success, and in 1794 opened the then new theatre of Drury-lane with her Lady Macbeth. On the German drama being imported into England, she, too, performed Mrs. Haller in The Stranger. About 1801 Mr. Kemble acquired a share in Covent-garden theatre, and the services of Mrs. Siddons were afterwards transferred thither. Mrs. Siddons lost one of her daughters, the youngest, whom it was expected Sir Thomas Lawrence would wed, in 1798; her husband died in 1802, and her eldest daughter in 1803, which events gave an hitherto prosperous life—prosperous beyond the ordinary list of mortals, the first distaste, and she began, for the first time probably since she first knew the enchanting breath of popular applause, to wish for retirement. In 1808 the conflagration of the theatre for a season suspended her efforts. She, however, accepted an engagement at the new house at fifty pounds a night, which she opened, and performed her part of Lady Macbeth in dumb show in the midst of the O. P. riot. Mrs. Siddons took leave of the profession on the twenty-ninth of June, 1812, her last performance being the character of Lady Macbeth. In 1813 she performed the same character for the benefit of her brother Charles; and in 1816 the character of Queen Catherine, for the same object. On the eighth of June in that year she performed Lady Macbeth, to gratify the Princess Charlotte of Wales and the Prince of Saxe Coburg, which was, we believe, her last appearance on the stage. She, subsequent to that time, gave public readings of Shakspeare and Milton; but, generally speaking, she has lived in close retirement since 1816. She resided in Upper Baker-street, and continued in good health, and capable of taking air, till within a few days of her death.

Mrs. Siddons was gifted with a noble and commanding person, a most beautiful but energetic countenance, a voice powerful and melodious, and with all the charms both of mind and body that are calculated to make an impression on mankind. She was a very queen. Her great natural talents were perfected by diligent study, and she not only comprehended—she knew all the parts she undertook. Her action was noble and impressive; and her character unsullied by any vice, gave a dignity to her profession, such as never before belonged to it in England. She was as exemplary in her duties as a mother, as she was admirable as an actress. In her time, she was admired by Pitt, Burke, Sheridan, and all the great political characters of the last fifty years. Royalty did not disdain to honor her with its countenance; and if ever woman was at once popular with the multitude, honored by the great, and respected by the good, it was Mrs. Siddons. She had three children, who all died before her. Her son was proprietor of the Edinburgh theatre, and died a few years ago. The death of her two accomplished daughters and her husband we have already mentioned. The daughters were said to have possessed the happiest minds and the most delightful persons: the eldest sister was an accomplished and scientific musician. Thus did this celebrated actress see all that could connect her with the world perish before her. Her grand-children, indeed, and her brother remain; and it was reserved to her, as one of the last pleasures of her existence, to see her niece, though not gifted with her extraordinary talents, attain a high degree of public approbation. Mr. Kemble announced the event at Covent Garden, where the performances were immediately changed. Early in the forenoon, bills were posted up at the doors of the theatre, announcing the melancholy event, and that Miss E. Tree would perform the part of Lady Townly, in the Provoked Husband, in place of Miss F. Kemble.

Mrs. Siddons, at the time of her death, would undoubtedly bequeath her fortune to her grandchildren. Her son George visited India, where he had a writership given to him, we believe, by the late Lord Melville. Miss Siddons resided with her mother when she died; and there are grandchildren, the offspring of Mr. Henry Siddons, who live with their mother in Edinburgh. This statement is requisite, because some of the morning papers have asserted that Mrs. Siddons has left her fortune to Mr. Horace Twiss and the children of Mr. Charles Kemble.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

THE ARK AND DOVE.

GENTLEMEN—Oblige a mother by inserting the enclosed extract from the Episcopal Watchman. It is from the pen of Mrs. Sigourney, better known to the lovers of poetry by the name of Lydia Huntley. I read it to my little girl of four years old, (a namesake of the poetess by the by) and she now tells the story in her own simple way to her younger sister. This fact convinces me that my opinion of the piece is correct, and that it is calculated to do more good than all the silly ghost stories and nursery tales that have appeared since the reign of queen Ann. Yours respectfully, L. W.

"Tell me a story, please," my little girl
Lisp'd from her cradle. So I bent me down,
And told her how it rain'd, and rain'd, and rain'd,
Till all the flowers were cover'd, and the trees
Hid their tall heads; and where the houses stood,
And people dwelt, a fearful deluge roll'd,
Because the world was wicked, and refused
To heed the words of God. But one good man,
Who long had warn'd the sinful to repent,
Obey, and live—taught by the voice of heaven,
Had built an ark, and thither with his wife
And children turn'd for safety. Two and two
Of beasts, and birds, and creeping things he took,
With food for all—and when the tempest roar'd,
And the great fountains of the sky pour'd out
A ceaseless flood, till all beside were drown'd,
They in their quiet vessel dwelt secure—
And so the mighty waters bare them up;
And o'er the bosom of the deep they sail'd
For many days. But then a gentle dove
Scap'd from the casement of the ark, and spread
Her lonely pinion o'er that boundless wave.
All, all was desolation—chirping nest,
Nor face of man, nor living thing she saw,
For all the people of the earth were drown'd,
Because of disobedience.—Nought she spied,
Save wide, dark waters, and a frowning sky,
Nor found her weary foot a place of rest.
So with a leaf of olive in her mouth,
Sole fruit of her dear voyage, which, perchance,
Upon some wrecking billow floated by,
With drooping wing the peaceful ark she sought—
The righteous man that wandering dove received,
And to her mate restored, who with sad moans
Had wonder'd at her absence.

Then I look'd
Upon the child, to see if her young thought
Wearied with following mine. But her blue eye
Was a glad list'ner—and the eager breath
Of pleased attention curl'd her parted lips.
And so I told her how the waters dried—
And the green branches waved, and the sweet buds
Came up in loveliness—and that meek dove
Went forth to build her nest—while thousand birds
Awoke their songs of praise, and the tired ark
Upon the breezy breast of Ararat
Reposed—and Noah with glad spirit rear'd
An altar to his God.

Since—many a time—
When to her soft rest, evening's earliest star,
That little one has laid—with earnest tone,
And pure cheek prest to mine, she fondly asks,
"The Ark and Dove."

Mothers can tell how oft,
In the heart's eloquence, the prayer goes up
From a seal'd lip—and tenderly hath blent
With the warm teaching of the sacred tale
A voiceless wish—that when that timid soul,
Now in the rosy mesh of infancy
Fast bound—shall dare the billows of the world,
Like that exploring dove, and find no rest—
A pierced, a pitying, a redeeming Hand
May gently guide it to the ark of peace.

THE DRAMA.

FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC THEATRICALS.

This is inauspicious weather for theatricals. The regular company at the Park ended their representations for the season, with Cinderella, and made

"a swan-like end,
Fading in music."

The actors and actresses are dispersed over the surrounding country. Macbeth and Macduff are smoking cigars together at Congress hall. Dennis Brulgruddery and Desdemona are taking a sociable peep at Niagara; and Cinderella has disappeared somewhere indefinitely, as if the whole affair had been to us as to the bewildered prince, "a lovely dream." Some are ploughing the waters among the highlands of the Hudson; and some wandering in the quiet shadows of Oyster Bay. They have passed like beings of the world from the stage of life, and a new people "reign in their stead."

This new people, as the reader is probably aware, is no other than the French company, who opened on Tuesday evening, with the comic opera of The False Agnes, and the French national piece of the 27th, 28th, and 29th of July.

We have not yet been able to attend their exhibitions; and in the dearth of other dramatic information, extract the following from Frazer's Magazine, touching a universal favorite with our public:

"Of all created beings, Madame Malibran possesses the truest, the purest, and the most pervading genius. This, combined with musical knowledge seldom equalled, with a voice of singular extent and power, and features capable of expressing every—the minutest shade of feeling, enables her to excel in all departments of the lyric drama. In the comic characters—the simple coquet of the village—the intellectual coquet of the city—the wily, yet pure hearted bride of Figaro, she is unapproached. Zerlina, Rosina, and Susannah, are actually before you. They never could have appeared on earth under any other aspect. But, in tragedy, she has some rivals to contend with. Over all these, however, she triumphs in that which is at once the most charming to the spectator, and to the actress the most difficult in the lyric repertory—Desdemona. It was as Desdemona she bid the town farewell at the close of the last season—farewell for a long period, perhaps for ever; for she is one of those, fashioned from that porcelain clay which is so ill calculated to resist the shocks of life, and the anxious admirer of her genius cannot oftentimes fail to mark—

"A gloom
In her dark eye, prophetic of the doom
Heaven gives its favorites—early death!"

This is, however, too sad a theme to dwell upon. In Desdemona she bid the town farewell; and never was seen any thing which so nearly approached perfection, as her personation of the character upon that evening. All traces of her recent illness had vanished, her eyes were never brighter,

"Eyes whose arrowy light Shone like the reflex of a thousand minds."

And never was her beautiful brow more clear: her voice had perfectly recovered its flexibility and richness, and her acting throughout seemed one continued inspiration."

Paganini, also, appears to have set all London crazy. The journalists declare, that to whatever extravagant pitch anticipations may have been excited, they assuredly fall far short of the reality. "He is not only the finest player, perhaps, that has ever existed, on the violin; but he forms a class by himself, and produces effects which he has been the first to discover, and in which few, if any, imitators will be able to follow him." From every thing related of him, we must conclude that he is a most extraordinary being. The critics are beginning to inquire, whether he can ever be persuaded to visit this country. Our public are quite ready to fall into raptures. Few ever excited such intense curiosity.

THE FINE ARTS.

POWER OF MUSICAL INTONATION.

It is said of Pacchierotti, that on one occasion when playing the character of Arbaces at Rome, he pronounced the three words, Eppur sona innocente, in so touching a manner, that the very orchestra stopped; a short symphony, which should have immediately succeeded his declaration of innocence, was neglected, and on his demanding somewhat angrily of the leader, what he and his subordinates were about, the flattering answer was, "Sir, we are weeping!"

THE BOOK OF ARMAGH.

A short time since great curiosity was evinced by the amateurs and literati of Armagh, with respect to the sale of this truly valuable and unique curiosity. The manuscript is the production of the seventh century, and is written on vellum in the pure Irish character, with Greek capitals intermixed; both sides of the membrane are written upon. It is of the small quarto size, about eight inches high, six inches wide, and about three inches thick. It contains four hundred and twenty two pages, and is altogether perfect, except the first membrane part of the Gospel of St. Matthew, and a few pages, which have been defaced by attrition. The cover, or case, is not the least singular part of the treasure. It is of thick black leather, having raised ornamental devices, hieroglyphics, and figures of animals upon it. It has also a very antique brass lock and hasp, part of which latter remains. There were originally eight brass staples, which passed through the lid, a bolt or pin passed through them under the hasp, like our modern portmanteaus. It sold for three hundred and ninety pounds. All were anxious to hear who was the purchaser of this gem of antiquity, but no one knew. Some kind Asmodeus from the house of Cochran and Co., of London, we understand, has borne it off in triumph from its native shore.

MARVILLE DE PAGANINI.

This is the title of a duetto for a single violin, (says the Boston Commentator,) recently published in London. It is the famous piece, the performance of which by Paganini has excited such astonishment throughout Europe. One part he executes with the bow, the other with the fingers only, or pizzicato. Three bars from the first movement of this will give some notion of the whole, and of the nature of the performance. It must, of course, be numbered among the curiosities of music.

ADAGIO.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE GREAT MEDICINE; OR THE MAGIC WHISKERS.

IN THE STYLE OF MODERN BOOKS OF TRAVELS;

Being an abridgment of eight octavo manuscript volumes.

YOUNG HYACINTH PRIMROSE was early in life smitten with the mania for locomotion. As soon as he was his own master he commenced his travels, and in the course of seven years poked his nose into divers unknown countries with hard names, and inhabited by people of hard characters. He visited the Black sea, the White sea, and the Red sea; he visited the cataracts of the Nile, the Pyramids, the Sphinx, and the Catacombs. From thence he took an excursion to Palestine, where he saw Mount Tabor, the lake Tiberias, the ruins of Tyre; had a long talk with Lady Hester Stanhope, and was not half so surprised at any thing, in the whole course of his travels, as at not finding a single Jew in Jerusalem.

After this he perambulated almost all Europe, saw every thing that every traveller had seen for a thousand years past, and was just on the point of invading old Africa, for the purpose of visiting the famous city of Timbuctoo, and ascertaining the course of the Niger, when it occurred to him he might die before he got there; whereupon, considering that there were no more old worlds to conquer, he stopped short in his career, and sojourned awhile at the city of the restaurateurs.

While there, the savans bored him about his own country, and especially about the aborigines, concerning whom the learned of Europe are exceedingly curious. Hyacinth had passed so much of his time in acquiring a knowledge of other countries, that he knew little or nothing of his own. Having displayed his ignorance one evening, in a very decisive manner, a learned and distinguished old philosopher was overheard to say, "Monsieur, if you wish to acquire information of other people, you should bring a little with you by way of exchange;" whereupon friend Hyacinth beat a retreat, and returned to the new world, with a prodigious outfit of whiskers.

He determined to qualify himself for the society of the learned of Europe, by acquiring a competent knowledge of matters of which they were ignorant. But how to do this was the question. "Books can teach me nothing but what these fellows know, for they read every thing; and as to travelling, every part of this continent has been explored. There is no terra incognita here."

He thought of the sources of the Mississippi; but, as ill luck would have it, Mr. Schoolcraft had just been there, and published a book. Next he proposed to explore the country beyond Lake Superior, but Captain Franklin had been beforehand with him. Then he thought of the vast regions about the Missouri, the Yellow Stone, the Platte, and the Arkansas; but alas! here too Messrs. Lewis and Clarke, and Major Long had anticipated him. He was almost ready to weep, like another Alexander, when the thought struck him that no one had ever yet explored the recesses of the Rocky Mountains, and he determined to set about it immediately.

"It must be a glorious place for wonders," quoth he; "and if not so, I can make as many wonders as I please, for there will be nobody to contradict me."

Accordingly he hastened his preparations, consisting of some trinkets to conciliate the Indians, some coffee to refresh himself, and divers other little affairs too tedious to mention. At St. Louis he met a party of traders, going up the Missouri, as far as Council Bluffs, who agreed to take him with them. From Council Bluffs they proceeded up the Platte river, till they came to the Loup Fork, where the party separated: the traders going to the Pawnee villages on that stream, to barter for furs; and Hyacinth, with his companion, interpreter, and guide, all in one person, proceeding up the main stream towards the Rocky Mountains. The guide was half Frenchman, half Indian, or, to say truth, rather more of an Indian than a Frenchman, or indeed any thing else. He professed to speak French, but our hero perceived it was not exactly with the Parisian accent; and as to his English, it was mixed up with a strange variety of classical Indianisms. He was as thin as a reed, of a dark, weather-beaten complexion, long lank raven hair, and a face as smooth as the palm of my hand. He had exterminated his beard by the roots, in compliment to the Indian ladies, who abhor such an appendage to a fine gentleman. There could not have been found in all the world a greater contrast than the faces of Hyacinth Primrose and his travelling mentor, Pierre Fuzee, as he was called, presented. Pierre remonstrated seriously against the appearance of our hero, and wanted very much to shave him outright, but he swore he would rather be hunted for a buffalo than part with a single hair. Pierre Fuzee shook his head, and instead of heaving a sigh, as some men would, or getting angry, as others might have done, cut a caper, and began a song in all languages, about hunting grizzly bears, and such other rural recreations. He was indeed the merriest, best natured, bravest rogue that ever danced a jig on the banks of the Platte.

The third day of their pilgrimage they saw an immense drove of wild horses, which came galloping towards them, like a troop of Arabs of the desert. Our hero, indeed, mistook them for such, until they came near enough for him to see they were without riders. They curvetted round and round in a circle, gradually contracting at each circuit till they came high enough to have kicked our travellers into mummies, if they had been so minded. Without paying any attention to Pierre they all rallied round Hyacinth, with whom they seemed to acknowledge a close affinity. They rubbed their noses against his whiskers with infinite satisfaction, and appeared so desirous of his accompanying them, that Pierre Fuzee was afraid they would seize on his master, and run off with him. He therefore fired his gun over their heads, upon which they all scampered away like the wind; not, however, without now and then turning round to look at his whiskers!

"Diable!" said Pierre, laughing, "I believe Monsieur Hyacinth carries some great charm about him."

A few days more brought our travellers to a part of the river which was quite dry, as it is in many places, where, like some of the streams in Africa, it is absorbed by the quicksands and disappears. Pierre was running about among the stunted cotton trees, in search of game, and Hyacinth took it into his head to cross over on the other side of the dry bed of the river. Before he had gone ten steps he sunk up to his shoulders in the quicksands, through which the river found its silent unseen way. He called for help—it was high time to call, for in addition to the quicksands, there was a great brown bear approaching from the opposite shore towards him, and he in the struggle had lost his rifle, which immediately disappeared in the sands.

Pierre fired at the animal without effect. He either missed him entirely, or the creature did not feel the ball, for they don't mind a few shot through the liver and lungs. Before Pierre could load again the bear had come up with our unfortunate hero, and was reproaching his whiskers.

"My master is a gone man!" sighed Pierre—but for once he was mistaken. Sir Bruin discovered a marvellous sympathy with the unfortunate gentleman, whom he mistook, probably, for one of his fellow-creatures; and after kissing and hugging all he could see of him, which indeed was nothing but his head and face, shook his wise noddle, as much as to say, it is all over with my brother, and scrambled away out of the quicksands as fast as he was able, I suppose to call his friends to the assistance of Mr. Hyacinth Primrose.

"By St. Gallinipper," quoth Pierre, "but my master has certainly got something about him, to keep off the wild beasts. I must find out what it is."

But first he thought of getting the poor gentleman out of the quicksand. After a moment's reflection, he bethought himself of one of those slipping nooses used by the Indians to catch the wild horses of the prairies; and getting as near as he could, without sinking into the sands himself, he threw it with such dexterity that the noose went right over his head. He then pulled him out of the sand as softly as possible, for fear of choking him, which he certainly would have done had it not been for the vast tuft of hair he carried about his muzzle and under his chin, which prevented the rope from even chafing his skin.

"What a fool I was," quoth Pierre Fuzee, "to pull up my beard by the roots. There is no medicine, not even a rifle that never misses, equal to such a suite of whiskers."

Soon after they came to a prairie dog village, and being very hungry, having met with no game for the last three days, they were in hopes to be able to procure one of these little animals for supper; but they were so wild, that it was impossible to come within gunshot of them. Accordingly, they laid themselves down at the root of a cotton tree, and instead of taking supper, took a nap. Presently a troop of prairie dogs crept close to our hero, and seemed to be very curious about his whiskers. They conversed together in low under tones, looked first at the whiskers, then at each other, pricked up their ears, cocked their tails, and seemed so eager to make acquaintance with this new species of puppy, that Pierre, who could not sleep sound for hunger, took the opportunity of seizing a couple of them by the legs, and converting them to his own use and behoof; in other words, cooking one for supper, the other for breakfast.

"Hurrah!" cried Pierre Fuzee, "whiskers forever! It don't signify, but I must have a pair, by hook or by crook."

He took a piece of dry cotton-wood, and having burnt it to a coal, applied it to his muzzle with such surprising effect, that at a little distance his whole face looked as if it were bewhiskered in the very first style. He then laid himself down, and pretended to be asleep. But the prairie dogs were not to be taken in by such a counterfeit. They did not discover the same disposition to cultivate his acquaintance, as they did that of our hero, nor acknowledge the same affinity with his whiskers.

As they approached the head waters of the Platte river they encountered a herd of buffaloes, which stood stock still, and suffered our hero to come close up to them, without appearing to take any notice of his approach.

"He certainly is in possession of some unseen charm," quoth Pierre, as he fired at a fat bull, whose hump had caught his fancy. The herd fled at the report of the rifle, but looked back several times, apparently wondering Hyacinth did not follow them, for there can be little doubt but they mistook him for one of their company. In the rage and anguish of his wound the great bull made for our hero, roaring like the sounds of the tempest in the wilderness, as it seemed with a full determination to demolish him in a twinkling. Pierre shouted with all his might to put his master, who was standing with his back towards the enraged animal, on his guard, while he again loaded his rifle, and the young man turned round just as the bull was within a single jump of him.

"It is all over with my master," quoth Pierre, "unless the whiskers do their duty now."

But what was his surprise at seeing the fiery animal stop short the moment Hyacinth turned towards him, shake his head, as if he had made a mistake, then advance up to him, and rub against his side, as if he had been for all the world just like a fellow-creature!

Being now at the entrance into the Rocky Mountains, our hero, as was his custom, took out his book, and was busy making some notes for the benefit of the savans at Paris, when he was aroused by a whizzing sound passing close to his ear, followed by a most appalling yell. Before he could gather himself together, a band of mountain Indians rushed upon, and would soon have dispatched him, had not Pierre Fuzee called to them in their own language, and told them they were friends. The party was headed by a great chief, called Mitaminaboo, or the Tobacco-bag, and belonged to a tribe which inhabited a valley far in the bosom of the mountains, to which they conducted Hyacinth and his attendant. When they came in sight of the village, which consisted of about forty or fifty lodges or tents, made of buffalo skins, they raised a loud shout, and all the women and children came out to meet them; but, as soon as they saw our hero's tremendous whiskers, they ran away, and hid themselves in the woods. It was some time before they could be prevailed on to return, which they did at last, on the assurances of Pierre that his master would not hurt them. After admiring and wondering a good deal, one of the women, a daughter of Mitaminaboo, ventured to come, and smoothe his whiskers, laughing at the same time, and crying out, "Ouskinekissi Manichick," which Pierre translated "The Great Medicine." The name of this princess was Nikik, or the Little Otter, and her mother, now dead, was a Spanish woman of Santa Fé.

The great Tobacco-bag took Hyacinth to his lodge, and gave him a little short pipe to smoke. He was one of the gravest Indians in all the Rocky Mountains, but he could not help laughing to see the smoke coming out of his whiskers, like a little prairie just getting on fire. This band was at war with its neighbors, as is customary with this amiable, interesting race, and soon after set out on an expedition against a tribe, the chief of which had pronounced the Tobacco-bag to be an old woman.

Hyacinth was complimented with the privilege of going along with them, accompanied by Pierre, and the Little Otter begged him very tenderly to take care of his whiskers. In two days the Tobacco-bag came up with the enemy, who made a stout resistance, until our hero advanced, whereupon they all ran away as fast their legs would carry them!

Hyacinth was considered the hero of the day, and his whiskers from that moment held in profound veneration, as the greatest medicine ever known in the Rocky Mountains. They had gained a victory over one of the most powerful nations in the world, commanded by Kallitaté, or the Lame Duck, a mighty warrior, who wore a necklace of scalps a yard long.

From this time the renowned Tobacco-bag meditated a plan for securing the great medicine, by marrying his only daughter, the Little Otter, to our hero, and adopting him into the tribe. While he was wavering on this point, and summing up the pro and *con*s, the Little Otter, and indeed all the women of the tribe, did nothing but admire the great medicine. Pierre Fuzee, by putting odds and ends together, and recollecting the incidents of the bear, the prairie-dog, the buffalo, &c. had made it out entirely to his satisfaction, that all the virtue of the great medicine his master carried about him was in his whiskers. This idea he communicated to the ladies, and great therefore was their desire to get possession of the least curl of this wonderful talisman.

They begged and entreated him, if it was only a single hair, but our hero was inexorable; he would rather have sacrificed his ears than his whiskers. Every night, while he was asleep, they came and twitched his moustaches, till he had no peace of his life; and if he took one of the little poppooses on his knee, it was sure to lay hold of them with all its might, being doubtless thereunto invited by the vehement desires of the mother. In this way Hyacinth lost some of his most precious curls, and became quite inconsolable when he contemplated his visage in a pocket-glass, which he had carefully preserved.

The Little Otter, who had become very fond of him, and could hardly bear to be out of his sight, one day looked over his shoulder, and saw the reflection of the whiskers in the glass; upon which she ran away to the rest of the women, and reported that there was another "Ouskinekissi Minichick" come among them. On explaining the affair, they determined to get possession of the second great medicine, and that night purloined his pocket-glass. But great was their astonishment and disappointment at finding no Ouskinekissi behind or within it. They were, however, consoled for their disappointment by each one seeing herself there, instead of the great medicine. For a long time they did nothing but take turns to admire themselves, and passed all their time looking in the glass, instead of cultivating corn, carrying wood, cooking dinner, and mending moccasins, as in duty bound.

The discovery of this wonderful little thing that contained so many faces, added to the veneration of these simple people for our hero. The great Tobacco-bag hesitated no longer about giving him his daughter, and adopting him for his son and successor. But previous to this grand ceremony, it became necessary to consult the old women, who among the tribes of the Rocky Mountains dream all the dreams, and decide on all questions of public interest. They are the most wonderful old ladies in the world, for they will sit three whole days perfectly silent, before they deliver their opinions.

After due deliberation the old ladies decided that, according to immemorial custom, ever since the great comet with a great beard came out of the earth, dragging their great ancestor, the great field-mouse, by his tail, no man could be adopted into the tribe without first having his beard pulled out by the roots, so that it should never grow again, to give offence to the great comet, which was justly entitled to a monopoly of all the beards in the universe. These cunning old baggages thought that by this decision they would each have a chance of getting a few hairs of the great medicine, to wit, the whiskers of the renowned traveller, Hyacinth Primrose. The old men were also, no doubt, influenced by a secret wish of this kind, and the decision was unanimous against the whiskers.

It is impossible to describe the indignation of our hero, when he heard of this confiscation of the honors of his muzzel. He swore that he would see the Tobacco-bag, the Little Otter, and the great comet with a great beard, and the great field-mouse hanging by his tail, at the d—l, before they should touch a hair of his beard. Nor was the horror of Pierre Fuzee a whit inferior to the rage of his master. He muttered an olla podrida of imprecations, half French, half Spanish, half English, and half Indian—for it took four halves to make up such a diabolical whole—that would have made the very beards of a forest of live oak stand on end, had they, peradventure, heard him. He held the whiskers of our hero to be the greatest medicine in the world, and like a faithful retainer, took no little share of their honors and dignity to himself. He did not fail to blacken his muzzel every morning with burnt wood; but the Indians easily distinguished between this paltry imitation and the original whiskers of his illustrious master.

The expostulations of Hyacinth and his faithful squire were vain. They might have sworn till the Rocky Mountains echoed with their swearing—the old women were determined to get possession of a few hairs of the great medicine, but how to disforest the phiz of our hero was the question. Such was their awe of the possessor of the mighty whiskers, that the stoutest warriors shrunk from committing the sacrilege of even touching them without his consent. They sent the Little Otter, like another Delilah, to cheat our hero out of his beard and his supernatural powers; but that little traitress did nothing but tickle her nose with his whiskers, and laugh like an innocent child, to see how it made her sneeze. She then, after amusing herself sometime in this way till she was tired, told him what she came for; and instead of trying to induce him quietly to resign his honors, insinuated to him to run away with her to the white people, and make her his wife. Pierre Fuzee joined his entreaties, and our hero consented, if they could find an opportunity, for he swore they should have his life sooner than his whiskers.

The Little Otter was accordingly instructed to tell the old women that the great Ouskinicki Minichick had promised to submit to the disforesting, (that was the phrase of these simple people,) provided they would permit him to do it in his own way. In the first place they must pitch him a tent by itself, at some distance towards the sources of the river Platte, and leave him alone with his servant, Pierre Fuzee, with a supply of provisions for seven days; that they must neither come that way or look that way, if they wished to raise any pumpkins or kill any buffaloes all the rest of their lives. They might come on the eighth night, and by that time the Ouskinicki Minichick's face would be as bare of whiskers as the great snowy summit of the mountain was of trees.

The old women unanimously assented to this arrangement; the lodge was erected, the provisions deposited, and the Ouskinicki Minichick shut up with his faithful squire, Pierre Fuzee. That very night, so soon as it was dark, the Little Otter stole from her lair, and joined them. They lost not a moment, all things being previously prepared, in departing with all speed towards the sources of the Platte, which they reached on the second day; and proceeding along the banks of that stream were at length fortunate enough to meet the very party of traders which had accompanied our hero as far as the Loup Fork.

In the mean time the seven days had expired, and every soul of the tribe was so completely absorbed in the subject of the great medicine, that nobody missed the Little Otter; or if they did, nobody thought of inquiring after her. At length the eighth day arrived, and it was midnight. The whole tribe, with the old women at their head, proceeded to the solitary lodge, and knocked at the door, with fear and trembling. No one answered. They knocked again, and still no answer. At length the Tobacco-bag began to be somewhat impatient, and the old ladies mighty curious. After trying a third knock in vain, they proceeded, in fear and silence, to remove the simple fastenings. All within was dark as pitch, and silent as the grave. After some little hesitation, the Tobacco-bag, accompanied by the oldest of the old women, entered, and groping about came in contact with the skin of a buffalo's head, which had been left there in lieu of the invaluable whiskers of our hero. "The great medicine! the great medicine!" exclaimed the great Tobacco-bag, in triumph; and "the great medicine!" shouted they all together.

Anxious to divide the treasure, and to thank the illustrious giver, they lighted a pine knot and proceeded to examine the prize. It was some time before they could distinguish the Buffalo's head from the muzzel of our hero, and had it not been for the horns, the thing would have been almost impossible. When, however, they at last discovered the cheat, and that both Hyacinth and his squire were non est, their rage and mortification were terrible. Instead of being silent three days, the old women talked three days without stopping, and all together; and the Tobacco-bag, with his warriors, on missing the Little Otter, which they did the next morning, concluding they had all three gone off together, determined on a vigorous pursuit.

The Indians of this part of the continent all ride on horses, the breed of which was originally derived from Mexico. They travel like the wind, and unfortunately the party which our hero had joined had but few horses, and those jaded by a long journey.—While sitting at supper one evening around a fire, they were roused by a terrible yell. It was the party of the Tobacco-bag, and so much more numerous than that of the traders, that it was in vain to think of resistance in case of an attack. The Tobacco-bag, however, being still in awe of the whiskers, contented himself with demanding the three fugitives, relating, at the same time, the history of our hero and the great medicine. A thought struck the captain of the trading party, a shrewd old backwoodsman, who knew the Indian character perfectly. He entered forthwith into a negotiation with the Tobacco-bag, who agreed, after consulting with his warriors, that if the Ouskinicki Minichick would comply with his agreement, and bestow upon them the great medicine, he might go where he pleased, and marry his daughter, the Little Otter.

Sore was the dilemma, and terrible the conflict of doubts in the bosom of Hyacinth Primrose. To lose his whiskers which he had been cultivating with such parental care, whose young ideas he had taught to shoot—the delight of his soul and the ornament of his existence! It was too bad—it was impossible—better lose his life—better lose his wife—better be nothing than an unwhiskered man. But when he turned to the Little Otter, and saw her deer eyes swimming in tears, and thought what a kind friend and mistress she had been, what a pretty wife she would be, and what a figure he should cut in Paris with a princess for a bride, his stubborn resolve gave way, and with a mighty effort he consented—yes, he consented to be shaven! The feat was performed by Pierre Fuzee, who managed to pocket some scores of the sacred hairs, unseen by the Indians, who received the great medicine in triumph, dashed away over the vast plains towards their snow-clad mountains with a speed that outstripped the sight of the eye, and disappeared like shadows in the distant horizon. Upon the strength of the possession of this great medicine, which was distributed among the tribe, they became extremely arrogant and presumptuous—quarrelled with all their neighbors, and got many a sound drubbing. But they never lost their confidence in the great medicine, and the miraculous whiskers still continued to be cherished as the most valuable of all their possessions.

On arriving at St. Louis, our hero, like a man of honor, married the Little Otter, and after some time spent in vainly attempting to recruit his whiskers, returned to Paris with Pierre Fuzee, who, seeing so many muzzles a-la-bison in that renowned city, lost all faith in the great medicine.

"By all the saints whose names I know or don't know," quoth Pierre, "I believe my master's whiskers are no better than a buffalo's."

The Little Otter was received at court with much distinction, having proved her descent from the great Tobacco-bag, who was descended from the great Field-mouse, which hung at the tail of the great comet with a great beard; and our hero had the satisfaction of astonishing the savans with some exceeding tough stories about the Rocky Mountains. He was never afterwards flouted for not knowing any thing about his own country.

But his whiskers? The great medicine? Alas! the primitive energies of the soil had been exhausted in producing the first crop, and they never grew again!

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

CURIOUS ANECDOTE.

Extract from the journal of a nobleman.

In a gloomy day in the month of November, a traveller on horseback stopped at the door of an inn, in the village of Rouelle, which adjoins the park of Malmaison. The hostess went out to receive him, and having given his horse to the stable-boy, he ordered dinner. He was shown into the best room in the house, and the busy hostess set about preparing the repast. In a few minutes another traveller, on horseback, stopped at the inn and also ordered dinner. "I am very sorry that I cannot accommodate you, sir," said the hostess; "but every thing we have in the house has been bespoke by a gentleman who arrived a few minutes before you." "Go up stairs," said the traveller, and tell your guest I shall be obliged to him if he will permit me to share his dinner, and I will defray my portion of the expense." The hostess delivered the message to the first traveller, who politely replied, "Tell the gentleman I shall be glad of his company, but that it is not my practice to accept payment from persons whom I invite to dine with me." The second traveller accordingly went up stairs, and having expressed his acknowledgments for the kind reception he had received, they both sat down to the table.

The dinner was as cheerful as could be expected, considering the short acquaintance of the parties; but during the dessert, when some excellent wine was placed before them, the conversation became more unrestrained, and the second traveller ventured to ask his obliging Amphitryon what had brought him to that part of the country, where he appeared to be a stranger? "I have been ordered here," he replied, "by the cardinal." "By the cardinal?" resumed his companion. "Pardon my curiosity, sir, if I inquire whether you have given his eminence any offence?" "By no means," replied the first traveller; "and it is only to free myself from any such imputation that I have come here. The fact is, there have been published at Rochelle, my native town, a virulent satire upon the public conduct and personal character of the cardinal, several copies of which have been addressed to the king, and though I never in my life wrote a single word that has appeared in print, I am unjustly accused of being the author of this pamphlet. Nothing obtains such ready relief as the whisperings of folly and ill-nature; and I have therefore lost no time in obeying the summons of his eminence, in the hope of effectually refuting the charge that is brought against me." "Sir," said his companion, with an expression of marked anxiety, "return thanks to Providence for the fortunate accident that introduced me to you to-day. I also have been summoned hither by the cardinal, and for no other purpose, I am convinced, than that of beheading you." A thrill of horror passed through the frame of the person to whom these words were addressed. "Yes, sir," resumed the speaker, "my task would have been to behead you. I am the executioner of a neighboring town, and whenever the cardinal has any secret act of vengeance to perform, I receive orders to repair to the castle. The particulars I have just heard you relate, together with the hour of your appointment here, all convince me beyond a doubt, that you are marked out as a victim. But fear nothing, I will secure your escape. Order your horse instantly and go with me. I will acquit myself of the debt of gratitude which your courtesy has imposed upon me."

The horror and alarm of the poor traveller may be more easily conceived than described. He instantly ordered the horses to be saddled, and having paid the bill, he and his companion set out, taking a private way through the wood of Bertrand. "Do you see," said the guide, as they approached the castle, "that grated window which almost reaches the crannies of the central turret? In that dungeon, sentences against which there is no appeal, are pronounced and executed, and the mutilated bodies of the victims are hurried into the moat below, where they are speedily destroyed by quick lime. Neglect not to observe my instructions. Conceal yourself behind that hedge, and if within the space of an hour you see a light glimmering at the window which I have pointed out, then you may conclude that I am ordered here to execute vengeance upon another; but if, on the contrary, you see no light, rely on it that you yourself are the intended victim. In that case, lose not a moment. Profit by the darkness of the night and the swiftness of your horse. Gain the frontier and there plead your cause as you think fit. But permit me to tell you, that it is absurd to seek to justify yourself against the imputation of an offence which you have not committed; for, where despotism reigns, truth and justice are powerless."

Having expressed unbounded gratitude to his tutelar saint, the traveller withdrew to his hiding-place. The suspicions of the cardinal's agent proved well founded. No light appeared at the window of the turret; and at the expiration of an hour the traveller galloped off. He immediately quitted France, and did not venture back until after the death of the cardinal.

On returning to his native country, his first business was to visit the inn of Rouelle, and to make inquiries respecting his benefactor, who, however, had not been heard of for several years. He then related his adventure, which has since become a local tradition, and has conferred celebrity on the inn of Rouelle, known by the sign of the Cheval Blanc. The room in which the two travellers dined is shown to this day, and is called la salle de bon secours.

THE VILLAGE GARRISON.

It happened in the course of the thirty years war, that Gonsalvo de Gordeva, who commanded the Spanish troops, then overrunning the Palatinate, found it necessary to possess himself of a little walled village, called Ogersheim, that lay in his way. On the first intelligence of his approach all the inhabitants fled to Mannheim; and when Gonsalvo at length drew near, and summoned the place to surrender, there remained within the walls only a poor shepherd and his wife, the latter of whom, having that morning brought a little infant into this world of misery, was unable to leave her bed, and her husband of course staid with her.

The anxiety and distress of the poor man may be more easily conceived than described. Fortunately, however, he possessed both courage and shrewdness; and on the spur of the moment bethought himself of a scheme for escape, which, after embracing them both, he hastened to put into execution.

The inhabitants having run off in a tremendous hurry, had left almost all their property at his disposal; so he had no difficulty in finding what was requisite for his purpose, viz. a complete change of dress. Having first arranged his lower man in military guise, he tossed away his shepherd's hat, which he replaced with a huge helmet, "a world too wide;" he buckled a long sword to his side, threw a goodly cloak over his shoulders, stuck two enormous pistols in his belt, and putting on boots, so thick in the soles and high in the heels that they lifted him about half a foot from the ground; he fastened to them a prodigious pair of jingling spurs, which were the fashion of the time. Thus accoutred, he forthwith betook himself to the walls, and leaning with a pompous air on his sword, he listened coolly to the herald, who advanced to summon the village to surrender.

"Friend," said our hero, as soon as the herald had concluded his speech, "tell your commander that though I have not yet made up my mind to surrender at all, I may possibly be induced to do so, provided he agrees to the three following conditions, in which I shall make no abatement whatever:—first, the garrison must be allowed to march out with military honors; second, the lives and property of the inhabitants must be protected; third, they must be allowed the free exercise of the protestant religion."

The herald immediately replied, that such preposterous conditions could not for a moment be listened to; and added, that the garrison was known to be weak, and concluded by again demanding the instant surrender of the place.

"My good friend," answered the shepherd, "do not be too rash. I advise you to inform your general from me, that nothing but my desire to avoid bloodshed could make me think of surrendering on any terms whatever; and please to add, that if he does not choose to agree to those I have stated, he will gain possession of the town only at the point of the sword; for I swear to you by the faith of an honest man and of a christian, as well as by the honor of a gentleman, that the garrison has lately received a reinforcement he little dreams of."

So saying the shepherd lighted his pipe, and puffed away with an air of the most consummate nonchalance. Confounded by this appearance of boldness and security, the herald thought it prudent to return, and state to Gonsalvo the demands which had been made. The Spanish general, deceived by this show of resistance, and being unwilling to waste either men or time in reducing this paltry town, resolved to agree to the conditions offered, and followed by his troops, approached the gates. This lenient determination was announced by the herald to the shepherd, who only vouchsafed to say in reply, "I find your commander is a man of some sense." He then left the walls, let down the draw-bridge, deliberately opened the gates, and allowed the Spanish troops to pour into the town. Surprised at seeing no one in the streets but a strange looking fellow, whose caricature of a military costume hung upon him like patchwork, Gonsalvo began to suspect treachery, and seizing the shepherd, demanded to know where the garrison was.

"If your highness will follow me I will show you," answered the rustic.

"Keep by my stirrup, then," exclaimed Gonsalvo, "and on the least symptom that you mean to betray me, I shall send a bullet through your heart."

"Agreed," said our friend. "Follow me, Spaniards! for I swear by the word of an honest man and a christian, as well as by the honor of a gentleman, that the garrison will offer you no injury."

He then placed himself by Gonsalvo's stirrup, and followed by the troops, passed through several silent and deserted streets, till at length, turning into a narrow lane, he stopped before a mean-looking house, and having prevailed on Gonsalvo to enter, he led him into a small room, where lay his wife, and her little boy beside her.

"Noble general," said he, pointing to the former, "this is our garrison; and this," he added, taking his son in his arms, "is the reinforcement of which I told you."

Aware now of the real state of matters, the absurdity and cleverness of the trick, moved even Spanish gravity, and Gonsalvo gave free course to his mirth. Then taking off a rich gold chain, which decorated his own person, he passed it round the neck of the infant.

"Permit me to offer this mark of my esteem," he said good-naturedly, "for the valiant garrison of Ogersheim. By the hand of a soldier, I envy you the possession of such a reinforcement; and you must let me present you with a purse of gold, for the use of the young recruit."

He then stooped down and kissed the delighted mother and her boy, and quitted the house, leaving the shepherd to boast, for many a summer day and winter night, of the success of his stratagem.

Anecdotes of Thirty Years' War.

EXTRACT FROM A LATE DISCOURSE.

The worship of some divinity is coeval and connatural with the existence of man. Wherever the light of the sun has shone—wherever the beauties and the glories and wonders of creation have been seen, the footsteps of a God have been traced, and observing man has recognized the handy work of a divinity. Go to the rudest and most uncultivated age of man; visit the most barbarous climes that have ever been explored, where the dim light of nature alone had been seen—where the illuminations of science and the sun of supernatural revelation had never shone—where the temple for public worship had never been reared—nor the pious anthems of a cultivated and chastened devotion ever ascended—or on the green banks of the gentle meandering Euphrates, or by the side of the dark rolling Ganges, or along the stealthy waters and sultry clime of the Niger, or amid the polar regions of the North, or far to the west, where the red savage pursues the bounding game along the wooded banks of Columbia—there you will find the impress of the deity enstamped on his offspring, and the child looking around for its father.

And, though rude may be his manners and crude his conceptions, there will you find him prostrating himself in adoration, or in some form or other paying religious homage to a power which, though unseen, is felt to be above and around him. He knows that he has a being, that he had a beginning, that he did not create himself, and hence, that there is a power, a being, prior and superior to himself. And according to his conceptions of the nature and character of that being, will be his feelings and acts of devotion and religious homage.

We can see the tokens of his goodness, and read in letters of gold his boundless love in all the vast range of creation. We behold them in the mechanism of nature, in the heaving tides of the ocean, in the lofty mountains and wide spread valleys of the earth, in the beauties of the landscape, the gurgling fountains of water, the fragrance of the air, the flowery decorations of spring, the green and luxuriant summer, the rich golden harvest of autumn, and the white robes of winter—in the golden beams of the noon-tide sun, in the silver rays of night's gentle queen, in the star-spangled firmament of evening, in which the Father of mercies seems to look down upon us with myriads of sparkling eyes of love. They are alike visible in the nice gradation of being, from the groveling reptile to the burning seraph, in the subserviency of all to each, and each to all, while man holds the middle grade and forms the connecting link by which, though bound to earth and inferior objects, for a season, he is indissolubly linked to angels and to God, by the intellectual powers and faculties with which he is endowed.

THE POLISH LADIES.

Who would not feel an affection for Poland, the Poles, and, above all, the Polish women? Who would not admire the wit and courage of the men, and the grace and beauty of the women? The manners of the Polish ladies are more exquisitely fascinating than those of all others. To prefer another city to Warsaw is impossible. There you find the most refined ton of Paris allied with oriental manners, the good taste of Europe and the magnificence of Asia united, the politeness of the most civilized society, with the plain, unaffected hospitality of barbarous nations. Who would not admire a people whose external appearance is universally noble or prepossessing? and whose manners, though plain and unassuming, are polite and cordial? In the cities you meet with good breeding and urbanity every where, and in the country good-natured roughness prevails. The comprehension of the Poles is quick, their conversation light and agreeable, and their education has made them possessors of every talent. They have the gift of languages, are deeply read in general literature, eloquent and accomplished. Their taste in every thing is highly cultivated; they are admirers of the fine arts, passionately fond of state, private theatricals, and of their national dancing. Their dress is original; some of their customs extraordinary; their style of living magnificent. They are good and open-hearted, and ever gratefully inclined.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Journal of a Naturalist. 12mo. p. 286. Philadelphia. Carey and Lea. 1831.

This publication is at once delightful and instructive. It contains a mass of interesting and valuable facts, conveyed in a chaste and unpretending style. The reader accustomed to study nature, will be gratified and enlightened by the intelligent suggestions of the author, while he, unused to seek amusement from such a source, will be agreeably surprised to find what a charm, what an importance can be shed around common things. Science, in so many ages, has been locked up in dead languages, or concealed in shady cloisters, that we are pleased with the spirit of the age which strips her of pomp and mystery, and makes her familiar to the ordinary understanding. It would be both honorable and advantageous to us as a nation, if this volume, and others of a similar description, were to be found in every family.

The author informs the reader, that he resides upon a "very ancient road," connecting the city of Bristol with that of Gloucester; and without any attempt to make us swallow his moral wrapped up in sweet fiction, he proceeds at once to communicate his ideas upon various subjects. You feel yourself walking abroad through nature with an intelligent man, who points out many beauties which without him you would not have discerned, and offers explanations upon topics with which you were before unacquainted.

Perhaps there is no plant more frequently resorted to in poetry, for the sake of its striking and mournful imagery, than the ivy. It is introduced with equal effect into painting. Among the numerous objects which occupy our author's attention, this has not escaped him. The following are his remarks:

"The ivy, (hedera helix) the dark-looking ivy, almost covers with its thick foliage the pollards in our hedgerows; and, creeping up the sides of the old barn, and chimney of the cottage, nearly hides them from our sight; affording a sheltered roosting-place to many poor birds, and is almost their only refuge in the cold season of the year. But the ivy can boast of much more extensive service to the poor wayfarer beings of creation than the merely affording them a covering from the winds of winter. Those two extreme quarters of our year, autumn and spring, yield to most animals but a very slender and precarious supply of food; but the ivy in those periods saves many from want and death; and the peculiar situations, in which it prefers to flourish, are essential to the preservation of this supply, as in less sheltered ones it would be destroyed. In the month of October the ivy blooms in profusion, and spreading over the warm side of some neglected wall, or the sunny bark of the broad ash on the bank, its flowers become a universal banquet to the insect race. The great black fly (musca grossa) and its numerous tribe, with multitudes of small winged creatures, resort to them; and there we see those beautiful animals, the latest birth of the year, the admiral (vanessa atalanta) and peacock (vanessa io) butterflies, hanging with expanded wings like open flowers themselves, enjoying the sunny gleam, and feeding on the sweet liquor that distils from the nectary of this plant. As this honey is produced in succession by the early or later expansion of the bud, it yields a constant supply of food, till the frosts of November destroy the insects, or drive them to their winter retreats. Spring arrives; and in the bitter months of March, April, and even May, at times, when the wild products of the field are nearly consumed, the ivy ripens its berries, and then almost entirely constitutes the food of the missel thrush, wood-pigeon, and some other birds; and now these shy and wary birds, that commonly avoid the haunts of man, constrained by hunger, will approach our dwellings to feed upon the ripe berries of the ivy. Now too the blackbird and the thrush resort to its cover to conceal their nests. These early-building birds find little foliage at this period sufficient to hide their habitations; and did not the ivy lend its aid to preserve them, and no great number are preserved, perhaps few nests would be hidden from the young eyes that seek them. The early expansion of the catkins of the willow (salix caprea) and others of the willow tribe, whence the bee extracts its first food, and the late blooming of this ivy, are indispensable provisions for the existence of many of the insect race; the 'young raven does not cry in vain,' nor is any thing abandoned by that power which called it into being.

"We all seem to love the ivy, 'The wanton ivy wreathed in amorous twines,' more than any other uncultured evergreen that we possess; yet it is difficult satisfactorily to answer why we have this regard for it. As a lover of the lone, the ivy-mantled ruin, I have often questioned with myself the cause and basis of my regard for that, which was but a fragment of what might have been formerly splendid, and intrinsically possessed but little to engage admiration, yet wreathed in the verdure of the ivy, was admired; but was never satisfied, perhaps unwilling to admit the answer that my mind seemed to give. The ivy is a dependent plant, and delights in waste and ruin. We do not often tolerate its growth when the building is in repair and perfect; but, if time dilapidate the edifice, the ivy takes possession of the fragment, and we call it beautiful; it adorns the castle, but is an indispensable requisite to the remains of the monastic pile. There is an abbey in the north of England, which has been venerated by all its late possessors. It is trimmed, made neat, and looks, perhaps, much as it did formerly, except being in ruins. The situation is exquisite, the remains are splendid, yet with many it fails to excite such interest as it should do. It is a bare reality. A ruin in the west of England once interested me greatly. The design of re-visiting and drawing it was expressed at the time. A few days only elapsed; but the inhabitant of a neighboring cottage had most kindly labored hard in the interval, and pulled down 'all the nasty ivy, that the gentleman might see the ruin.' He did see it, but every charm had departed. These two instances, from many that might be advanced, manifest that ivy most frequently gives to these ancient edifices the idea of beauty, and contributes chiefly to influence our feelings when viewing them. The ruins of a fortress, or warlike tower, may often historically interest us from the renown of its founder or its possessor, some scene transacted, some villain punished, hero triumphant, or cause promoted, to which we wished success: but the quiet, secluded, monastic cell, or chapel, has no tale to tell; history hardly stays to note even its founder's name, and all the rest is doubt and darkness; yet, shrouded in its ivied folds, we reverence the remains, we call it picturesque, we draw, we engrave, we lithograph the ruin. We do not regard this ivy as a relic of ancient days, as having shadowed the religious recluse, and with it often, doubtless, piety and faith; for it did not hang around the building in old time, but is comparatively a modern upstart, a sharer of monastic spoils, a usurper of that which has been abandoned by another. The tendril pendent from the orient window, lightly defined in the ray which it excludes, twining with graceful ease round some slender shaft, or woven amid the tracery of the florid arch, is elegantly ornamental, and gives embellishment to beauty; but the main body of the ivy is dark, sombre, massy; yet, strip it from the pile, and we call it sacrilege, the interest of the whole is at an end, the effect ceases—

'One moment seen, then lost for ever.'

Yet what did the ivy effect? what has departed with it? This evanescent charm perhaps consists in the obscurity, in the sobriety of light it occasioned, in hiding the bare reality, and giving to fancy and imagination room to expand, a plaything to amuse them."

We copy the subjoined for the moral it conveys. It is imbued with a portion of that spirit of universal benevolence, which should enter into every character; and, in affording details useful and curious to the naturalist, it puts to flight a whole host of prejudices which too frequently find their way into the minds of those, whom but for them, both nature and education would teach to shrink from cruelty:

"Notwithstanding all the persecutions from prejudice and wantonness to which the hedgehog (erinaceus europæus) is exposed, it is yet common with us; sleeping by day in a bed of leaves and moss, under the cover of a very thick bramble or furze-bush, and at times in some hollow stump of a tree. It creeps out in the summer evenings; and, running about with more agility than its dull appearance promises, feeds on dew-worms and beetles, which it finds among the herbage, but retires with trepidation at the approach of man. In the autumn, crabs, haws, and the common fruits of the hedge, constitute its diet. In the winter, covering itself deeply in moss and leaves, it sleeps during the severe weather; and, when drawn out from its bed, scarcely any thing of the creature is to be observed, it exhibiting only a ball of leaves, which it seems to attach to its spines by repeatedly rolling itself round in its nest. Thus comfortably invested, it suffers little from the season. Some strong smell must proceed from this animal, as we find it frequently with our sporting dogs, even in this state; and every village-boy with his cur detects the haunts of the poor hedgehog, and as assuredly worries and kills him. Killing every thing and cruelty are the common vices of the ignorant; and unrestrained innocence becomes a ready victim to prejudice or power. The snake, the blindworm, and the toad, are all indiscriminately destroyed as venomous animals whenever found; and it is well for the last-mentioned poor animal, which, Boyle says, 'lives on poison, and is all venom,' if prolonged sufferings do not finish its being; but even we, who should know better, yet give rewards for the wretched urchin's head! that very ancient prejudice of its drawing milk from the udders of resting cows being still entertained, without any consideration of its impracticability from the smallness of the hedgehog's mouth; and so deeply is this character associated with its name, that we believe no argument would persuade to the contrary, or remonstrance avail with our idle boys, to spare the life of this most harmless and least obtrusive creature in existence.

"If we were to detail the worst propensities of man, disgusting as they might be, yet the one most eminently offensive would be, cruelty—a compound of tyranny, ingratitude, and pride; tyranny, because there is the power—ingratitude, for the most harmless and serviceable are usually the object—pride, to manifest a contempt of the weakness of humanity. There is no one creature, whose services Providence has assigned to man, that contributes more to his wants, is more conducive to his comforts, than the horse; nor is there one which is subjected to more afflictions than this his faithful servant. The ass, probably, and happily, is not a very sensitive animal; but the poor horse no sooner becomes the property of man in the lower walks of life, than he commonly has his ears shorn off; his knees are broken, his wind is broken, his body is starved, and his eyes —!! I fear, in these grades of society mercy is only known by the name of cowardice, and compassion designated simplicity and effeminacy; and so we become cruel, and consider it as valiance and manliness. Cruelty is a vice repeatedly marked in scripture as repugnant to the prime attributes of our Maker, 'because he delighteth in mercy.' One of the three requisites necessary for man to obtain the favor of heaven, and which was of more avail than sacrifice and oblation, was that of 'showing mercy'; and He, who has left us so many examples in a life of compassion and pity, hath most strongly enforced this virtue by assuring us, that the 'merciful are blessed, for they will obtain mercy.'"

One more extract, and we leave this sensible work to the care of the public, without doubting for a moment that it will be properly appreciated:

"Man from the earliest periods began to subject the animal world to his dominion, and avail himself of its properties and powers to improve his own condition. As his wants or propensities occurred, he compelled to his aid such animals as he could subdue, or were adapted to his purposes. The chief objects for which we require the aid of animals, are for food, clothing, vigilance, and strength. Though the two former are highly essential to our comfort, they are not indispensable; the vegetable world supplies them in abundance to large portions of the inhabitants of the globe, and the companionable qualities, watchfulness, and swiftness of the dog might be dispensed with. It is the strength of animals that makes us sensible of our own weakness. By their power we build our dwellings, effect an intercourse with distant places, obtain much of our food, and the fuel of our hearths: a state of civilization requires, as an indispensable requisite, these things and others, rendering most manifest our obligations to the animal world. Animals were created before man; but some of them were apparently endowed with their useful and valuable properties for his comfort and assistance; for he had the dominion of them consigned to him, and was commissioned to subdue them. Having used their products for food and clothing, conjointly with the fruits and seeds of the vegetable world, and their bodies for the carriage of his burdens, after a long age of abstinence he began to feed on their flesh; and they have continued his faithful and assiduous servants, contented with their destiny, and submissive to his desires. He gives them food and shelter in payment of service, attending them with diligence and care: all this may be for his own emolument and pleasure, yet the well-being of the creature, had it continued wild, would not have required it: most of them live longer, and have more enjoyment in a wild and unreclaimed state, than when domesticated with him. By art, and for profit, he has in many instances altered the very nature of the animal, and created ailments, rendering his cares and attentions necessary, which in a state of nature are not required. The lives of many of them, even when subjected to the best of treatment, are consumed with labor and fatigue: and when their unhappy destiny consigns them to the power of poverty and evil passions, what an accumulation of misery and suffering do these wretched creatures undergo! If these arguments have any foundation in truth, it will appear, that animals are not necessarily dependent on man, and generally derive no benefit from their intercourse and association with him; but that, in conformity with original appointment, they aid him to acquire the enjoyments and accomplish the necessities of civilized life. Yet there is one creature, that seems designed by its natural habits to be the servant and dependent of man; and of all that fall under his dominion, not one receives an equal portion of his care, or is more exempt from a life of exhaustion in his service. The dog is fed with him, housed, and caressed; associates with him in his pleasures, is identified with and enjoys them with his master; living with him, he acquires the high bearing and freedom of his lord; feels he is the companion and the friend; deports himself as a partaker of the importance and superiority, we might almost say of the sorrows and pleasures of the man; is elated with praise, and abased by rebuke; submissive when corrected, and grateful when caressed: his anxiety and tremor when he has lost his master, and with him himself, is pitiable: when deserted by his lord, he becomes the most forlorn of animals, a never-failing victim to misery, famine, disease, and death. His ardor may excite him at times until overpowered by fatigue; but he is not generally stimulated by pain or menace to attempts beyond his natural powers: view him in all his progress, his life will be found to be an easy, and frequently an enjoyable one; and though not exempt from the afflictions of age, yet his death, if anticipated, becomes a momentary evil. When in a native state, he is a wretched creature, a common beast of the wild, with no innate magnanimity, no acquired virtues; has no elevation, no character to maintain, but passes his days in contention and want, is base in disposition, meager in body, a fugitive, and a coward."

The Cabinet History of England, Scotland, and Ireland. By the Right Hon. Sir James Mackintosh, M. P., Sir Walter Scott, Bart. and Thomas Moore, Esq. England. Vol. II. Philadelphia. 12mo. pp. 314. Carey & Lea. 1831.

The present volume of this publication embraces the history of England, from the reign of Henry the Sixth to the death of queen Mary. The accomplished compiler stands among the first candidates for literary renown; and his name, combined with those of Sir Walter Scott and Mr. Moore, is a sufficient pledge for the sterling merit of the Cabinet History, and affords assurances which the second volume of "England" has not disappointed. He has skillfully effected the difficult task of compressing the narrative of important events within a comparatively narrow compass, without injuring their force and general arrangement. His style is clear and rapid. Many will, doubtless, peruse this production, and thereby acquire useful information, who would have failed to undertake more elaborate works. In presenting history in a simple and attractive form, the author has rendered a service to the reading community, especially to that portion whose avocations do not allow them leisure for systematic study, and consequently to the cause of learning.

A stereotype edition of this work has just been issued. It is neatly printed and bound, and will no doubt meet with encouragement from a respectable class of the community.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Conversations of the week.—The information by a late arrival from Liverpool that the French government will be required to take a more decided part in behalf of the Poles than it has hitherto done, gives their affairs an encouraging aspect, which could not have been anticipated so soon after their late reverses.

There is a strong and universal desire here to offer assistance to these brave people, struggling against tyrants; but, as it is impossible for us to extend our aid to them, it would be well for all who experience a sincere wish to ameliorate the condition of their fellow-creatures, to examine into the distresses which they can relieve. We allude now to the exertions which the poor and hard-working women of our own country, of our own city, are making, to place themselves in the way of honestly obtaining a necessary support. They are goaded on to this by absolute want; and there is a degree of inconsistency in our high-flown strain of pity for people on the other side of the globe, coupled as it has been with such an apathy respecting the miseries of thousands immediately around us, and which might be remedied without either difficulty or danger. Should the Russian government abduct the poorest vagabond who calls himself an American citizen, the nation would fall into a frenzy; but we go on with our theatres and celebrations, our plans and our pleasures with perfect composure, as long as our citizens are only destitute of death in the streets, or driven to such a degree of destitution as to be precipitated, however reluctantly, into the most abandoned means of obtaining a livelihood. Mr. Mathew Carey is entitled to the gratitude of all good men, as well as the respect of the intelligent classes, for the sensible and arduous endeavors with which he has striven for the benefit of the unfortunate and virtuous female laborers. These friendless women have had several meetings, in the course of which they decided that they could not accept of the prices offered them by the clothiers. The Daily Sentinel states that the clothiers have threatened that if their terms are not acceded to, they will make no further efforts in favor of the women who have resolved that they will contend for their own prices. We are well aware that this question of combinations is a delicate one, and in general is justly considered as highly reprehensible; but it is not to be supposed that these females will contentedly starve to death from respect to an abstract principle of political economy. We observe that they have appointed a committee to receive donations, and to apply them to the relief of the most needy. This is an inefficient and precarious method of assistance, and can be but temporary. The subject is not one which admits of legislation, and must be, therefore, submitted to the tribunal of public opinion, which, if once aroused, will be amply sufficient to decide the question justly and permanently. Let the tailors, therefore, as has been suggested, "publish the names of those merchant tailors and clothiers who give full prices, in order that those friendly to their cause may know where to bestow their patronage; and it is strongly urged that they lose no time in establishing a store under suitable management where they may receive work themselves."

A general sensation has been excited by the recent discovery of a part of the jewels supposed to have been stolen at the palace of the prince of Orange, in Brussels, on the ninth of September, 1829, and for which was offered a reward of fifty thousand guilders. Mr. Swartwout, one of the most prompt and indefatigable officers under the general government, deserves every praise for his attention to his duties on this occasion. The value of all the trinkets lost is about a million. The amount recovered from the Italian, Carrara, is estimated at a hundred thousand, besides about five thousand dollars in money. It is presumed that a part of the jewels are concealed in Brussels. The others were smuggled into France and thence into this city. Carrara was assisted, it is said, in his designs by a Frenchman, who here betrayed him. He was accustomed to wear many of the valuable jewels on his person, and the probability is that a number of them have been disposed of in this city. The officers of the customs, unacquainted with the great value of the property, or with the fact that it was stolen, allowed the criminal to escape. His arrest, at ten o'clock on Saturday night, at Brooklyn, was principally owing to the perseverance and courage of Mr. Seely, who leaped after him into a ditch, and there secured him till the police-officers approached. The goods having been smuggled into this port, are forfeited by law, and before they can be delivered to their rightful owner, it will be necessary for congress to pass a special act for that purpose. It is wonderful how the thieves evaded the vigilance of the European police, and by what cunning management the property was embezzled, and conveyed so secretly from the prince's household and dominions. We may look for developments of a very interesting nature upon this subject.

A procession, consisting of a military escort, the great body of our fellow-citizens, the clergy, the directors of the Bible Society, the Cincinnati, judges, the corporation, &c. &c. followed the remains of our venerable and respected fellow-citizen, Col. Richard Varick, to the New-York Marble Cemetery, on Tuesday. We offer a brief sketch of the life of this brave soldier, this faithful patriot, and excellent man. He was born about the year 1752, and has a claim upon the grateful recollection of his fellow-citizens for his fidelity and courage both in military and civil stations. He tendered his services to the late Major General Schuyler, then commanding the northern army, and was appointed his military secretary in 1776, immediately after the declaration of independence. In February 1777, he was named by congress deputy commissary general of musters for the northern army, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He was present at the memorable battles of Stillwater and Saratoga, (nineteenth of September and seventh of October 1777) and with others reaped the reward of those actions, in the surrender of the British army under the command of General Burgoyne to General Gates on the sixteenth day of October of the same year. He was afterwards stationed at West Point, and performed the duties of inspector-general of the troops at that post and its vicinity until after the treason of General Arnold, to whose family he was for some time attached as aid-de-camp. After Arnold's desertion, Col. Varick was appointed recording secretary to General Washington, in which capacity, with great honor to himself, he remained until nearly the close of the war. After the evacuation of New-York by the British troops on the twenty-fifth of November 1783, and the restoration of the civil government of the state, he held the office of recorder of this city, and subsequently of mayor—the latter for many years. On the fourth of July 1806, he was chosen president of the State Society of the Cincinnati, and has been re-elected ever since.

Selected poetry.—We take this occasion to acknowledge the politeness of a correspondent in sending us the subjoined selections. The first, from the United States Gazette, is spirited and worth preserving. The second is also good; but our friend has omitted to name the publication in which it originally appeared. We regret this, as every thing worth copying should be ascribed to its proper source.

THE FLAG OF THE WEST.

Ne'er waved beneath the golden sun
A lovelier banner for the brave,
Than that our bleeding fathers won,
And proudly to their children gave!
Not earth a fairer gem can bring,
Or freedom claim a brighter scroll
Than that to which our free hearts cling—
The flag that lights the freeman's soul!

Its glorious stars in azure shine,
The radiant heraldry of heaven;
Its stripes in beauteous order twine,
The emblems of our union given.
And tyrants with a trembling gaze,
Survey its bright and meteor glare!
While glory's beams around it blaze,
And rest in fadeless splendor there!

Look, freemen! on its streaming folds,
As gallantly they range afar,
Where freedom's bird-undaunted holds
The branch of peace and spear of war;
While high amid the rolling stars,
With words which every heart expand,
Within her beak serene she bears
The badge of our united land!

Behold, thy star-wrought ensign sweep,
Thy country's pride, the tyrant's bane;
Unrivalled on the foaming deep,
Unconquered on the battle plain.
Along the exulting mountain gale
'Tis borne with wild majestic flow,
As trailing meteors skyward sail,
And leave the dazzled world below!

From shore to shore, from hill to hill,
Where freedom's voice hath yet been heard,
'Tis welcomed with a holy thrill,
And oft rebellion's flame hath stirr'd.
Around the globe, through every clime,
Where commerce wafts or man hath trod,
It floats aloft, unstain'd with crime,
But hallow'd by heroic blood.

Though France hath crush'd her Bourbon flower,
And seized the flag her valor sought,
She holds it as oppression's dower—
A name is all the boon it brought.
Though Albion boast her cross of blood,
Encrimson'd on a thousand plains,
Yet freedom's cause she hath withstood,
And mark'd it with redeemless stains.

But thine, Columbia! thine's the prize,
To cheer the free, and guide the brave,
To wave through earth's remotest skies,
And plant upon oppression's grave.
Thine is the standard freedom wrought,
To rear above the lion's form,
Whose flame their martyr'd fathers sought,
To cheer them through the battle's storm.

Flag of the free! still bear thy way,
Undimm'd through ages yet untold,
O'er earth's proud realms thy stars display,
Like morning's radiant clouds unroll'd.
Flag of the skies! still peerless shine,
Through ether's azure vault unfurl'd,
Till every hand and heart entwine,
To sweep oppression from the world!

STANZAS,

Addressed to a young boy, who, supposing himself rebuked for his affection, replied, "I am not too old to love my mother."

I did not think to check the flow,
Of thy young heart's deep love, fair boy,
And with ungentle hand to throw
A cloud athwart thy sun of joy.
Would—though fast-coming years will steal
The boyish freshness from thy brow,
Thou ne'er couldst be "too old" to feel
The same pure love that stirs thee now.

Would that thine heart might ever be Linked to thy mother's, by a spell
As strong as human destiny,
And love that years nor cares may quell;
That manhood might not lead away
Thy steps from the maternal knee,
The spot where thou art wont to pray,
The lip that only bleaseth thee.

Yet vain the wish—a mother's voice
May not forever win thine ear,
A mother's heart bid thine rejoice,
Nor blend with thine a mother's tear.
Thou wilt commix with men—and yearn
For the endearments childhood knew,
And sigh, when later friendships burn,
For those they early loved and true.

And they will greet thee not—no charm
Lingers about our after years;
There cometh no maternal arm
To mould our course, or stay our fears.
And thou wilt look, in sorrow, back
On many a joy-enlivened scene,
But find on manhood's blistering track,
Naught like a mother's love, I ween.

Then think not I could bid thee seal
Thy living heart up in thy breast,
And would that thou shouldst cease to feel
All that hath power to make thee blest!
O, no! let thine affections now,
Gush out, whene'er their promptings move;
Hereafter it may be that thou
Wilt find no human thing to love.

SECOND VERSE.

I ask not now a lover's smile—
These eyes are sunk and dim;
But in their ruin they possess
An eloquence for him:
Though others pass me—from his heart
More sympathy I claim;
When I am gone—perchance he'll weep
When'er he hears my name.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

LINES.

"I could weep, madam, would it do you good."

O, I COULD weep to think how soon
Our joys decay,
To see the leaves and flowers bloom,
To fade away.

Yes: I could weep, as few have wept,
O'er friendship's grave;
O'er feelings, hopes, affections swept
In one dark wave!

Canst thou not weep for every woe
That claims a tear!

O'er all the poorest wretch can know
Of misery here!

Yes! all can weep with those who play
A mourner's part;
Sweet sympathy has power to sway
The coldest heart.

Feelings like these have nought of earth,
But all of heaven;
The purest they, which, at his birth,
To man are given.

Indulge thou, then, this holy grief
For others' woes;
This sorrow for the falling leaf,
And fading rose.

But cherish not ideal sadness,
Or fancied pain;
Nor let a single ray of gladness
E'er shine in vain.

POINTS IN WRITING.—Joseph Scaliger says
"The use of commas and semicolons was, in my time, invented by Manutius, and entirely unknown to the ancients." There were three persons of the name of Manutius, whose editions of the classics are still considered superior to all others. Aldus

Manutius, the eldest, died at Venice in 1516. He was one of the most laborious and indefatigable scholars of the age. Over his door was this inscription: "Stranger, whoever thou art, it is the request of Aldus Manutius, if you have any business with him, that you would announce it as briefly as possible and retire, unless, like another Hercules, you are come to relieve for a while the weary Atlas of his weight; for endless toil awaits you here." Paul, the son of Aldus, was far more learned than his father, and is highly complimented by Scaliger. The younger Aldus, son of the preceding, bid fair to outstrip both his father and grandfather; but he wanted their industry and perseverance, fell into poverty, was obliged to sacrifice his noble library of eighty thousand volumes, and died in great poverty at Rome, in 1597. The famous Aldine Classics are editions by this distinguished family, so called from the surname of Aldus.

DICTIONARIES AND LOTTERIES.—Monsieur Menage says, "There cannot be more unequivocal proofs of the increase of ignorance and poverty in any nation, than the multiplication of dictionaries and lotteries." Alas, for the present age!

A DISPENSATION.—The same author says, that "Among the Greek manuscripts contained in the King's Library at Paris, there are to be found decrees of the Council of Constantinople, which permit the Emperor to dispense with the ten commandments!"

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THOU NEVER SHALT FORGET ME.

THOU never shalt forget me! go, mingle with the gay,
Clad in the rounds of fashion, sport thy morn of life away;
E'en there thou never canst repress those thoughts of shame that rise,
E'en there canst never choose but feel the sting that never dies.
From the lips of thy admirers when thou hear'st thy praises burst,
Oh then when thus commended, shall thy tortures be the worst;
Think, then, oh think how quickly they all of them would flee,
Did they know how thou hast broken all thy vows of love to me.
To me, who ever thought thee as constant as the dove,
To me, who ever loved thee with a fondly trusting love;
To me, who for thy happiness would willingly have died,
And for thy sake have sacrificed peace, glory, hope, and pride!
And, like a second siren, if thou luredst by thine art
Some other one to woo thee, and to offer thee his heart,
Wilt thou dare to plight thy troth to him, before the face of heaven,
And swear to him eternal love, yet hope to be forgiven?
In the brightness of the morning, in the shadows of the night,
Shall my spirit be about thee, like a mildew and a blight;
Whatever lot await thee, thy curse shall be the past,
To wither all thy blooming hopes, thy happiness to blast.

MY HEART WAS WITH THOSE LITTLE GIRLS.

Written after seeing some little children at play.

My heart was with those little girls,
With laughing eyes and sunny curls;
It joined them in their merry play,
And I felt as young as they.
I saw them glide from tree to tree,
In the shadow of the grove,
And those beautiful creatures were to me
So many things of love.
O! every one hath sometime felt,
Through all his weary wanderings,
The tears within his bosom melt
At touching of some secret springs,
That long had slumbered, dead to feeling,
But called to life, a power revealing,
That bade him throw the mortal by
And feel his immortality!
It was of joy a very sight,
Of which I felt a part—
They wrought in me a pure delight,
And I blessed them from my heart!

A FRAGMENT.

How beautiful she is! I gaze on her,
As the old miser counts his hoarded wealth;
With this sole difference—his regard surveys
The precious heap, and finds it still deficient;
Still it doth lack what his o'er-anxious heart
Most eagerly desires; but when my eyes
Do read the soft perfection of her face,
I think the fates have granted me enough.
I knew not such felicity could be
On this side heaven; and with requited love,
Supremely blessed and happy, pass on, work!
Or good or bad alike thy ways to me,
In my own world, where nothing I regret
But that a life so sweet should be so brief.

WRITTEN IN A FIT OF THE BLUES.

Why should I blush and hang my head? Because
My neighbor's house is larger than mine own;
Or that he wears a coat that gains applause,
Of finer cloth than this that I have on?
Why should I blush? Is it because he drives
A curricle or carriage, and drinks wines
From silver goblets, and luxurious thrives
On the rich provender on which he dines?
And has his nightmare on a couch of down,
Hung round with tapestry, when he eats too much;
And menials tremble at the great man's frown,
And flatterers cringe his haughty palm to touch?
Is it for this? No! by all nature, no!
Perish the thought that ever stooped to this!
Contentment dwells not in such paltry show—
From many a nobler source man gathers bliss.
Why should I blush? Is poverty a crime?
Is it a stigma on the immortal mind?
Is man less man—in feeling less sublime—
In thought more trammelled, or in soul confined?
Nature, through all my veins, doth answer—no!
And the roused spirit speaks a stern amen.
Stoop not, for sake of gold, the mind too low—
For they who do so seldom rise again.
Lose once thy balance—let the scale but turn,
And wisdom strikes the beam, and man's debased;
Low, groveling thoughts with avarice will burn,
And intellect and feeling run to waste.

It is a thing that every day is done,
To weigh minds in a balance with men's cash;
Such kind of talents man delights upon—
The starving Otways were to these but trash!
Your pocket is your true thermometer,
By which to tell the weather of life's sky;
Consult it—like a faithful monitor,
'Twill tell you when the silver there runs high,
That men will greet you with a gracious ken,
And make warm climates in hearts cold as ice;
But when to zero sinks the metal—then
They'll sting like adders, or avoid like mice.

I will not blush—but should the fiery glow
Of indignation rise upon my cheek,
Deem it no sign of guilt that it is so,
Nor misinterpret that which it may speak.
I envy not a man because he's rich,
Nor more nor less respect him for his state;
But some do puff and strut to such a pitch,
That one must think, with pity, on the fate
Of that poor frog who, as old Æsop says,
Aspired the ox in stature to excel,
But, like some would-be giant of these days,
Burst, as a bubble, in the pompous swell.

ENGLISH LITERATURE.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF DISTINGUISHED POETS.

BY SAMUEL L. KNAPP.

ROGERS.

Samuel Rogers was well educated and well disciplined. After enjoying the benefit of a classical education and foreign travel, he set down to business as a banker, and pursued his profession with the attention and correctness of the sale-devoted sons of trade. Goldsmith was his model, and he labored his lines with ten times his master's care, if not always with his master's success. Perhaps the English language does not afford a more finished composition, in regard to language, than the "Pleasures of Memory." He wrote because he felt the inspiration, and polished his verse and chastened his language, because he was too scrupulous to give his country a specimen of careless or unfinished poetry. He was born in 1762, and, of course, is now an old man, and if his muse has lost some of her fire, his heart has lost none of its warmth. It was Rogers who came in to soothe the last pangs of Sheridan, as he was drinking the dregs of the cup of his misfortunes and his follies on his death-bed.

CAMPBELL.

Thomas Campbell has filled a great space in English poetry for more than thirty years. He was born in 1777. He was made professor in the Royal Institute, and gave lectures on poetry, which are in print—and if they are not all we might have expected from the author of the "Pleasures of Hope," they are learned and smooth, and abound in striking passages. He has also given lectures on Greek literature—a subject of deep interest to the scholar.

The "Pleasures of Hope" is a splendid poem. It was written for perpetuity. Its polish is exquisite, its topics felicitously chosen, and its illustrations natural and beautiful. This is poetry, philosophical and plain, but full of imagination. There are no startling paradoxes, no abrupt endings and beginnings—all is as pure as day and as sweet as summer. He lifts you up to an exceeding high mountain, and you see all nature in her loveliness, and man in the truth of his character, with hope irradiating, cheering, and sustaining him in the numerous ills of life. "Gertrude of Wyoming" is preferred by some readers even to his "Pleasures of Hope." It is a sad tale, told with tenderness as well as genius. But if these never had been written, his songs would have given him claims as a first-rate poet. They cover sea and land. Their spirit stirs the brave, whatever may be his field of fame, whether the snow is to be his winding-sheet or the deep his grave. National songs are of the most difficult production, and of the highest value. They are the soul of national feeling, and a safeguard of national honor. They are readily impressed on the memory, and never forgotten when acquired. They are fitted to every instrument and every voice. They are on the lips of infants, and are breathed from the dying patriot's heart. England has not been wanting in patriotic songs; but that song composed by Peterborough, and sung by Wolfe on the eve of battle, and many others that have assisted to rouse drooping spirits, are not equal to those of Campbell. "Ye mariners of England," will live as long as there is a timber left of the British navy. The spirit of a great poet goes back to what has passed in the affairs of man, and carries with it the hopes of future times.

Campbell not only sung the mighty but unsuccessful struggle of the Poles, "when Kosciusko fell," but shadowed forth that distinct and awful determination of man which is inherent in his nature, and which time will bring forth sooner or later to put down all oppression. Every great poet is indeed a seer for his country's good, and not that only, but for the good of all mankind.

"Oh! righteous heaven! ere freedom found a grave
Why slept thy sword, omnipotent to save?
Where was thine arm, O vengeance, where thy rod,
That smote the foes of Zion and of God,
That crushed proud Ammon when his iron car
Was yoked in wrath and thundered from afar?
Where was the storm that slumbered till the host
Of blood-stained Pharaoh left the trembling coast,
Then bade the deep in wild commotion flow,
And heaved an ocean on their march below?
"Departed spirits of the mighty dead!
Ye who at Marathon and Leuctra bled!
Friends of the world! restore your swords to man,
Fight in his sacred cause, and lead the van.
Yet for Sarmatia's tears of blood atone,
And make her arm puissant as thine own.
Oh! once again to freedom's cause return—
The patriot Tell—the Bruce of Bannockburn!
Yes, thy proud lord's unpittied land shall see
That man hath yet a soul, and dare be free;
A little while along thy saddening plains
The starless night of desolation reigns.
Truth shall restore the light by nature given,
And like Prometheus, bring the fire from heaven.
Frons to the dust, oppression shall be hurled,
Her name, her nature withered from the world:
"Ye that the rising morn invidious mark,
And hate the light, because your deeds are dark—
Ye that expanding truth invidious view,
And think, or wish, the song of hope untrue—
Perhaps your little hands presume to span
The march of genius, and the powers of man—
Perhaps ye watch at pride's unbalked shrine,
Her victims newly slain, and thus divine
Here shall thy triumph, genius, cease, and here
Truth, science, virtue, close your short career.
"Tyrants, in vain ye trace the wizard ring,
In vain ye limit mind's unwearied spring.
What! can ye hush the winged winds asleep,
Arrest the rolling world, or chain the deep?
No, the wild wave contends your scepter'd hand,
It rolled not back when Canute gave command.
Man! can thy doom no brighter soul allow,
Still must thou live a blot on nature's brow?
Shall war's polluted banner ne'er be furled?
Shall crime and tyrants cease but with the world?
What! are thy triumphs, sacred truth, belied,
Why then hath Plato lived, or Sidney died?"

Sarmatia is awake, and armed to hurl oppression to the dust. The soul of the patriot is hers. She dares attempt to be free! Hope is still alive. Her warriors are firm and undismayed. The departed spirits of the mighty dead are with her; not only those of Marathon and Leuctra, but the shade of Kosciusko walk "unavenged amongst them." May the sword be omnipotent to save. Tell—Bruce—Washington, will be there also. May the starless night of desolation be followed by the dawn of freedom. And the poet's song and the prophet's voice be all truth—sound historic truth in this struggle for liberty.

CRABBE.

Crabbe is now an old man—his life has been one of professional duties and of great virtue. He has had no eccentricities or aberrations. His life exhibits nothing for the world to censure or deplore. He is now almost an octogenarian, and the muse has inspired him perhaps as long as she will. His works are both admirable and novel. He truly took a new pathway to fame. His portraits are mostly from humble life—he has shown their vices and their virtues. The world had heard enough of their vices, but few in the reading circles had been taught their virtues. His profession had made him acquainted with both. He could read their hearts, and he has delineated their characters most faithfully. It is one of the facts in the history of man, that his affections may be purified while his mind is only partially enlightened. This was known to the careful reader of human nature, but had in a great measure been overlooked by the bard. Agreeable images suited the poet best, or if not those at all times, striking incidents he thought seldom occurred in the lives of the humble, or if they did occur, they were not likely to be noticed. Crabbe probed deep, and gave an honest account of the misery, and anguish, and the sources of joy of the poor. His works are yet to be more known and admired than they have been, for in time the poor will read them, which is not the case now. He who softens the anguish of the wretched, or suggests to them any mode of ameliorating their condition, is a benefactor of his rank. Crabbe will go down to posterity as a moralist and a poet together, and one too that the church may be proud of. It may be said that the poor had no poet until Crabbe arose. He has given their sorrows and their joys without one particle of coarseness. "Those his Saviour cherished, he has portrayed, and like him he has taught them to hope for another and a better world. Such a man does more good than a thousand proud men, who can only look on what is classical and refined. In the grave there are no distinctions, and to that condition we must all come at last. There is no difference now between the dust of Lazarus and that of the mighty Caesar and the great Napoleon. The great enemy of man is a leveller, and to him we must yield sooner or later. He who encourages the faint and weary in the journey of life, is a servant of God and a friend to his species, and verily will receive his reward, both in the life that is,

and in that which is to come. Crabbe has asked no honors and received no distinctions for his services, except such as the public awards to merit. He has, in imitation of his divine master, washed the feet of his disciples, and prepared himself for the burial.

When the monuments of sublime genius have crumbled to dust, and are remembered no more, the labors of the pious survive; they, as it were, fertilize the soil of hope, and reap and secure the harvest of faith. The poor of unborn ages will acknowledge that Crabbe led them by his writings to patience, resignation, and unwavering belief, which softened their hard fates, and lighted up in them bright and glorious visions of immortality and happiness when the miseries of existence should be over.

THOMAS MOORE.

It is difficult to speak of Moore without saying too little of his beauties or his faults. No man was ever more felicitous than he in his peculiar style of writing. He attacked the heart through the medium of the senses, and if his spells were not lasting, they were all powerful while they existed. His muse came not from Pindus, braced with mountain air, but all redolent from the paradise of Mahomet, full of joy and enchantment, bordering upon intoxication. The young read his productions with avidity, and the old wondered at his power over words. His sweets never cloy; nor can it be said that he is ever vulgar, however sensual. His are Apician dainties, and therefore more dangerous. It must be confessed that in his late poetical works he has atoned for the looseness of his earlier writings. It is to be regretted that he should ever have written the lives of Sheridan and Byron. These works can do no good. The exposure of the follies of these extraordinary men neither deter the rising generation from vice nor enlighten the minds of those who are out of danger from such examples.

This high authority will induce many to drag into public view the faults of less distinguished persons, and the grave, which formerly hid the sins of ordinary men, may do so no longer. To say nothing of the dead but what is good, is too narrow a rule; but all the truth should not be spoken of every one, unless its publication can benefit the community. These liberties of the press destroy the respect with which the exalted in mind or station were formerly regarded. The follies and vices of these superior beings bring them down to the level of vulgar minds. One of the greatest ties of the social compact was the gravity and dignity that was attached to knowledge and experience. The philosophers proclaimed liberty and equality in France in 1789, but the true spirit of it not being understood by the lower orders, they caught the hatred to tyranny, and, with the oppressors, swept away the philosophers also.

But to return to the poetry of Moore—he is now in his prime, and may woo the muse for many a sunny day, and more entirely redeem his early aberrations. But we beg of him to give no more lives in this style. If he would take up some holy man, whose days had abounded in incident, and throw around him the rays of his poetical genius, he would make a work that would long and widely benefit mankind; but we have had enough of travels and baggies of Circes and of Cyprians. The mind after a while, even of those who had a strong appetite at first, turns with loathing from these offensive details, which in the life of Byron seem to occur as constantly as the seasons; and it makes no difference whether it be said by the living, or written by his departed subject. Fiction, however monstrous, is better than such truths; for there is always a lurking remembrance in the mind that it is fiction, and poor human nature is saved from the effect which might be produced if it had been treading over realities.

Moore has genius of a high order, and it is devoted to the public. Let him recollect his responsibility to that public, and take such subjects as will enlighten many, amuse all, and be constantly doing good.

MILMAN.

The Rev. Henry Milman is one of the finest poets of England, whether you consider the genius, the taste, or the purity of the man. He has been, and probably now is, professor of poetry at Oxford. In his college days he took all the prizes for poetry, or more of them than any other person in his way. He has written since he has been in the church with great power and elegance. Milman is in the prime of manhood, a sound believer, a good moralist, a splendid prose writer, and yields to no one in his wishes to do good. It is to be hoped that his productions will soon become as fashionable as those of Byron and Moore.

BYRON.

All the world has read Byron, and it has not yet gone from our ears that the great poet is dead. Recollections, lives, sketches, and anecdotes have been profusely poured out upon the world, until all have grown weary with wading through them. It is well to know enough of his character as a poet, and to find the best portion of his works and of his history, not to dwell on it. His course from the dawn of reason was wayward. His vices commenced early and lasted as long as he lived. He violated duties, scorned all human ties, and offended every religious creed.

He wrote many things with great effect. He saw and felt much, but after all was selfish in his feelings. He was sometimes generous, and always profuse; but in the midst of labor, pleasure, or profligacy, his own greatness and his wrongs, real or imaginary, were uppermost in his thoughts. When the excitement about Lord Byron has passed away, the world will admire his talents, and will select many parts of his works, and bind them up together for posterity. The Greeks will erect a monument to his memory out of the remains of the tombs of Pindar and Alcibiades; and when time has sunk some glaring instances of his profligacy into dimness and shade, the mitred guardian of the gates of Westminster-abbey may permit a slab to be sculptured with his name. Charity will not always plead in vain for this honor; she will be heard when she offers, as a palliation for many of his errors, the want of parental example and domestic instruction.

SHELLY.

The name of Shelly excites unpleasant feelings. He was a being to be pitied. His were the wanderings of a powerful intellect, that led directly down to the gates of death. He pushed, while yet a youth, his skepticism to frenzy. By his waywardness he had nothing to gain, but much to lose. Perversity and infidelity drove him from the university, and at last almost from the society of men; but the time that passed over him did not return him to reason, nor did he acknowledge that the Most High reigneth among men. Shelly wrote under a torture that even his muse could not describe, nor find any match for among earth-born beings. Shelly had in prospect titles, wealth, and fame. His mind was of a gigantic order. He reasoned against revelation and religion with the strength of the prince of darkness. His poetry partakes of the obscurity of his reasonings; but there is in it a most wonderful power of thought and expression. Sometimes this obscurity seems to heighten the sublimity of his poetry. Curses were on his lips, and poverty stung him to madness, and made him blaspheme the more. He was called to his great account at thirty years of age. He was drowned; and Byron erected, and fired his funeral pile, and watched it as the flames ascended; and in admiring the classical beauty of the scene, forgot to shed "the tear to friendship due."

There is a possibility that such a mind as Shelly's might have worked itself free from the vile stuff about it if he had been spared to a mature age. Shelly's principles were too much enveloped in metaphysics to have had a very deleterious effect on society. The poison lies deep in his works, when there is any, and will not be sucked in by the cursory reader; and the wise one will have an antidote for it when he is in danger. There is a charm in sound principles worth all other talismans. It is painful to see youthful virtue cut off in the early summer of life, but the pang is tenfold when misguided genius is called to depart, "unavowed, unannealed." Shelly rather strove to vindicate his absurdities than to propagate his principles. His example will not be infectious, for his short life proved that disobedience and transgression are sources of misery; and that he who defies the community will find himself bound hand and foot, and thrown away with contempt; life to him is without enjoyment, and death comes without hope; he departs without the lamentations of the good, and rests without the praises of the eloquent. If those bound by the ties of consanguinity or alliance shed a tear upon his grave, it flows not from the fountain of pure affection; but is a scalding drop, wrung from painful recollections of his worse than useless course.

MATTHIAS.

When the elements of the moral and political world were in a state of high commotion, a work entitled the "Pursuits of Literature," was published anonymously. It was a severe and an indignant satire upon the wild and unprincipled writers of that period. Its tone was high and manly, but its severity was directed by no party-spirit. The author struck down the sciolists and charlatans of that period with a strong hand. He neither courted nor feared those in power. In the pride of a man of letters he assumed the bold, but true doctrine, that on literature, well or ill conducted, depends the fate of a nation. He spoke of literature in its broadest sense. He brought great stores of learning to his aid. He had drank deeply of the sweet waters of the Pierian spring. If he sometimes was guilty of affectation, it could do no harm to any but himself. The author of the "Pursuits of Literature" was a learned man, if his pedantry was at times too apparent. If this composition was not equal to the pretensions of the writer, it most certainly was a learned production. The notes were more valued than the verse. This work did much to put down the trash of spurious politicians, and writers of affected importance, even if he did, in some hasty moments, throw his arrows sometimes too promiscuously. He plumed himself, like Junius, on concealment; but was not, like him, capable of keeping his secret. The author was found to be Mr. Matthias, a learned man. Canning, in his poem called "New Morality," speaks of the writer of the "Pursuits of Literature," then unknown, with no small share of praise.

Thou too! the nameless bard, whose honest zeal
For law, for morals, for the public weal,
Pours down impetuous on thy country's foes
The stream of verse, and many-lingued prose:
Thou too! though oft thy ill-advised dislike
The guiltless head with random censures strike,
Though quaint allusion, vague and undefined,
Play faintly round the ear but mock the mind.
Through the mix'd mass yet truth and learning shine,
And manly vigor stamps the nervous line:
And patriot warmth the generous sage inspires,
And wakes and points the desultory fires!

From Matthias the Lake poets received a serious castigation. Perhaps he was too intent upon extirpating the pitiful gnats and fire-flies of literature, that were buzzing and stinging about him, while he should have been dealing his ponderous blows upon the monsters and dragons of mischief; though full of classical allusion and heroic examples, he forgot that of Hercules. Had this hero stopped on his journeys to abate every little nuisance, or to have crushed every tarantula and viper in his pathway, the Augean stable might never have been cleansed, nor the Nemean lion slain. Great efforts should be directed to great ends.

The name Diebitsh signifies, in his native language, thievish. The Russian army is now commanded by another German, General Toll, which means mad.

THE FINE ARTS.

PAINTINGS AT THE ARCADE BATHS.

A NUMBER of paintings, chiefly by James Ward, R.A. are at present opened for exhibition at the rooms above the Arcade baths, in Chambers-street. Among these the prominent picture is a cattle piece, as large as life, in imitation of the grand Paul Potter, said to have been one of the finest in the Bonaparte Louvre. We have not yet had leisure to bestow a sufficient examination upon this picture to speak of it as it deserves. Our readers may rest assured that they have seldom been afforded an opportunity of witnessing one more deserving their attention. Its coloring is unusually fine. The animals in the foreground are thrown out from the canvass with wonderful effect, and the far perspective in the distance is an admirable illusion. Besides the cattle piece there are specimens by Watteau, De Hooghe, Rembrandt, Breughel, Ostade, Van Meer, Brauwer, Angelica Kauffman, R. A.; Clater, Nasmyth, Barney, Towne, &c. There are some sweet faces in the "Mistletoe, or Christmas-eve," by Clater; and the glare of the deep red firelight upon those in its vicinity is highly effective. We would direct the attention of the spectator to the figure of the father in the "Reluctant Consent." This collection is small in number, but of superior merit, and the proprietor may confidently anticipate throngs of visitors when the wanderers begin to return to their homes; at present he must not be discouraged, as everybody is out of town. Eleven hundred in one week sipped the waters at Saratoga. The streets are abandoned. We miss many a face, which we suppose is off somewhere among the mountains. The summer in the city is dull enough; nobody here but "business men;" but notes of preparation may be heard from various quarters, which give token of a brilliant winter.

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Bourne has published the admired "Overture to William Tell," "Annot Lyle," a fine ballad; and "Music floats in the air," from Cinderella. The entire score of this opera is nearly completed.

Hewitt also has issued the second number of the "Casket, or Musical Companion," containing a variety of pieces; the ballad of the "Switzer's song of home," and "My sire is in his grave," the words of the last by Horatio Gates, Esq.

MISCELLANY.

SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN JOURNALS.

MRS. GORE'S LATE WORK.—The following paragraphs are extracted from a new novel entitled "Pin Money," recently published by Mrs. Gore, authoress of the "Manners of the Day."

"There was a certain Lady Mapleberry, with six unmarried daughters—one of those large, lively, good-humored, singing, dancing, riding, chatting families, where a young man seeking a wife is apt to fall in love with the joint-stock merit and animation of the group; and to feel quite astonished on discovering, after his union with Harriet or Jane, how moderate a proportion he has received in his lawful sixth of the music, information, accomplishments, and good-humored gossipry of the united tribe." ****

"We have been admonished by the royal philosopher of the Jews, that the sun should not go down upon our wrath; but had Solomon penetrated half the mysteries of the female breast, he would have additionally interdicted a sunset upon our coolness! Anger is of brief endurance, and soon raves itself to rest; but coolness is as long-lived as other cold-blooded animals—it is as the toad which exists for a thousand years in the heart of a rock! Were I, like Dr. Gregory and other moral tacticians, to bequeath a legacy of counsel to my daughters, I would say—'Never sleep upon a misunderstanding with those you love; if you feel less kindly towards them than usual, the chances run that you are in the wrong.'"

"Among the incidents and passions influencing the variability of woman's humor few are more potent, yet more indignantly disavowed, than the love of finery. From the moment a girl becomes conscious of the difference between sky-blue and rose-color, it is astonishing what wonders can be wrought in the temper of her mind and mood of her feelings, by the acquisition of a new dress, or the sight of some particular friend's Parisian bonnet; and there scarcely exists a woman wise or virtuous enough to be insensible to the change produced in her appearance by variation of attire. Goldsmith knew more of womankind than they knew of themselves, when he made Dr. Primrose declare, that a set of new ribands sufficed to metamorphose his philosophical daughter Sophia into a coquet!" ****

"Alas! how rarely amid the scenes of polished life are the surface and substance truly identified; how seldom does the word on the lip, or the expression glancing in the eye, accord with the mighty feeling laboring within! A diamond melts in the crucible—but the exhalations emanating from its decomposition are not a degree more noble than those which arise from an ordinary conflagration; the heart consumes away in secret corrosion—but flippant wit and hollow laughter grace its martyrdom."

DR. ABERNETHY.—The late Dr. Abernethy would never permit his patients to talk much. He could not succeed in silencing a loquacious old lady but by the following expedient:—"Put out your tongue, madam." The lady complied. "Now keep it there till I have done talking." An old lady, very much inclined to be prosy, once sent to him and began by saying that her complaint commenced when she was only three years old. The professor rose abruptly, and left the house. It was observed to Dr. Abernethy that he appeared to live much like other people, and by no means to be bound by his own rules. He replied, that he wished to act according to his own precepts, only he had "such a devil of an appetite."

CANOVA.—Many authors have fancied particular hours of the day, or particular seasons of the year, as more propitious to flights of genius. Canova fancied the sun of Italy alone propitious to his genius; a clouded sky or a foggy atmosphere cast a gloom on his spirits which he could not overcome, so that even Paris was to him the grave of genius. Napoleon perceived that in the bust Canova made of him, and which is now in the possession of Baron Depon, that there was wanting that grand character which distinguished his work from the rest of modern sculptors, and observed to him, that he did not think he had been happy in the execution. "I feel it, sire," replied Canova, "but I cannot help it; the clouded sky of France does not inspire me like the warm sun of Italy."

ADVANTAGE OF A GOOD CHARACTER.—A country paper, giving an account of an inquest upon the body of a young man, who had been killed by a blow from the sails of a mill, says—"The previous good character of the deceased, left no doubt that the catastrophe was purely accidental. Verdict accordingly."

VENTRILOQUY.—During Mr. Love, the ventriloquist's sojourn in Dublin, he happened to visit Dr. R. in St. Stephen's-green. The doctor, wishing to create a little amusement for his lady, who was considerably indisposed, requested Mr. Love to favor them with some trifling specimen of his powers. The doctor's servant, a lad who was not overburdened with the article of brains, and who was unacquainted with Mr. L.'s person, was selected as the object. While he was in the act of removing the cloth after dinner, a sudden and loud call was heard in the passage, "Joe, my lad, come and help me to finish the bottle of wine we stole out of your master's cellar last night." The surprise of Joseph may be more easily conceived than described. He proceeded to the door, saw nobody, but speedily heard the same voice in the cellar, crying out, that he had unluckily knocked the spigot out of a barrel of ale, and the stingo was inaudible to the cellar. Honest Joseph, who now began to entertain very considerable doubts, as to whether he was awake or the reverse, rushed down to the cellar, where, finding every thing in a quiescent state, he returned pale and speechless to the dining-room. Indeed, he strove to speak, but his tongue refused its office, and his words, like Macbeth's, "stuck in his throat." The invisible speaker was then heard in the street, and finally upon the roof of the house. The doctor and his lady, now almost bursting with laughter, considering that the joke had been carried far enough, informed poor Joseph that the whole had been a deception on the part of the ventriloquist, of which they had some difficulty in persuading him.

MEMORY OF A BULLFINCH.—The late Sir William Parsons, when a very young man, took great delight in a piping bullfinch which he had taught to sing. When he was about to visit Italy, he entrusted the favorite to a married sister, of whose humanity he was well assured; and on his return, the first visit he made was to his sister, who, with all reasonable allowance for brotherly affection, strongly suspected that she was indebted to the bullfinch for this special attention. The bullfinch had been long in declining health, and was at the moment thought to be dying. Sir William, full of sorrow, opened the cage-door, put in his hand, and spoke to the bird; the bird recollected his voice, shook its feathers, staggered on to his finger, piped the favorite tune of his master, and fell dead. There is nothing, perhaps, in this story, which needs a warranty, but we have it on authority which cannot be questioned.

EXTRAORDINARY MATCH AGAINST TIME.—In 1753, the Duke of Queensbury, then Lord March, made a match to convey a letter a certain number of miles in a given time. Even the most knowing ones of the day deemed the thing impossible; his lordship, however, enclosed his letter within a cricket-ball, and stationing twenty young fellows, who were good hands at catching, in a large circle, made them throw it from one to another for the appointed period—at the expiration of which, on the ground being measured, the distance that the ball had been made to travel, was found to exceed, by nearly one-fourth the stipulations of the wager.

THE BILL.—A gentleman, a few days ago, when he was leaving Long's hotel, had his bill presented to him by one of the waiters. The gentleman paid it to a single penny. The waiter stood in expectation of the usual gratuity, but received nothing. "Sir," said the waiter, "I hope every thing has been to your mind." "Perfectly so," replied the gentleman. "I hope, sir, I have given you no offence." "None whatever," answered the gentleman. "Will you be pleased to consider the servants?" "No, no, my man; I am for the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill."

WAY TO MAKE AN AUDIENCE UNANIMOUS.—"A serious disturbance," says a French paper, "broke out in the theatre of Toulouse. A violent quarrel arose between two parties, one of which wished to support an actor on his début, the other seemed determined to hiss him. The authorities ordered the house to be cleared, which the National Guard did with energy and promptitude."

LOVE AND MURDER.—A young gentleman and lady, residing in England, being violently attached to each other, and the relatives refusing to consent to their union, they agreed to go abroad and put an end to their existence. They arrived at Lisbon, and, with loaded pistols pointed at each other's bosoms, they agreed to fire at the same moment. His pistol took effect, and laid the young lady dead at his feet, but hers missed fire. On his arrival in England, he was arrested, tried by a special commission, and was hanged at Newgate.

MRS. SIDDONS.—The demeanor of Mrs. Siddons was rarely divested in private life of the solemnity contracted during her histrionic functions. It is said that a Bath shopman was frightened into a fit by the scrutinizing eye and sepulchral tone with which, during the purchase of a piece of calico, she once inquired, "Did you say, sir, this would wash?"

The only surviving son of Mrs. Siddons went out a writer, and is now a judge in India, where he has greatly distinguished himself by his forensic acquirements. The only daughter, Miss Siddons, a very accomplished young lady, was with her mother when she died.

PIGEON-FANCIERS.—Dr. Mitchell, in a lecture lately delivered on ornithology, relates the following extraordinary anecdotes in proof of the strength of the ruling passion in pigeon-fanciers. A gentleman, an admirer of pigeons, went to the house of a weaver in Spital-fields, who was a pigeon-fancier, to make a purchase. On entering, he was struck with the appearance of poverty apparent in the nakedness of the children who were playing about. He was sent up to the pigeon-loft, where he found the fancier in all his glory, attending his birds with a degree of care far beyond what he appeared to bestow on his children. He showed his birds, and pointed out their various perfections, pledging "his honor" to their hereditary claims to superiority. The gentleman having selected a pair, asked the price. "Five guineas," said the fancier. "Five guineas!" exclaimed the gentleman, whose impression from the poverty he had seen made him think it impossible that the birds could be so valuable—"Would not two guineas do?" Indignation flashed from the eyes of the fancier: he seized the two birds, and twisted their heads off. "There," he exclaimed with Roman energy, accompanying the exclamation with terrible imprecations, "do you suppose that because I am a poor man I will allow myself to be trampled upon? Bess," said he to his wife, "grill these for my supper. Now do you, sir," turning to his amazed customer, "get down the ladder, or I will kick you down." The gentleman found it would be vain to attempt to treat the wound he had inflicted, and thought it safest to retire. A party of pigeon-fanciers met at a public house in Spital-fields, to show their pigeons. Two journeyman silk-weavers had each an almond tumbler, and a contest arose as to which was the finest. The beak of each of them was scarcely a third of an inch in length, and the plumage was announced to be the most beautiful in the whole world; but one was decided to be a little superior to the other. The owner of the second bargained for and purchased the victor, giving for it eleven guineas, all the money he had in the world. He then took the bird and wrung off its head, exclaiming in exultation, "Now my bird is the best in the whole world."

MUSIC ALL OVER.—London is swarming with musicians, till it is humming all over like a bee-hive. Wars with come, in order to conduct a new oratorio of his at Dublin: Hummel is going to try his luck at Manchester; what the celebrated Field, from Petersburg, is come for, we have not yet been able to learn; and there are fifty more, at least, all ready to rival Paganini, and delight John Bull.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

A NEW HYDROMETER.—A new instrument to measure the degree of moisture in the atmosphere, of which the following is a description, has been recently invented by M. Baptiste Lendi, of St. Gall. In a white flint bottle is suspended a piece of metal about the size of a hazel nut, which not only looks extremely beautiful, and contributes to the ornament of a room, but likewise predicts every possible change of weather twelve or fourteen hours before it occurs. As soon as the metal is suspended in the bottle with water, it begins to increase in bulk, and in ten or twelve days, forms an admirable pyramid, which resembles polished brass; and it undergoes several changes till it has attained its full dimensions. In rainy weather this pyramid is constantly covered with pearly drops of water; in case of thunder or hail, it will change to the finest red, and throw out rays; in case of wind or fog, it will appear dull and spotted; and previously to snow, it will look quite muddy. If placed in a moderate temperature, it will require no other trouble than to pour out a common tumbler full of water, and put in the same quantity of fresh.

PURE WATER.—A plan for supplying London and other large cities with pure filtered water is about to be submitted to parliament. The design consists in forming filters under the bed of the Thames, through which a quantity of pure water, equal to the consumption of the metropolis, will be furnished to the companies now in being.

PROPOSED RAIL ROAD THROUGH FRANCE.—The last number of the Revue Encyclopedique has suggested a plan, to form a rail-road from Havre to Strasburg, by way of Paris, which would open a communication with the south of Germany and Switzerland, that might be carried on at half the present cost by the Rhine navigation. The capital required has been calculated at four millions. It is assumed that the line of road pointed out, embraces a population of two millions, and that if one in a hundred made a journey daily, on which a franc would be payable as toll, the whole expense of interest and repairs would be covered. The impetus that such an undertaking would give to commerce is incalculable; but unfortunately, it is easier to estimate than to furnish capital.

MANUFACTURED ANTHRACITE.—Several pieces of polished anthracite coal, says the Miner's Journal, converted into writing appliances, such as inkstands, and boxes, wafer vases, paper weights, &c. displaying much taste in their execution, were exhibited yesterday in our borough. Being for sale, we understand they were purchased with much avidity. Their appearance was very pretty and inviting, and highly creditable to the skill and ingenuity of Mr. Kirk, by whom we understand they were executed in this country. The period is close at hand no doubt, when this mineral will be extensively laid under contribution for articles of useful and ornamental workmanship, and furnish an extensive field for exercise of mechanical genius. No stronger proofs of this production are required than the beautiful specimens above alluded to, combined with the enterprising spirit of improvement which distinguishes the present age.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

CLOSE OF THE SEASON.

We omitted in our last to notice the performance at the Park on the twenty-ninth ultimo. We take the present occasion, however, of doing so, as it was for the benefit of Mr. Simpson, and it once more brought before us, and for the first time since her late indisposition, Mrs. Austin. The house was crowded, and the prima donna was received with those flattering marks of attention which the gallantry of our citizens is in the habit of bestowing on their favorite artists; and, we may add, in no instance could it be more deserved. The opera went off with great spirit; and, with the exception of Pedro, was never played better. Mr. Blakeley, however, was no substitute for the younger Placide, who has made the part his own; or, to borrow a phrase to which the French are partial, has "created it." Mrs. Sharpe has succeeded in becoming mistress of the music, and gave due effect to Clorinda. Mrs. Vernon never misses a comic point, when it is to be made; and her dancing in the ball-room scene was excellent. Jones improves in acting; and his fine manly tenor voice, divested of the falsetto, (which detestable adjunct he seldom uses perceptibly) was heard to every advantage. We thought Mrs. Austin gave some of the passages in the early part of the opera with less force than usual; but a friend, who is au fait in musical affairs, suggested to us that she spared her voice in all probability from caution; a supposition fairly made out by the power and brilliancy with which she executed the Tyrolienne air, with its variations. Placide, in quitting the Baron for the season, has left an impression which we doubt whether any actor, either English or American, could efface. The audience consisted of the most fashionable of the citizens who remain in New-York; and among them we noticed Mr. McLane, our late minister to England. Thus the finest season, ever known for our national opera, has concluded. The production and popularity of Cinderella have given a tone and vigor to musical taste in this city, of the first importance to the art.

The opera of Masaniello is in active preparation, and green-room report speaks of the importation of a Fenella, and of the progress in the construction of an organ for the purpose of aiding it. It may not be inappropriate to add, and the musical public may derive more confidence in the attractions of this opera, from knowing that it is to be produced under the superintendence of the same accomplished amateur to whom the success of Cinderella must be, in a great measure, ascribed. It is said that the fair patrons of opera are already making it a topic of conversation among the picturesque cliffs of Trenton, the brilliant throngs at Saratoga, and by the wild roar of Niagara.

The grand "spectacle" of Napoleon will, we understand, be the opening piece of the establishment; and the enormous expense which the manager is incurring in the preparation of both dramas, entitles him to the liberal support of the public; nor do we doubt but that an ample reward will attend his efforts. M.

THE FRENCH COMPANY.

The French troupe are playing to tolerably good houses. The musical department has suffered a loss in Letellier, their late "haut-centre," and their comedy has gained by the addition of a Monsieur St. Aubin. The band, under the superintendence of Paradol, whom we look upon as an excellent chef d'orchestre, is extremely able in stringed instruments; but, excepting the bassoon, we cannot compliment their wind instruments. In other respects the company is nearly the same as last season. We have often taken occasion to remark that the forte of this troupe is their excellent mode of getting up their pieces, affording an ensemble highly pleasing, and which covers a multitude of individual defects. It is obvious to every person commonly gifted with what is termed "an ear for music," who witnesses these performances, that none of the singers are first-rate, and that some of them are detestably bad; indeed the present tenore, Monsieur Deschamps, may be so described. Madame St. Clair, the prima donna, has a remarkably good intonation, and without much power or quality, she nevertheless detracts nothing from the value of her music, by false taste; and, in concerted music particularly, the purity of her tones frequently give much pleasure, uniting well with other voices. Mademoiselle Berdoulet—we beg her pardon, we mean Madame Berdoulet Paradol, for she has, it appears, formed an alliance with Monsieur Paradol—is an excellent actress, and gives so much point and feeling where it is requisite, that we are inclined to pardon a weak voice and occasional defects of ear. Privat, a good actor, sings correctly; but has the besetting sin of the company, want of physical power. An exception to this is to be found, however, in Monsieur Curto, the basse-taille, who has a good full bass voice, and has evidently been in a decent school. We were present at the representation of Rossini's "Ganza Ladra," ("La Pie voleuse," as the French have it,) and we were much pleased with the general performance of the piece, and filled with admiration at the fact of so many indifferent singers being able to produce such effects by their united efforts. The overture (a clever composition, but full of "sound and fury;" drums of all kinds, cymbals, triangles, and other warlike instruments) was not played as well as during the preceding season, and the opening scene of the prima donna was cruelly used, by the horn-players particularly. It is Rossini's famous "di Piacer," and it abounds in imitations by the wind instruments, of which they made sad havoc. The beautiful duet between the father and daughter, Madame St. Clair and Curto, was extremely well sung, and pleased much. The finale to the second act, the theme of which is the committal to prison of the heroine, was a specimen of French taste by no means to our liking. The late capture of the Dutch diamond stealer, and his struggles with his pursuers, was a mere bagatelle in comparison. Indeed, the general row which took place, the mixture of singing, tugging, and screaming, afforded us a strange specimen of French notions of the pathetic, and we take leave to add, would have caused old Garcia's hair to have resembled the "quills upon the fretful porcupine," had he witnessed such an exhibition. B.

MR. BOOTH.—This popular tragedian has been performing his round of favorite characters, and with his usual success, at the Chat-ham, which is the only theatre at present open for the English drama.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 115.

Two subjects sometimes excite my wonder. First, that with so many sources of pleasure man can be wretched; secondly, that existing as he does, in the danger of such awful calamities, he can ever, even for a moment, be happy. It has occasionally struck me too that thought is an evil, or, at least, that it produces many evil consequences. True, it is the object of education to develop the powers of the intellect, and children are the victims of a perpetual scheme to make them reflect; but may not this system be carried too far? May not the machinery of the mind be set in motion with a force which cannot afterwards be controlled, and then what does reflection bring to compensate the glowing sunshiny boy for his unshrinking eyes and voice of irrepressible happiness, for his unbroken spirit and shadowless imagination? It endows him with wisdom, gravity, and prudence. It teaches him to tremble at every step, to mistrust every hope, to suspect every pleasure. Nature's simple sources of gratification are idle things—fountains dried to him: while the bosom of the earth teems with the harvest, he is brooding over wintry anticipations, and when he muses on the face of a young happy child, he sighs, because he reflects, and reflection flings a shadow upon mirth. They resemble the moon and the sun, which cannot both reign together in the sky.

An habitual thinker cannot be permanently happy. He may revel with a fleeting pleasure—he may float in a delicious reverie—he may feel blissfully for a moment that his cup of joy is full. His fancy may expand with an inspiration, or his bosom thrill with the triumph and the rapture of a requited passion; but these sensations scarcely linger longer in his bosom than the rose-light of the setting sun on the summit of the hill—and in proportion to the intensity of the excitement, will be the subsequent depression of his spirits. Place such an one upon the proudest eminence—realize all his fondest wishes—let his very dreams become bright realities around him, and his rejoicing will not be without a shudder. His mind will be crossed with melancholy forebodings—so much for reflection.

It thus frequently happens that they who are most envied, suffer under the operation of thoughts and feelings invisible to the unreflecting world. Who are more envied than the great—the profound statesman—the convincing and spirit-stirring orator—the immortal poet—the painter—and the novelist, who surprise and captivate the million? While regarding their splendid works, and the effects of them upon others, who can refrain from yearning to be like their authors? How intense the desire to grasp their dazzling powers, to become, like them, objects of delight, admiration, and wonder? Yet how many of these beings are unhappy! The wreaths which bind their temples are full of hidden thorns. They are racked with hours of keen and gloomy meditation. Their very blessings disguise dark sad things which the shouting crowd know not of. Oh, the rugged, cruel influences, gloomy as Erebus, inexorable as fate, concealed under the glancing surface of society! Genius is too often but an altar on which its victim is offered a splendid sacrifice—dying in radiance. I made these sublime reflections in solitude. One is more apt to be both sublime and sentimental when alone. There is a rebuking spirit about the bustle and common-place realities of actual life which often puts to flight, in a moment, the lofty aspirations of the philosopher, and the fantastic visions of the poet. An author, especially a poetic one, therefore, in propria persona, generally presents a broad contrast to his writings, and after having in his closet poured forth a swelling flood of splendid misery, or delicate refinement, puts on his hat and goes incontinently to a tavern for a mint-julep.

"You are forever talking of happiness," said the Genius, "yet few have felt it. Many believe themselves possessed of it, but find they have confounded it with excitement. Of this the world is full of causes. It sleeps in the bosom as fire dwells in the flint, and is struck out so brightly by the clash of events. The subtle element of mind is changeable like the air, and like it subject to extremes of cold and heat, of storms and calms. You have spoken slightly of reflection, and have envied the thoughtlessness of youth; but reflection and genius are advantages, and like all other worldly blessings, are not to be enjoyed without a penalty. But the carelessness of childhood, which shields it from forebodings of the future and regrets of the past, exposes it to agonies of the present, equally calculated to give it pain. In the dark it trembles, lest it should be seized by a spirit. In its daily course it is surrounded by objects of intense interest, for which it languishes in vain. It is continually in danger, and seldom ceases to be enslaved while the labors which it is compelled to accomplish are irksome, and too often attended with mystery and mortification. Wisdom and dark experience, on the contrary, in producing melancholy, also bring resignation. If they diminish the charms, they also loosen the ties of life; they make you gloomy, but independent; there is disappointment, but there are also loftiness and courage."

"Ay," I replied, "but this is still to be wretched. I covet not the independence founded on the want of feeling; nor the courage to die which springs from a fear to live. I tremble at death."

"And so you do at life," replied my companion. "You will find none satisfied with the past; few willing to live over again their vanished years; to take the chance for the dangers they have escaped, or endure the pangs they have suffered; all look to the future for a recompense, which they persuade themselves has hitherto been denied only by an accidental combination of circumstances, and thus they drop into their graves just as they have surmounted all obstacles to contentment. Come, let us enter the magic mirror, which opens at our approach. Yonder child may throw some light upon our inquiries."

We entered. The boy to whom he had alluded was on his way to school, for the first time. I asked him if he would recommence his life, and by the aid of the Genius he comprehended, and replied to my question.

"Oh no," he said; "I have just passed through a period of helplessness and inaction; my life has so far been spent in tears and cries, and at my outset I was surrounded by a throng of painful and dangerous diseases, which destroyed my happiness, and nearly put an end to my existence. These I have just surmounted, and now I am on the threshold of the great temple of knowledge, I am eager to enter, and survey her wonders."

We wandered on till we reached a palace-like looking building, shaded with old trees. In the distance the silver line of a river flashed in the sun, and a rustic road wound near, ornamented on either side with a hedge of fragrant blossoms. It was a bright picture—like a dream in its quiet richness—its gleams of light, its deep forest shadows, its contrast to the wrangle and roar of cities.

"Beautiful," I murmured. "It is an Eden. I could spend my life here."

A youth came from the mansion, looked around with emotion, lingered a moment, as if he quitted it with regret, and then departed towards an equipage, which stood ready to receive him.

"This is a literary college," said my companion; "the youth is about bidding it farewell forever, after a residence of many years: speak to him."

"Fair student," said I, "be not surprised to hear what I offer. I am commanded by a supernatural being to enable you to retrace your years since you entered this peaceful institution. The world is full of discord and danger. In going forth upon its scene of woe your bad passions will be aroused, your virtues corrupted. Disease will wrinkle your face; misery, torture, perhaps madness, ruin your heart. You will sicken for that which you can never obtain. Perhaps disappointed love will embitter your early joy; perhaps poverty, protracted, debasing, peace-destroying, dreadful poverty will cow your young spirit, drink up the sources of your mirth, and mark you for an outcast and a wretch. Tremble, boy, for every step may arouse an agony, every friend prove a foe; the future is all deceit. Pause ere you launch upon an ocean on which your whole hopes may be wrecked, and dwell, if you will, here in this happy and most lovely glen."

"Stranger," said the youth, with a clear, bold voice, and something of a pride flashing in his eyes, "I am young and fearless. My life within these walls has been tedious and effeminate. I have only learned to talk, when my bosom pants for action. The days have rolled heavily in a weary monotony, and each year has been more tolerable than the preceding only because it brought me nearer to life and freedom. Now the world, the mighty glorious world, opens to my view. I am bewildered among lofty plans and delicious anticipations. I know not which road to fame I had best adopt. There are crowds of the innocent, the injured, the unhappy; my bosom glows to pity and relieve them, and they tell me my path will be swarmed with traitors, fools, bigots, and tyrants. I burn to show, by my words and actions, how I detest and despise them. My impatience can be no longer curbed. I fly to relieve my suspense."

Farther and yet farther we strolled on through the fair woods, till a brilliant city rose before us, and we passed unnoticed among its countless crowds. About us were lights flashing, feet shuffling, music bursting, voices mingling, cries for pity, exclamations of mirth. All was gaiety and misery; grace, beauty, disease, and trembling old age; splendor and sickly want, strangely mingled together.

A spacious mansion rose to view, illuminated, and revealing signs of a merry and a costly festival. We passed in with the tide of brilliant fashion and greatness. My eyes and my soul were dazzled. As I gazed around the apartment my glances met those of a maiden of enchanting loveliness. Her face was sweet and radiant. I spoke to her. I seemed to have known her long.

"Gentle girl," said I, "tell me the history of your life."

"Behold it around me," she said. "I have always dwelt thus in the midst of splendor."

"Then," said I, "at length I have found one who will consent to live over again the years that are gone."

"Not for worlds," she said. "I am on the eve of accomplishing an object on which my whole happiness is staked. My past life has been wasted in fruitless wishes, but my reward is at hand, and the future will repay all."

The gay banquet disappeared, and in its place stood a cottage, secluded from the noisy haunts of life. An aged man sat by the door, in the shadow; his face was marked and noble, but he shook with the weight of extreme old age. His soul was yet young and ardent, but his mortal system was fast falling to ruin. Faintly his feeble eyes received the glimmering images of outward objects. Beautiful nature was to him a dim and distant dream. Even the carol of the birds, which burst forth in many places around, came almost unheard to his aged ear; and when he would move his seat, as the declining sun flung the shadow in another direction, his trembling limbs scarcely supported his weak and faltering steps.

"Blessed spirit," exclaimed I to the Genius, "what a melancholy wonder, what a striking ruin is age! What strange reflections must throng through the mind of this helpless creature! How unearthly must be his feelings! How hushed his passions! His memory! into what a world it has broadened! His hope! how it has dwindled into nothing, respecting all human things! What a wretch is this, without the conviction of a future existence! To feel himself gradually sliding from the scenes of day, his vigor departing, his senses failing, his affections dying. His use and importance as a human being passed away. The ties which bound him to earth, one after the other, snapped asunder, and the ground on which he stands gliding from beneath his feet."

"He is, indeed," said the Genius, apparently useless, "but yet with what a majesty time has invested him. How the idle mirth or the narrow and repining melancholy of your bosom dies away before the look of that silent gray head. Wherever you meet it, master student, whether in the halls of science and splendor, or in the cottage of the poor and the low, reverence old age. It has a wisdom beyond books, and a grandeur above genius. Its thoughts are elevated; its heart is purified; its sensual fires are burnt out; its slowly lifted feet are already treading in the shadow and coldness of death; it will expire without sympathy, with all that it has treasured of experience and knowledge."

"And yet," rejoined I, "how often time in the human bosom only deepens prejudice, and confirms the dominion of some predominant passion. It has ever been the impulse of my nature to bow down before the silver head, yet an insight into the world too often checks the impulses of nature, causes us to suspect where we have trusted, to despise what we revered; to turn away coldly from that which in youth we loved. We find the detestable heart of the miser hugging base schemes of avarice under a withered bosom; and the mad brain of the bigot plotting cruelty and fraud beneath locks whitened by time."

We were interrupted by the entrance of a boy about three years old, gifted with grace and beauty. There was something in the soft and happy tones of his voice, and the freshness and perfection of his countenance, sufficient to extort admiration from a cynic; and, as he clambered up on the old man's knee, wound his little arms around his neck, placed his full red pouting mouth against the dry and withered lips, and looked up with his large, floating, and brilliant orbs into the weak and rheumy eyes of his venerable parent, the contrast was striking.

"Miserable age!" I exclaimed involuntarily, "beautiful, beautiful childhood! Youth and decrepitude, how strangely they seem thus together, even as a bursting dew-washed bud breaking from beneath a crumbling ruin. Wonderful medley of grace, hope, and loveliness; and of disease, impotency, and despair. How oddly yon golden curls lie over the wrinkled temple; and the breeze blows the snowy lock upon the dimpled cheek of the boy, while his soft and innocent hand pauses over that broad, time-worn, and thoughtful forehead. "Tell me, old man," I exclaimed, "how wouldst thou reward him who could restore to thee this child's unshaded youth, and give thee to retrace thy path, now so nearly ended?"

"With my tears," he answered: "my existence, stranger, has been blessed with many joys, but with more disappointments. In yonder graveyard sleeps the wife of my bosom, and by her side our daughter, the mother of this angel boy. My son's bones are whitening on a foreign shore. I set out in life with brilliant hopes of fame and happiness, all of which I have long outlived. I have struggled through painful diseases; I have nearly fallen amidst sore temptations; and while I press to my bosom this dear relic of those I loved, and shall see no more, I regard him with compassion, not envy. My favorite fancy paints me stretched out peacefully in death; this feeble hand still, these weary eyes closed, this brain, which has formed so many fair visions and awful fears, rested at length and forever; if my spirit could indeed hover above the mean and decaying tenement which it had happily abandoned, it would look down upon it a moment before it unfolds its wings for a better existence, and address it thus: 'Rest, unhappy image, rest. At length thy cares are over. No more shall disease torture thy limbs, and anguish wrench and crush thy heart. Pangs shall not again rack that white and tranquil forehead, nor those cheeks be excruciated with the agony which tells that impatient decay has commenced its ravages even before thou art laid with the worms. Tears have ceased to swell those stiffening lids, and sighs to agitate that peaceful bosom. Rest, remnant of wretchedness, thy toils are over. Poverty, like a poisonous shade, shall no more wither thy budding hopes, nor disappointment freeze thy affections with its wintry blast. Images of forbidden joy shall not haunt thee, palsying thy proud energies, and prostrating thy soul in the dust. Thy task is done. Peaceful night descends around, from which no revolting reality shall startle thee. Thy once stormy bosom is hushed into a calm, which neither disease nor unkindness, nor thine own ungoverned passions, can break. Rest, perturbed and weary creature, rest forever!'"

The cottage, the gentle child, the trembling old man were gone. The Genius also had disappeared. I was again alone in my chamber, awed with the mysteries of human life. F.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

THE VAIN MAN.

GENTLE reader, you have been before with me into my study, and will, I trust, remember the sketch of the Careless Man. Here is a gentleman, whom I beg leave to introduce to your notice; "and any attention," as they say in letters of introduction, "would confer a great favor on your humble servant." This is, positively, one of the happiest fellows that ever existed.

"A happy fellow?" say you. Some fine-looking young buck, with a fortune; some author, whose play has succeeded; some sentimental youth, whose mistress has just blushed and said "yes, or —." By your leave, fair reader, you are altogether out of the way. This is the vain man, and his vanity is his bliss. He is as ugly as man may well be; but observe how exuberantly delighted he is before a looking-glass. With what an air of exquisite satisfaction he steals a side glance at the mimic chamber, in the clear expanse, wherein is seated in graceful attitude no less a personage than his amiable and accomplished self. He helps you to a piece of the meat, and snatches a glance; he tells you his grandmother is dangerously ill, and takes a peep; he stretches forth his arm for some gravy, and watches himself with a sly gratification, which concentrates all the strength of the company in their risible muscles. It is perfectly impossible for him to exist near a glass without investigating the peculiar state of his own countenance and apparel, at that particular moment. He frowns, and looks fierce; he smiles, and dissolves, as it were, into an amiable fascination. If mirrors reflected the fancies as well as facts, you should see big bullies running away from him; and beautiful women, all round the room, bending on him their approving glances. He arranges the curls about his forehead, turns in the extreme point of his collar, so as to form an angle just this side of perceptibility. He lifts his eyes to the two elegant orbs which light him from within; and while students are toiling, warriors fighting, while poets are racking their imagination for ideas, and immortal painters bending wearily, and with pale faces, over the pallet, Sir Thingumbob here is your happy man. By the mass, he is your true philosopher. He dwells in a continual halo. Real genius faints in its track. True learning stands appalled at the immensity of that of which it must forever remain in ignorance; but this one is forever satisfied. He detects admiration in every glance. He is perpetually filled with pleasing contemplations; his whole life is a fine dream, full of the advantages of reality without its certain penalties, its bitter sorrows. Let any diffident young gentleman calculate his sufferings from bashfulness or modesty—from all this the vain man is free. He never trembles, lest he should not succeed in an undertaking; and when he fails, he never troubles himself with upbraidings. He finds a cause in himself for every welcome occurrence, and blames others for whatever is disagreeable.

Why what a spell is this same vanity, which thus rejects every thing unpleasant, and appropriates every thing delightful; and yet, (alas, alas, that there should be nothing bright on earth without a shadow,) it does sometimes lead to trouble. There are odd misconceptions which one does not like to be caught in.

My friend Albert is one of these gifted fellows. He is always studying effect. He lives for it; it is the secret of his kindness and charity. For it he is careful in his person, and most conciliating in his manners. His attitudes are taken from statuary, his expressions are none of them extemporaneous. Humor his weakness, and you may lead him blindfolded at pleasure; wound his self-pride, and you had better put your foot on a sleeping snake. He confessed to me, one evening, that a charming girl had a concealed passion for him. He sat beside her, and amused her by ridiculing a plain young man on the opposite side of the room. My friend was witty, at least he thought so, and I was myself rather surprised at the mirth with which she received his facetious observations.

"Is she not divine?" asked he.

"She is, certainly, a sensible girl."

"I swear I'll marry her in a year," said he. "Did you hear her laugh when I dissected the great beetle who has been all night blundering about her?"

Touching this matrimonial plan, my friend might doubtless have kept his word, but from the slight difficulty occasioned by the "great beetle," who the next morning married her himself, and "blundered" off with her to the falls of Niagara. SEDLEY.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

FROM THE MANUSCRIPT OF A MURDERER.

BY H. PLUNKETT, ESQ.

THANK heaven, the crisis is near! Even now, as my quivering hand records this slight memorial of my fate, the chill damp of death overspreads my brow. I have dallied and dallied with my task, until stern necessity imperiously calls upon me either to perform it, or sink unknown and unremembered into the silent grave. Death! Annihilation! What a volume of untold horrors dwells in those two simple words! I call to remembrance the philosophy which in the heyday of youth and spirits was so congenial to my mind, to aid me in this horrible dilemma. I invoke the shades of Voltaire and Rousseau, whose tenets I credited with so much ardor, and pursued with such wild avidity in the days of youth, to direct me from the path into which they have led me; they seem but to deride my exertions—to exult in my tortures. Why is this death so fearful? Wherefore do we cling—as though enamored—to this weak breath, and dread with so much horror the hour which shall shut us from the hopes, joys, fancies, and sympathies of earth? By what fatality does it happen that we would rather live on, victims to the keenest pangs of agony, than allow our life-stream to terminate in the dark ocean of eternity? Death! Annihilation! horrible!

But enough of this. Let me employ the few remaining hours of existence in collecting and recording my scattered recollections of the scenes of by-gone days. Ere the life spark be extinct, let me endeavor to afford the means of awakening in some kind breast one sympathetic throb for a being whose earthly course has been one continued tissue of misery. Oh! how the cold breath of winter and the damp dews of midnight have crept through my veins, and curdled in my life-blood! Even now, whilst I write, an universal tremor agitates my frame; but I have sought my fate, and manfully will I undergo the ordeal. I have been scorned as mad—I have been avoided as mad—I have been branded as mad—but mad I am not.

They never loved me—never. I was their first born, and all the little tendernesses and cares which a child so naturally expects, were, at my expense, lavished upon my younger brother. The genial current of affection was frozen in my heart, ere yet opportunity had been allowed for its gushing springs to reveal the richness of their depths. The warm hopes and sympathies so eminently peculiar to the season of boyhood—the many feelings and blisses which a heart so exquisitely moulded must otherwise have experienced—all which tended to make the past cherished, the present lovely, and the future sought after, were imprisoned in the cold chills of recklessness. I felt as one who stands alone in the desert, with no hand to direct, no companion to cheer him. I was never an encourager of idle fictions, but it was impossible for me, ~~at that~~ ^{in that} solate as I was, to look up to the blue firmament, and not link my fate with one of the bright ~~stars~~ ^{stars} which so often greeted mine eye. ~~There was one pale star—I know not why—but as its brilliancy or darkness alternated, I felt that my inmost soul sympathized with its changes; and as its brightness waned or burned, I too rejoiced or mourned.~~ The feeling, I know, was idle, but it captivated my fancy, and I indulged it. Oh! how my heart throbbed under the accumulation of pent-up feelings which loaded it to anguish! At home it was remarked that my manners grew misanthropic, and my countenance morose. I became impatient of the restraint of society, and burned with a feverish longing for the time which should free me from its control. I know not how to account for this; but a fatality seemed to urge me onwards, although I felt that it was adverse to the warm feelings of my nature. My days rolled on like the development of an almost inexplicable dream; and my existence seemed to be confined to the imagination alone. And for this was I stigmatized with the title of maniac!*

I loved her—deeply, passionately loved her. It was my first flame, and I indulged it with all the ardor of a young and enthusiastic spirit. My best feelings had so long, from necessity, been confined to their own sanctuary—my hopes, my sympathies, my passions, had so long been chilled by the apathy of solitude—that now, when a blessed channel was afforded by which they might gush forth, my sickened heart almost sunk beneath its excess of bliss; for the reaction was too powerful for its weakened faculties. When, in what place, and by what means we became acquainted, it recks but little; suffice, a mutual flame was established, a passion which was revealed alone by the mute but appealing eloquence of sighs. Our love was an ecstasy of pleasures and pangs; a sense of overwrought happiness and misery, blended withal so exquisitely, that, agonizing as it was, I would not have exchanged those dear pains for all the hollow happiness of the world. She was my Eden, my hope. For her sake alone did I live; in her happiness alone found pleasure, in her sorrows my deepest grief. We felt that our love would be unavailing; but both the mariner cling less wildly to the floating straw because he feels that its assistance will be useless? Despair but gave a zest to our passion, and, incredible as it may appear, our hearts were entwined together with more tenacity as difficulties increased around us. The wearied spirit must cling to some prop, from which death alone can effect its disunion. We loved as few have loved, as few can love; we suffered as few have suffered, as I trust, few may suffer. It was not by the bonds of worldly affection that our hearts were united; we slighted the sickly glare and vain weakness of that flame which can be fanned by a smile or quenched by a tear. Our passion had been kindled in silence, and nurtured in grief; our communings had been cherished in fear; we had been mute companions in sorrow. We knew that we were doomed to part as we had met, in silence and in tears; and we did part; how, or when, I know not. But even now, at the distance of so many years, the horrid truth flashes upon me like a remembrance which we would fain discard, but which, in spite of our efforts, again and again recurs. Yes! we did part;—would to heaven it had been for ever!**

'Twas thus the stream of time rolled on. Once again my step trod the land of my fathers, but in loneliness and sadness. All the currents of affection—all that can infuse into the wearied heart consolation for the past, hope for the future, were dried within me. The blasted oak lives on at the root, although its every branch be withered, its every protection faded; and thus it was with me. My heart was like a bleak and arid wilderness, with no stream of hope to revive its dreary dearth, no current of joy to awaken it to earthly sympathies. I could not sigh—the effort would have been too much for endurance. I could not weep—the fountain of tears was frozen in my soul.

But I must be brief; I feel the death-pang preying upon my vitals, and my quivering hand and fainting spirits reveal too well how short is the space allotted to me. Carelessly I passed what was formerly the home of my parents; they had been the cause of all my misery, and their brutal want of affection was certainly not lost upon me. Another quarter of an hour found me seated in the alcove in which my stolen interviews had been held with Emily; on the same seat, beholding the same prospect, and indulging in the same feelings as at our last meeting. She too had been there; a slight form which I marked at a distance in the garden, bade me indulge the hope that she was not far off. Language were weak to depict my feelings at that critical moment. She approached—she entered! Good heavens! how altered, and yet how passing beautiful! She saw me; but no smile of recognition played on her cheeks, no shriek of astonishment listened in her eye. A shriek—a deadly shriek—burst from her lips, and she fell senseless into my arms. Suddenly, however, starting up as if ashamed of her weakness, she cast upon me a look which pierced my very soul. It was but a look; but that heart must indeed have been of adamant, which had not shrunk from its withering gaze. I called upon her, but she did not answer; I entreated her, but she did not hear me; I pronounced her name, but my words died on the air: there she stood, motionless, senseless, and almost breathless. There was a vacancy in her stare, an idiotic expression in her countenance, which told but too well that her reason had fled. She seemed almost to gasp for breath; so eager, so intense was the one feeling which predominated in her soul. On a sudden, however, starting from her reverie, and uttering an unearthly yell of laughter, she rushed from the arbour. I followed, and endeavored to retain her; but her fragile form, endued at that moment with an almost supernatural energy, eluded my grasp, and she continued her course to the mansion. This was, however, but the frenzy of a moment. Returning, if possible, even at a more hurried pace than that with which she had departed, she again entered the arbour. "Ay, I knew it would be thus!" exclaimed she, as she grasped my hand with fervor; "I knew, in spite of all their arguments, that my dire forebodings could not be based on unreality. I felt that my heart could not thus yearn, were not the object of all its wishes still unnumbered with the dead." "Dead!" ejaculated I, in a wild and hurried tone. "Good heavens! what can have given rise to this horrible illusion? Emily, if you still retain any regard for the miserable object of your earliest affections, keep me not thus in suspense, but ——" "Henry," resumed she, "be not thus impatient. When last I addressed thee, thou wert a boy, not thou art a man; with the image of childhood, divest thyself of its passions, and act and speak as the man that thou art. I am thy brother's wife! Ay, upon his bosom must this aching head repose; to him must I look forward for the consummation of my miseries. O, Henry!" she continued, "hadst thou been able to analyze the many and tumultuous feelings which racked my soul when two days ago I acknowledged as my husband the wretch whom I abhorred, and with a prophet's glance saw the secrets of the dreary future unveiled to my gaze, thou hadst indeed pitied the hapless victim of thy treachery!" "Good heaven!" rejoined I; "what can this mean? The shade of some dark unfathomable mystery seems to brood over me." "What?" interrupted she, "is it possible that my imaginings can have been unfounded? Oh! I thought it must be thus; I knew that the vows which we cherished with so much ardor, and in the face of so many dangers, could not be so easily broken. No! they told me that the object of my fond, my first love, had been faithless to his trust; and she proved ere she, also, have persuaded me, that he was dead;" and she paused ere she again repeated the word, "ay dead;" but I knew that they were deceiving me: and now that he has returned—returned to claim me for his own—they have forced me into an union more horrible than a thousand deaths. They have deluded me! but let them beware: I will have my revenge!" The earnest and impassioned tone in which she gave vent to the gloomy feelings of her spirit, awed me, in despite of myself, into an almost breathless silence. I felt as though I were in the presence of a superior being; and it was not until she had concluded, that I ventured to embody in words the agony of thought which pressed its leaden weight upon me. At length, however, I ventured to exclaim—"Lead me, my Emily—lead me to the wretches who, with their execrable falsehoods, have so played upon your credulity; and even though ranged among my nearest kindred, I will hesitate not to chastise their unaccountable villany." "Again and again must I repeat to you, be not impatient. Impetuosity will fail to effect that purpose, which our cooler reason will aid us to accomplish without difficulty. For the present we must part. When the village clock tolls the hour of midnight, meet me in my private apartment. Be punctual—be cautious; till then, farewell!" and she once more departed from my presence.**

The last stroke of the bell tolled the hour of midnight; I entered, by means of a private passage, into the secret chamber, where Emily impatiently awaited my arrival. Seizing my hand with a firm and unflinching grasp, and addressing me in a low, but not tremulous accent. "Art thou a man?" said she, at the same time fixing upon me a look of fearful and withering import. Surprised at this strange commencement of an interview which I had been inclined to suppose would have been carried on in a far different spirit, and unable to divine the cause of so abrupt an interrogation, I answered rather petulantly—"I trust that by no action of my life have I yet forfeited that title." "Speak low," replied she, cautiously; "the very walls have ears, and the winds themselves will, in the face of heaven, proclaim this horrible deed." A sudden chill came over me. Could it be, then, that the innocent Emily, whose artless eloquence had a few hours previously taken so strong a hold of my affections, was now to become my murderer? The appearance of a short dagger, which she at that moment withdrew from the folds of the robe which enveloped her form, fully confirmed my suspicions. Was she, then, insane? As the horrible conjecture struck me, with the aid of that power which the mind so pre-eminently possesses of concentrating in one point things apparently remote and anomalous, did I pass in review before me each action which she had committed—each word she had spoken—and too well did they verify my surmises. The fervor of her accent, and the impassioned gesture of her manner, the restlessness of her eye, all tended to convince me that the throne of reason had been usurped. In a low and hurried tone of voice she continued—"What infatuation is this? You have affirmed that you are a man; let not your actions disprove the assertion: nay, shrink not, but follow me!" She then, with a swift and noiseless step, led the way into the ante-room; and having ascertained that our movements were unobserved, continued her course into her bedchamber. Approaching the bed, and with one hand putting the lamp over the features of her ill-fated husband, to observe if the occasion was favorable to the meditated deed, and with the other suspending the dagger over his naked breast, whilst her whole countenance displayed the workings of a deadly and implacable hatred, she bade me approach. Merciful heaven! what was my astonishment on discovering that the intended victim was, indeed, my brother! It mattered not at that moment what had been my injuries, or how deep soever the malediction which, in the bitterness of my anguish, I had vented upon him; the imminent danger of his present situation was sufficient to dispel all feelings of rancor from my breast, and to rouse within me the affections of the brother. "Fiend!" exclaimed I, half choked with indignation, and at the same time I wrested the dagger from her hold. The disturbance which necessarily attended this struggle, added to the noise occasioned by the lamp as it fell from the grasp of Emily, aroused my slumbering brother—aroused him, alas! but to plunge him into a torpor yet more profound; ere time had been allowed him to inquire into the nature of the confusion, he was no more! The blow had descended; one, and one only groan announced the passage of his spirit to its eternal home: he had fallen by my hand. By what infatuation I know not, but scarcely had I obtained the dagger within my power, than, ere opportunity had been given for reflection, it was buried in my brother's breast. My brain reeled, my limbs refused to perform their office, and with the loud yells of laughter which proceeded from the lips of Emily, my senses utterly deserted me. *****

London Magazine.

THE ALIAS, OR MR. ST. JOHN.

"I always walk my horse into a town or up to a hotel door," said Phil, as we descended the last sand bank to Saratoga village, and passed leisurely the spring at Congress-hall.

He sat on the left side, driving—a peculiarity of his own, adopted like most of his other whims, from a horror of being like other people—his eccentric palm-leaf sombrero inclined at the merest possible angle to his left eye, and his rein-hand held up, as if for a graceful gesture, at about the second button.

It was just evening, and the great piazza was crowded with promenaders. I was a stranger to the gay crowd myself, but as the Stanhope stopped, couple after couple recognised Phil; and we were surrounded, before we could set foot upon the ground, by beaux and belles, all in that atmosphere of free manners, ready to throw off the metropolitan reserve, and give an uproarious welcome to one of the most agreeable men on the park. With some difficulty we reached our rooms at last, and were about preparing for a toilet when the bell rang for tea. I felt the summons sensitively, for Phil had refused to dine on the road because the "Half-moon" smelt of herring; and I looked forward to the bathing, and brushing, and cravatting that was before me with a melancholy foreboding of appetite. My resolution was soon made.

"Phil!" shouted I, talking at the top of my voice through the lattice over the door, "I think I'll go to tea before dressing."

"You'll be sent to Coventry if you do," answered the dandy, in a tone of deliberate conviction.

It sounded like a knell, but appetite is imperative. I knew I was sun-burnt and flushed—I knew my travelling coat was excessively unbecoming—I knew I was grimed beyond the redemption of any thing but a two hours' lavation in rose-water and cream, by the dust of the worst of roads—I knew I looked more like a blacksmith's 'prentice (I was never handsome—but I can dress) than a gentleman scholar—but in the hope of getting a seat unobserved at the bottom of the table, and coming back to pursue my toilet leisurely and philosophically, (an impossible thing, let me say, with an appetite,) I ventured.

I had come to Saratoga, by the way, with an object. One of the most admired women there was a sister of an old college friend, who, with a brother's fondness on one side, and a friend's on the other, had praised me to his sister, and his sister to me, till between descriptions, and postscripts, and the thousand indefinite modes of mystifying one another, we were mutually curious to meet. With this explanation I go on.

The two immense tables, stretched down in long and busy perspective through the hall, crowded with the five hundred fashionables and "would-be-so's," and the knives and spoons and women's voices, (men never talk till the meal is over,) were mingled in bewildering confusion. With some difficulty I found a seat—just vacated by an invalid—and hoping that I had stepped in unobserved, I sent for a cold bird, and played my knife and fork in busy silence.

Birds, berries, and bread and butter gave me no courage. I had finished my meal, but I sat looking up the long line of faces on the opposite side, speculating on one physiognomy and then another, and selecting future acquaintances from the pretty and the piquant. All at once my eye caught upon a side-face I had seen before, and a sudden turn, and a mutual recognition, left me no hope of escape. There sat my old friend; and I knew instantly, by the resemblance, that the tall, magnificent creature at his side was his sister! I felt the blood rush into my face like a broken sluice. You never saw me blush!—(thank heaven, I never do except upon surprise)—it's horrible! My eyes, nose, forehead were purple—I knew it—I could see every vein in my mind's spectrum! I saw Harry speak to his sister. Her eyes were on me in an instant; and, as I turned half away, and almost burst a blood-vessel in trying to look unconscious, I could see by my side eye that her glass was raised, and I felt it go down to my dress, and up to my red forehead, and my flattened hair, and about my slovenly cravat—what did I not suffer? I had no power to move, and I had forgotten in my confusion the commonest ruse by which I might have avoided her. I was seen and scrutinized, and as I edged out of the hall in agony, I debated whether I had better insult my old friend, and so avoid an introduction, or drown myself in the bath—either seemed paradise to my present feelings.

Harry was in my room before I could get the door closed.

"What could tempt you to come to the table looking so like the devil?"

"Why, in the name of all the saints, did you point me out to your sister?"

In a long four years of intimacy we had never come so near quarrelling. He told me frankly that his sister was disagreeably surprised at my appearance, and I sat down on the bed and cursed my stars till I was tired.

Well—I bathed, and dressed, and at nine o'clock Harry was in my room again.

"Gertrude will never recognize you," said he, measuring me from head to foot. "You are exquisitely dressed, and look as little like the blushing youth at the table as I like Hyperion."

A thought struck me! I was always impudent by candle-light, and I determined on my ~~instantly~~ ^{instantly}. I remembered that, though very tall, I was rather short-bodied, and looked like a small man at table, and trusting to the metamorphose of a studied toilet, I proposed to Harry to introduce me by another name. It was agreed upon as soon as mentioned.

The rooms were brilliantly lighted, and the band playing a march. The ball had not commenced. Fifty or sixty couples, however, were promenading round the room, and among them Harry, with his sister upon his arm. I settled my cravat, and with an assurance that would have astonished myself by daylight, lounged coolly and alone up the middle of the splendid hall, my head slightly inclined in a collected modesty, and my glass passing leisurely over the feet only of the gaily dressed promenaders. I felt that every eye in the room was upon me, but I was sure of my self-possession. As Harry came round, I caught once more, with a side glance, the glitter of a glass levelled full upon my figure, and my hopes sprang like Mercury at the sound of the low silver-toned—"Who is he?"

"A college acquaintance of mine, Mr. St. John," said Harry.

"Does he talk as well as he dresses?"

I did not hear the answer, but a moment after the manager clapped his hands for cotillions, and Harry came to present me.

I cannot, of course, speak otherwise than in general terms of my progress in my partner's favor. I had the advantage of having read her letters for four years, and I knew every trait and taste she possessed, both natural and acquired, and my knowledge of her character must have seemed like intuition. I could quote all her favorite authors, and I remembered her own quotations, and did not fail, of course, to introduce them; and the similarity of taste seemed wonderful. We went out upon the piazza after the first dance, and paced its dim-lighted length till the ball was over—four glorious hours! And we parted at two—very good friends, certainly.

I had my name entered upon the books as Mr. St. John. I gave Phil the cue (he was very near betraying me twenty times a day,) and no one else knew me. The veritable Mr. R— (Harry made his regrets to his sister) was supposed to be sick in his room, overheated with travel. Gertrude said in my ear she was not sorry—for she "had seen him, and, spite of Harry's eulogies, he was the ugliest man she ever saw." I pulled up my collar, and hemmed instinctively at the assertion. *****

Some six weeks after this I was standing behind a sofa on which sat the lady of whom I have spoken. It was a fine October day, clear and of a delicious coolness, and she had stopped at the end of a canto to look out through the low long windows upon the beautiful lawn—indulging, apparently, some unbidden thought. I stood silently gazing down upon her polished forehead, and musing with a trembling pleasure on her excessive beauty and her noble mind, unwilling to break the charm either of her thoughts or my own. Harry entered with a letter, and without looking at the superscription she thanked him, and was quietly slipping it under her belt, to be read at leisure, when he laid his finger upon her hand, and begged her, with an equivocal smile, to attend to it immediately. I had stepped back to the extreme corner of the room as she broke the seal; and while she read it, stood pulling to pieces a splendid exotic, which had just been brought out from the green-house—the most valued flower she had.

"How could he presume—"

"But my dear Gertrude—"

It was only by fragments that I caught the earnest conversation between them. For ten or fifteen minutes I stood in agony. At last they seemed to agree, and Harry called to me.

"St. John! You shall decide! Gertrude refers it to you. Here is my old friend Mr. R—, a man whom I have loved like a brother for years, and whose character and good qualities I thoroughly know. He wrote to Gertrude when we were in college together, and she to him, like brother and sister, and though they have never been fairly introduced, they are as well acquainted with each others' characters as she and yourself. On the strength of my interest and this acquaintance, he romantically enough offers himself to her, here, in this letter. He is rich, of a leading family, and my best friend; and yet she calls his generous offer impertinence, and will not even answer the letter unless you decide against her."

An indignant tear stood in the dark eye that appealed to me as he stopped.

"Is it left to me," I asked; "quite—and will you abide by my decision?"

Harry left the room abruptly. As the door closed, I walked round the sofa, and with a trembling voice and a doubting heart pleaded my own cause against the presuming stranger; offering my poverty and my love instead of the wealth and consequence of my rival. I presume I was eloquent. I know I was earnest.

Harry's voice in the entry raised me from my knee, and in a moment he came laughing in, and called for the decision.

"You promise," said I, rising, and looking at the beautiful girl as she quelled her emotion, "you promise solemnly to marry your brother's friend, Mr. R—, if I say it is my wish."

She looked playfully into my face—"I do!" She little expected my reply.

"Then marry him!" said I, solemnly, "and may heaven bless you!"

For an instant she fixed her eyes upon me as if she doubted whether she had heard rightly. The color fled from her cheek, and her hands dropped at her side, and for a moment I repented bitterly the idle trick I had practised. It was explained as soon as she recovered sufficiently, and my repentance vanished with my pardon, for I had won her when she believed me poor, with a dazzling rival and a pleading brother against me; and the "ugliest man she ever saw" is Mr. R— (alias Mr. St. John) and her husband. LITERARY NOTICES.

Classical Family Library. Xenophon. 2 vols. 8mo. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

THESE volumes comprise the Anabasis and the Cyropædia—the former translated by E. Spelman, the latter by Maurice A. Cooper. The celebrated "retreat of the ten thousand," under Xenophon, presented at a moderate price and in a neat form, is a welcome and valuable addition to our rapidly augmenting stock of publications, and the history of Cyrus will be acknowledged as one of the most excellent works which could have been selected. The style of these histories is marked by a pleasant and natural simplicity peculiar to the author, whose mind seemed more intent on pouring out its full treasures to the reader, in the shortest and clearest manner, than in dressing out his thoughts in gaudy apparel. We subjoin the account of the death of Cyrus. Nothing can be more plain and dignified than the closing sentence, which is every way worthy of the historian.

"When he had finished his sacrifices and prayer, he returned home, and finding himself disposed to be quiet, he lay down. At a certain hour proper persons attended, and offered him to wash. He told them that he had rested very well. Then, at another hour, proper officers brought him his supper; but Cyrus had no appetite to eat, but seemed thirsty, and drank with pleasure. And continuing thus the second and third days, he sent for his sons, who, as it happened, had attended their father, and were then in Persia. He summoned, likewise, his friends and the magistrates of Persia. When they were all met, he began in this manner:

"Children, and all you, my friends, here present, the conclusion of my life is now at hand, which I certainly know from many symptoms. You ought, when I am dead, to act and speak of me in every thing as a happy man; for, when I was a child, I seemed to have received advantage from what is esteemed worthy and handsome in children; so, likewise, when I was a youth, from what is esteemed so in young men; so, when I came to be a man, from what is esteemed worthy and handsome in men. And I have always seemed to observe myself increase with time in strength and vigor, so that I have not found myself weaker or more infirm in my old age than in my youth. Neither do I know that I have desired or undertaken any thing in which I have not succeeded. By my means my friends have been made happy, and my enemies enslaved; and my country, at first inconsiderable in Asia, I leave in great reputation and honor. Neither do I know that I have not preserved whatever I acquired. And though, in time past, all things have succeeded according to my wishes, yet an apprehension lest, in process of time, I should see, hear, or suffer some difficulty, has not suffered me to be too much elated, or too extravagantly delighted. Now, if I die, I leave you, children, behind me, (whom the gods have given me) and I leave my country and my friends happy. Ought not I, therefore, in justice, to be always remembered, and mentioned as fortunate and happy? I must, likewise, declare to whom I leave my kingdom, lest that being doubtful, should hereafter raise dissensions among you. Now, children, I bear an equal affection to you both, but I direct that the elder should have the advising and conducting of affairs, as his age requires it, and it is probable he has more experience. And as I have been instructed by my country and yours to give place to those older than myself, not only brothers, but fellow-citizens, both in walking, sitting, and speaking, so have I instructed you, from your youth, to show a regard to your elders, and to receive the like from such as were inferior to you in age: receive then this disposition as ancient, customary, and legal. Do you, therefore, Cambyses, hold the kingdom, as allotted you by the gods and by me, so far as it is in my power. To you, Tanoaxares, I bequeath the satrapy of the Medes, Armenians, and Cadusians, which, when I allot you, I think I leave your elder brother a larger empire, and the title of a kingdom, but to you a happiness freer from care and vexation: for I do not see what human satisfaction you can need; but you will enjoy whatever appears agreeable and pleasing to men. An affection for such things as are difficult to execute, a multitude of pains, and an impossibility of being quiet, anxiety from an emulation of my actions, forming designs yourself, and having designs formed against you; these are things which must more necessarily attend a king than one in your station; and be assured these give many interruptions to pleasure and satisfaction. Know, therefore, Cambyses, that it is not the golden sceptre which can preserve your kingdom, but faithful friends are a prince's truest and securest sceptre. But do not imagine that men are naturally faithful, (for then they would appear so to all, as other natural endowments do) but every one must render others faithful to himself; and they are not to be procured by violence, but rather by kindness and beneficence. If, therefore, you would constitute other joint guardians with you of your kingdom, whom can you better begin with than him who is of the same blood with yourself? And fellow-citizens are nearer to us than strangers, and those who live and eat with us than those that do not. And those who have the same original, who have been nourished by the same mother, and grown up in the same father, and beloved by the same parents, and who call on the same father and mother, are not they, of all others, the nearest to us? Do not you, therefore, render those advantages fruitless by which the gods unite brothers in affinity and relation; but to those advantages add other friendly offices, and by that means your friendship will be reciprocally solid and lasting. The taking care of a brother is providing for one's self. To whom can the advancement of a brother be equally honorable as to a brother? Who can show a regard to a great and powerful man equal to his brother? Who will fear to injure another so much as him whose brother is in an exalted station? Be therefore second to none in submission and good-will to your brother, since no one can be so particularly serviceable or injurious to you. And I would have you consider how you can hope for greater advantages by obliging any one so much as him. Or whom can you assist that will be so powerful an ally in war? Or what is more infamous than want of friendship between brothers? Who, of all men, can we so handsomely pay regard to as to a brother? In a word, Cambyse, your brother is the only one you can advance next to your person without the envy of others. Therefore, in the name of the gods, children, have regard for one another, if you are careful to do what is acceptable to me. For you ought not to imagine, you certainly know, that after I have closed this period of human life I shall no longer exist; for neither do you now see my soul, but you conclude, from its operations, that it does exist. And have you not observed what terrors and apprehensions murderers are inspired with by those who have suffered violence from them? What racks and tortures do they convey to the guilty? Or how do you think honors should have continued to be paid to the deceased, if their souls were destitute of all power and virtue? No, children, I can never be persuaded that the soul lives no longer than it dwells in this mortal body, and that it dies on its separation; for I see that the soul communicates vigor and motion to mortal bodies during its continuance in them. Neither can I be persuaded that the soul is divested of intelligence on its separation from this gross senseless body; but it is probable that when the soul is separated it becomes pure and entire, and is then more intelligent. It is evident that, on man's dissolution, every part of him returns to what is of the same nature with itself, except the soul; that alone is invisible, both during its presence here, and at its departure. And you may have observed that nothing resembles death so much as sleep; but then it is that the human soul appears most divine, and has a prospect of fatality; for then it is probable the soul is most free and independent. If, therefore, things are as I think, and that the soul leaves the body, having regard to my soul, comply with my request. But if it be otherwise, and that the soul, continuing in the body, perishes with it, let nothing appear in your thoughts or actions criminal or impious, for fear of the gods, who are eternal, whose power and inspection extend over all things, and who preserve the harmony and order of the universe free from decay or defect, whose greatness and beauty are inexplicable! Next to the gods, have regard to the whole race of mankind, in perpetual succession; for the gods have not concealed you in obscurity, but there is a necessity that your actions should be conspicuous to the world. If they are virtuous and free from injustice, they will give you power and interest in all men; but if you project what is unjust against each other, no man will trust you, for no one can place a confidence in you, though his inclination to it be ever so great, when he sees you unjust where it most becomes you to be a friend. If, therefore, I have not rightly instructed you what you ought to be to one another, learn it from those who lived before our time, for that will be the best lesson. For there are many who have lived affectionate parents to their children and friends to their brothers; and some there are who have acted the opposite part towards each other. Whichever of these you shall observe to have been most advantageous, you will do well in giving it the preference in your choice. But perhaps this is sufficient as to these matters. When I am dead, children, do not enshrine my body in gold nor in silver, nor any thing else, but lay it in the earth as soon as possible; for what can be more happy than to mix with the earth which gives birth and nourishment to all things excellent and good? And as I have always hitherto borne an affection to men, so it is now most pleasing to me to incorporate with that which is beneficial to men. Now, said he, 'it seems to me that my soul is beginning to leave me, in the same manner as it is probable it begins its departure with others. If, therefore, any of you are desirous of touching my right hand, or willing to see my face while it has life, come near to me: for when I shall have covered it, I request of you, children, that neither yourselves nor any others will look on my body. Summon all the Persians and their allies before my tomb to rejoice for me; that I shall be then out of danger of suffering any evil, whether I shall be with the gods or shall be reduced to nothing. As many as come, do you dismiss with all those favors that are thought proper for a happy man. And, said he, 'remember this as my last and dying words. If you do kindnesses to your friends, you will be able to injure your enemies. Farewell, dear children, and tell this to your mother as from me. And all you, my friends, both such of you as are here present, and the rest who are absent—farewell.'

"Having said this, and taken every one by the right hand, he covered himself, and thus expired."

Adolph, and other Poems. By J. A. Shea. 12mo. p. 163. New-York. W. E. Dean. 1831.

This neat little volume is principally devoted to the commencement of a progressive poem, which promises to be no mean acquisition to this department of domestic literature. It is true, the author is not "a native, born and bred," being a youthful, warm-hearted, son of the Emerald Isle.

We do not altogether admire the sentiments expressed in a short dedication to the Hon. Stephen Van Rensselaer, who is often known to have taken even humble talent by the hand, and aided it forward in its laudable exertions:

"How far," says he, "the failure of many gifted American authors is attributable to the apathy of the influential, I am unable to say; but that it has been materially so, few will have the temerity to deny. If talent is to be produced to the country, it must be husbanded: if to be preserved, it must be guarded: and, as a first step towards its successful cultivation, America, and 'the magnates of the land,' must arise from that unnatural, unjust, and dishonoring servility which patronizes few publications, however excellent, that bear not the recommendation of European criticism."

"Never, probably, was the truth of the position

"'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view,"

so practically illustrated in this country. Week after week we see the literary refuse of a foreign market disgorged upon these shores, and swallowed with the most wilful avidity; and why? because it comes recommended by the interested reviewers of the British metropolis; and yet, sir, it is well known that the press of Great Britain is not less venal in literary than in political assumptions. (Opinions are not purchaseable.) Does not the question, then, naturally enforce itself here, 'Is the slavery of the mind more endurable or less degrading than that of the body?' If not, the revolution of America is incomplete, and it is still necessary assiduously to inculcate that, while she possesses any intellectual promise, it must not be neglected, nor her children permitted to prostrate themselves in exclusive worship before the shrines of European literature."

The stanzas comprised in this volume are merely introductory; but the plot is so far developed as to excite interest in its future progress, and final denouement. The hero, Adolph, reminds us of Beattie's Minstrel; though, in many respects, the young Hibernian is of a very different character. He was an orphan at the age of fifteen, "parentless and homeless," cast on a cheerless world to earn his bread, without experience and without friends. The object of the poem is to accompany him through the varied career of poverty, toil, hope, disappointment, virtuous perseverance, and ultimate success. The moral is, therefore, good. As regards its execution, the promiscuous quotation of a few stanzas will enable the reader to judge for himself.

When morning looked along the golden east
Adolph would walk the solitary strand,
Behold the gorgeous sky as it increased,
And watch its influence o'er the sea and land;
See every beam upon the sweet dews feast,
And hill and vale, as by some wizard's wand,
Filled with a million re-awakened flowers,
And then exclaim, "A glorious world is ours!"

"Why do I hear the young and happy heart
Filling its home with misanthropic sighs?
Why do I see, mid gilded halls, depart
Health from the cheeks and gladness from the eyes?
Why do I see some self-tormenter start,
And fret and foam by which he daily dies,
And these where pleasure falls in golden showers?
'Tis strange—'tis strange! a glorious world is ours!"

"From the day's birth-hour to the evening's close,
I can find music in the rushing ocean;
Fruit on the tree and fragrance in the rose;
Pictures in the 'evening clouds' panoramic motion;
Freshness and peace in the green vale's repose;
And mountain-altars for the soul's devotion;
Morals in streams that flow, and flowers that fall;
Beauty in each—omnipotence in all."

The reader will perceive that these stanzas are not exactly according to Spencer's favorite measure, but we know not by what other name to call them. It will also be found that, unlike the Minstrel of Beattie, there is much light humor in the poem of Adolph; especially in that part where his love and "whole course of wooing" is described. Though love be a universal language, an Irishman has his own mode of expressing it.

Now Adolph most religiously attended
His church, and paid attention to his prayers;
But more (a practice which he should have mended,
To heaven's fair clients as they came up stairs;
And towards them was he vigilantly bended,
That wheat may not be lost amid the tares;
So that when beauty came he may refer
The aspirations of his soul to her.

Then when the termination would draw nigh,
Adolph would at the portal take his stand,
To see the unconscious idol passing by,
And touch his chapeau with a courtier's hand:
And utter such a deeply wistful sigh,
As even a saint could not misunderstand;
And if it rained, out spoke the happy fellow,
"Madam, do deign to honor my umbrella!"

Adolph was a poet, and several of his sonnets, songs, apostrophes, and acrostics are sprinkled through the work, and give it a pleasing variety, not usual in a long poem. One of them is introduced as follows:

Adolph now sighed for the Chaldean's lore;
And gazed intensely on the million lights,
Which, as he gazed, but multiplied the more,
Like armies gathering on the heavenly heights.
His fettered spirit struggled to explore
Those mystic suns of our creation's nights;
But far beyond the impotence of man
They lived—and thus his humbled feelings ran.

Want of room will not permit us to extend these quotations as far as we could wish; but the following certainly deserve a place:

"Oh for that clime of gallantry and fame,
Where love and glory tune the poet's lyre!
Where th' one is not afraid to feed his flame
From the pure fountain of his soul's desire—
Nor glory still to adore Napoleon's name:
Oh may the son be worthier than the sire—
Demand the nation's faith, and trample down
That sire's ambition and the Bourbon's crown."

"And will it ever come—that glorious hour!
When th' untombed spirit of Helena's rock
Shall summon France to wake her slumbering power,
And all her treasured thunderbolts unlock;
Till the affrighted heavens with war-clouds lower,
And Europe reels convulsed beneath the shock!
Will this Napoleon end what that began,
And mankind's monarchs yield to monarch man?"

In alluding to the emancipation of Greece, the author has these beautiful lines:

Yes! every step of thy celestial clime
Is peopled with bright recollections! not
A temple, column, tower, or tomb, which time
Hath not all razed or ruin'd, but is fraught
With some proud lesson, some ennobling thought;
There is a wordless eloquence which speaks
To the charmed soul from each enchanting spot;
A spirit and a spell, whose magic wakes
In cities, plains and groves, mountains and hills and lakes.

Here stand the tombs that sepulchre their sleep—
The royal Spartan and his deathless band;
Here Salamis' victorious waters sweep,
Amid the mountain Titans of her strand;
There Simois wanders through the desolate land
Unlike that rapid river, which of yore
Shook with the strife of Phrygia's thousands, and Wheeling its sounding way all swain with gore,
Limbs—trunks and grappling foes on its red waters bore!

Several miscellaneous pieces succeed Adolph, which we recommend to the reader, with the assurance that the volume before us is worthy of his perusal. The work has many faults, but they are principally the faults of an ardent young mind, which time alone can correct.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Conversations of the week.—The annual commencement of Columbia college was celebrated on Tuesday, the second instant. A pressure of engagements prevented our attendance; but we learn that the exercises afforded general satisfaction.

It is currently reported that Washington Irving intends returning to this city in the course of the ensuing spring. Few events could be more gratifying to our fellow-citizens, who are justly proud of him, and grateful for his successful exertions in elevating the literary reputation of his country. Mr. Irving has indeed run a brilliant career, and every one here feels towards him like a bosom friend. However opposed we may be to public dinners, on trivial occasions, we deem this one on which that compliment may with propriety be offered. There is a subject on which we touch with delicacy, as one beyond the province of the public press: we allude to the fact that Mr. Irving has chosen to fix his residence in Europe, and to the ill-natured and unwarrantable observations to which it has given rise. In a paragraph, at present going the rounds of the papers, we find Mr. Irving himself mentioning them with regret. These attempts to render any one accountable to the public for the ordinary events of his private life, are a little beyond the limits of courtesy; and they never assumed more importance in the eyes of any intelligent person than when Washington Irving and his brother, Judge Irving, noticed them. Where would have been the "History of Columbus" if the author had remained at home? How many graceful sketches of foreign manners we should then have lost! The truth is, writers of Mr. Irving's temperament are much benefited by travel. Subjects are presented to them in new lights, and the change of scenery displays to them the sudden variety of a kaleidoscope wherein motion forms the images into fine combinations. The author of "Knickerbocker" will, it is to be hoped, in the course of his approaching visit, enjoy as well as communicate, pleasure. Since his "Voyage" he has been read and admired by millions who were before incapable of appreciating his beauties. He has become a theme of interest and curiosity to a new generation, and he must stand prepared to meet the inquiring glances of a whole host of young literary worthies, who, as the Etionians say, "do not think small-beer of themselves," but of whom, ("alas that it should be so,") he has never heard! But we are getting prolix, as one is apt to on a favorite subject.

David Williams, the last of the immortal trio who captured the unfortunate Andre, died on Tuesday, the second instant, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, at Livingstonville, Schoharie county, and was buried with military honors. He was born on the twenty-first of August, 1754. The rugged honesty of these three patriots is a fair example of the prevalent feeling during the excited period of the revolution, but stands out in bold relief from the licentious treachery of Arnold. We are continually reminded how prolific the brief history of this country is in romantic incident and themes for the novelist and poet. Had these three men lived in ancient Rome, their stately statues would long since have arisen.

Can any antiquarian correspondent inform us touching the origin of the expression, "it is sufficient to puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer?" which implies, on the part of the practitioners of our fair sister city, a superiority over our own "learned Thebans." We know not what peculiar acumen may be inhaled from the breezes of the Delaware and the Schuylkill; but if the attorneys in that part of the world do actually possess any short-handed method of solving problems, we call upon them to enlighten us upon the subject of the Siamese twins, one of whom, it seems, has been committing an assault and battery. In arresting one, the other requires to know by what right he also is to be arrested? How is the guilty to be punished without also inflicting a penalty on the innocent? It will be in vain to look for precedents in such a case; and the world, who are always more alive to physical than to moral wonders, because it is easier for men to see than to reflect, cry out at the occurrence of such a phenomena in the history of jurisprudence. We believe, however, that similar instances of the inextricable confusion of the right and the wrong continually take place, in which the court cut them asunder, without reference to private feeling.

Mr. Knapp, to whose politeness we are indebted for the sketches on the first page, has it in contemplation shortly to publish a duodecimo, of about three hundred pages, entitled the "Pursuits of Literature." The work, with other matters, will contain a condensed view of English literature, with some account of the literary and scientific men from the earliest period of British history to the present time. The extracts made in to-day's paper are a specimen of the style and manner, but convey only a partial idea of the subjects which the volume will embrace.

The committee sent from this city to congratulate the king of the French have returned, it appears, without having made much impression on his majesty.

The English papers contain an account of a splendid fete, recently given by Lafayette, at which all the valor, talent, fashion, and beauty of Paris were present.

A model has been exhibited in Philadelphia of an important original invention for transporting the United States' mail, with complete security, at the rate of one hundred miles an hour, and without exposure to the depredations of robbers.

A finished full-length engraving of the king of England, and also one of the fall of Nineveh, are to be seen at the store of Peabody and Co. Broadway.

A trial, arising out of a belief in witchcraft, occurred in Nashville, on the twenty-second ultimo.

At Providence, the other day, a boy of fourteen married a little miss of the same age.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE YOUNG GIRL WITH GRAY HAIR.

Most of our readers remember the story of Mrs. Montague's hair turning suddenly gray, the effect of fright from a thunder-storm on the Alps; and perhaps another similar case is not altogether unfamiliar, of the boy who was lowered down the side of a precipice to get an eagle's eggs from the nest, and was attacked by the parent bird; and in attempting to defend himself with a knife, cut the rope that held the basket in which he was seated, so that he was sustained by a single strand, at a distance of many hundred feet from the bottom of the cliff; he was drawn up, but such was the shock his feelings sustained, that in a few hours his head became as gray as that of the octogenarian. The following translation, which we make from a French paper, will show another instance of early gray hairs, from an expedition that promised as little any such result as the two above noticed.—United States Gazette.

After three year's absence, I saw her again, two weeks since, at the theatre. Every eye was fixed upon her but mine—I dared not look. The sight of her produced in me a painful and indescribable emotion. But I soon turned towards her—her appearance made me weep.

"Poor Henrietta," said I.

A person sitting near me, pulled me by the sleeve and said, "Is it not strange that a girl so young should be gray?"

"It is such a pity," said another; "she has such beautiful black eyes."

"If there was a poet here," said a dandy, "I am certain that the sight of this beautiful monster would inspire him to write a splendid ballad."

If I had had a dirk with me, the fellow should have felt it.

I made an attempt to escape, but an irresistible force nailed me to the bench. At length the curtain rose—who could tell me what was passing on the stage? I knew nothing of it excepting that a gentleman behind me observed, that it was a very pleasant farce. I, in the mean time, was choked with grief.

Between the acts, the people around me began again to converse about the young lady with gray hair.

"I'll bet any thing," said one, "that the poor girl has met the devil in the evening, face to face, in the woods."

"Not at all," said another; "there is no devil in the case. I am a physician, and will explain to you how it happens that certain kinds of hair—"

"Ay, you are going to explain the matter scientifically," interrupted a third person; "my dear sir, you waste your science here. It is impossible that a whole head of hair, on a young girl, should turn gray without some extraordinary cause. This interesting victim must have experienced some violent shock."

"Her husband, perhaps, was killed in her arms on the twenty-ninth of July."

"Ah, that is quite possible," murmured a man who had been a gend'arme; "or perhaps while she was playing at the edge of the window, the child has fallen from the fourth story, and been crushed upon the pavement."

"Beg pardon, gentlemen, but your suppositions are wide from facts. You can easily see that she is neither a mother nor a widow. How old do you suppose such a girl to be—sixteen, sir?"

"Eighteen, sir."

"Perhaps you know her?" said the man to me. I shrunk back into silence, and he continued:

"It is evident to any one that has studied the physiology of the passions, that this young lady owes her early gray hair entirely to a violent disappointment in love."

I turned suddenly towards the speaker, and pressing his hand convulsively in mine, exclaimed, "Ah, sir, I am a guilty wretch!"

I know not what the company must have thought of this exclamation, torn from me by the remembrance of my crime; but luckily for me, the music struck up with all its force, and the drop curtain rose again.

During the remainder of the farce I could think only of former days, recalling to my mind the image of Henrietta—Henrietta, so young, so beautiful, and so cruelly deserted—Henrietta, the lovely mistress of my youth, whom I now found in three years with the gray hairs of age!

"Wretch!" said I to myself, "what hast thou not made her suffer—with what shameful neglect hast thou treated the most tender love?"

I tore my breast with my nails, such was my anguish.

I quitted the boxes. It appeared that the performance had closed. One of my friends came up to me, and without paying any attention to my paleness, he took me gaily by the hand.

"I have just seen Henrietta," said he.

"How," said I, "have you also seen her?"

"Undoubtedly, my dear fellow; she is terribly changed though."

"Oh, horribly," cried I.

"Do you know how that has happened?"

"Hush," said I, imploringly; "hush, I beseech you. I am the monster!"

"What," said he, laughing, "are you the robber?"

"What robber?" demanded I.

"The quack?"

"I know nothing of that."

He then told me that Henrietta, passing at Bourges about a month since, had purchased in the public square, of a mountebank, a powder for coloring the hair auburn or black—and that was the reason her hair turned gray!

CONSUMPTION.

If the reader of this paper has ever chanced to cast his eyes through a medical book, he must have been struck with the appalling variety of diseases to which he is exposed. There is something hideous in the contemplation of these hidden dangers—these terrible things suspended over our heads in the midst of festivity, like the sword of Damocles by a single hair. We blame youth for its thoughtlessness. But it is its joy and its shield, bestowed upon it by the same benevolent nature which has folded up the tender bud in its green mantle before it has itself sufficient strength to bear the fierce heat of noon or the damp coldness of the evening. If the young possessed the dreadful faculty of perceiving all the dark repulsive passages through which the path of life may lead, they would shrink back, amazed and affrighted, from such numberless perils.

If, as some of the superstitious nations of the east have taught, the affairs of the earth sometimes fell under the control of a mighty spirit of evil, we should mark the monstrous and loathsome shapes which disease assumes in its attacks upon our helpless fellow-creatures, as striking manifestations of his unrelenting malice and of his wonderful power.

There is one kind of death which we mourn with feelings unmingled with bitterness. It is the gradual decay of the aged. Indeed when we consider the situation to which the weight of years reduces a human being, we cannot but confess that the portals of the grave exclude such a time-stricken and feeble creature from little worth regretting. In him disease appears in its most friendly aspect. It has waited until he has run through all life's pleasures, tested its hopes, acknowledged the emptiness of its grandeur, and exhausted all its sources of mirth and joy. I cannot mourn keenly when the remains of such an one are laid in the ground. I reflect—the ship has arrived at its port. The flower has budded and bloomed, and is giving place to another. The oil of the lamp is burnt out, and the flame expires. But oh! when youth and vigor and hope are summoned! When death comes to them arrayed in its hideousness—breaking in upon the happiness of a cheerful scene—racking the bones—wasting the flesh—sending fever through the blood, and wrenching the brain to madness—playing its tremendous experiments of torture upon the fragile form of loveliness, which the tenderness of parents and friends had hitherto scarcely permitted “the winds of summer to visit too roughly,” tearing it from gay prospects of bliss and the convulsive grasp of affection—then must the weak mortal cover up his face and shudder in silence, and wonder at the inscrutable decrees of Providence.

In this respect fate seems to have been kinder to the brute creation than to man. The voracity with which they prey upon each other renders the number which die by a natural death but small, and we have no reason to suppose that their diseases in variety and pain at all equal our own.

Can there be a more melancholy spectacle than a man, in the prime of life, gradually yielding to some fatal malady? Every day he feels himself growing more passive in its embrace. If sickness chain him to his weary couch, week after week, month after month, glides away. He watches the progress of the shadows as they note the passing hours upon the walls of his darkened and gloomy chamber. Perhaps he remains in this dreadful state during the revolution of all the seasons. He hears them shovelling off the heavy heaps of snow from the pavement beneath his window—and he sees its white and flaky masses piled up on the sill, and freezing in sparkling crystal upon the frosted glass. Then it passes away, and the spring sun gleams in upon his hollow cheeks and wasted system—and perhaps he hears the voice of a bird, venting the gushing fulness of its heart in music, as if there were no panting invalid creeping forth from the chill shadows of death to breathe in the scented air, and feel its “invisible fingers” play with the locks upon his skeleton forehead, and warm his dying heart with recollections of youth and hope and love. What reflections must pass through the mind of such a creature!

I once spent several weeks in the town of —, and became there acquainted with a young gentleman, who was wasting away with a slow consumption. He resided in the hotel where I lodged. His person, I was told, had been remarkably handsome, and his face still bore the traces of a high order of beauty. His well formed mouth still expressed with force the various moods of his mind; and his eyes, which were very large, and of a deep black, were full of power and meaning. His prospects had been of a most agreeable kind before the disease attacked him. He was rapidly rising in his profession, and was about to be united to a young girl, who had since married another. I felt deeply for him; and my sympathy, which he was not long in perceiving, was the foundation of an attachment which strengthened till he died. His heart, which appeared to have been absolutely frozen to all the rest of the world, seemed to delight in pouring out all its feelings to me. He found a strange fascination in dwelling upon the incidents of his early life—his proud hopes—his haughty hatred of cowardice and oppression—his love of women and children—his enjoyment of music—and the eagerness with which he had once prepared to participate in the beautiful things of the world.

We sat together one afternoon in his chamber. The sun was setting, and shed a crimson light. Masses of illumined clouds were thronging around the departing orb of day, some burnished with fiery red, some bound with a dazzling fringe of gold, and others melting and sinking into a sea of rich orange, which flooded the whole heavens with its radiant waves.

The glory of the sky had also fallen upon the earth, which presented a little landscape to the eyes of the short-breathing invalid, of most perfect loveliness. There was a valley, a meadow of the deepest green, a wood within whose shadowy recesses the gaze strove to pierce in vain, and a grove of tall oaks, upon a lawn which was beautifully marked with their lengthened and gigantic shadows, as the level beams streamed through the unmoving branches. A river sometimes disclosed its silver bosom, winding with a graceful sweep, by its fringed banks, and stealing silently off into the quiet of the forest. A holy repose hushed all nature. The very cattle which reclined around looked like paintings, and the tinkle of the sheep's bell, heard in the distance at intervals, was the only sound which told that the scene was more than an enchanting vision.

My poor friend gazed in silence. His eyes passed over the glowing ocean of splendor above, and the picture-scene which lay in tranquil beauty around. At first his face beamed only awakened rapture at the triumph of nature. Then a shadow passed over it, as if a thought of his own contrasted fate were stirring at his heart, till at length, he closed the heavy lids of his sick-looking eyes, and I saw them swollen gradually with large tears, which stole silently out from the long lashes, and rolled down his haggard cheeks.

He extended his hand for mine, and pressed it to his lips, and then spoke in a low voice, and without opening his eyes.

“It is an awful thing to die—to go down from this brightness, this gorgeous beauty of nature, into the cold dark grave. To know never again the warm raptures which were but now thrilling across my heart-strings. To be withdrawn from the living; to moulder away into worthless dust; to have the worm at my bosom; to forget; to be forgotten!”

His lips quivered, his frame trembled; he leant down his head; he buried it in my bosom and wept. I knew that tears would relieve him, and after a pause, attempted to offer religious consolation. He remained in this situation for some time in silence. At length he said, “I am ashamed of this weakness. I thought I could fall with as much dignity as Cesar; and so I could under any sudden blow; but this protracted and weary disease unmans me, and gives me too much time for reflection; and reflection paints the world in such colors that I cannot but leave it with regret. Oh! knew you but the visions which have thronged through my imagination while imprisoned within this narrow apartment. I have busied myself during the slowly dragging hours of midnight in remembering and in fancying. I have been a warrior in the field; I have been a traveller, musing on the wonders of foreign lands; I have been a husband, and a father. I have shaken the senate with eloquence; have roused the public with poetry; I have been an actor, wielding all the passions of nature; and a wealthy man, purchasing all happiness that earth can know. These are the shadows which have enlivened my solitude, and beguiled my tedious time, with an amusement which, after all, was wretchedness. And oh! could I but tell you, in the deep watches of the night how the bright scenes of nature have come up to my mind! When the wintry storm was beating against the house, and shrieking and sighing and groaning through the deserted halls; when the fierce angry wind coursed through the air like a very demon, and shook the rattling windows in their casements, with what a wonderful vividness the summer luxuriance of this fair earth has flowed up to my fancy: the calm old woods, the glad streams, the buds and flowers. Then I have seen the proud ship, her snowy sails set, rising and falling upon the blue ocean billows; and then would appear a sunny green bank, scented with clover, and thronged with the faces of those I had loved; music breathing, eyes flashing, lips smiling, sweet voices mingling, waters, birds, and branches gleaming around deliciously, till it grew to be a perfect reality, on which I gazed with an excess of trembling pleasure: when, with a loathsome change, that ran with shuddering horror through every nerve of my body, images of death would crowd upon me; coffins, black pall would be gliding with a ghostly silence about the room; and figures in white, with ghastly faces, beckoning me; and once a newly dug grave, with sods and spades lying beside it; and a procession, with a gloomy, dead, stiff form, stretched out, which I knew to be myself; living, but unable to move or speak—a monstrous nightmare—till the whole would melt into a general horror, and I would awake, struggling and trembling, and feel my wasted and shrivelled limbs, and gasp for the breath which I knew would soon pass forever away.”

A few days after this interview I was called suddenly from the village, and on my return, after the expiration of a few weeks, I left my horse at a neighboring stable, and walked towards the hotel. It was just such a radiant afternoon as that which I have endeavored to describe.

“My poor friend!” I thought, “perhaps he is even now sitting by the window, and brooding over his unhappy doom.”

As I passed by the little church, and the few simple graves gleamed with their white monuments, through the palings of the fence, I perceived one newly erected. It bore the name of him who then was uppermost in my thoughts. I looked over into the peaceful yard, and on the grassy mound.

There is no philosophy like the contemplation of a new grave, while the voice of its tenant is yet ringing in your ear. The sun had gone down from the darkened heavens, and the dimmest of the stars sent its trembling beams through the dewy shadow before I shook off my reverie, and turned my steps homeward. SEDLEY.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

EXTRACTS FROM THE JOURNAL OF A NATURALIST.

We give below several extracts from this volume, which we noticed in a late number. The theory which ascribes the origin of so many hundred thousands of our fellow-creatures to the potato, is rather shocking to the vanity of human nature.

THE POTATO.

“Two of our crops not being of universal culture, are entitled to a brief mention. We grow the potato extensively in our fields, a root which must be considered, after bread-corn and rice, the kindest vegetable gift of Providence to mankind. This root forms the chief support of our population as their food, and affords them a healthful employment for three months in the year, during the various stages of planting, hacking, hoeing, harvesting. Every laborer rents of the farmer some portion of his land, to the amount of a rood or more, for this culture, the profits of which enable him frequently to build a cottage; and, with the aid of a little bread, furnishes a regular, plentiful, nutritious food for himself, his wife, and children within, and his pig without doors; they all grow fat and healthy upon this diet, and use has rendered it essential to their being. The population of England, Europe perhaps, would never have been so numerous as it is without this vegetable; and if the human race continue increasing, the cultivation of it may be extended to meet every demand, which no other earthly product could scarcely be found to admit of. The increase of mankind throughout Europe, within the last forty years, has been most remarkable; as every census informs us, notwithstanding the havoc and waste of continual warfare, and most extensive emigration; and as it seems to be an established maxim, that population will increase according to the means of supply, so, if a northern hive should swarm again, or once more arise, future historians will probably attribute this excess of population, and the revolutions it may effect, to the introduction of vaccination on the one part, and the cultivation of the potato on the other.”

IMPORTANCE OF NATURAL HISTORY.

“It is rather a subject of surprise, that in our general associations and commixtures in life, in times so highly enlightened as the present, when many ancient prejudices are gradually fitting away, as reason and science dawn on mankind, we should meet with so few, comparatively speaking, who have any knowledge of, or take the least interest in, natural history; or if the subject obtain a moment's consideration, it has no abiding-place in the mind, being dismissed as the fitting employment of children and inferior capacities. But the natural historian is required to attend to something more than the vagaries of butterflies, and the spinings of caterpillars; his study, considered abstractedly from the various branches of science which it embraces, is one of the most delightful occupations that can employ the attention of reasoning beings; a beautiful landscape, grateful objects, pleasures received by the eye or the senses, become the common property of all who can enjoy them, being in some measure obvious to every one; but the naturalist must reflect upon hidden things, investigate by comparison, and testify by experience; and living amidst the wonders of creation, it becomes his occupation to note and proclaim such manifestations of wisdom or goodness as may be perceived by him. And perhaps none of the amusements of human life are more satisfactory and dignified, than the investigation and survey of the workings and ways of Providence in this created world of wonders, filled with his never-absent power; it occupies and elevates the mind, is inexhaustible in supply; and, while it furnishes meditation for the closet of the studious, gives to the reflections of the moralizing rambler admiration and delight, and is an engaging companion, that will communicate an interest to every rural walk. We need not live with the humble denizens of the air, the tenants of the woods and hedges, or the grasses of the field; but to pass them by in utter disregard, is to neglect a large portion of rational pleasure open to our view, which may edify and employ many a passing hour, and by easy gradations will often become the source whence flow contemplations of the highest order.

Young minds cannot, I should conceive, be too strongly impressed with the simple wonders of creation by which they are surrounded: in the race of life they may be passed by, the occupation of existence may not admit attention to them, or the unceasing cares of the world may smother early attainments—but they can never be injurious—will give a bias to a reasoning mind, and tend, in some after-thoughtful, sobered hour, to comfort and to soothe. The little insights that we have obtained into nature's works are many of them the offspring of scientific research; and partial and uncertain as our labors are, yet a brief gleam will occasionally lighten the darksome path of the humble inquirer, and give him a momentary glimpse of hidden truths; let not then the idle and the ignorant scoff at him who devotes an unemployed hour, to investigate a moss, a fungus, a beetle, or a shell, in 'ways of pleasantness, and in paths of peace.' They are all the formation of Supreme Intelligence, for a wise and worthy end, and may lead us by gentle gradations to a faint conception of the powers of infinite wisdom. They have calmed and amused some of us worms and reptiles, and possibly bettered us for our change to a new and more perfect order of being."

'No calling left, no duty broke.'

TREES.

"Trees in full foliage have long been noted as great attractors of humidity, and a young wych elm in full leaf affords a good example of this supposed power; but in the winter of the year, when trees are perfectly denuded, this faculty of creating moisture about them is equally obvious, though not so profusely. A strongly marked instance of this was witnessed by me, when ascending a hill in the month of March. The weather had previously been very fine and dry, and the road in a dusty state; but a fog coming on, an ash tree hanging over the road beneath was in a puddle, when the other parts continued dry, and manifested no appearance of humidity. That leaves imbibe moisture by one set of vessels and discharge them by another, is well known; but these imbibings are never discharged in falling drops: the real mystery was, the fog in its progress was impeded by the boughs of the tree, and gradually collected on the exposed side of them, until it became drops of water, whereas the surrounding country had only a mist flying over it. Thus in fact the tree was no attractor, but a condenser; the gate of a field will in the same manner run down with water on the one side, and be dry on the other; as will a stick, or a post, from the same cause. It is upon this principle that currents of air will be found under trees in summer, when little is perceived in open places; and the under leaves and sprays will be curled and scorched at times, when the parts above are uninjured. The air in its passage being stopped and condensed against the foliage of the tree, it accordingly descends along its surface or front, and escapes at the bottom, where there are no branches or leaves to interrupt its progress. In winter there is little to impede the breeze in its course, and it passes through; consequently at this season the air under a tree is scarcely more sensibly felt than in the adjoining field.

"It may be observed, that in the spring of the year the herbage under trees is generally more vivid and luxuriant, than that which is beyond the spread of the branches: this may be occasioned, in some instances, by cattle having harbored there, and the ground becoming in consequence more manured; but it will be found likewise manifestly verdant and flourishing where no such accessory could have enriched it, and is, I apprehend, in general, chiefly owing to the effects of the driving fogs and mists, which cause a frequent drip beneath the tree, not experienced in other places, and thus in a manner keep up a perpetual irrigation and refreshment of the soil, and promote the decomposition of the foliage beneath, which being drawn into the earth by worms, contributes to the verdure by the nutriment they yield."

FLOWERS.

"Flowers, in all ages, have been made the representatives of innocence and purity. We decorate the bride, and strew her path with flowers: we present the undefiled blossoms, as a similitude of her beauty and untainted mind; trusting that her destiny through life will be like theirs, grateful and pleasing to all. We scatter them over the shell, the bier, and the earth, when we consign our mortal blossoms to the dust, as emblems of transient joy, fading pleasures, withered hopes; yet rest in sure and certain trust that each in due season will be renewed again. All the writers of antiquity make mention of their uses and application in heathen and pagan ceremonies, whether of the temple, the banquet, or the tomb—the rites, the pleasures, or the sorrows of man; and in concord with the usages of the period, the author of the 'Book of Wisdom,' says, 'Let us crown ourselves with rose-buds and flowers before they wither.' All orders of creation, 'every form of creeping things and abominable beasts,' have been, perhaps, at one time or another, by some nation or sect, either the objects of direct worship, or emblems of an invisible sanctity; but though individuals of the vegetable world may have veiled the mysteries, and been rendered sacred to particular deities and purposes, yet in very few instances, we believe, were they made the representatives of a deified object, or been howed down to with divine honors. The worship of the one true Being could never have been polluted by any symbol suggested by the open flowers and lily-work of the temple.

"The love of flowers seems a naturally implanted passion, without any alloy or debasing object as a motive: the cottage has its pink, its rose, its polyanthus; the villa its geranium, its dahlia, and its clematis: we cherish them in youth, we admire them in declining days; but, perhaps, it is the early flowers of spring that always bring with them the greatest degree of pleasure, and our affections seem immediately to expand at the sight of the first opening blossom under the sunny wall, or sheltered bank, however humble its race may be. In the long and sombre months of winter our love of nature, like the buds of vegetation, seems closed and torpid; but, like them, it unfolds and re-animates with the opening year, and we welcome our long-lost associates with a cordiality that no other season can excite, as friends in a foreign clime. The violet of autumn is greeted with none of the love with which we hail the violet of spring; it is unseasonable, perhaps it brings with it rather a thought of melancholy than of joy; we view it with curiosity, not affection: and thus the late is not like the early rose. It is not intrinsic beauty or splendor that so charms us, for the fair maids of spring cannot compete with the grander matrons of the advanced year; they would be unheeded, perhaps lost, in the rose bowers of summer and of autumn; no, it is our first meeting with a long-lost friend, the reliving glow of a natural affection, that so warms us at this season: to maturity they give pleasure, as a harbinger of the renewal of life, a signal of awakening nature, or of a higher promise; to youth they are expanding being, opening years, hilarity and joy; and the child, let loose from the house, riots in the flowery mead, and is

'Monarch of all he surveys.'

There is not a prettier emblem of spring than an infant sporting in the sunny field, with its osier basket wreathed with butter-cups, orchises, and daisies. With summer flowers we seem to live as with our neighbors, in harmony and good-will; but spring flowers are cherished as private friendships."

THE ASPEN TREE.

"The shivering of the aspen (populus tremula) in the breeze will give us the sensation of coldness, and communicate an involuntary shuddering. The construction of the foliage of this tree is peculiarly adapted for motion: a broad leaf placed upon a long foot-stalk, so flexible as scarcely to be able to support the leaf in an upright posture: the upper part of this stalk, on which the play or action seems mainly to depend, is contrary to the nature of footstalks in general, being perfectly flattened, and, as an eminent botanist and esteemed gentleman, Dr. I. Stokes, observes, is placed at a right angle with the leaf, being thus peculiarly fitted to receive the impulse of every wind that blows. This stalk is furnished with three strong nerves, placed parallel, and acting in unison with each other: but towards the base the stalk becomes round, and then the nerves assume a triangular form, and constitute three distinct supports and counteractions to each other's motions. I know no petiole with a similar conformation, or better calculated for the vibration of a leaf.

THE SNAPDRAGON.

"We have our walls in many places here decorated with most of the varieties of the great snapdragon, (antirrhinum majus) the white, the pink, and the common; and that beautiful deviation, with a white tube and crimson termination, is slowly wandering from the garden, and mixing with its congeners. It has not, perhaps, been generally observed that the flowers of this plant, "bull-dogs" as the boys call them, are perfect insect traps; multitudes of small creatures seek an entrance into the corolla through the closed lips, which upon a slight pressure yield a passage, attracted by the sweet liquor that is found at the base of the germen; but when so admitted there is no return, the lips are closed, and all the advance to them is impeded by a dense thicket of woolly matter, which invests the mouth of the lower jaw—

"Smooth lies the rode to Pluto's gloomy shade;
But, 'tis a long, unconquerable pain
To climb to those ethereal realms again."

But this snapdragon is more merciful than most of our insect traps. The creature receives no injury when in confinement, but, having consumed the nectareous liquor, and finding no egress, breaks from its dungeon by gnawing a hole at the base of the tube, and returns to liberty and light. The extraordinary manner in which the corolla of this plant is formed, the elastic force with which the lower limb closes and fits upon the projection of the upper, manifest the obvious design in the great architect, "whose hands bended the rainbow;" and the insects are probably the destined agents whereby the germen is impregnated, for as soon as this is effected, the limbs become flaccid, lose their elasticity, are no longer a place of confinement, but open for the escape of any thing that might have entered. The little black pismire is a common plunderer of this honey.

"It is a perplexing matter to reconcile our feelings to the rigor, and our reason to the necessity of some plants being made the instrument of destruction to the insect world. Of British plants we have only a few so constructed, which, having clammy joints and calyxes, entangle them to death. The sun-dew (drosera) destroys in a different manner, yet kills them without torture. But we have one plant in our gardens, a native of North America, than which none can be more cruelly destructive of animal life, the dogbane, (apocynum androsaemifolium), which is generally conducive to the death of every fly that settles upon it. Allured by the honey on the nectary of the expanded blossom, the instant the trunk is protruded to feed on it, the filaments close, and, catching the fly by the extremity of its proboscis, detain the poor prisoner writhing in protracted struggles till released by death, a death apparently occasioned by exhaustion alone; the filaments then relax, and the body falls to the ground. The plant will at times be dusky from the numbers of imprisoned wretches. This elastic action of the filaments may be conducive to the fertilizing of the seed by scattering the pollen from the anthers, as is the case with the barberry; but we are not sensible that the destruction of the creatures which excite the action is in any way essential to the wants or perfection of the plant, and our ignorance favors the idea of a wanton cruelty in the herb; but how little of the causes and motives of action of created things do we know! and it must be unlimitable arrogance alone that could question the wisdom of the mechanism of him 'that judgeth rightly; the operations of a simple plant confound and humble us, and, like the hand-writing on the wall, though seen by many, can be explained but by One.'"

THE UNITED STATES EXEMPT FROM DESERTS.

The Monthly American Journal of Geology and Natural Science, from which the subjoined article, entitled "The United States exempt from Deserts, and all the evils consequent thereon," is extracted, is published at Philadelphia. The editorial department is conducted by G. W. Featherstonhaugh, Esq.

"The physical conformation of North America precludes all possibility of deserts, or extended wastes. Those arid regions result from a want of moisture, and attach to the extended plains in the neighborhood of the tropics, too vast and disproportioned for the quantity of rain that nature has assigned to them. They drink, and are still dry. The clouds of heaven float over them in vain. Like Pharaoh's kine, they devour all, but change not their miserable condition.

"What are those physical phenomena that have insured us against all the ills of deserts? Geography tells us, that whenever a continent or country is expanded, more than a few hundred miles, in the equatorial regions, with a surface comparatively low and flat, it will become a desert. This is the result of the natural inability to be supplied with moisture. Most of Africa; the middle and southern regions of Asia; and even Hindostan, where mountains do not prevail, have become sterile and desert. The face of nature in those countries is deformed; and vast chasms are created in those regions, where the vegetable and animal kingdoms are unable to flourish.

"New Holland owes its moisture to its insular situation; the peninsular form preserves fertility in Spain, Italy, Greece, and Asia-minor; back-bone mountains save Hindostan from entire barrenness; and the vicinage of some sea, or mountain elevation renders those parts of Africa, Asia, and Europe, which the great deserts do not reach, the fit abodes of man. In Central Africa, and Asia, and the coasts of the Red sea and Indian ocean, no mountains exist, to collect from the atmosphere stores of moisture, and spread them over those thirsty plains, to fertilize and clothe them with verdure. No commanding Cordilleras overlooking their plains, catch upon their long slopes the vapors of heaven, and preserve, upon their cloud-capped summits, reservoirs of eternal snow, with which to irrigate the plains that meet their base. It requires, then, a mountain range; the vicinage of some sea, or ocean, or a high, temperate latitude, to insure freshness to extended plains, and impart to them a fertility, proper for the comforts and wants of man.

"Let us examine our own continent, and learn the causes that have guaranteed to us, this exemption from deserts. Within the tropics and their neighborhood, North America is narrowed into a strip; it has all the advantages of an insular position, and drinks the moisture of two oceans. This is not all: the Cordilleras traverse the whole space, rising upon the Mexican table, to an elevation of eleven thousand feet, and commanding the neighboring seas. All winds, but more especially the heavily laden trades, pour forth their vapors upon this happy region, and clothe its long slopes and rich plains, with all the luxuriance of vegetation. These friendly mountains, after upheaving the tropical parts of our continent to the regions of eternal verdure, bear aloft their wide-spread arms, (the Chippewayan and Alleghany ranges,) as far as it is necessary to counteract the heats of a southern sun, and impart fertility to the great valley of the Mississippi, which seems especially consigned to their fostering care. But when elevations become no longer essential to the certainty of moisture and vegetation, they sink into the great plains of Canada, and disappear. How wise is this arrangement! For, if these mountains had carried their characteristic elevation far north, they would have chilled, with their eternal snows, all the northern portion of our country, and rendered it barren, not from drought and deserts, but what is equally to be deprecated, the blights of intolerable cold. These friendly ranges of mountains are thus the everlasting guarantees of our country's fertility. The Alleghany range derives its moisture from the Atlantic, and waters not only all the states that intervene between it and that ocean, but the states and districts that rest upon its western base, and contributes its full part to the great plains of Mississippi and Missouri. The Rocky, or Chippewayan range, draws heavily from the Pacific ocean, and abundantly waters not only that slope, but the extended plains which meet its eastern base. The narrow slopes of the two ranges of mountains which border the two oceans, are easily and very naturally irrigated from those oceans; and their slopes pointing inwards from the oceans, and the plains immediately in contact with them, draw moisture from the numerous founts and reservoirs of the mountains themselves. The great valley of the Mississippi, however, is too extensive, and too important to the rising population of this country, to be left to any uncertain supply of moisture. The sources of the mountains with which it is enfolded, might prove to be inadequate, and certainly would, if all depended on them. Other guarantees are found, and powerful aids provided in the case. That great valley opens itself without barrier, on the southern end, to the trade winds, which become deflected by the Mexican coast, enter it, fraught with all the moisture of the gulf, and deposit on this region a supply, literally inexhaustible, because those winds themselves are perpetual. Lest the mountain supply and trades both might not reach the northern end of this great plain, nature has thrown there the largest reservoirs, or accumulations of fresh water in the world. The great and numerous lakes of Canada, over which the winds pass, and from which clouds charge themselves with vapor, insure a never-failing supply of water to all that portion of the plain which lies contiguous. Thus every thing is provided, and nothing left to chance. Elevation, mountains, contiguous oceans, and internal reservoirs, all co-operate to insure to the territory of the United States a constant supply of moisture. The native fertility of the soil is therefore great, and yields to the wants of man with certainty and abundance. This supply of moisture is well tempered, and rarely pours forth in excess. In some countries, particularly in the north of Europe, in England and Ireland, the crops often fail from excess of moisture than a deficiency. The grain blights in the field, or moulds and rots in the granary, and acquires a musty smell and flavor, which takes away its merchantable character, and disqualifies it for the fine breads. Our seasons, fortunately, are just moist enough to give perfection to vegetable growth, without injuring it by excess; just regular enough to exempt us from all the labor of artificial irrigation, and leave the air dry and elastic enough to enable us to preserve all our vegetable productions. Happy country! where the elements hold so steady a balance; where rains prevail to mature, not to injure vegetation; where the sun shines to ripen, and not to parch up verdure; and where a clear, elastic air gives spring to the animal frame, and vigor to all nature.

"Where deserts exist, they not only preclude vegetation, and consequently population in the districts where they prevail, but exert a baneful influence upon all the neighboring regions that are inhabitable. They absorb the moisture from them, and render vegetation very uncertain. The heats that steam from the deserts enfeeble and stint all that has life and growth in the adjoining districts. Siroc winds prevail, collect the deleterious matter, heated and active, from their parched surface, sweep the neighboring countries, carry languor, disease and blight in their train, and convert all that is green into a brown desert. Hordes of locusts seem by nature associated with the deserts; rise in clouds, warp upon their winds, and like a deadly blast, couch upon the adjacent countries, and destroy all that is verdant. It results, therefore, that deserts not only mar the habitable globe to the extent that they prevail, but inflict upon the adjoining countries all the evils of famine, uncertainty, and disease; thus limiting the numbers, the comforts, and the power of man.

"We will now briefly note the effect of deserts upon the human figure, upon population, industry, the arts, morals, and liberty. The human form, in connection with deserts, is without its wonted symmetry—thin, dry, and emaciated; and the complexion dark, swarthy. Man seems formed there to drift with the sands, to move his light and elastic frame with all the quickness that uncertainty might require, but possesses not the muscular power necessary to effective labor. The Africans, Arabians, Tartars, Bedouins, and others, are swarthy, dark, and devoid of all the symmetry of which the race is susceptible, and strikingly illustrate our position.

"In such countries population is sparse, and the few who draw a scanty support from the stunted and uncertain vegetation, are unfixed in their habits, and wanderers. They realize nothing, improve not their condition, are actuated by the sudden impulses of want, or the emergency occasioned by the irregularities of the elements around them.

"When the seasons and climate of the country in which man lives are uncertain; when no human effort can control them, and no art or foresight render labor available, he partakes of all the irregularity of the seasons; becomes as wild as nature herself; puts himself afloat with the elements, and is in his turn a devastator.

"If industry exist not, and human labor be unavailable, none of those improvements which change the condition of our race, and give to us character and comfort, have any existence. Without surplus production there can be no commercial exchanges; a limit is thus placed to social improvement, and a barrier erected against civilization. Man, under such a state of things, cannot multiply his race, because his supply of food is limited; nor create wealth, because his labor is unproductive and without stimulus; nor make valuable improvements in the arts, comforts, and intercourse of society, because he has neither the means nor the necessary numbers; nor can he polish and refine himself, because his state of society is essentially wild and violent.

"Morality is there nothing beyond those simple virtues which are connected with self-preservation; that rude hospitality, the necessity of which dire suffering has felt, and that reckless bravery which has been prompted by despair. High and honorable feelings, sterling integrity, truth, and that habitual propriety that discharges all the duties of man to his fellows, are unpractised, and comport not with such an uncertain state. The religion of the inhabitants of the desert is wild and superstitious, because it has no moral guarantee. The imagination creates the punitive power that makes brown the desert, that waves with the sands, and spreads around famine and devastation. It is invoked to destroy, and worshiped from fear. The ways of God to man are not justified, as in that fabric of good order, intelligence, and virtue, which is reared under more favorable circumstances.

"Liberty, in such countries, is the freedom of the desert, as unfixed as its votaries, and as wild as nature herself. Man's safety there is not the guarantee of the laws, but the strength of his own arm, or the ease with which he can escape. He governs himself by circumstances, not by any principles of justice, or legislative enactments. Government has reared no permanent altar in such countries; it moves in wild democracy with the wanderings of man; and accommodates itself to all his irregularities. We see, therefore, that our race, in such countries as are connected with the deserts, is scant and of uncouth form; their virtues wild and rudely primitive, their labor unavailable, wealth and improvements have no place, the arts and elegances of life have no existence, commerce no basis, liberty, and religion no temples but the desert, and no guarantees but a wild and irregular nature.

"In the United States it is widely different. We are exempted from deserts, and all their concomitant evils. An almost uninterrupted fertility spreads through our extensive land, with scarcely a mountain crag to break its continuity. Equally secure from an injurious excess of moisture, we lean with confidence upon our seasons; we understand our climate, we appreciate the productiveness of our soil, and feel that we have all the guarantees which nature can give against want and famine; all the certainty of property in the avails of our labor, every stimulus to exertion and industry, and the most perfect assurance to us and our posterity, of moral and physical enjoyment. Where nature herself is regular, the population full of intelligence, the arts well established, and plenty throughout the land, good order and good taste will prevail. Liberty, with just government, is the natural consequence of such a condition of things. Already has it taken deep root. Every right is regarded, and every interest protected. The broad shield of the law covers all. Famine and unavoidable disasters, drive man to despair; he looks to the present moment only, because the future is wrapped in doubt; he runs all chances, and neglects all system, and the providence necessary for accumulation and comfort. Under the mighty guarantees that we have named, we may expect great perfection in our race, a maximum population, a productive industry, a moral condition, a high degree of intellectual development, the greatest advancement in the arts, commercial prosperity, all the refinements of society, and a government of laws which will reach and guard all.

"All these blessings are in store for this nation, if the people are true to themselves. Nothing can impede their happiness and glory if they can only be led, by a wise and general system of education, to reject the insidious pretensions of artful and selfish men, and lean voluntarily upon the wise and just for the administration of their affairs, and the preservation of their institutions."

THE FINE ARTS.

PAINTINGS AT THE ARCADE BATH.

(SECOND NOTICE.)

"Where lights and shades a mingling aid compose;
Softened by these, and spirited by those:
Though bright, not glaring; though subdued, not cold;
Gay without glitter; without harshness, bold."

We have slightly mentioned this collection in a previous number, but it certainly merits a more extended notice.

No. 1. A group of cattle, (on a landscape) large as life, by James Ward, Esq. R. A. This piece is full of vigor and effect, and improves on examination. An opinion of its excellence should not be formed until a long gaze has abstracted the mind from all other thoughts, and given the imagination time to play. The illusion is then complete, and the admirable power displayed in it will not fail to attract the attention and praise of the generality of our fellow-citizens. This specimen of Mr. Ward's talent was elicited by the celebrated cattle-piece of Paul Potter, removed by Napoleon from Holland to Paris, to grace his collection in the Louvre. It is said, that our distinguished countryman, Benjamin West, was for twenty years the intimate friend of Mr. Ward; and that the picture for which we now solicit the attention of our readers, was undertaken at his suggestion. It cannot be an imitation, as the artist, it appears has never seen the production of Potter. The figures in the present "cattle piece" are, an enormous bull of the Alderney breed, "in the attitude of defence and protection of its offspring." A cow stands fronting the spectator, with a calf, which, apparently, startled by a bird, is nestling to its mother's side in a very natural and pleasing attitude. Sheep are reposing quietly, and a cow reclines, in the foreground. "The distant groups of cattle are huddled together as a mutual defence against insects, while butterflies, gnats, and rich field flowers tell that it is a glowing summer day." The conception and execution of this fine painting are equally creditable to the artist, as is also the management of the landscape, a wide, level, luxuriant plain.

No. 2. The Fall of Phaeton, by J. Ward. Few are unacquainted with the fable of Phaeton, the modest young gentleman who persuaded his father, Phœbus, to entrust to him driving the horses of the sun for one day. The steeds ran away; and, says Ovid,

"Phaeton! his yellow hair
Seized by the flames, falls headlong;
And shines through a long tract of air,
As when, in a serene evening,
A star falls!"

He came so near the earth as nearly to kindle it into a very destructive conflagration; whereat Jupiter struck the boy with lightning, gathered up the horses, and returned them to a more experienced hand. There are some striking groups in this picture. The attitudes of the falling steeds are conceived with considerable force.

No. 3. Portrait of the artist's mother, by Ward. Said to have attracted much attention at the exhibition of the Royal Academy, London.

No. 4. Portrait of an Arabian horse, by Ward. We are informed, that the artist's forte lies in depicting the figures of animals. He certainly sketches them with great truth, and imparts to them a high degree of animation and nature. They are finely finished and colored. A very large sum was offered for the original of this likeness by one of the continental emperors. We are reminded of the breathing image of another of these noble animals, struck out in one of Byron's moments of inspiration:

"Bring forth the horse!" The horse was brought.
In truth he was a noble steed,
A Tartar of the Ukraine breed;
Who look'd as though the speed of thought
Were in his limbs: but he was wild—
Wild as the wild deer, and untam'd
With spur and bridle undefield—
'Twas but a day he had been caught;
And snorting, with erected mane,
And struggling fiercely, but in vain,
In the full foam of wrath and dread,
To me the desert-born was led:
They bound me on that mental throng
Upon his back, with many a thong;
Then lo! he'd him, with a sudden leap—
Away! away! and on me dash!
Torments less rapid, and less rash!"

No. 5. Another horse, by the same hand, and one of the most celebrated of the English racers, Haphazard. From 1801 to 1806, a great favorite, winning nearly thirty matches.

No. 6. Portrait, by Ward, of a Spanish bloodhound, who caused a duel in Hyde Park, in which a gentleman was killed. The painting may be, and we believe is, admirable; but the individual has a scoundrel look about him, and possesses just such an amiable face as sometimes after a smothered growl, and a preparatory rattling of chains peeps out upon the horror-struck traveller, when he has ventured too far into some farm-yard, or old grist-mill, without reading the laconic warning on the fence, "Beware the dog."

No. 7. A pair of oval paintings on copper, of Sterne's Maria, by Angelica Kauffman, R. A. Smooth and unpretending, yet well finished.

No. 8. The Mistletoe, or Christmas Eve at the old Esquire's Hall in the country, by Thomas Clater. The works of Wilkie are universally known and admired. Many engravings of them, extremely well done, and sufficient to convey an elevated opinion of the artist's merit have reached this country. This mistletoe, by Clater, is much in his style. He has selected a subject which affords a pleasant exercise for the imagination. It is intended to give an idea of old England life and amusement at this season of mirth and joy. "It forms a part of these Christmas gambols," says the catalogue, "to suspend a branch of the mistletoe from the roof of the chief room; and any young female caught under it, whether by accident, intention, or stratagem, forfeits a salute to the happy man who is fortunate enough to snatch it at the moment." A certain agreeable air of waggish fun pervades the piece; and if the artist could have painted sounds as well as sights, we fear there would be divers reports from various quarters of the room of a very curious and improper description. The figures are spirited, and the groupings in several instances rich and beautiful. The old woman and others around the fire, which reflects a glare of red light upon them, after a steady gaze of a few moments afford the spectator much gratification. Two unfortunate maidens under the mistletoe are paying the penalty of their heedlessness. We wonder, however, that the artist should not have bestowed upon the prominent female figure a countenance of more beauty. For the mere purposes of conversation, &c. personal loveliness is by no means an essential requisite; but when you come to kissing—persons experienced in that line state that a sweet face adds materially to the satisfaction of the party.

No. 9. No. 10. Pertinacity, or Clandestine Courtship; and the Reluctant Consent—both by Clater. Much beauty of design and execution in both. It would be almost as great a pity to separate them as the two young persons who form the principal figures. The old gentleman, in the last, is spirited and natural.

No. 11. A View on the River Neath, (Scotland). River scenery is always beautiful. No view can be perfect without water. Its effect in softening the features of nature; the contrast between the freshness of one bank, and the faint haziness—sometimes a silvery gauze—sometimes an azure mist of the other—images reflected in the water—all render it enchanting. The view on the Neath is one of this kind. One excellence about it is the sky. Painters and engravers are generally unsuccessful in their endeavors to imitate this exquisitely beautiful feature of a landscape on canvass. Painted heavens too often want light and airiness. There is nothing ethereal or transparent about them. The sky and the clouds are rolled together in heavy billows, like the smoke of a house on fire. This piece is full of natural beauties. The high bank—the woody shores—and its general quiet air, will make up for a certain want of brilliancy which is perceptible in the next, by the same master.

No. 12. A View in Sussex, by Nasmyth. A bright, luxuriant scene, a cottage, road, and woodland. The foliage is finished with unusual delicacy and skill.

No. 13. The Nursery, by J. Barney. A pretty domestic scene, and well painted.

No. 14. By J. Barney. The same family as the last one, painted several years afterwards.

No. 18. A small Portrait of Rembrandt.

No. 19. A Portrait of the Artist's Wife, by do.

Not having even the most slender pretensions to critical acumen respecting paintings, excepting a mere pleasure in gazing on such as recal nature to our recollection, we have a sort of horror of the old specimens. We fear lest we should pass lightly over some precious relic of an immortal personage, to praise a new first attempt from some obscure youth of the present day. When, therefore, we come suddenly upon one of these dark-looking, smoky, and incomprehensible groups, we can but gaze, look wise, and hold our tongues; as gravity is often made to supply the place of wisdom. If these heads are by Rembrandt, we must confess they are wonderfully chaste and effective.

No. 25. Playing Drafts, by Adrien Brauer. There is really a striking expression of character and humor kept up through all the parts of this little piece. The perplexity of the player about to move; the suspense and eager anxiety with which he is watched by his antagonist; are depicted with great force and fidelity.

There are others in the collection, which only a want of room induces us to overlook. A pair of ludicrous French drawings will not escape the notice of the visitor; and in the last, of a row of fourteen colored and framed drawings of female beauties, in the costume of their country, the observer will be delighted with one of the most lovely forms and faces in the world; not even excepting Mrs. Abuthnot and her companion, as taken at the opera.

When the travelling season is over, we venture to predict that this exhibition will become a fashionable resort. It is well lighted, and possesses an advantage over the Clinton Hall room, in a green baize carpet.

THEATRICAL ON DITS.

We just learn, that the opera of Cinderella has been translated into German, and is about to be performed at the Berlin theatre. A selection of music so judicious, with so fascinating a plot, is an accession to the drama of any country.

Mr. Sinclair and Miss Hughes, of Covent Garden theatre, are about to visit this city. The former is well known as a vocalist, especially as a singer of Scotch ballads; the latter has just concluded an engagement at Covent Garden, where she was articulated for three years. She is the latest tenant of the part of the Fairy Queen, in Cinderella, at that establishment, and might be very advantageously employed in the same character at the Park. We are also informed, from a private source, that Mr. Anderson and Miss Bartolozzi intend appealing to the theatrical taste of our fellow-citizens. The former is probably known to most of our readers by a public dispute with Madam Vestris, at Drury-lane; the latter is that lady's sister. We presume that the preliminary managerial puffs will speedily announce these arrangements to the public.

The Morning Post gives the following anecdote of Paganini: "He dined last week at Mr. Horsley's, and was particularly struck with the Chevalier Neukomm's grand cantata, Napoleon's Midnight Review, which was sung by Mr. Parry, jr. He said it was a production that would immortalize any author. Hummel and Moscheles performed a duet in their best manner, (and we all know what manner that is,) during which Paganini stood leaning on his hand, like a statue, expressing by his looks the delight he felt. A few nights after his arrival, he retired to his bed-room soon after eleven o'clock; presently the tuning of a violin was heard; all ears below were wide open, and his landlord, Mr. Card, and others, crept up the stairs on tiptoe to listen; after preluding for some time, Paganini began to introduce his double and triple stops, and at length to play a melody in two parts, with a running accompaniment, which led the anxious listeners to conclude that he certainly had some friend playing with him, perhaps the old one; and to strengthen this opinion the servant maid declared the next day that when she went to make his bed there was a strong sulphureous smell in the room.

A second number of the Messrs. Buckingham's New-England Magazine has appeared; and we have also looked through the August number of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, Science, and Arts, to both of which we recommend the attention of the lovers of light reading.

We acknowledge the receipt of the Christian Miniature Library, volume one: printed by Sleight.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

NEW SCENES.

New scenes are round me, and they seem to change
The color of my thoughts. Dark shadows pass
Like vapors of the morning, and my heart
Beats with the healthful pulse of early days.
I would that some few things which haunt my mind
Were covered by oblivion's sullen waves,
And washed away forever—so that life
Might lose its weariness, and be again
A renovated blessing, and a charm.
Oh, it is beautiful to see the light
Of our young dreams break through dark mists of gloom,
And sweep them onward—till hope's glorious hues,
Like autumn-tints upon the dying leaves,
Glow o'er the heart.

Summer smiles once again,
As in the years gone by—its breezes play
Upon my lightened spirits, and the wings
Of the wild zephyrs catch each passing thought
And bear them to deserted groves and bowers,
Where the gay robin stops to carol forth
His joyous lay; while the green leaves keep time
With gentle motion; and young buds and flowers
Seem listening e'en in their unconscious life.
Cease, mem'ry, cease! No further now pursue
Past images of bliss. It is enough
That the bright pageant long has pass'd away,
And I am here, as in another world,
Mixing at times amid the stranger throng,
To fly from thought, and stifle the regrets
Which wake in solitude.

There are some dreams,
Some vivid dreams of life, which fade so slow
And faintly from the mind, that years must on,
Ere they can mingle in the shades of time,
And be forgotten. Oh, are they not dreams
Indeed! The visions only of a day!
Yet, would their spell were o'er me even now,
Amidst these scenes. I could be happy still.
I feel the power to be so, in my heart.
But then there comes a thought, a mem'ry, borne
Sometimes upon a rustling leaf; and oft
Upon some fragile flower, which tells its tale,
And dies—while still th' unwelcome thought lives on—
Lives, midst the stars at night, and the green grass
By day—or in the sound of the weird winds,
Which in their wild mysterious wanderings, wake
Some silent chord, and send its echo back
From the deep, hollow past—or in the tones
Of the low murmur'ing waters, which draw in
The notes of life's lost music, with their own,
Till the whole soul is sad. Away, away!
All here is new—and I, too am changed:
Changed with the changing world—striving to gain
The coldness and the apathy which chills
The feelings at their source; for not to feel,
I almost think were bliss. To look on life,
E'en with the stoic's eye—to see the few
In whom we trusted most, warp'd, turn'd aside,
And not regret it. Ay, to gaze on them,
As in their carelessness, they pass us by,
And hate not friendship's name.

Such are the ones,
For whom life holds out its unbroken charm—
For whom no inward pang, beneath cold pride,
Preys like a canker-worm, upon the heart;
For whom no dark remembrance follows still
The flying steps; and casts o'er novelty,
Visions of strange resemblance, which destroy
Its gloss and charm; and bring the wish, long vain,
And yet the more intense, because 'tis vain.
Come back, come back!—But, no—I call thee not.
'Twas but a momentary thought; for thou
Art nothing now to me. Thy heart is link'd
To stern and fierce ambition. Go thy way.
The past shall be like the forgotten waves
Of the great ocean, which break on its breast,
And sparkle for a moment in the light,
Then mingle in the sea—leaving their place
To others which press onward to the spot,
Seeming with prouder swell to foam and dash
Over their ruins—yet, in turn to lie
Beneath the next. Such, such is human life!

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PASSAGES FROM THE JOURNAL OF A POOR AUTHOR.

READ a review of my last publication in —. I am cut to pieces. There is no reasoning upon the subject. There is not an argument in the whole article; all broad assertion and empty abuse; and yet this kills me. This is not criticism—it is revenge. If I had lent him fifty dollars, instead of this arrogance and vituperation I should have been debauched with miserable flatteries, sufficient to have turned the stomach of Scott, Byron, or Shakespeare. The writer is thoroughly known to me. His opinion is contemptible. He is without honor, honesty, education, good feeling, talent, or money. All who know him personally, despise and laugh at him. He is a butt in his own circle, a hanger on of theatres and taverns, puffed up with conceit, with the shallowness of a goose and the malignity of an adder; yet, when his opinions are put in print, and sent abroad under the sanction of a newspaper, they have weight and influence upon thousands, just as a dwarf behind a cannon can beat down a house. What is there in the mere process of printing, by which a fool may be converted into a philosopher, a teacher of wisdom, a judge of what is right and wrong, a leader of fashions and opinions? Should such a little piece of ridiculous pomposity dare to thrust his face in a genteel private circle, and tell them this book is good, and that one is bad, that they should do this and they should not do that, they would show him the way down stairs, if they could do so for laughing. But when he seats himself in his editorial chair, behold the miraculous metamorphosis! He insults individuals; he decides, without the trouble of reflection, upon the most abstruse questions. He seizes a volume, which has cost its author months, years, perchance a long and laborious life of toil and reflection, and pronounces it "stuff." Perhaps the writer may be a gray-haired man, a hard student, a deep thinker, a great traveller. He may have run through all the passions of life, seen all the wonders of foreign countries, been awed before the ruins of Rome, or mused above the fragments of Carthage. But your beardless critic here, who believes himself competent to judge of any thing at the slightest notice, frowns upon the result of all this experience, and the public take his word. Foolish critic! how long wilt thou be permitted to reign over thy betters? Misguided public! how long wilt thou be cheated by a charlatan?

At this time, when patent systems of education develop the mental faculties of infants before they can pronounce plainly their own language, and make boys wise, as it were by steam; when we have governors and secretaries at twenty; when poets, authors, and editors begin to retire from business before their beards grow; and when, in short, the whole management of the world seems to have fallen into the hands of children, it behoves the community to cast about their eyes, and see by whom their opinions are controlled.

As an author I have no claim to exemption from criticism; but then it should come from some competent tribunal. I cannot sit down quietly and see an ignorant and vulgar boy, little in mind as in person, and contemptible in both, aspiring to give a tone to the feelings of nearly two hundred thousand intelligent individuals.

There is not in all nature such a thoroughly impudent, presuming, impertinent, and superficial creature as your young and conceited editor. He acts as if he were gifted with universal knowledge. He is a judge of coins and paintings, tells the silver-headed artist where the light and shade should have been stronger, and what a defect there is in the foreshortening of the arm: teaches the matured actor how to perform, the orchestra how to play; the lawyer how to plead. He has no respect for the gray beard and the wrinkled forehead; forgets the possibility that he may be in the wrong; and while he ordains what ought to be, and like Cesar says, "do this," he often ascribes what does actually take place to his own exertions. What a mortifying reflection to an author, that such a reptile should guard the temple of fame. That, before he can lay his gift with reverence at the feet of the public, as before some generous and mighty monarch, this upstart thing, like a saucy minister, steps in, and pronounces upon its merits; so that, peradventure, it never reaches the hands of our common master. If I were independent of the world I should, most assuredly, leave off writing altogether. I detest a regular pack-horse author, not above mediocrity; it's worse than ontony butter. A fellow with inky fingers, and a pen behind his ear and his pockets full of manuscripts, who talks in regular periods, and has a sort of local reputation, no one can exactly tell why. Oh! for Aladdin's lamp, or Cincinnatus's taste for the plough. I am so thoroughly and deeply sick of counting cost, and contemplating debt, that I do ever and anon feel sorely tempted to be dissatisfied with my lot. Then people talk to me about patience! to me, a nervous, dun-hunted, dispirited author! Patience! bah! how I hate the word. With one suit of clothes, and that sadly "declined in the vale of years;" with a melancholy indefiniteness respecting the time and place of my next dinner; in midsummer, (think of a man's going down out of the attic to see a dun, with the thermometer at ninety, and nothing in his pocket but his hands,) and then talk of patience. The fact is, it is a very excellent sort of a thing for a little while; for one misfortune, which cannot be helped, and will soon be forgotten; but a whole existence of it! Excuse me. Oh that I could shape for myself a brilliant life, no matter how short, to flash along, meteor-like, through this gloomy world, and then to flash out; and no moping, no dunning, no calculating, no economy, no patience, and no writing. What a wardrobe I would have! what a house! what horses—magnificent horses! I love these proud, fleet creatures, with their flashing eyes and floating manes, and the ring of their hoofs along the pavement. How I should skim over the pleasures and luxuries of life! What a library and study! what busts and pictures!

"Adonis painted by a running brook,
And Cytherea all in sedges hid:
Which seem to move and wanton with her breath,
Even as the waving sedges play with wind!"

Then this mountain-load would be off my soul. I should dash abroad, everywhere, in such style, with a steward to keep accounts, some honest stanch, incorruptible fellow—I like honest old family servants; and they are scarce enough, let me say—then to Europe, London, through all the dazzle of the metropolis, then to the softness of the country; to Scotland, slap Walter Scott on the back; give a countryman's grasp to Washington Irving, make my bow to the king; run through France, Germany, Switzerland; study a little at Rome and Greece—dear Greece and Byron; poor, poor Byron; one peep into Egypt, and a trip to Asia. I think I should enjoy a Napoleon sort of pride, in dating from distant places.

Jaffa, October ninth, &c. Dear Arthur—
Then at length I should turn my face homeward, and fling myself at her feet. Beautiful Lucy!

"The dell he could na scathe thee,
Nor aught that wad belang thee;
He'd look upon thy bonny face
And say, 'I canna wrang thee.'"

But hark! a knock at the door—my tailor's boy with a bill. Oh reality! reality! while men have invoked hope, love, and fancy, why have they forgotten thee! stern, awful, inexorable divinity. And oh! tailors, bootmakers, and the like; surely, surely if you knew what unpleasant sensations those little pieces of paper excite in the bosoms of literary men, you would pause and reflect ere you detracted so much from the happiness of your fellow-creatures. How small in appearance, yet how awful in consequences! This is the advantage of truth over fiction. I may sit down and describe the bloodiest scenes of war, and my reader takes it calmly, and cares nothing; but this note, with its brevity, this "A. B. to C. D. debtor to one suit," &c. how instantly it appeals to the feelings. How suddenly it dispels all my agreeable reveries. Tailors have much to answer for in this world. There is something atrocious in the look of a man with a bill. He eyes you, he lingers, he mutters; he won't take no for an answer, but talks out loud before people. You can't knock him down, but swallow your perplexity; and when he goes out at length, growlingly, you feel as if you could creep through the eye of a needle. I wonder if hanging is a very disagreeable death. SEDLEY.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

AMERICAN SCENERY.

Ithaca, August 1st, 1831.

DEAR M.—Agreeably to my promise, when we parted on board the steam-boat at New-York, I shall attempt a faint outline of the beautiful and sublime picture which nature here presents.

I have seen most of the mountain-scenery, and cataracts within one hundred miles of our city, but have yet met with nothing that will compare with what is now before me; I say now before me, for, though I date this from Ithaca, I do not write it in the village, but on the summit of an eminence, whence several other beautiful little villages, with their towering spires, are visible. Having been caught in a hail-storm yesterday, and exposed to its pelting, which paid very little respect to straw hats or glass windows, I am now an inmate of a neighboring cottage, refitting, and preparing for another cruise. In the meantime I'll proceed with my sketch. These rugged precipices—stop—where was I? What was I about to say? Our mutual friend R. is at my elbow, and I will ask him, what I shall say to the editors of the Mirror?

"Tell them," says R. "how pleased we should be to have them both with us, to share in the toil and the pleasure of climbing the rugged steep about Ithaca falls, and viewing the picturesque and romantic scenery with which this place abounds. Tell them that here nature may be viewed in some of her most terrific and sublime performances"—[R. is growing poetical]—"that the banks of Fall creek are two hundred feet in height, interspersed with piles of rock, which resemble the walls of ancient towers or castles; and, to appearance, as truly perpendicular, and the stratum as mathematically horizontal, as if placed by the hand of man, guided by the plummet's law." Tell them it is a specimen of nature's masonry, that might shame some of their New-York bricklayers."

This is all true; and in many spots along the western canal the cliffs present the same wonderful appearance, as they do in some places along the banks of Cayuga lake. Here and there, on the margin of Fall creek, may be seen a tree on the brink of a precipice, supported by a few of the roots, while the rest are bare, and inclining over, as if ready to plunge into the abyss below. The perpendicular fall of water at what is called the "Ithaca falls," is one hundred and sixteen feet; and on this same creek there are four other falls, higher up, but of less magnitude. There is quite a village about these falls; and, were it worth the while, I would now look down, and count the buildings, which consist of a paper-mill, iron-works, plaster-mill, turning and chair factories, &c. with the dwellings of the workmen and others. In one of these I took shelter from the tornado yesterday, and there I expect to dine to-day.

A work of some magnitude has been lately accomplished at these falls; one of the lofty cliffs immediately above them having been perforated, and a tunnel cut through the solid rock, for the distance of perhaps two hundred feet. This has been done for the purpose of forming a raceway for the water of the mills and factories. The work was performed by blasting and blowing off small fragments of rock at a time. Our friend R. says, that he walked into this immense cavern more than a hundred feet, before it was completed, and stood at its mouth when a blast took place at the further extremity. He represents the explosion to have been tremendous, and its temporary effect on the "nervous system" such as cannot be easily described. In order to turn the water into this new raceway, it was necessary to erect a dam above the falls. Above this "hole in the wall" are strata of rocks, earth, and trees—such rocks as the giants are said to have once hurled at Jupiter. Indeed, they may be some of the very same, as we are told they afterwards piled them up in heaps, with the intention of scaling heaven from their summits! Of the old wooden raceway, which winds round the cliff, near where this everlasting one has been constructed, I shall say something presently. But I must pause now to tell you what I think.

I think, that if the beautiful and picturesque scenery around Ithaca, and on the borders of Cayuga lake, were better known, few travellers to the west, whether for pleasure or business, would fail to turn aside, to stop and enjoy it. Indeed I feel anxious to have this place and its attractions more generally known. It is a matter of astonishment to me, that they should have remained so long in comparative obscurity. It is true I had been informed that the scenery around Ithaca falls was picturesque and grand, but "the half was not told me;" and I now doubt whether there be another place on the globe which, in a circumference of eight or ten miles, can furnish so much to interest the admirers of the sublime and beautiful in nature. Now, then, if you please, we will return to Fall creek, or as some call it, Fall river.

The five falls on this river, which I mentioned before, have a descent of four hundred and thirty-eight feet in the short distance of a mile. The high fall of a hundred and sixteen feet, is the first which strikes the eye when riding from the steam-boat to the village. I shall never forget its appearance, because it was unexpected. Two immense piles of rocks inclose the stream, and, on the right hand, high up the bank, is seen the old mill-race, above mentioned, winding round the point of the bank, "suspended in mid-air," and now and then an adventurous visitor carefully treading his way along the dizzy path. "This raceway was built in an extraordinary manner," says a printed sketch, from which I am now quoting. "A person let himself down (by a rope, I presume, though the sketch does not say so) from a tree. Standing on a high point above, and swinging over the giddy steep, he there dug out places in the rock, in which to fasten the principal supporters of the race."

The next fall above is not so high as the first, but more wild and beautiful. The third reminds me of Trenton falls; the fourth has a diagonal course; and the fifth, last, and highest of all, pours down almost in one sheet. Some of the basins into which the falling water descends are extremely picturesque.

On Cascadilla river, or creek, there are also a number of falls, on a smaller scale, but not less interesting, and surrounded by scenery of equal beauty. One of them descends nearly perpendicularly into an amphitheatre, overshadowed with pine, spruce, hemlock, &c. There are several other falls on this creek, which is also remarkable for a beautiful little island, well known as the "Tea Island," much frequented in summer afternoons "by the ladies of the village, who there prepare the fragrant beverage, and do the honors of this natural saloon to the attendant beaux."

Six-mile creek is another great curiosity, abounding in romantic scenery, and having a number of falls! In the language of the writer before quoted, here "nature seems to breathe nothing but the breath of waters and the incense of groves."

About a mile from the village is another fall, still more wild and gloomy than any I have yet mentioned. This is called Buttermilk falls, descending from the same elevation as the others, and falling into the same valley. And, eight miles further, there is still another, called Taghanick falls, where the water descends perpendicularly, two hundred and thirty-eight feet! "Words cannot describe the magnificence of the ravine into which it is precipitated, nor the effect which it produces on the mind." But my paper is exhausted, and I must bid you adieu.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

GENTLEMEN—In the ninety-ninth number of this journal, for the year 1829, there is a review of a portion of the works of Dr. Channing. A tone of superciliousness, and even of arrogance, runs through the article. Praise comes extorted and with visible reluctance, while the hypercriticism of the censure is obvious. The writer is peculiarly facetious on the subject of Dr. Channing's "Essay on Napoleon," and, after extracting that portion of it which ranks Milton, Bacon, and Shakspeare above "gifted warriors, whose elements of thought are physical forces and physical obstructions," &c. breaks forth into the following strain:

"We are here forcibly reminded of Mr. Fielding's character of Mr. Abraham Adams. 'Indeed, if this good man had an enthusiasm, or what the vulgar call a blind side, it was this: he thought a school-master the greatest character in the world, and himself the greatest of all schoolmasters, neither of which points he would have given up to Alexander the Great, at the head of his army.' So Dr. Channing very gravely divides greatness into different sorts, and places himself at the top, among those who talk about things—commanders at the bottom, among those who only do them. He finds fault with Bonaparte for not coming up to his standard of greatness; but in order that he may not, raises this standard too high for humanity. To put it in force, would be to leave the ancient and modern world as bare of great names as the wilds of North America. To make common sense of it, any one great man must be all the others. Homer only sung of battles, and it was honor enough for Alexander to place his works in a golden cabinet. Dr. Channing allows Bonaparte's supremacy in war, but disputes it in policy. How many persons, from the beginning of the world, have united the two in a greater degree, or wielded more power in consequence? If Bonaparte had not gained a single battle, or planned a single successful campaign; if he had not scattered coalition after coalition, but invited the allies to march to Paris; if he had not quelled the factions, but left them to cut one another's throats and his own; if he had not ventured on the concordat, or framed a code of laws for France; if he had encouraged no art or science or man of genius; if he had not humbled the pride of 'ancient thrones,' and risen from the ground of the people to an equal height with the gods of the earth—showing that the art and the right to reign is not confined to a particular race; if he had been any thing but what he was, and had done nothing, he would then have come up to Dr. Channing's notions of greatness, and to his boasted standard of a hero! We, in Europe, whether friends or foes, require something beyond this negative merit: we think that Caesar, Alexander, and Charlemagne were 'no babies;' we think that to move the great masses of power, and bind opinions in a spell, is as difficult as the turning a period, or winding up a homily."

In the ninety-fourth number of the same publication, and in the course of a review of Lockhart's life of Burns, the following remark occurs, which is directly in contradiction to the above, and exactly acquiesces with the assertion of Dr. Channing, and for which he is so unmercifully ridiculed. When a prejudiced critic is disposed to find fault, the most perfect of all human compositions would afford him ample opportunity, especially when he arrogates the right of deciding upon matters of opinion.

"Conquerors are a race with whom the world could well dispense; nor can the hard intellect, the unsympathizing loftiness, and high but selfish enthusiasm of such persons, inspire us in general with any affection; at best, it may excite amazement; and their fall, like that of a pyramid, will be beheld with a certain sadness and awe. But a true poet, a man in whose heart resides some effluence of wisdom, some tone of the 'eternal melodies,' is the most precious gift that can be bestowed on a generation: we see in him a freer, purer development of whatever is noblest in ourselves; his life is a rich lesson to us, and we mourn his death, as that of a benefactor who loved and taught us."

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Young Ladies' Class Book; a selection of lessons for reading, in prose and verse. By Ebenezer Bailey, principal of the young ladies' high school, Boston. Boston: Lincoln & Edmands. New-York: Collins & Hannay. 1 vol. 12mo. p. 408. 1831.

A neatly printed and excellent selection from eminent authors, and among them many who reflect honor on American literature: Brainard, Bryant, Channing, Cooper, Everett, Halleck, Irving, Sigourney, Sprague, Willis, &c. We copy one of the latest effusions from the pen of the latter.

PARRHASIUS.

"Parrhasius, a painter of Athens, amongst those Olynthian captives Philip of Macedon brought home to sell, bought one very old man; and, when he had him at his house, put him to death with extreme torture and torment, the better, by his example, to express the pains and passions of his Prometheus, whom he was then about to paint."

The golden light into the painter's room
Streamed richly, and the hidden colors stole
From the dark pictures: 'daintily forth,
Aed, in the soft and dewy atmosphere,
Like forms and landscapes magical, they lay.
The walls were hung with armor, and about,
In the dim corners, stood the sculptured forms
Of Cytheris and Dian, and stern Jove,
And from the casement soberly away
Fell the grotesque, long shadows, full and true,
And, like a veil of flimsy mellowness,
The lint-specks floated in the twilight air.

Parrhasius stood, gazing forgetfully
Upon his canvases. There Prometheus lay,
Chained to the cold rocks of Mount Caucasus,
The vulture at his vitals, and the links
Of the lame Lemnian fettering in his flesh;
And, as the painter's mind felt through the dim,
Rapt, mystery, and plucked the shadows wild
Forth with its reaching fancy, and with form
And color clad them, his fine, earnest eye
Flashed with a passionate fire, and the quick curl
Of his thin nostrils, and his quivering lip,
Were like the winged god's, breathing from his flight,

"Bring me the captive now!
My hand feels skilful, and the shadows lift
From my waked spirit airy and swift;
And I could paint the bow
Upon the bended heavens, around me play
Colors of such divinity to-day.

"Ha! blind him on his back!
Look! as Prometheus in my picture here—
Quick—or he faints!—stand with the cordial near!

Now bend him to the rack!
Press down the poisoned links into his flesh!
And tear agape that healing wound afresh!

"So—let him writhe! How long
Will he live thus? Quick, my good pencil, now!
What a fine agony works upon his brow!

Ha! gray-haired, and so strong!
How fearfully he stifles that short moan!
Gods! if I could but paint a dying groan!

"Pity thee!" So I do!
I pity the dumb victim at the altar;
But does the robed priest for his pity falter?
I'd rack thee, though I knew
A thousand lives were perishing in thine:
What were ten thousand to a fame like mine?

"Hereafter?" Ay, hereafter!
A whip to keep a coward to his track!
What gave death ever from his kingdom back
To check the sceptic's laughter?
Come from the grave to-morrow, with that story,
And I may take some softer path to glory.

"No, no, old man; we die
E'en as the flowers, and we shall breathe away
Our life upon the chance wind, e'en as they.
Strain well thy fainting eye;
For, when that bloodshot quivering is o'er,
The light of heaven will never reach thee more.

"Yet there's a deathless name—
A spirit that the smothering vault shall spurn,
And, like a steadfast planet, mount and burn;
And though its crown of flame
Consumed my brain to ashes as it won me,
By all the fiery stars! I'd pluck it on me.

"Ay, though it bid me rifle
My heart's last fount for its insatiate thirst;
Though every life-strung nerve be maddened first;
Though it should bid me stifle
The yearning in my throat for my sweet child,
And taunt its mother till my brain went wild;

"All, I would do it all,
Sooner than die, like a dull worm, to rot;
Thrust foully in the earth to be forgot.
O heavens! but I appeal
Your heart, old man! forgive—Ha! on your lives,
Let him not faint!—rack him till he revives!

"Vain, vain; give o'er! His eye
Glazes apace. He does not feel you now—
Stand back! I'll paint the death-dew on his brow.
Gods! if he do not die
But for one moment—one—till I eclipse
Conception with the scorn of those calm lips!

"Shivering! Hark! he mutters
Brokenly now—that was a difficult breath—
Another? Wilt thou never come, O death?
Look! how his temple flutters!
Is his heart still? Ah! lift up his head!
He shudders—gasps—Jove help him—so—he's dead."

View of ancient and modern Egypt; with an Outline of its Natural History. By the Rev. Michael Russell, LL.D. With a Map and Engravings. One vol. 18mo. p. 348. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

This useful work forms the twenty-third number of the "Harpers' Family Library," and fills a vacancy in the library of American publications. It contains a succinct account of all that is known of Egypt, both in its ancient and modern state. The information, a part of which we subjoin, respecting the present state of this interesting country, will be found peculiarly valuable, and confirms us in the opinion, which we have several times previously expressed, in common with many other journals, that this series of works is one of the most appropriate gifts which an intelligent father could present to his family.

"It was in the year 1807 that the English ministry sent a second expedition into Egypt, with the view of preventing that country from falling again into the hands of the French, whose ambassador at Constantinople was understood to direct the politics of the Grand Signior. The number of troops under the British general did not exceed five thousand; and it was entirely owing to the ignorance of our government, in regard to the amount of the Turkish forces at Alexandria, and the strength as well as the disposition of the Mamlouks, that they exposed such a handful of men to certain destruction. The beys availed themselves of this opportunity to make their peace with Mohammed Ali, and consented to follow his standard against the invaders, who had established a footing on their coast. The melancholy result is well known. Alexandria yielded to General Fraser after a smart encounter; but, failing in his successive attempts on Rosetta and El Hamet, the flower of our little army was cut off, wounded, or taken prisoners. Four hundred and fifty of their heads were publicly exposed at Cairo, while the unfortunate captives were treated with every species of contempt and cruelty.

"The departure of the British allowed the pasha to return to the internal affairs of his turbulent province. As he relied chiefly upon the army, he had increased its numbers till the expense of maintenance emptied his coffers, and compelled him, in order to replenish them, to resort to measures of extreme severity. He felt that his popularity was endangered; and being convinced that the Mamlouks would embrace the first opportunity of attempting to precipitate him from the viceregal throne, he resolved upon their final destruction, at whatever expense of candor or humanity. This horrible determination, it has been conjectured, was confirmed by the necessity imposed upon him of conducting the war against the Wahabees in Arabia—an undertaking in which he could not engage without employing in that country his best troops and commanders. The Porte had urged him to prepare for this expedition, so important to the purity of the faith and to the integrity of the empire; rewarding him, beforehand, by conferring upon his favorite son, Tousoun, the dignity of a pasha of the second order.

"The same youth had been appointed by his father general of the army which was destined to serve in Arabia. The first day of March, 1811, was named for the investiture of the new chief—a ceremony which was to take place in the citadel. The Mamlouks were invited to share in the parade and festivities of the occasion; and accordingly, under the command of Chahyn Bey, and arrayed in their most splendid uniform, they appeared at the hall of audience, and offered to the pasha their hearty congratulations. Mohammed received them with the greatest affability. They were presented with coffee, and he conversed with them individually with apparent openness of heart and serenity of countenance.

"The procession was ordered to move from the citadel along a passage cut out in the rock; the pasha's troops marching first, followed by the Mamlouk corps mounted as usual. As soon, however, as they had passed the gate, it was shut behind them, while the opposite end of the defile being also closed, they were caught, as it were, in a trap. Mohammed's soldiers had been ordered to the top of the rocks, where they were perfectly secure from the aim of the Mamlouks, while they poured down volleys of shot upon their defenceless victims, who were butchered almost to the last man. Some of them, indeed, succeeded in taking refuge in the pasha's harem, and in the house of Tousoun; but they were all dragged forth, conducted before the kiaya bey, and beheaded on the spot. The lifeless body of the brave Chahyn was exposed to every infamy. A rope was passed round the neck, and the bloody carcass dragged through various parts of the city. Mengin, who was in Cairo at the time, assures his readers that the streets during two whole days bore the appearance of a place taken by assault. Every kind and degree of violence was committed, under pretence of searching for the devoted Mamlouks; and it was not until five hundred houses were sacked, much valuable property destroyed, and many lives lost, that Ali and his son ventured out of the citadel to repress the popular fury."

"Mohammed noted among the slain four hundred and seventy mounted Mamlouks, besides their attendants, who usually served on foot. The number of victims in the end did not fall short of a thousand; for orders were given to pursue this devoted race into the remotest parts of the country, and, if possible, to exterminate them throughout the whole pashalic. The heads of the principal officers were embalmed, and sent as an acceptable present to the sultan at Constantinople. Only one of the beys, whose name was Amim, is understood to have escaped the massacre in Cairo. Being detained by business, he was too late to occupy his proper place in the procession, and he only arrived at the citadel at the moment when the troops were passing the gate. He waited till they had entered the fatal passage, intending to join his own body; but seeing the gate shut suddenly, and hearing, almost immediately after, the discharge of fire-arms, he put spurs to his horse and galloped out of the city. He afterwards retired with a small suite into Syria.

"It is impossible to refrain from condemning the cruel and faithless conduct of Mohammed on this memorable occasion. He may have received orders from Constantinople to annihilate those ambitious and turbulent soldiers, who acknowledged no master but their own chief, and no laws except such as suited their licentious habits. But it is difficult, notwithstanding, to find an apology for the deliberate cold-hearted treachery which disgraced the execution of the imperial mandate. So little compunction, too, did he feel when reflecting on the occurrence, that we are told by Mengin, on being informed that he was reproached by all travellers in their narratives for this inhuman massacre, he replied, that he would have a picture of it painted, together with one of the murder of the Duc d'Enghein, and leave to posterity what judgment it might pass on the two events. This argumentum ad hominem might silence a Frenchman who had followed the standard of Bonaparte, but it goes only a very little way to remove the impression of abhorrence which must be retained by every heart not altogether insensible to those eternal distinctions on which all moral judgments must be founded.*

"Mohammed Ali was now at liberty to devote his attention to the state of things in Arabia, whither his son, Toussoun Pasha, had been sent to command the army. His campaign had already been crowned with several successes against the Wahabees; he had taken the city of Medina, the keys of which his father had sent to the porte, with large presents of money, jewels, coffee, and other valuable articles. The viceroy himself now thought it time to pay his devotions at the shrine of Mecca, and accordingly made a voyage across the Red sea. At Djidda he was received with all kindness and hospitality by the Shereef Ghaleb; in return for which, to gratify either his avarice or his political suspicion, he gave secret orders to Toussoun to seize and convey him to Cairo. Meanwhile he plundered the palace of immense treasures, part of which he applied to the support of the army, and part he shared with his master the sultan; but the latter, on understanding the manner in which they had been obtained, had honesty enough to return them to their owner through Mohammed."

The twenty-fourth number of the Library, we understand, will consist of "A history of Poland, from the earliest period to the present time," with a portrait of Kosciusko. The interest universally felt respecting the situation of that country, will insure to the forthcoming work many readers.

The Mosaic History of the Creation of the World: illustrated by discoveries and experiments derived from the present enlightened state of science, with reflections, intended to promote vital and practical religion. By Thomas Wood, A. M. Revised and improved by the Rev. J. P. Durbin, A. M. Professor of Languages, Augusta college, Kentucky. First American, from the second London edition. New-York: M'Elrath & Bangs. 1 vol. 8vo. p. 410. 1831.

This octavo, which had passed through two London editions, is now first re-published in the United States. It contains all the minutiae connected with the Mosaic account of the creation, and equally recommends itself to the friends of literature and religion. The improvements, which are mentioned in the title-page, have been added in order to adapt the work more nearly to the wants of the American public. They are found incorporated in the body of the text, in smaller print, and inclosed in brackets. The style of the typography is neat, and the volume creditable to the publishers.

SELECTED POETRY.

THE SCHOLAR OF THEBET BEN CHORAT.†

BY N. P. WILLIS.

"Induentia coeli morbum hunc movet, interdum omnibus aliis amotis."
Melancthon de anima, cap. de humoribus

Night in Arabia. An hour ago
Pale Dian had descended from the sky,
Flinging her cestus out upon the sea,
And at their watches now the solemn stars
Stood vigilant and lone, and, dead asleep;
With not a shadow moving on its breast,
The breathing earth lay in its silver dew,
And, trembling on their myriad viewless wings,
Th' imprisoned odours left the flowers to dream
And stole away upon the yielding air.

Ben Chorat's tower stands shadowy and tall
In Mecca's loneliest street; and ever there,
When night is at the deepest, burns his lamp
As constant as the Cynosure, and forth
From his looped window stretch the brazen tubes,
Pointing forever at the central star
Of that dim nebula just lifting now
Over Mount Arafat. The sky to-night
Is of a clearer blackness than is wont,
And far within its depths the colored stars
Sparkle like gems—capricious Antares
Flushing and paling in the southern arch,
And azure Lyra, like a woman's eye,
Burning with soft blue lustre, and away
Over the desert the bright polar-star,
White as a flashing icicle, and here,
Hung like a lamp above th' Arabian sea,
Mars with his dusky glow, and fairer yet,

* For a striking account of the massacre of the Mamlouks, see "Life and Adventures of Giovanni Finati," vol. i. p. 101, &c. He varies in a few particulars from the narrative of Mengin, although in the essential points there is no material difference. The boys, he tells us, were not assembled to grace the reception of the Pelisse by the young pasha, but to consult with the viceroy about the approaching war with the Arabian schismatics; and Mengin himself relates that Toussoun was not invested with the ensigns of his office till more than a month afterward. The chief, too, Chahyn by the latter author, is by Finati denominated Seim—an example of the discrepancy which arises from the practice adopted by travellers in Egypt of spelling according to the pronunciation of their respective countries.

It is remarkable that the Frenchman should have omitted an anecdote of Amin Bey, which made a great noise at the time, and was repeated to Mr. W. Banks by that officer himself when he met him at a subsequent period in Syria. "This chief, who was brother to the celebrated Elfy, urged the noble animal which he rode to an act of greater desperation, for he spurred him till he made him clamber upon the rampart, and preferring rather to be dashed to pieces than to be slaughtered in cold blood, drove him to leap down a precipice, a height that has been estimated at from thirty to forty feet, or even more; yet fortune so favored him, that, though the horse was killed, the rider escaped."—Finati, 110.

Sir F. Henniker says of him, "His horse leaped over the parapet, like leaping out of a four pair of stairs window. His horse was killed. The bey trusted himself to some Arabs (Albanians according to Finati), who, notwithstanding the offer of a large reward, would not deliver him up." P. 64.

† A famous Arabian astrologer, who is said to have spent forty years in discovering the motion of the eighth sphere. He had a scholar, a young Bodouin Arab, who, with a singular passion for knowledge, abandoned his wandering tribe, and applying himself too closely to astrology, lost his reason and died.

‡ Even to the naked eye, the stars appear of palpably different colors; but when viewed with a prismatic glass, they may be very accurately classed into the red, the yellow, the brilliant white, the dull white, and the anomalous. This is true also of the planets, which shine by reflected light, and of course the difference of color must be supposed to arise from their different powers to absorb and reflect the rays of the sun. The original compositions of the stars, and the different dispersive powers of their different atmospheres, may be supposed to account also for this phenomenon.

§ This star exhibits a peculiar quality—a rapid and beautiful change in the color of its light; every alternate twinkling being of an intense reddish crimson color, and the answering one of a brilliant white.

Mild Sirius* tinct with dewy violet,
Set like a flower upon the breast of Eve;
And in the zenith the sweet Pleiades,†
(Alas! that even a star may pass from heaven
And not be missed!) the linked Pleiades,
Undimmed are there, though from the sister band
The fairest has gone down, and south away,
Hirundot with its little company,
And white-browed Vesta, lamping on her path
Lonely and planet-calm, and, all through heaven,
Articulate almost, they troop to night,
Like unrobed angels in a prophet's trance.

Ben Chorat knelt before his telescope,
Gazing with earnest stillness on the stars;
The gray hairs struggling from his turban folds,
Played with the entering wind upon his cheeks,
And on his breast his venerable beard
With supernatural whiteness loosely fell.
The black flesh swelled about his sandal thongs,
Tight with his painful posture, and his lean
And withered fingers to his knees were clenched,
And the thin lashes of his straining eye
Lay with unwinking closeness to the lens,
Stiffened with tense up-turning. Hour by hour,
Till the stars melted in the flush of morn,
The old astrologer knelt moveless there,
Ravished past pain with the bewildering spheres,
And, hour by hour, with the same patient thought,
Pored his pale scholar on the characters
Of Chaldee writ, or, as his gaze grew dim
With weariness, the dark-eyed Arab laid
His head upon the window and looked forth
Upon the heavens awhile, until the dews
And the soft beauty of the silent night
Cooled his flushed eyelids, and then patiently
He turned unto his constant task again.
The sparry glinting of the morning star
Shot through the leaves of a majestic palm
Fringing Mount Arafat, and, as it caught
The eye of the rapt scholar, he arose
And clasped the volume with an eager haste,
And as the glorious planet mounted on,
Melting her way into the upper sky,
He breathlessly gazed on her:

"Star of the silver ray!
Bright as a god, but punctual as a slave—
What spirit the eternal canon gave
That bends thee to thy way?
What is the soul that on thy arrowy light
Is walking earth and heaven in pride to-night?
"We know when thou wilt soar
Over the mount—thy change, and place, and time—
'Tis written in the Chaldee's mystic rhyme
As 'twere a priceless lore!
I knew as much in my Bedouin garb—
Coursing the desert on my flying barb!
"How oft amid the tents
Upon Sahara's sands I've walked alone,
Waiting all night for thee, resplendent one!
With what magnificence,
In the last watches, to my thirsting eye,
Thy passionate beauty flushed into the sky!
"Oh God! how flew my soul
Out to thy glory—upward on thy ray—
Panting as thou ascendedst on thy way
As if thine own control—
This searchless spirit that I cannot find—
Had set its radiant law upon my mind!

"More than all stars in heaven
I felt thee in my heart! my love became
A frenzy, and consumed me with its flame.
Ay—in the desert even—
My dark-eyed Abra coursing at my side,
The star, not Abra, was my spirit's bride!

"My Abra is no more!
My "desert-bird" is in a stranger's stall—
My tribe, my tent—I sacrificed them all
For this heart-wasting lore!

Yet than all these the thought is sweeter far—
Thou wast ascending at my birth, bright star!

"The Chaldee calls me thine—
And in this breast, that I must rend to be
A spirit upon wings of light like thee,
I feel that thou art mine!
Oh God! that these dull fetters would give way
And let me forth to track thy silver ray!"

Ben Chorot rose
And silently looked forth upon the east.
The dawn was stealing up into the sky
On its gray feet, the stars grew dim apace,
And faded, till the morning star alone,
Soft as a molten diamond's liquid fire,
Burned in the heavens. The morn grew fresher—
The upper clouds were faintly touched with gold,
The fan-palms rustled in the early air,
Daylight spread cool and broadly to the hills,
And still the star was visible, and still
The young Bedouin with a straining eye
Drank its departing light into his soul.
It faded—melted—and the fiery rim
Of the clear sun came up, and painfully
The passionate scholar pressed upon his eyes
His dusky fingers, and with limbs as weak
As a sick child's, turned fainting to his couch,
And slept.

* When seen with a prismatic glass, Sirius shows a large brush of exceeding beautiful violet rays.

‡ An Arabic constellation placed instead of the Piscis Australis, because the swallow arrives in Arabia about the time of the heliacal rising of the fishes.

It was the morning watch once more.
The clouds were drifting rapidly above.
And dim and fast the glimmering stars flew through,
And as the fitful gust sighed mournfully,
The shutters shook, and on the sloping roof
Plashed heavily large, single drops of rain,
And all was still again. Ben Chorot sat
By the dim lamp, and, while his scholar slept,
Pored on the Chaldee wisdom. At his feet,
Stretched on a pallet, lay the Arab boy
Muttering fast in his unquiet sleep,
And working his dark fingers in his palms
Convulsively. His sorrow lips were pale,
And, as they moved, his teeth showed ghastly through,
White as a charnel bone, and closely drawn
Upon his sunken eyes, as if to press
Some frightful image from the bloodshot balls,
His lids a moment quivered, and again
Relaxed, half open, in a calmer sleep.

Ben Chorot gazed upon the drooping sands
Of the departing hour. The last white grain
Fell through, and with the tremulous hand of age
The old astrologer reversed the glass,
And as the voiceless monitor went on,
Wasting and wasting with the precious hour,
He looked upon it with a moving lip,
And starting turned his gaze upon the heavens,
Cursing the clouds impatiently.

"'Tis time!"
Muttered the dying scholar, and he dashed
The tangled hair from his black eyes away,
And, seizing on Ben Chorot's mantle folds,
He struggled to his feet, and falling prone
Upon the window ledge, gazed steadfastly
Into the east:

"There is a cloud between—
She sits this instant on the mountain's brow,
And that dusk veil hides all her glory now—
Yet floats she as serene
Into the heavens! Oh God! that even so
I could o'er mount my spirit-cloud, and go!

"The cloud begins to drift!
Aha! Fling open! 'tis the star—the sky!
Touch me, immortal mother, and I fly!
Wider! thou cloudy rift!
Let through! such glory should have radiant room!
Let through! a star-child on its light goes home!

"Speak to me, brethren bright!
Ye who are floating in these living beams!
Ye who have come to me in starry dreams!
Ye who have winged the light
Of our bright mother with its thoughts of flame—
(I knew it passed through spirits as it came)—

"Tell me! what power have ye?
What are the heights ye reach upon your wings?
What know ye of the myriad wondrous things
I perish but to see?
Are ye thought-rapid? Can ye fly as far—
As instant as a thought, from star to star?

"Where has the Pleiad gone?
Where have all missing stars* found light and home?
Who bids the Stella Mirat go and come?
Why sits the pole-star lone?
And why, like banded sisters, through the air
Go in bright troops the constellations fair?

"Ben Chorot! dost thou mark?
The star! the star! By heaven, the cloud drifts o'er!
Gone—and I live! nay—will my heart beat more?
Look! master! 'tis all dark!
Not a clear speck in heaven! my eye-balls smother!
Break through the clouds once more! oh starry mother!

"I will lie down! Yet stay!
The rain beats out the odor from the gums,
And strangely soft to-night the spice-wind comes—
I am a child away
When it is on my forehead! Abra sweet!
Would I were in the desert at thy feet!

"My barb! my glorious steed!
Methinks my soul would mount upon its track
More fleetly, could I die upon thy back!
How would thy thrilling speed
Quicken my pulse! Oh Allah! I get wild!
Would that I were once more a desert-child!

"Nay—nay—I had forgot!
My mother! my star-mother! Ha! my breath
Stiffles!—more air!—Ben Chorot! this is—death!
Touch me! I feel you not!
Dying!—Farewell, good master!—room! more room!
Abra! I—loved thee; star—bright star! I—come!"
How idly of the human heart we speak,
Giving it gods of clay! How worse than vain
Is the school homily, that Eden's fruit
Cannot be plucked too freely from "the tree
Of good and evil." Wisdom sits alone,
Topmost in heaven; she is its light—its God!
And in the heart of man she sits as high—
Though grovelling eyes forget her oftentimes,
Seeing but this world's idols. The pure mind
Sees her forever; and in youth we come

* "Missing stars" are often spoken of in the old books of astronomy. Hipparchus mentions one that appeared and vanished very suddenly; and in the beginning of the sixteenth century Kepler discovered a new star near the heel of the right foot of Serpentarius, "so bright and sparkling that it exceeded anything he had ever seen before." He "took notice that it was every moment changing into some of the colors of the rainbow, except when it was near the horizon, when it was generally white." It disappeared the following year, and has not been seen since.

† A wonderful star in the neck of the whale, discovered by Fabricius in the fifteenth century. It appears and disappears seven times in six years, and continues in the greatest lustre for fifteen days together.

Filled with her sainted rapture, and kneel,
Worshipping God through her sweet altar-fires,
And then is knowledge "good." We come too oft.
The heart grows proud with fulness, and we soon
Look with licentious freedom on the maid
Throned in celestial beauty. There she sits,
Robed in her soft and seraph loveliness,
Instructing and forgiving, and we gaze
Until desire grows wild, and, with our hands
Upon her very garments, are struck down,
Blasted with a consuming fire from heaven!
Yet oh, how full of music from her lips
Breathes the calm tones of wisdom! Human praise
Is sweet, till envy mars it, and the touch
Of new-won gold stirs up the pulses well,
And woman's love, if in a beggar's lamp
'Twould burn, might light us cheerily through the world,
But knowledge hath a far more wildering tongue,
And she will stoop and lead you to the stars,
And witch you with her mysteries, till gold
Is a forgotten dross, and power and fame
Toys of an hour, and woman's careless love
Light as the breath that breaks it. He who binds
His soul to knowledge, steals the key of heaven—
But 'tis a bitter mockery that the fruit
May hang within his reach, and when, with thirst
Wrought to a maddening frenzy, he would taste—
It burns his lips to ashes! American Monthly Magazine.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

LA MUETTE DE PORTICI.

THIS celebrated production of Auber, the present popular idol of the French musical world, was performed at this establishment on Monday to a crowded and steaming auditory, in defiance of a thermometer at ninety in the shade. Auber has been charged with being an imitator, and so perhaps he is, and yet he is truly original in many points. He has, it is true, much of the Salvata Rosa-like school of Weber, and with it he mixes up the Claude-like warmth of Rossini; nevertheless from this commixture he produces you a something which is strongly characteristic of himself alone. The "overture to Masaniello" is well known to our readers. It contains great masses of discords ingeniously worked together at the commencement, and highly descriptive of tumultuous excitement, and the bold and dashing march with which it concludes, is as beautiful a melody and as highly embellished with instrumental points as the quick movement of any overture that we can call to mind. As a composition, it does not carry the weight of the overtures of Don Giovanni and Il Flauto Magico, by Mozart—nor yet can it be classed with the Der Freischütz, nor the Oberon of Weber, nevertheless it will justly maintain a respectable place among compositions of the highest grade. It has more vigor and power than any overture of Boieldieu, although it yields to some of that author's compositions in regularity of idea and smooth modulation. In truth, excepting Boieldieu, Auber is better than any French author. In all Frenchmen there is a vivacity and strenuous mode of delivery, accompanied by vehement and sometimes grotesque gesture, which leads strangers to believe that they are often suffering under excitement, when the contrary is the fact; but give one a little touch of the heroic, something about la gloire, la beauté, or la Paris, the latter of which includes both the former in his patriotic and comprehensive view of the question, and he shall act a perfect madman without the least trouble to himself, and without a vast deal of deep feeling either, but nevertheless he shall convince you that he is in earnest. This opera was produced with an excellent ensemble, and we never recollect hearing such a noise made by a similar number of persons—but still it was an effective noise—call it singing we cannot, but it was a species of passionate shouting, very well adapted to the subject of the piece, and assisted by Auber's powerful instrumentation, proved eminently effective. La Muette was played by Madame Berdoulet Paradol, but as we have seen the melodrama, we think her inferior either to Mrs. Barnes or Mlle. Celeste, who have both played the character. Monsieur St. Aubin acted Masaniello well: there was a prostration of mental energy in the mad scene, relieved by frantic bursts of passion, which proved that he had considered the business. Madame St. Clair enacted the injured princess very passably; her singing was correct, but weak. Privat and Curto, we have pointed out previously as efficient singers. There was a cream-colored horse, "with black mane and tail," as the auction bills say at Tattersals, which did not partake in the general unanimity—whether he did not understand French, or was astounded at the clatter, we cannot say, but certainly he retrograded in a manner which proved that he did not participate in the general feeling; and at one time some doubts existed whether he was not about to prove too potent for Masaniello and three holders of his bridle. We have to add that upon the appearance of this quadruped, sundry bipeds showed their affinity to the beast by applauding most vigorously.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Conversations of the week.—The grand jury have at length made a statement, contradicting the Magdalen Report, and asserting its exaggerations to be to the truth about as ten to one. It appears from their presentment, that the moral character of the city has rather improved than otherwise. It is proper, however, to caution our readers against confounding all the members of the society, which is obviously in its object an excellent one, with those few who personally explored this dark avenue of statistics, and insulted the public with the officious and grossly erroneous report. Thus ends this famous proceeding. We hope it will teach zealous reformers to attend to their own affairs, and leave those of the community to the laws, and such magistrates as they may select to enforce them. We are reminded of the dignified conduct of Peter Stuyvesant, who, on something of a similar occasion, having cause to perceive that his good and trusty subjects were rather too much inclined to intermeddle with matters which did not concern them, resolved to adopt some gentle method of correcting the evil.

"He accordingly (says his grave and dignified historian) watched his opportunity, and one evening when the enlightened mob was gathered together, listening to a patriotic speech from an inspired cobbler, the intrepid Peter all at once appeared among them, with a countenance sufficient to petrify a mill-stone. The whole meeting was thrown into consternation—the orator seemed to have received a paralytic stroke in the very middle of a sublime sentence, and stood aghast with open mouth and trembling knees, while the words horror! tyranny! liberty! rights! taxes! death! destruction! and a deluge of other patriotic phrases, came roaring from his throat, before he had power to close his lips. The shrewd Peter took no notice of the skulking throng around him; but, advancing to the brawling bully-ruffian, and drawing out a huge silver watch which might have served in times of yore as a town-clock, and which is still retained by his descendants as a family curiosity; requested the orator to mend it, and set it going. The orator humbly confessed it was utterly out of his power, as he was unacquainted with the nature of its construction. 'Nay, but,' said Peter, 'try your ingenuity, man; you see all the springs and wheels, and how easily the clumsiest hand may stop it, and pull it to pieces; and why should it not be equally easy to regulate as to stop it?' The orator declared that his trade was wholly different—that he was a poor cobbler, and had never meddled with a watch in his life; that there were men skilled in the art, whose business it was to attend to those matters; but for his part, he should only mar the workmanship, and put the whole in confusion. 'Why, harkee, master of mine,' cried Peter, turning suddenly upon him, with a countenance that almost petrified the patcher of shoes into a perfect lapstone—'dost thou pretend to meddle with the movements of government; to regulate, and correct, and patch, and cobbler a complicated machine, the principles of which are above thy comprehension, and its simplest operations too subtle for thy understanding; when thou canst not correct a trifling error in a common piece of mechanism, the whole mystery of which is open to thy inspection?—Hence with thee to the leather and stone, which are emblems of thy head, cobble thy shoes, and confine thyself to the vocation for which heaven has fitted thee. But,' elevating his voice until it made the welkin ring, 'if ever I catch thee, or any of thy tribe, meddling again with affairs of government, by St. Nicholas but I'll have every mother's son of ye flayed alive, and your hides stretched for drumheads, that ye may thenceforth make a noise to some purpose!'

"This threat, and the tremendous voice in which it was uttered, caused the whole multitude to quake with fear. The hair of the orator arose on his head like his own swine's bristles, and not a knight of the thimble breast but his heart died within him, and he felt as though he could have verily escaped through the eye of a needle."

A child has been killed—we might almost say murdered—by the carelessness of a driver, who in consequence of it has been arrested. It is to be expected that accidents of this nature will occasionally occur in a crowded city, and foot passengers are frequently censurable for exposing themselves unnecessarily to danger. But in the present instance the cartman was driving furiously, at the rate of eight miles per hour. The mother of the child witnessed the catastrophe. We have before noticed the utter recklessness with which hackney coachmen and cartmen turn suddenly around corners, by which the life and limbs of our citizens are every day placed in jeopardy.

A curious specimen of small literary malice appears in the Boston American Traveller. We several years ago declined complying with the request of the conductor, to exchange; for which he amuses himself with occasional bursts of spleen, and endeavors to "cut us to pieces with his keen conceit." He asserts that the commendations bestowed upon us by our contemporaries are purchased. This is equally complimentary to us and to those who praise us. Notwithstanding, however, the heavy disadvantage of this Boston Traveller's disapprobation, we must still refuse to exchange. It is really disgusting to see a public press perverted into an engine of private resentment. We frequently smile at the facility with which we trace the track of a personal enemy by the hypercriticisms and falsehoods that bubble up along the surface of the literary world, in the shape of abusive paragraphs. It is like watching the ripple above the shark as he cuts his way through the smooth water. We seldom deem it worth while to reply to these attacks, and notice the present one not in anger. "There is room enough in the world for thee and me." But a friend has just laid the venomous paragraph on the table, and we have looked at it as we should at a little snake in a tumbler. But a truce to this worthy. He slips from our memory on the entrance of a messenger with a packet. It proves to be "The Tourist," a pocket manual for travellers on the Hudson river, the western canal, and stage road to Niagara falls; comprising also the routes to Lebanon, Ballston, and Saratoga; just printed by Ludwig & Tolefree. It is a neat, and to a traveller in that part of the country, an almost indispensable companion, which may be easily carried in the vest pocket. It should be sold on board the steamboats.

In another column will be found an article upon the subject of painting. We must not neglect to remind the public, that the collection of our venerable countryman, Colonel Trumbull, is also still open for exhibition at the American Academy of the Fine Arts, in Chambers-street. A visit could not fail to afford gratification to all who have not yet examined this interesting gallery.

Mr. Barrett, formerly of the Bowery, has leased the Tremont theatre, Boston. He is highly appreciated in this city.

Anastasiu will be the next number of the Harpers' select novels. This ably written and celebrated romance needs no comment.

It has been ascertained in London that the sale of publications generally doubles on the prosecution of the author.

Messrs. Carey & Lea will publish, early in September, the Autobiography of the author of Waverley, forming the third volume of the Cabinet Library, the popularity of which is already established by Lord Londonderry's interesting volume on the Campaigns of Germany and France, and the admirable Journal of a Naturalist.

We learn, says the Boston Patriot, that the sloop of war Peacock, now lying at the Navy-yard, is ordered to be fitted out immediately, destined probably for the East Indies, in consequence of the attack by the Malays upon the ship Friendship of Salem.

The London Courier observes—"War is unavoidable, if Russia and Prussia persist in opposing the enlightened views of more liberal cabinets."

We have before us the London "Harmonicon," a monthly journal of music, for June. It is beautifully printed in the quarto form, and the music-type is executed almost as well as copper-plate. The reputation of this work in musical matters, is widely extended. It is conducted with great ability, and will be perused with pleasure by our amateurs. Peabody and Co. are the agents for the work.

A wag in speaking of the appointment of Mason to the secretaryship of Michigan, observed that there appears to be a great many anti-masons in that territory.

The National Gazette has copied the following opinion of the "Young Duke" from an English paper:

"This is one of the light agreeable novels that, independently of the amusements it offers, has a moral and useful tendency. It paints in lively colors the fashions, the follies, and the vices of the day; and the author has an intimate acquaintance with the manners of a wide range of society. The tale is well told, the characters well drawn, and the progress of a young duke through the eventful career of youth, with every inducement to pursue the path of fashionable life heedlessly and extravagantly, is portrayed with great force."

We close these scattered observations with a few lines, just received, from James Neck. The reader will be delighted with their pleasing simplicity and tenderness.

MIGNONNE.

She calls me "father!" though my ear
That thrilling name shall never hear,
Yet to my heart affection brings.
The sound in sweet imaginings;
I feel its gushing music roll
The stream of rapture on my soul;
And when she starts to welcome me,
And when she totters to my knee,
And when she climbs it, to embrace
My bosom for her hiding-place,
And when she nestling there reclines,
And with her arms my neck entwines,
And when her lips of roses seek
To press their sweetness on my cheek,
And when upon my careful breast
I lull her to her cherub rest,
I whisper, bending her above,
"I love thee with a father's love!"

The Dutchman's Fireside.—We are gratified to learn that this work has received the most substantial evidences of public favor. A continual demand has exhausted three editions, and a fourth has accordingly been put to press. We are by no means surprised at this, as the author is a writer of great power and humor, and will sustain an elevated station among the foremost of our candidates for literary renown. The popularity of his productions, however, has been partially injured by the frankness with which he expresses his opinions; which, in our estimation, deserves anything rather than censure. Had he possessed less independence and more policy, had he flattered the prevailing tastes of certain classes and denominations, his productions would, no doubt, have been far more widely circulated. But he has pursued a different course, and although we may regret innumerable instances of carelessness in what he has written, all must, nevertheless, admire him as an author, and esteem him as a gentleman. By the late arrival we perceive that the "Dutchman's Fireside" has been announced for re-publication in England. A literary friend has just shown us a letter from Edward Lytton Bulwer, from which we are permitted to make the following extract:

"I have received," says the author of Pelham, "the Dutchman's Fireside, and think it excellent. I sent it to Mr. Colburn, with a letter of recommendation, and he has already advertised it for sale. I hope it will prove as successful here as it deserves. I am happy to coincide with you in admiring its merits."

The opinion of Mr. Bulwer—himself one of the most deservedly popular novelists of the day—is by no means without its value.

The "Lay of the Scottish Fiddle," by Mr. Paulding, was also re-printed in London, with a highly complimentary preface by the late R. C. Dallas, Esq.; and the "Backwoodman," a poem, now out of print, was translated into the French and German languages. The novel of "Koningsmarke," likewise, was re-published in England. Neither of these works addressed themselves to the feelings or prejudices of these nations; but, on the contrary, frequently expressed sentiments decidedly in collision with them, and consequently provoked the anger of several periodicals.

Mr. Bulwer's letter contains another item, which we take leave to transfer to our columns. It announces the fact, that a new novel may shortly be expected from his pen:

"My novel is getting on rapidly. The title is not yet decided; but the plot is from a very remarkable murder by a very remarkable man, half a century ago. In short, from the story of Eugene Aram. Perhaps the title will be the above name."

It will contain a fine portrait of the author, from a painting by Pickersgill.

SECOND VERSE.

Her dark brown hair is braided,
O'er a brow of spotless white;
Her soft blue eye now languishes
Now flashes with delight;
The hair is braided not for me,
The eye is turn'd away,
Yet my heart, my heart, is breaking
For the love of Alice Gray!

THIRD VERSE.

I've sunk beneath the summer's sun,
And trembled in the blast;
But my pilgrimage is nearly done,
The weary conflict's past;
And when the green sod wraps my grave
May pity haply say,
"Oh! his heart, his heart is broken
For the love of Alice Gray!"

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

LINES,

Upon a young lady's showing me a copy of verses from a beau, who had just deserted her.

And is he gone? Is this the last
Sad fond memorial of his love?
Is all his false tongue whispered past?
Can not e'en tears so melting, move?
Alas! that woman's heart should ever
Thus fondly, truly, vainly cling
To one loved object, born to sever
Hope from so fair, so pure a thing.
Ah! could you, Marianne, forget
You ever loved and loved in vain,
You might find hearts more constant yet,
And I awake to hope again.

ON THE SAME OCCASION.

Many a dart is sent by Cupid
From lovely woman's glancing eye,
That vainly strikes a heart too stupid
To feel a lover's ecstasy.
Was this thy case, fair Marianne?
Dost thou a slighted passion smother?
Didst thou thus find one faithless man?
Forget him, sweet, and love another.

THE CHANGE.

When I wrote sonnets to thy brow,
Thine eye was full and bright;
Thy cheek was not, as it is now,
So very, very white;
Thy beauty then inspired the tale—
But now, my love, thou'rt very pale.
When first to thee I bent the knee,
I'd no rheumatic pain;
My curling locks then floated free—
No lady thought me plain—
But now, like Samson, I bewail
My shaved head—and thou art pale.
Six months ago, and thou, my dear,
Couldst still enjoy a jig—
Six months ago, and I had hair,
But now I wear a wig—
Six months ago—but cease the tale—
I'm bald, and thou art very pale.

POLITENESS TO FEMALES.

As there is nothing in which the good breeding of a company of gentlemen is more clearly evinced than in a ready civility to the female sex, which should spring, as it were, from an impulse of nature; so nothing can mark them as low and vulgar more pointedly than a neglect of those observances which the refined of all ages have been eager to pay to woman. I have frequently had occasion to observe the rudeness of mixed companies of well-dressed men to females; and have sometimes been disgusted with seeing a lazy fellow, in the apparel of a gentleman, lounging along the seats of the theatre, with his hat drawn down over his eyebrows, or perhaps sitting before ladies on the front seat, and disturbing them with low and frivolous conversation to some other of the same crew.

I undertook the other day to gallant several charming young girls across the river to Hoboken. On entering the boat we found no prospect of seats. Two long benches were crowded with persons in the dress of gentlemen, not one of whom made any move; although three as pretty women, and as amiable too, as you could select from Broadway in an afternoon of spring, were standing, and with the prospect of remaining in the same situation during the whole passage. Around were other gentlemen, on chairs, lounging in various attitudes, and leaning back (which last graceful habit, let me add, is a rank Americanism) while one fellow had absolutely taken possession, not only of one chair for his body, but of an extra one upon which he coolly deposited his legs, and amused himself with looking under the bonnets of my fair companions, at the same time whistling "Yankee doodle." Although I am naturally of an extremely peaceful disposition, I assure you my hand ached to try the strength of a horsewhip upon his shoulders. Equally striking instances of coarseness, and bad education, as well as bad disposition, may be every day observed on board any of the steam-boats, when the passengers are rung to a meal. It is almost as much as one or two of us can do to protect our female friends from the outrages and depredations of the hungry surrounding savages. Dishes are cleared while we are in the act of reaching them—waiters commanded from our sides, by stentorian lungs from the other end of the table; so that the scene rather resembles a riot than a breakfast; and should any lady by chance be left without a seat, she may pass fifty voracious dandies, with quizzing-glasses and little whalebone canes, before one will abandon the advantage of his physical superiority, and rise to give her his place.

This is an evil which calls loudly for a remedy, although I scarcely know how to set about it; for they who are sufficiently vulgar to commit these misdemeanors, are beyond the reach of ridicule or reproof. I have spoken of these offenders against the rules of polite society as badly educated, I will close these brief observations with the remark, that this species of rudeness is frequently found among the better classes. The poor, who have been denied the advantages of learning, are frequently polite from their intrinsic kind and generous feelings, while the native bad heart and mean understanding betray themselves in these trifles, through all the treasures of learning and the gloss of fashion.

Selections from English periodicals.

THE FAIR SEX.—The census just taken for the borough of Liverpool, shows that our fair friends are, at the present period, in a fearful majority. They exceed the males by nearly twelve thousand! The comfort and happiness of the males are, doubtless, greatly increased by the overplus of the softer sex; but, when we view that overplus in its effects on the comfort and the happiness of the ladies themselves, we are filled with alarm for our fair friends.

"'Tis true, and, pity 'tis, 'tis true," that they cannot all get husbands, unless the men, (some of whom deem one wife more than enough for one man) should be compelled to support the surplus female population. Were an immigration of males to take place, what "marrying and giving in marriage" there would be in Liverpool!

SIMPLICITY.—At the marriage of Monsieur d'Artois, the city of Paris agreed to distribute marriage portions. A smart little girl of sixteen, named Lise Noirin, having presented herself to inscribe her name on the list, was asked who was her lover? "O," said she, with great simplicity, "I have no lover; I thought the city furnished every thing!" This being told to the count, a worthy husband was sought out for the girl, and her marriage portion was doubled.

THE ESCAPE OF LOVE.

Love once dwelt in a palmy isle,
His palace of the green leaves' shade,
A chain of roses on his wings,
His guardian, a dark-eyed maid.
They lived in sweet companionship—
Enough for him one smile so bright—
Enough for her to live for him,
To watch his chain and keep it bright.
But once, the nymph laid down to sleep,
Leaving her fragrant chain undone,
And Love awakened, while she slept,
Shook off his fetters, and was gone!

An author, whose former works had been twenty years forgotten, having broken his literary silence by an attack on Voltaire; the latter wrote to one of his friends, "This man hath left the abode of the dead to speak evil of the living."

PERSUADING SERVANTS FROM THEIR PLACES.

I AM a gentleman of large family, and have for many years resided in this city. Among the special disadvantages incidental to this, as to every other place of abode, I can recollect none more disagreeable than the difficulty of obtaining good domestics. It is very true that we are compelled to drink water impregnated with lime; that we are occasionally teased by musketoes; that we are awakened every night by the alarm of fire; and sometimes experience anxiety from the fear of house-breakers: but I could endure all this, and find

"In some part of my heart
A drop of patience."

But the plagues and mortifications which have ever attended my endeavors to procure what our eastern friends call "help," are nearly intolerable.

When my good Fanny and myself, after the interesting ceremony and the expiration of the honey-moon, completed our arrangements for housekeeping, we found ourselves "imparadised" in a snug two-story brick mansion, in one of the most pleasant and genteel sections of the town. We possessed agreeable neighbors, and fine health and spirits to enjoy their society. My business prospered beyond my highest anticipations. I soon found myself encompassed with a number of little "blooming responsibilities," which imparted to my home an air of calm happiness that only a father can feel, and which made that spot the centre of all my interests and wishes. What a pity, that in this world there must always be something to mar our contentment—some enemy within or without, to keep alive in our remembrance our mortality and final doom! The enjoyment which we might have reasonably expected from these combined blessings, was greatly annoyed by the evil mentioned at the commencement of this essay. We exhausted all artifices in order to procure a cook, a nurse, and a waiting man. Our attempts were truly unlucky. The intelligence office poured in upon us one after another with the best of characters, but we could not endure them. One came with a certificate from a respectable family, in which her honesty, industry, and sobriety, were praised in the strongest terms; but happening one day to enter the room suddenly, I found Miss Sobriety at the sideboard, with the decanter of brandy and her lips in such a relative situation as at once let me into a very important secret respecting the young woman's disposition. I accordingly told her, in a mild way, that if she had desired any refreshment, she should have asked her mistress for it, by which means she would doubtless have procured it: as matters stood, I was sorry to be compelled to say we should not hereafter require her services. After begging, apologizing, and explaining with vehemence, she burst into tears—declared she was the mother of two infants, whom her husband had cruelly abandoned, and hoped that the gentleman would not take the bread out of the mouth of a poor defenceless woman, but would at least give her a good character. Not choosing to inflict the lady upon any unwary stranger, and not particularly inclined to credit her recital, I positively refused: upon which, with the suddenness with which Milton mentions that the arch-fiend, "squat like a toad" at the ear of our prime mother, resumed his original form at the touch of Ithuriel's spear—the poor, defenceless creature assumed the impudent demeanor of an amazonian virago, and assailed me with such a mingled shower of oaths and threats, and revealed such a licentious recklessness of character, as made me rejoice that I had escaped without having my wife's throat cut, or my children poisoned. This custom among decent people of giving a good character to persons with whom they are dissatisfied, merely from a weak feeling of pity, or a selfish desire to be rid of them as quietly as possible, is pernicious. It is a kind of fraud, not the less censurable, because you do not know whom it will cheat. It is a lie, which must eventually be detected. It procures only a temporary benefit to the bearer—disgraces yourself—and casts a general odium upon all the class of honest and hard-laboring people whom Providence has placed in that station.

My waiting man, John, was of a different construction. He possessed all the requisites for an excellent servant, and was in reality a great favorite of my own. But he was cursed with an incurable propensity to officiousness, and a ludicrous habit of acting as if he were one of the company rather than a waiter. My friends have been thunderstruck, at a dinner-party, after the recital of some amusing anecdote, and the first burst of laughter had subsided, to hear the peal of friend John at their elbow, his approving slap on his knee, followed by some frank opinion, as "that's the best one yet," or "that fellow must have been a queer chap," or "there's no mistaking him." I should have kept him, however; but an English lady, of an aristocratical disposition, and who seldom condescended to any thing like a republican familiarity, having paid a long visit to my wife, John told her one day at dinner, that he "would recommend the soup," as it was "very fine." She either did not, or rather, I presume, would not hear him; upon which, he took hold of her little finger, with a gentle shake, and placing his face within a most sacrilegious proximity to the haughty dame's, pronounced the monosyllable "soup" in an elevated interrogatory key. Have you ever seen a cat bristle up with bended back against the wall, or under the sofa, with round green glaring eyes flashing out from the shadow at the approach of some great, good-natured dog? Imagine, then, the air with which the venerable and respectable maiden lady turned around upon her foe. I positively thought she would have bitten him. Poor John! he had to start; and in his place I hired an obsequious, cringing scoundrel, who moved about the house like a sloth, drank every thing that came in his way, and stole my money into the bargain.

With nurses we have been equally unfortunate. One was kind-hearted, but she had such a vulgar speech, that I was unwilling that she should associate with my children; another was fine spoken, but pert and saucy. Susan told them ghost-stories; Sally pinched them when she was out of humor; and Peggy was a slattern, and too lazy to speak. I really once thought that I was suited. Miss Arabella was apparently just what she should be: neat, obedient, industrious, modest, sober, and honest. But nature had endowed her with a pretty face and genteel carriage, and she was inspired with ideas of gentility and fashion. I came home one Sunday afternoon, and met a lady on the steps quite elegantly dressed. At first I thought it was my wife; but then she was not accustomed to such a dashing apparel. As I approached, I touched my beaver respectfully, and was about to inquire if the honor of this visit was intended for Mrs. S., when the stranger exclaimed, "I'll go down through the kitchen-way, if you please, sir, and let you in." In a little time I found Miss Arabella saw more company than I did; and I have been surprised when at tea to descry three or four fashionable looking gentlemen, rustling, nodding, and glittering down stairs and along the entry, in single file, till I scarcely knew whether I was in my own house or not. When these little agreeable circles began to be enlivened by the presence of certain acquaintances of the other gender, I was fain to pay Miss Arabella her wages, and solicit her not to trouble herself with our household affairs for the future.

Sitting in my study one day, a gentleman came in, and, bowing with great politeness, called me by name, and in excellent English for a foreigner, claimed the honor of my acquaintance, handing me a letter at the same time. I shook him kindly by the hand, begged him to be seated, and on perusing the letter found out the gentleman had understood I was in want of a cook, and begged leave to offer his services in that capacity. On a second glance at him, I remembered to have seen him at the house of a friend who had lately sailed for London.

At length, however, by dint of the most unremitting perseverance, I succeeded in obtaining three servants upon whom I could rely. The best of cooks, the most unexceptionable of waiters, and a nurse who is like a mother to the children. They resided in my family five years, during which period the more I saw of them the more I valued them. And now, Messrs. Editors, I come to the object of this paper, which is to make public the ungenerous, I may add, the dishonorable conduct of several families, whom I really have always respected and esteemed, and do yet in a certain degree, although circumstances have materially degraded them, or rather the master and mistress of them, in my estimation.

I had often boasted to my friends of my invaluable servants; and their reputation, indeed, was pretty well extended through the neighborhood. Many attempts had been made to seduce them from their allegiance to me; but as I always treated them kindly, and gave them liberal wages, I am pleased to believe they felt bound to their situation both by interest and gratitude. The waiter, Phil, revealed the names of several who had thus tampered with him; inquiring what wages he was allowed in my family, how many hours he was compelled to work in the day, and what kind of labor was imposed upon him. They hinted that he ought to expect more; that his duties were too toilsome; and in short plainly told him, that if he would leave me and make a compact with them, they would insure him higher wages and less work. This is a species of downright robbery. I prefer that such dishonest meddlers in the affairs of private families should open my secretary, and help themselves to any reasonable sum of money. That action would not be any more of a deliberate and guilty swindle, and would put me to much less inconvenience. Phil has about him a sterling honesty, which binds him to me; besides which he has a native good sense which enables him to see when he is in an excellent place; or as he one day expressed it in his homely but not weak phraseology, he knew "which side his bread was buttered." The nurse has not been so faithful. She has been allured by a house in Broadway, a family of great wealth and fashion, and the offer of higher wages, and has left me without any assistance whatever. And the cook is probably at this moment up to her eyes in business in a private boarding-house, where,

I have reason to believe, she will discover that it is much more easy for her mistress to make promises than to keep them. I hope some of your readers will take the hint from this statement, which has nothing but truth and good intention to recommend it for publication. I think, however, that while a large portion of them derive more gratification from eloquent poetry and fanciful tales, or essays which embrace only lofty moral or metaphysical subjects, others would be pleased with your devoting a space of the Mirror to the correction of these little evils of practical life. To such as have been or may be guilty of the unneighborly conduct complained of here, I wish distinctly to state, that I look upon them as so many swindlers, who have the bad disposition of offenders against the law without their courage. It is my opinion, that after a perusal of my humble recital, whoever deludes a good servant by covert promises, from his place in a decent family, would pick my pocket in any other way if he durst. He is a bad neighbor, an undutiful citizen, and I will stake my life, an unkind husband and an injudicious father. And if he do not actually break the law of his country, he violates other natural rules of courtesy and moral right, and richly deserves the anathema which Burns bestowed on the foes of Scotland's weal, "a towmond toothache." LITERARY NOTICES.

MR. BULWER'S FORTHCOMING NOVEL.

EUGENE ARAM.

IN our last number we copied part of a private letter from Mr. Bulwer, announcing the fact that he is preparing for the press another novel, founded, to use his own language, upon "a very remarkable murder, by a very remarkable man, half a century ago. In short, from the story of Eugene Aram." We remember having been, several years since, struck with the perusal of this singularly interesting occurrence, with the extraordinary talent and erudition of the man, and the ingenuity and eloquence of his defence. Perhaps there is not on record a more able and convincing address to a court and jury, from a criminal, than that of Aram's, and the wonder is that he was not immediately acquitted. A general belief of his innocence would undoubtedly always have prevailed, but for his letter, written to the attending clergyman after sentence had been pronounced. He was executed on the sixth of August, 1759. Believing that such materials, about to form the theme of a novel in the hands of a popular and eloquent writer, possess, at this period, a more than ordinary interest, and that the particulars are known to few, we have explored sundry bureaux, book-cases, and old drawers, and shaken off the dust from heaps of forgotten periodicals, with an indefinite recollection of having something of the sort in our possession, and at length have alighted upon a work, entitled

"The Magazine of Wonders, and Marvellous Chronicle; intended as a record of accounts of the most extraordinary productions, events, and occurrences, in providence, nature, and art, that have been witnessed at any time. Consisting principally of such curious articles as come under the denomination of miraculous, queer, strange, marvellous, whimsical, absurd, out of the way, and unaccountable. Including genuine accounts of the most surprising escapes from death and dangers—strange and unaccountable accidents, discoveries of long concealed murders—absurd and ridiculous customs, peculiar to different nations—dreadful shipwrecks—heroic adventures—uncommon instances of strength and longevity—memorable exploits—interesting and extraordinary anecdotes—and whatever else is calculated to promote entertainment and improvement. Collected from the writings of the most approved historians, travellers, philosophers, &c. of all ages and countries; embellished with copper-plates. By D. Fraser, author of the Mental Flower Garden, Compendium of the History of all Nations, &c."

Take breath, gentle reader, as we did after reading the above title, which we have copied for thy especial edification. This wonderful "Magazine of wonders," now nearly, we presume, out of print, contained the very object of our search, which we are about to receive, regenerated and adorned with all the embellishments of fancy, from the vivid pen of the author of Pelham. We have crowded out several original communications to give it place, and here it is.

"The murder for which Eugene Aram suffered, and his whole history, is so uncommon, that our readers will be equally pleased and astonished with a full and explicit relation of it.

"One of the ancestors of this offender had been high sheriff of Yorkshire, in the reign of King Edward the third; but the family having been gradually reduced, Aram's father was but in a low station of life; the son, however, was sent to a school near Rippon, where he perfected himself in writing and arithmetic, and then went to London, to officiate as clerk to a merchant.

"After a residence of two years in town, he was seized with the small-pox, which left him in so weak a condition that he went back to Yorkshire for the improvement of his health.

* Twelve month.

"On his recovery, he found it necessary to do something for immediate subsistence; and accordingly engaged himself as usher to a boarding-school; but, not having been taught the learned languages in his youth, he was obliged to supply by industry what he had lost through neglect; so that teaching the scholars only writing and arithmetic at first, he employed all his leisure hours in the most intense study, till he became an excellent Greek and Latin scholar; in the progress to which acquirements he owed much to the help of a most extraordinary memory.

"In the year 1734, he engaged to officiate as steward of an estate belonging to Mr. Norton, of Knaresborough; and, while in this station, he acquired a competent knowledge of the Hebrew. At this period he married, but was far from being happy in the matrimonial connexion.

"We now proceed to relate the circumstances which led to the commission of the crime which cost Aram his life. Daniel Clarke, a shoemaker, at Knaresborough, after being married a few days, circulated a report that his wife was entitled to a considerable fortune, which he should soon receive. Hereupon Aram, and Richard Houseman, conceiving hopes of taking advantage of this circumstance, persuaded Clarke to make an ostentatious show of his own riches, to induce his wife's relations to give him that fortune of which he had boasted. There was sagacity, if not honesty, in this advice; for the world in general are more free to assist persons in affluence than those in distress.

"Clarke was easily induced to comply with a hint so agreeable to his own desires; on which he borrowed and bought on credit a large quantity of silver plate, with jewels, watches, rings, &c. He told the persons of whom he purchased, that a merchant in London had sent him an order to buy such plate for exportation; and no doubt was entertained of his credit till his sudden disappearance in February, 1745, when it was imagined that he had gone abroad, or at least to London, to dispose of his property.

"When Clarke was possessed of these goods, Aram and Houseman determined to murder him, in order to share the booty; and on the night of the eighth of February, 1745, they persuaded Clarke to walk with them in the fields, in order to consult with them on the proper method to dispose of the effects.

"On this plan they walked into a field, and at a small distance from the town, well known by the name of St. Robert's Cave. When they came into this field Aram and Clarke went over a hedge towards the cave, and when they had got within six or seven yards of it, Houseman, by the light of the moon, saw Aram strike Clarke several times, and at length beheld him fall, but never saw him afterwards. This was the state of the affair, if Houseman's testimony on the trial might be credited.

"The murderers going home shared Clarke's ill-gotten treasure, the half of which Houseman concealed in his garden for a twelvemonth, and then took it to Scotland, where he sold it. In the meantime Aram carried his share to London, where he bartered it to a Jew, and then engaged himself as an usher at an academy in Piccadilly; where, in the intervals of his duty in attending the scholars, he made himself master of the French, and acquired some knowledge of the Arabic, and other eastern languages.

"After this he was usher at other schools in different parts of the kingdom; but as he did not correspond with his friends in Yorkshire, it was presumed that he was dead; but, in the year 1758, as a man was digging for limestones, near St. Robert's Cave, he found the bones of a human body; and a conjecture hereupon arose that they were the remains of the body of Clarke, who, it was presumed, might have been murdered.

"Houseman having been seen in company with Clarke a short time before his disappearance, was apprehended on suspicion; and on his examination, giving but too evident signs of guilt, he was committed to York castle; and the bones of the deceased being shown him, he denied that they were those of Clarke, but directed to the precise spot where they were deposited, and where they were accordingly found. The skull being fractured, was preserved to be produced in evidence on the trial.

"Soon after Houseman was committed to the castle of York it was discovered that Aram resided at Lynn, in Norfolk, on which a warrant was granted for taking him into custody; and, being apprehended while instructing some young gentlemen at a school, he was conveyed to York, and likewise committed to the castle.

"At the Lent assizes following the prosecutors were not ready with their evidence, on which he was remanded till the summer assizes, when he was brought to trial.

"When Houseman had given his evidence respecting this extraordinary affair, and all such collateral testimony had been obtained as could be adduced on such an occasion, Aram was called on for his defence; but, having foreseen that the perturbation of his spirits would incapacitate him to make such defence without previous preparation, he had written the following, which he read in court:

"MY LORD—I know not whether it is of right, or through some indulgence of your lordship, that I am allowed the liberty at this bar, and at this time, to attempt a defence, incapable and uninstructed as I am to speak. Since, while I see so many eyes upon me, so numerous and awful a concourse, fixed with attention, and filled with I know not what expectancy, I labor not with guilt, my lord, but with perplexity. For having never seen a court but this, being wholly unacquainted with law, the customs of the bar, and all judiciary proceedings, I fear I shall be so little capable of speaking with propriety in this place, that it will exceed my hope if I shall be able to speak at all.

"I have heard, my lord, the indictment read, wherein I find myself charged with the highest crime, with an enormity I am altogether incapable of; a fact, to the commission of which there goes far more insensibility of heart, more profligacy of morals, than ever fell to my lot. And nothing possibly could have admitted a presumption of this nature, but a depravity not inferior to that imputed to me. However, as I stand indicted at your lordship's bar, and have heard what is called evidence adduced in support of such a charge, I very humbly solicit your lordship's patience, and beg the hearing of this respectable audience, while I, single and unskilled, destitute of friends, and unassisted by counsel, say something, perhaps like argument, in my defence. I shall consume but little of your lordship's time; what I have to say will be short, and this brevity, probably, will be the best part of it; however, it is offered with all possible regard, and the greatest submission to your lordship's consideration, and that of this honorable court.

"First, my lord, the whole tenor of my conduct in life contradicts every particular of this indictment. Yet had I never said this, did not my present circumstances extort it from me, and seem to make it necessary. Permit me here, my lord, to call upon malignity itself, so long and cruelly biased in this prosecution, to charge upon me any immorality, of which prejudice was not the author. No, my lord, I concerted no schemes of fraud, projected no violence, injured no man's person or private property; my days were honestly laborious, my nights intensely studious. And I humbly conceive my notice of this, especially at this time, will not be thought impertinent or unseasonable, but at least deserving some attention; because, my lord, that any person, after a temperate use of life, a series of thinking and acting regularly, and without one single deviation from sobriety, should plunge into the very depth of profligacy, precipitately, and at once, is altogether improbable and unprecedented, and absolutely inconsistent with the course of things. Man is never corrupted at once; villainy is always progressive, and declines from right, step after step, till every regard of probity is lost, and every sense of all moral obligation totally perishes.

"Again, my lord, a suspicion of this kind, which nothing but malevolence could entertain, and ignorance propagate, is violently opposed by my very situation at that time, with respect to health; for but a little space before I had been confined to my bed, and suffered under a very long and severe disorder, and was not able, for half a year together, so much as to walk. The distemper left me indeed, yet slowly and in part; but so macerated, so enfeebled, that I was reduced to crutches; and so far from being well about the time I am charged with this fact, that I never, to this day, perfectly recovered. Could, then, a person in this condition take any thing into his head so unlikely, so extravagant? I, past the vigor of my age, feeble and valetudinary, with no inducement to engage, no ability to accomplish; without interest, without power, without motive, without means.

"Besides, it must needs occur to every one, that an action of this atrocious nature is never heard of, but when its springs are laid open, it appears that it was to support some indolence, or supply some luxury; to satisfy some avarice, or oblige some malice; to prevent some real, or some imaginary want; yet I lay not under the influence of any one of these. Surely, my lord, I may, consistent with both truth and modesty, affirm thus much; and none who have any veracity, and knew me, will ever question this.

"In the second place, the disappearance of Clarke is suggested as an argument of his being dead; but the uncertainty of such an inference from that, and the fallibility of all conclusions of such a sort, from such a circumstance, are too obvious, and too notorious, to require instances; yet, superseding many, permit me to procure a very recent one, and that afforded by this castle.

"In June, 1757, William Thompson, for all the vigilance of this place, in open daylight and double-ironed, made his escape; and, notwithstanding an immediate inquiry set on foot, the strictest search, and all advertisement, was never seen or heard of since. If then Thompson got off unseen, through all these difficulties, how very easy was it for Clarke, when none of them opposed him? But what would be thought of a prosecution commenced against any one seen last with Thompson?

"Permit me next, my lord, to observe a little upon the bones which have been discovered. It is said, which perhaps is saying very far, that it is the skeleton of a man. It is possible, indeed, it may be; but is there any certain criterion, which incontestably distinguishes the sex in human bones? Let it be considered, my lord, whether the ascertaining of this point ought not to precede any attempt to identify them.

"The place of their depositum, too, claims much more attention than is commonly bestowed upon it; for, of all spots in the world, none could have mentioned any one, wherein there was greater certainty of finding human bones, than a hermitage, except he should point out a churchyard; hermitages, in time past, being not only places of religious retirement, but of burial too. And it has scarce, or never been heard of, but that every cell now known, contains, or contained those relics of humanity; some mutilated, and some entire. I do not inform, but give me leave to remind your lordship, that here sat solitary sanctity, and here the hermit, or the anchoress, hoped that repose for their bones, when dead, they here enjoyed when living.

"All the while, my lord, I am sensible this is known to your lordship, and many in this court, better than me. But it seems necessary to my case that others, who have not at all, perhaps, adverted to things of this nature, and may have concern in my trial, should be made acquainted with it. Suffer me, then, my lord, to produce a few of many evidences, that these cells were used as repositories of the dead, and to enumerate a few in which human bones have been found, as it happened in this question; lest, to some, that accident might seem extraordinary, and consequently occasion prejudice.

"1. The bones, as was supposed, of the Saxon St. Dubritus, were discovered buried in his cell at Guy's cliff, near Warwick, as appears from the authority of Sir William Dugdale.

"2. The bones, thought to be those of the anchoress Rosia, were but lately discovered in a cell at Royston, entire, fair, and undecayed, though they must have lain interred for several centuries, as is proved by Dr. Stukely.

"But my own county, nay, almost this neighborhood, supplies another instance; for in January, 1747, were found by Mr. Stovin, accompanied by a reverend gentleman, the bones, in part, of some recluse, in the cell at Lindholm, near Hatfield. They were believed to be those of William, of Lindholm, a hermit, who had long made this cave his habitation.

"In February, 1744, part of Wooburn-abbey being pulled down a large portion of a corse appeared, even with the flesh on, and which bore cutting with a knife; though it is certain that this had lain above two hundred years, and how much longer is doubtful, for this abbey was founded in 1145, and dissolved in 1538 or 9.

"What would have been said, what believed, if this had been an accident to the bones in question?

"Farther, my lord, it is not yet out of living memory, that a little distance from Knaresborough, in a field, part of the manor of the worthy and patriotic baronet who does that borough the honor to represent it in parliament, were found, in digging for gravel, not one human skeleton only, but five or six, deposited side by side, with each an urn placed at its head, as your lordship knows was usual in ancient interments.

"About the same time, and in another field, almost close to this borough, was discovered also, in searching for gravel, another human skeleton; but the piety of the same worthy gentleman ordered both pits to be filled up again, commendably unwilling to disturb the dead.

"Is the invention of these bones forgotten, then, or industriously concealed, that the discovery of those in question may appear the more singular and extraordinary? whereas, in fact, there is nothing extraordinary in it. My lord, almost every place conceals such remains. In fields, in hills, in highway sides, in commons, lie frequent and unsuspected bones. And our present allotments for rest for the departed are but of some centuries.

"Another particular seems not to claim a little of your lordship's notice, and that of the gentlemen of the jury; which is, that perhaps no example occurs of more than one skeleton being found in one cell; and in the cell in question was found but one; agreeable, in this, to the peculiarity of every other known cell in Britain. Not the invention of one skeleton, but of two, would have appeared suspicious and uncommon.

"But it seems another skeleton has been discovered by some laborer, which was full as confidentially averred to be Clarke's as this. My lord, must some of the living, if it promotes some interest, be made answerable for all the bones that earth has concealed, and chance exposed? and might not a place where bones lie be mentioned by a person by chance, as well as found by a laborer by chance? or is it more criminal accidentally to name where bones lie, than accidentally to find where they lie?

"Here too is a human skull produced, which is fractured, but was this the cause, or was it the consequence of death? was it owing to violence, or was it the effect of natural decay? if it was violence, was that violence before or after death? My lord, in May, 1732, the remains of William, lord archbishop of this province, were taken up, by permission, in this cathedral, and the bones of the skull were found broken; yet certainly he died by no violence offered to him alive that could occasion that fracture there.

"Let it be considered, my lord, that upon the dissolution of religious houses, and the commencement of the reformation, the ravages of those times affected both the living and the dead. In search after imaginary treasures coffins were broken open, graves and vaults violated, monuments ransacked, and shrines demolished; and it ceased about the beginning of the reign of queen Elizabeth. I entreat your lordship, suffer not the violences, the depredations, and the iniquities of those times to be imputed to this.

"Moreover, what gentleman here is ignorant that Knaresborough had a castle; which, though now a ruin, was once considerable both for its strength and garrison? All know it was vigorously besieged by the arms of the parliament; at which siege, in sallies, conflicts, fights, pursuits, many fell in all the places round it, and where they fell were buried; for every place, my lord, is burial earth in war; and many, questionless, of these, yet unknown, whose bones futurity shall discover.

"I hope, with all imaginable submission, that what has been said will not be thought impertinent to this indictment; and that it will be far from the wisdom, the learning, and the integrity of this place, to impute to the living what zeal in its fury may have done; what nature may have taken off, and piety interred; or what war alone may have destroyed, alone deposited.

"As to the circumstances that have been raked together I have nothing to observe, but that all circumstances whatever are precarious, and have been but too frequently found lamentably fallible: even the strongest have failed. They may rise to the utmost degree of probability, yet they are but probability still. Why need I name to your lordship the two Harrisons, recorded by Dr. Howell, who both suffered upon circumstances, because of the sudden disappearance of their lodger, who was in credit, and had contracted debts, borrowed money, and went off unseen, and returned a great many years after their execution? Why name the intricate affair of Jacques du Moulin, under king Charles the second, related by a gentleman who was counsel for the crown? and why the unhappy Coleman, who suffered innocent, though convicted upon positive evidence, and whose children perished for want, because the world uncharitably believed the father guilty? Why mention the perjury of Smith, incautiously admitted king's evidence; who, to screen himself, equally accused Faircloth and Loveday of the murder of Dun; the first of whom, in 1749, was executed at Winchester; and Loveday was about to suffer at Reading, had not Smith been proved perjured, to the satisfaction of the court, by the surgeon of Gosport hospital?

"Now, my lord, having endeavored to show that the whole of this process is altogether repugnant to every part of my life; that it is inconsistent with my condition of health about that time; that no rational inference can be drawn, that a person is dead who suddenly disappears; that hermitages were the constant repositories of the bones of the recluse; that the revolutions in religion, or the fortune of war, have mangled, or buried the dead; the conclusion remains, perhaps no less reasonably than impatiently wished for. I, at last, after a year's confinement, equal to either fortune, put myself upon the candor, the justice, and the humanity of your lordship, and upon yours, my countrymen, gentlemen of the jury.

"Aram was tried by Judge Noel, who, having remarked that his defence was one of the most ingenious pieces of reasoning that had ever fallen under his notice, summed up the evidence to the jury, who gave a verdict that Aram was guilty, in consequence of which he received sentence of death.

"After conviction a clergyman was appointed to attend him, to represent the atrociousness of his crime, to bring him to a proper sense of his condition, and exhort him to an ample confession.

"Aram appeared to pay proper attention to what was said; but, after the minister had retired, he formed the dreadful resolution of destroying himself, and wrote a letter, of which the following is a copy:

"MY DEAR FRIEND—Before this reaches you I shall be no more a living man in this world, though at present in perfect bodily health; but who can describe the horrors of mind which I suffer at this instant? Guilt! the guilt of blood shed without any provocation, without any cause, but that of filthy lucre, pierces my conscience with wounds that give the most poignant pains! 'Tis true, the consciousness of my horrid guilt has given me frequent interruptions in the midst of my business or pleasures; but still I have found means to stifle its clamors, and contrived a momentary remedy for the disturbance it gave me, by applying to the bottle or the bowl, or diversions, or company, or business; sometimes one, and sometimes the other, as opportunity offered: but now all these, and all other amusements are at an end, and I am left forlorn, helpless, and destitute of every comfort; for I have nothing now in view but the certain destruction both of my soul and body. My conscience will no longer suffer itself to be hoodwinked or browbeat; it has now got the mastery; it is my accuser, judge, and executioner; and the sentence it pronounceth against me is more dreadful than that I heard from the bench, which only condemned my body to the pains of death, which are soon over; but conscience tells me plainly, that she will summon me before another tribunal, where I shall have neither power nor means to stifle the evidence she will then bring against me; and that the sentence which will then be denounced, will not only be irrevocable, but will condemn my soul to torments that will know no end.—O had I but hearkened to the advice which dear-bought experience has enabled me to give! I should not now have been plunged into that dreadful gulf of despair, which I find it impossible to extricate myself from; and therefore my soul is filled with horror inconceivable. I see both God and man my enemies; and in a few hours shall be exposed a public spectacle for the world to gaze at. Can you conceive any condition more horrible than mine? O, no! it cannot be! I am determined, therefore, to put a short end to trouble I am no longer able to bear, and prevent the executioner, by doing his business with my own hand!

EUGENE ARAM.

"When the morning appointed for his execution arrived, the keeper went to take him out of his cell, and found him almost expiring through loss of blood, having cut his left arm above the elbow and near the wrist, with a razor, but he missed the artery. A surgeon being sent for, soon stopped the bleeding; and when he was taken to the place of execution he was perfectly sensible, though so weak as to be unable to join in the devotional exercises."

In addition to the foregoing particulars, we extract a poem, but little known, founded upon the same event. It first appeared in an annual entitled "The Gem." It has been justly called one of the most remarkable productions of modern poetry; and, says a distinguished critic, "there is a resemblance, perhaps, to Coleridge in its general style, but it is by no means an imitation, and we scarcely feel heresy to put it side by side with the 'Ancient Mariner.'"

THE DREAM OF EUGENE ARAM.—BY THOMAS HOOD.

'Twas in the prime of summer time,
An evening calm and cool,
And four-and-twenty happy boys
Came bounding out of school;
There were some that ran, and some that leapt
Like troutlets in a pool.

Away they sped with gamesome minds,
And souls untouch'd by sin;
To a level mead they came, and there
They drove the wicked game;
Pleasantly shone the setting sun
Over the town of Lynn.

Like sportive deer they cours'd about,
And shouted as they ran;
Turning to mirth all things of earth,
As only boyhood can.
But the Usher sat remote from all,
A melancholy man!

His hat was off, his vest apart,
To catch heaven's blessed breeze,
For a burning thought was in his brow,
And his bosom ill at ease.
So he leant his head on his hands and read
The book between his knees!

Leaf after leaf he turn'd it o'er,
Nor ever glanc'd aside;
For the peace of his soul he read that book
In the golden tide;
Mistaken had made him very lean,
And pale, and leaden-eye'd.

At last he shud the ponderous tome,
With a fast and fervent grasp
He strain'd the dusky covers close,
And fix'd the brazen clasp;
"O God, could I to close my mind,
And clasp it with a clasp!"

Then leaping on his feet upright,
Some moody turns he took,
And past a shady nook,
And, lo! he saw a little book
That peep'd upon a book!

"My gentle lad, what is't you read—
Romance or fairy tale?
Or is it some historic page,
Of kings and crowns unstable?"
"It is," the boy, with upward glance,
"It is 'The Death of Abel!'"

The Usher took six hasty strides,
As smit with sudden pain,
Six hasty strides beyond the place,
Then slowly back again;
And down he sat beneath an ivy tree,
And talked with him of Cain;

And, long since then, of bloody me
Whose deeds tradition saves;
Of lonely folk cut off unseen,
And hid in sudden graves;
Of horrid slabs, in groves forlorn,
And murders done in caves;

And how the spirits of injured men
Shriek upward from the sod,
Ay, how the ghastly hand will point
To show the burial clod;
And unknown facts of guilty acts
Are seen in dreams from God!

He told how murderers walk the earth
Beneath the curse of Cain,
With crimson clouds before their eyes,
And flames about their brain;
For blood has left upon their souls
Its everlasting stain!

"And well," quoth he, "I know for truth,
Their pangs must be extreme,
Wo, wo, unutterable wo—
Who spill life's sacred stream!
For why? Methought, last night, I wrought
A murder in a dream!"

"One that had never done me wrong—
A feeble man, and old;
I led him to a lonely field,
The moon shone clear and cold;
Now here, said I, this man shall die,
And I will have his gold!"

"Two sudden blows with a ragged stick,
And one with a heavy stone,
One hurried gash with a rusty knife—
And then the deed was done;
There was nothing lying at my foot,
But lifeless flesh and bone!"

"Nothing but lifeless flesh and bone,
That could not do me wrong;
And yet I fear'd him all the more,
For lying there so still;
There was a manhood in his look,
That murder could not kill!"

"And, lo! the universal air
Seem'd lit with ghastly flame,
Ten thousand thousand dreadful eyes
Were looking down in blame;
I took the dead man by the hand,
And call'd upon his name!"

"Oh God, it made me quake to see
Such sense within the slain!
But when I touch'd the lifeless clay,
The blood gush'd out again!
For every clot, a burning spot,
Was scorching in my brain!"

"The late Admiral Barney went to school at an establishment where the unhappy Eugene Aram was usher, subsequent to his crime. The Admiral stated, that Aram was generally liked by the boys; and that he used to discourse to them about murder, in somewhat of the spirit which is attributed to him in this poem."

The History of Poland, from the earliest period to the present time. By James Fletcher, Esq. of Trinity College, Cambridge. With a narrative of the recent events, obtained from a Polish patriot nobleman. 1 vol. 18 mo. pp. 339. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

We cheerfully unite with our brethren of the press in recommending this book to the attention of all who wish a distinct knowledge of the causes of the present state of warfare between Russia and Poland. The leading facts in the history of the latter nation are skillfully compressed within the short space allowed by the excellent plan of the Family Library, of which this is the twenty-fourth number; and the narrative conducted in a clear and unostentatious style, is pregnant with interest and information. It is accompanied by a fine engraving of Thaddeus Kosciuszko, a name, whatever may be alleged against the general orthodoxy of Polish appellations, which the grateful lips of Americans will find no difficulty in pronouncing. As the struggle between this hunted people and their blood-thirsty hounds is the prominent topic of conversation, we copy from the advertisement to the present volume the following rules:

"All vowels are sounded as in French and Italian; and there are no diphthongs, every vowel being pronounced distinctly. The consonants are the same as in English, except

w, which is sounded like v, at the beginning of a word; thus, Warsaw—Varsafa; in the middle or at the end of a word, it has the sound of f, as in the instance already cited; and Narew—Nareff. c, like tz, and never like k; thus, Pac is sounded Patz.

g, like g in Gibbon; thus, Oginski.
ch, like the Greek χ or k; thus, Lech—Lek.

cz, like the English ch in pitch; thus, Czartoryski pronounced Tchartoryski.

rz, like j in je, with a slight sound of r; thus, Rzewuski—Rjevuski."

After a succinct account, bringing down the history of Poland to the death of Alexander, and the coronation of Nicholas at Warsaw in 1829, a well written narrative of recent events is extracted from the first number of Campbell's Metropolitan Magazine. A description of the grand duke Constantine, the "untamed tiger," whose cruelties over the gallant Poles have rendered him disgustingly conspicuous to the world, has already appeared in a previous number of this journal. We will select, however, a few additional particulars:

"From the time of the first re-establishment of the kingdom until 1820, the affairs of Poland went on apparently in conformity with the constitution; but there were perpetual breaches of that formal grant, until the Spanish revolution burst forth: then the intrigues of Austria, and the apprehension entertained by Alexander himself of military revolution, led to the establishment of the sadly-misnamed Holy Alliance, and an attempt was made to suppress entirely in Poland the spirit of national independence, which at one time, if not actually fostered, had been cheered by the smiles of the autocrat.

"The Count Zaionczek, a Pole, was nominally the king's lieutenant, but the real power was invested in the grand-duke Constantine, who held the appointment of commander-in-chief of the army. This personage, who has played so conspicuous a part in the affairs of Poland, is worthy of something more than a mere passing notice. ****

"One of the most atrocious acts of this most atrocious period is the treatment of Major Lukasinski, a Polish officer of high character and blameless life. He was distinguished by the grand-duke, indeed was especially favored on all occasions; but, being a member of the association at the time that it became particularly obnoxious, he was arrested, and after some time brought into the presence of his imperial chief; who, addressing him in terms of kindness and friendship, invited him to repose confidence in the known attachment he felt for him: thus thrown off his guard, the unhappy man spoke with frankness and candor. He was removed to his dungeon, tried on his confession to the grand-duke, was convicted, and condemned to be deprived of all his honors, to chains, and to perpetual imprisonment. In compliance with this sentence, he was conveyed to the fortress of Zamosc, where upwards of a thousand persons similarly circumstanced were confined. One of the grand-duke's emissaries was introduced into the prison; he got up a conspiracy for effecting the escape of the prisoners, and, without the privity of the wretched Lukasinski, contrived to procure his nomination as the leader of the conspirators. Then further persecutions were instituted, and for this imputed crime, which, even if real, could not be blamed by any man, he was condemned to death. This was, however, too humane; death would have afforded relief to the wearied sufferer, which was not the object of Constantine. It was therefore commuted to perpetual imprisonment and a WEEKLY FLOGGING! And it was directed that a record should be kept for Constantine's especial information of the effect of each blow on the wretched victim! Humanitary recoils at recording such atrocity, such cold-blooded ferocity; and we should not have ventured on making the statement, had not the facts been attested by documents found among the papers of the grand-duke after his precipitate retreat from Warsaw last November. *****

"Among the illustrious men there is a gentleman, now in London, whose personal suffering may be considered a fair example of the system pursued. His career may be described as one of pain and misery. His father—a distinguished champion of the liberties of his country at the period of the last partition—was expropriated; being accompanied with his wife, the subject of the present detail was born during their flight, and was seized with his father's property by the government! He was placed with a man who appears to have possessed some of the feelings of humanity; for on the death of his own child, he reported the stranger to be dead, at the same time restoring him to his parents. Subsequently to the establishment of the duchy of Warsaw, he entered the service of Napoleon, and served with distinction; but was taken prisoner in 1812, and was three years in prison. After the cession to Russia, and the establishment of the kingdom, he wished to retire from military life; and, after fourteen refusals to accept his resignation, the permission to retire was most ungraciously granted. His pertinacity had offended, and his integrity made him a marked man. Accordingly, on the occasion of which we speak, he was arrested (having at that time previously spent about seven years in Russian prisons,) and without condemnation placed in a dark dungeon, where for eleven months he neither saw the face of man nor the light of day. At the expiration of that time he, with others, was suddenly taken from his cell, thrown into a common cart, and conveyed under a burning sun to St. Petersburg, where he was kept in rigorous custody, until he had completed his fourth year of additional captivity. Almost at the moment of his arrest he had been married to a lovely and amiable female: he had no intercourse with his family during his wearisome confinement; and when he returned to be cheered by domestic affection, he found that he had become a father, but that his wife, worn out by her feelings, was no longer the beautiful partner of his hopes and fears, but an exhausted being, dropping fast into her grave."

It is but justice to add, that the rapidity, and yet discrimination, with which these publishers supply American readers with valuable works, calculated to improve the morals and enlighten the minds of old and young, rank them among the most deserving objects of public praise and support. The annexed lines, received sometime since, form an appropriate conclusion to a notice of this instructive volume:

TO THE POLES.

Success attend ye in each fight,
Heroic battles for the right;
Your tyrant foes are swarming round
To sweep ye from the earth,
And render desolate and bare
The land that gave ye birth;
The savage monarch heeds his power
Could crush ye like a feeble flower;
But he has learned ere this, I ween,
A patriot's strength to know,
And seen how those could stand who dared
To strike a patriot's blow.
His brutal hirelings have been sent
To graves without a monument:
Numbers have fled before a few,
Like ships before the blast;
The brows of Russian conquerors
Have been with gloom o'ercast:
Brave Poles! in vain ye have not bled,
Your plains are thick with Russian dead!

Fight on! fight on! undaunted band,
For your own dear devoted land;
Your wives shall hurry ye away,
Unto the scene of blood,
Your sires shall bless ye as ye go,
Because your cause is good!
Your very babes, from terror freed,
With tiny voices shall cry "God speed,"
And all who love ye as they ought,
Shall say, "fight on! fight on!"
There's nought but life that can be lost,
Yet freedom may be won!
Your deeds shall be for history's boast,
Each Pole shall be himself a host,
And strive as only those can strive
Who look behind, and see
Wives—children—all depending on
Their acts of bravery,
And crying out, "save us, oh, save,
From tyrants sterner than the grave!"
Then look before on threat'ning Poles
Assembled to destroy
The sources that to them are full
Of purest, holiest joy;
And then exert their every nerve
Those holy sources to preserve.

But if it is your fearful fate
To fall beneath the despot's hate,
Whose only rule of right is might,
And power his only aim—
He who deserves each freeman's scorn,
Whose glory is his shame,
He then will see no chains can bind
What he must hate—a patriot's mind—
His power can never make ye own
His title to be just,
He cannot at his footstool bid
Your lips to kiss the dust:
No! rather would ye choose your doom
A martyr's glory, and his tomb!

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

BOSTON, August 18, 1831.

GENTLEMEN—While on a trip to the waters of Niagara, I chanced to see a number of your paper at Buffalo, containing an article on organs, with the signature "B." Having myself a smattering of music, and being a great admirer of that "noble instrument," as the writer terms it, the proper use of which tends to soften the feelings and elevate the sentiments, I felt considerable interest in its perusal. At the same time I have to claim for my native town, Boston, the good fortune of possessing an instrument superior to any one in the Union; and built by the famous Smith, 'clepeled father Smith, of whom your correspondent makes such honorable mention. It was erected in the church built by the English, and called the King's Chapel; and tradition states, that it was selected in England by no less a person than George Frederick Handel himself. At present, Mr. Comer, late of the Bowery theatre in your city, and now leader at the Tremont theatre in this town, is the organist. It answers, in every respect, the description of Smith's organs. The trumpet-stop is truly magnificent; and the diapasons possess a roundness and peculiarity of that which is technically called "voicing," beyond any instrument I have ever heard. It may not be amiss to add, that the colors of the keys are inverted—those which mark the naturals being black, and those which denote the flats and sharps being white. Trusting to your candor for an insertion of this short notice, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,
A MEMBER OF THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE COUNTESS OF LEICESTER.

PENSIVE within her lonely tower
 Sat princely Leicester's lovely bride,
 Counting each slowly passing hour
 That kept her proud lord from her side.
 From that lone turret's window high
 She strained her eyes through twilight gloom,
 Anxiously hoping to espy
 The waving of his distant plume.
 A thousand doubts and fears the while
 Within her tender breast arose,
 And banished from her lip the smile,
 And robbed her fair cheek of the rose.
 She thought of happy youthful hours,
 Her father's hospitable halls;
 Her sweet retreats, her wild wood bowers,
 Her own romantic waterfalls.
 Fields where she used in joy to rove,
 Still followed by her favorite fawn;
 And, dear in childhood's early love,
 Her graceful temple on the lawn.
 Her heart was sportive then and light,
 Her days with happy swiftness past;
 That morning sun which rose so bright,
 How soon its beams were overcast!
 Far happier in her maiden state
 Than now the haughty Leicester's bride,
 Dreading her royal rival's hate,
 And victim of her husband's pride.
 And he, the favorite of his queen,
 In pomp and splendor moved along;
 The lord of many a festive scene,
 The star of many a glittering throng.
 Whilst she within these gloomy walls
 In solitary grandeur wept,
 Elizabeth in Leicester's halls
 Her gay luxurious revels kept.
 But hark! a well-known sound she hears,
 The bugle-note is ringing high;
 At length his snow-white plume appears,
 Her own beloved lord is nigh.
 She joyful springs to his embrace,
 Paused at his look of gloom and care;
 Gazed for one moment on his face,
 And shriek'd at what was written there.
 Then from his unsupporting arms
 She sank upon the marble floor;
 Death hush'd her timid heart's alarms,
 And Leicester's countess was no more.
 Proud earl! thy triumphs are complete,
 Be all that thy ambition plann'd;
 See England's nobles at thy feet,
 And England's queen implore thy hand.
 Thy countess lives no more to be
 The bar between thee and the throne,
 Death burst the tie and set thee free,
 And regal power is now thy own.
 Go to the gorgeous halls of state,
 Elizabeth awaits thee there;
 Go, in her smiles forget the fate
 Of her who died in wild despair.

CRITICISM.

"Thus with the year
 Seasons return; but not to me returns
 Day, or the sweet approach of ev'n or morn,
 Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
 Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
 But cloud instead, and ever-during dark
 Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
 Cut off, and for the book of knowledge fair
 Presented with a universal blank
 Of nature's works, to me expunged and razed,
 And wisdom at one entrance quite shut out.
 So much the rather those celestial light,
 Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers
 Irradiate; there plant eyes; all mist from thence Purge and dispel, that I may see and tell
 Of things invisible to mortal sight."—Milton.

THE fine distinction between intellectual and physical enjoyment, expressed in these celebrated lines, I have always conceived a clear evidence of a superior mind. Few are in the habit of considering it, or at least of acting upon it; and many are so much more swayed by substantial objects than by moral influences, that they sympathize very little with the mental labors and sufferings of their fellow-creatures, while they are lost in admiration at the completion of any bodily task, or struck with grief and horror when they perceive any corporeal injury. Such plain matter-of-fact people have not been blessed with that inward celestial light which the poet invoked; and although they are not consequently objects of pity, and may enjoy a great share of comfort and negative happiness in their own way, they are most legitimate subjects for ridicule and satire when they thrust themselves out of their proper spheres, or are by the accidental vicissitudes of life elevated to fulfill the duties which require intellect and education.

I am well acquainted with a person of this description, who pretends to a vast deal of literary merit, and pronounces upon the various productions of the mind with which the prolific press of the present day furnishes the community, with the dogmatism of a Turkish bashaw. I have often had occasion to observe how completely he was destitute of the eyes within, which Milton speaks of. I remember once when the town was treated with the exhibition of the Irish giant, we accidentally met, near the room of this living phenomenon, and agreed to pay him a visit. To confess the truth, the fellow was a curious specimen of the caprices of nature, and came fully up to my boyish conceptions of a Patagonian. My friend was absolutely beside himself with astonishment. He could scarcely find language to express the pleasure he had derived from the sight, and when we sallied forth again into the street he could talk of nothing but the giant. While he was delivering himself of some of the prodigious raptures which he had conceived on the occasion, we encountered a gentleman who has written some of the most charming specimens of poetry which our nation ever produced. I pointed out this gifted author to my friend, almost expecting that if the unwieldy mass of flesh and bones of our Irish prodigy had caused such an excess of rapture, he would go mad in earnest at the contemplation of one endowed by heaven with such a gigantic mind, such a wide-reaching fancy, and wonderful power of expression. He had never seen the poet, although he was familiar with his works; but, to my astonishment and chagrin, he carelessly cast his eye upon him, and returned immediately to the subject of the giant.

I could not help setting him down in my own mind as a silly fellow; for had he been capable of appreciating the wonders of the understanding, he could not have passed so slightly one who is so much more an extraordinary and noble creation of nature. Who that has read Shakespeare or Milton, had not rather peruse the faces of these two writers than examine a calf with two heads, an ox of double the usual bulk, or a man whose stature is greater or less than that of the ordinary run of mortals? Who had not rather look on Napoleon than on any monument of his building?

A few days after I met my silly friend at a picture gallery. As I am much given to contemplation, and derive more pleasure from purely imaginary sources than from those of reality, I am especially fond of a lounge at an exhibition of paintings. Every piece, as it were, lets me into a new world, not only of absolute vision, but of thought and fancy, and consequently fills my mind with agreeable emotions. Then the peculiar silence and shadow which generally reign in such a place, are favorable to reverie. I gradually disentangle myself from the confusion and excitement of the crowded town. I sometimes muse by a romantic scene in Switzerland, and sometimes pause before some Roman ruin. Here I find myself in the midst of groups of cattle, amid cool and pleasant forests; and again without the anxiety of my usual bashfulness, and fearless of giving offence, I contemplate some girlish face, whose laughing eyes fall directly on my own, with a sweet unshrinking gaze, and conjure up in my bosom certain thoughts, respecting which, good reader, you have no right to inquire in this sage essay on criticism. While I was thus amusing myself one day, and delighted with the wonderful skill and genius with which some of the artists had reflected nature upon the canvass, I felt a slap on my shoulder from no gentle hand. It was my friend the giant admirer. I swallowed my displeasure at his vulgar mode of salutation, and, with a civil air of forced familiarity, asked him how he was pleased with the pictures? He replied, that he did not like them much; there were too many landscapes for him; he never spent more than ten or fifteen minutes in a picture-gallery, but he had been lately to witness a curiosity, which he recommended to my particular attention.

"What, another giant?" asked I.

"No," replied he, "but Calvin Edson, the walking skeleton."

He then proceeded to indulge me with a detailed account of that interesting personage; how his bones came through his stockings; and how some one had entered into a speculation with him, he to give the man-skeleton so much for the proceeds of his exhibition, and the man-skeleton to allow him so much for every pound of fat gained.

I could scarcely avoid laughing at the earnestness with which he detailed to me every circumstance of a matter which I cared nothing about, and a great part of which totally escaped my attention, while I was studying the best form of serving him and his propensities up for the entertainment of the readers of the New-York Mirror.

I should not have deemed him worthy of so much notice, but that he and such as he have sometimes by spurious means obtained a greater weight in the community than they are entitled to by their mind and characters. There is no disgrace in dullness; because what is the result of nature and not of one's own indolence, is not a fair theme of censure, however it may be of regret; but when dullness assumes airs, when it usurps the throne of talent and education, it deserves the lash of satire and the frown of wisdom. I was led to these reflections principally by my last week's paper, which I found lying on my table, from an anonymous correspondent. On reading it over again in print, I am struck with the extent of the subject which the author has opened, although he has pursued it but a little way. There can, indeed, be no greater impediment to the growth of literature than bad critics. They resemble careless and unskilful gardeners, who do not know weeds from flowers. The art of reviewing books here is in a sickly state. It receives too little attention, and there is by far too great a familiarity between authors, editors, and publishers. The opinions of the press, therefore, often arise from personal feelings, from a desire not to injure the author or the publisher, from a carelessness or ignorance respecting the importance of studying out the true character of a new book, and showing its faults and its beauties. I regret to say, that specimens of philosophical and independent criticism do not abound on this side the Atlantic, at least out of the pale of several quarterly reviews, whose names at present it is unnecessary to mention. If the American reader should be required, where could he hope to find any subject in the shape of a review, handled in so clear, scientific, and learned a manner as the elegant papers by Addison, in the Spectator, on the "Paradise Lost?" It is the exertions of such men, backed by a reading community, that assist the progress of literature, that check the forward upstart, and seek out the modest and deserving; that unmask ignorance, vulgarity, and stupidity, and leave the field clear for merit. By their means, too, the mass of the people are enabled to judge for themselves, correct opinions are placed in their mouths, and the blessings of a general knowledge are distributed among them. "The mind that lies fallow but a single day," says this elegant and amiable writer, "sprouts up in follies, that are only to be killed by a constant and assiduous culture. It was said of Socrates that he brought philosophy down from heaven, to inhabit among men; and I shall be ambitious to have it said of me that I have brought philosophy out of closets and libraries, schools and colleges, to dwell in clubs and assemblies, at tea-tables, and in coffee-houses."

It may be observed of our critics, with a few honorable exceptions, that some are too much immersed in the concerns of their journals to afford any other candid notice of new publications than a mere list of their titles; others are destitute of a knowledge of the classical authors, either of the Greek and Roman languages, or of their own; and some are in the frequent habit of giving vent to their petty personal resentments in their capacity of critics. There are certain ones, whom I have often watched, who praise a writer or an actor till they have quarreled with him, and then take every possible opportunity of hypercritical abuse. The most perfect of literary productions have faults, and few are so bad (although I could name one or two) as to be totally destitute of beauties. If this low kind of critic hates a person, he can fling a disgrace over his work, by naming one fault with a sneer, and passing over its merits in silence; or if he have been eating oyster-suppers and drinking wine at his expense, he will laud up a smooth line to the very echo, and leave innumerable glaring defects to be discovered by more disinterested readers. To such a time-serving and malicious fellow I would say, in the words of the poet:

"Thou cold-blooded knave!
 Hast thou not spoke like thunder on my side?
 Been sworn my soldier? bidding me depend
 Upon thy stare, thy fortune, and thy strength,
 And dost thou now fall over to my foe?
 Thou wear a lion's skin! doff it for shame,
 And hang a calf's skin on those recreant limbs!"

It is also very amusing, in reading the public prints, to see the shifts and stratagems of learned conductors of journals, who wish to say something fine and flourishing respecting a book which they have never read. You shall note the struggles and circumlocutions of such a one. How he flutters around the title-page and the previous works of the author; the typography, size, and number of pages; and concludes by declaring that doubtless the public will not fail to appreciate it as it deserves. All such persons are mere drones in the literary hive.

I will close this article with a few observations by Addison, upon the same subject.

"It is in criticism as in all other sciences and speculations; one who brings with him any implicit notions and observations, which he has made in his reading of the poets, will find his own reflections methodized and explained, and perhaps several little hints that had passed in his mind, perfected and improved in the works of a good critic; whereas one who has not these previous lights, is very often an utter stranger to what he reads, and apt to put a wrong interpretation upon it.

"Nor is it sufficient that a man, who sets up for a judge in criticism, should have perused the authors above mentioned, unless he has also a clear and logical head. Without this talent he is perpetually puzzled and perplexed amidst his own blunders, mistakes the sense of those he would confute, or, if he chances to think right, does not know how to convey his thoughts to another with clearness and perspicuity. Aristotle, who was the best critic, was also one of the best logicians that ever appeared in the world.

"Mr. Locke's Essay on Human Understanding would be thought a very odd book for a man to make himself master of, who would get a reputation by critical writings; though at the same time it is very certain, that an author who has not learned the art of distinguishing between words and things, and of ranging his thoughts and setting them in proper lights, whatever notions he may have, will lose himself in confusion and obscurity. I might further observe that there is not a Greek or Latin critic, who has not shown, even to the style of his criticisms, that he was a master of all the elegance and delicacy of his native tongue.

"The truth of it is, there is nothing more absurd than for a man to set up for a critic, without a good insight into all the parts of learning; whereas many of those, who have endeavored to signalize themselves by works of this nature, among our writers, are not only defective in the above-mentioned particulars, but plainly discover, by the phrases which they make use of, and by their confused way of thinking, that they are not acquainted with the most common and ordinary systems of arts and sciences. A few general rules extracted out of the French authors, with a certain cant of words, has sometimes set up an illiterate heavy writer for a most judicious and formidable critic.

"One great mark, by which you may discover a critic who has neither taste nor learning, is this, that he seldom ventures to praise any passage in an author which has not been before received and applauded by the public, and that his criticism turns wholly upon little faults and errors. This part of a critic is so very easy to succeed in, that we find every ordinary reader, upon the publishing of a new poem, has wit and ill-nature enough to turn several passages of it into ridicule, and very often in the right place. This Mr. Dryden has very agreeably remarked in these two celebrated lines:

'Errors, like straws, upon the surface flow;
He who would search for pearls, must dive below.'

"A true critic ought to dwell rather upon excellencies than imperfections, to discover the concealed beauties of a writer, and communicate to the world such things as are worth their observation. The most exquisite words, and finest strokes of an author, are those which very often appear the most doubtful and exceptionable to a man who wants a relish for polite learning; and they are these, which a sour undistinguishing critic generally attacks with the greatest violence. Tully observes, that it is very easy to brand or fix a mark upon what he calls verbum ardens, or, as it may be rendered into English, 'a glowing bold expression,' and to turn it into ridicule by a cold ill-natured criticism. A little wit is equally capable of exposing a beauty, and of aggravating a fault; and though such treatment of an author naturally produces indignation in the mind of an understanding reader, it has however its effect among the generality of those whose hands it falls into, the rabble of mankind being very apt to think that every thing which is laughed at, with any mixture of wit, is ridiculous in itself.

"Such a mirth as this is always unseasonable in a critic, as it rather prejudices the reader than convinces him, and is capable of making a beauty, as well as a blemish, the subject of derision. A man who cannot write with wit on a proper subject is dull and stupid; but one who shows it in an improper place, is as impertinent and absurd. Besides, a man who has the gift of ridicule, is apt to find fault with any thing that gives him an opportunity of exerting his beloved talent, and very often censures a passage, not because there is any fault in it, but because he can be merry upon it. Such kinds of pleasantry are very unfair and disingenuous in works of criticism, in which the greatest masters have always appeared with a serious and instructive air."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE BAR VERSUS THE STAGE.

THE subjoined sketch, by a leading contributor to Blackwood's Magazine, is selected from the July number of the "Foreign Museum." There are some lively descriptions in it, and it holds up very successfully to good-natured ridicule, a species of character by far too common both here and in London.

"Depend upon it, my dear fellow, you have not, after all, lit so exactly on your feet as you expected."

"Possibly so!" was the reply, uttered with a sigh of incertitude and chagrin.

"Though you are now a member of the renowned English bar, yet you are out of your element—like a fish out of water, or a bird in it."

"Hem!"

"Every one but yourself can see that you have not a fit field for the display of your powers. 'Pon my honor, Tom, I feel for you."

"Do you, indeed? How very kind!" replied Tom, in rather a cynical tone: continuing, after a pause—"tis dreary enough work here, I own—that is, at present; but is not the way to heaven strait and narrow? Wait for a short year or two, Berton, and I shall astonish you."

"Egad, how is that?" inquired Berton.

"You shall soon see how you have labelled the bar: you shall soon see whether it is not a fit, a glorious field for the display of intellect—for the acquisition of wealth, fame, and power—an enchanted circle, where the old maxim, ex nihilo, is reversed. How could I be so ungrateful as to fall out with such a profession!" continued Elmsley, warming with his thoughts.

"Ay, ay, Elmsley—all that is, as Ferguson said of Archimedes' boast about moving the earth, 'true in theory, but utterly false in fact.' If I know any thing of your composition, you are not at all calculated for the bar. No, no—every-day talents, an aptitude for mastering the dull details of business—patient, plodding perseverance—indifference to the charms of society—exclusion from literature and science—these are the qualifications. But 'tis an ungrateful subject, and I'll drop it. Cheer up then—exporrigite frontem! You may be the brilliant exception, you know—the happy one of a thousand—the Mansfield, Kenyon, or Eldon of your day!"

"What a cursed croaking vein you have latterly taken to, Berton! there never breathed another so fond of looking on the dark side of things," replied the student at law, peevishly, stirring his coffee with much more rapidity than was necessary. He experienced the feeling of pique which is common to all who are convinced in spite of themselves. It may be supposed, that in such a humor, conversation flagged between the friends. Berton rose to go.

"You'll make one at my sister's conversation to-night, eh?" said he, putting on his hat and gloves. "Eleven o'clock, you know—and harkee, Scenicus will be there."

"I shall do myself the honor of waiting on her ladyship. Good-by!" replied Elmsley, rather coldly; and when the door had closed on his friend, he drew his chair closer to the fire, and sipped the remainder of his coffee in no very enviable mood.

This conversation took place at Elmsley's chambers, in the Temple—they were situated on the third floor of — court, and were as snug and silent as a 'son' of Coke should desire. In the day time, the prospect from his windows was confined to the opposite chambers—where glimpses might be occasionally caught of the pale beings who occupied their nooks without dreaming of aught beyond the precincts of the Temple. Elmsley's sitting-room bore the aspect of a quiet study. The walls were respectably lined with book-shelves; and assuming four hundred to be the complement of his library, two hundred of these were devoted to general literature, one hundred to classics, fifty to mathematics, twenty-five miscellaneous, and the rest—law.

Several books lay oddly enough jumbled together on his ample chamber table. Littleton's Tenures, and Scott's Marmion; a number of nisi prius reports, and the New Monthly; Blackstone and Ben Jonson; Shakspeare and Montesquieu; a political pamphlet, a playbill, a newspaper, a lady's album! Did not such a table indicate the embryo chancellor?

"The occupant of these chambers was—a genius. Elmsley, who had but lately exchanged a nook at — college, Cambridge, for his present residence, had just numbered three-and-twenty years. A thorough-bred biographer would have said of him, that he was 'possessed of every personal and mental accomplishment.' His mind, naturally powerful, and furnished with much general information, partook, nevertheless, of the heterogeneous complexion of his book-table. He had passed at college for an elegant but idle scholar. All who knew him acknowledged his lively, active, and versatile genius, his unbounded capacity, his fire and energy of disposition; but the more sober and judicious of his acquaintance lamented that the key-stone of the intellectual arch was wanting—discipline. A more ambitious man—one more restless to obtain distinction—could not be imagined; nor one at the same time more neglectful of the legitimate means of ensuring success. With all this he was a brilliant and showy fellow, unrivalled in conversation and companionship. What information he had acquired, was always at his command; and as he was possessed of great fluency of speech, a fine voice, and an imposing manner, he passed everywhere for 'a man of great talent.' Is it extraordinary that another ingredient of such a character was vanity—egregious vanity? He fell prostrate before every flatterer; absurdly credulous of whatever they said in his praise, and infinitely too good-natured to suspect his friends of tricks or treachery, he was capable of being persuaded to any thing.

"Nothing had puzzled Elmsley more than the choice of a profession—a thing none of the easiest to any one who takes the trouble to reflect on such an important measure. His, however, was an instance of ludicrous indecision. The trite comparison of the perplexed traveller, whose road suddenly split off into three, affords but a faint illustration of Elmsley's embarrassment, while balancing the respective merits of law, physic, and divinity. A sight of the portly bishop of —, floating in all the snowy splendor of lawn and silk, down the aisle of — cathedral, had half persuaded him that his conscience had called him to that mortifying and self-denying life. The fame and fortune of Sir Astley had turned his thoughts seriously to the medical profession. The immense popularity of Kean, critics in ecstasy, pits breathless, boxes shaking with applause, had made him think much oftener of the stage than he chose to acknowledge even to himself. But the bar—the ambidextrous bar—grasping in either hand the laurels of forensic and political eminence! He happened to be present on one occasion when Mr. — delivered one of his most splendid and successful orations—a recollection of the antecedent buzz of expectation among the admiring throng of wealth and rank—the burst of enthusiastic applause—his speech read the next day in all parts of the empire—oh! the thing was irresistible. It put an end to his vacillation. His course was decided.

"I ubi te vocat gloria, tendens ad sidera palmas."

The next day saw him hurrying to the Temple to make the requisite inquiries at the treasurer's office. A fortnight beheld him duly admitted a member of the honorable society of the — Temple. A month found him snugly ensconced on the third floor of No. —, in — court. In consideration of a hundred guineas, he secured a twelvemonth's attendance at the chambers of Mr. Quibble, a pleading barrister in large business, where he was to acquire an insight into the 'practical working' of the law, by drawing declarations, pleas, &c. and giving opinions on cases. Every one who knows any thing about the matter, must be aware that attendance was optional, since Mr. Quibble had no more control over him than he over Mr. Quibble; Elmsley's time, therefore, was completely at his own disposal. When he had got fairly into the legal harness, he began to find it more burdensome than he anticipated. He saw he had woefully miscalculated the distance between the starting-post and goal of the legal race-course. The bar looked a much more cheerless and melancholy scene than when viewed through the glowing medium of crowded courts listening with admiration to eloquent counsel. Was he the first of thousands that have been so deceived?

"Let the reader only fancy, now, such a man as Elmsley, plunging suddenly into the intricate and misty labyrinth of English law; sitting down daily to business which required a concentration of all the powers of a patient and well-disciplined mind, furnished with extensive practical knowledge—sitting down to it, utterly ignorant of the simplest technicalities of his profession—puzzled for hours by 'respondent ouster,' 'novel assignments,' 'general and special imparlance,' and thousands of similar attitudinisms, as familiar as the alphabet to the commonest attorney's clerk; incapable of a reference to cases, and too proud to be incessantly asking the simplest questions. Was it wonderful that he grew impatient, fretful, and irritated? Was it surprising that he began to experience a sensation, first of indifference, then dislike, and finally of disgust, whenever he set foot within Mr. Quibble's chambers? That this was enhanced when he found there, whenever he went, a pale, quiet, unassuming fellow-pupil, 'true as the dial to the sun, although it be not shone upon,' who, Mr. Quibble assured him, bade fair to become a first-rate lawyer, merely through his persevering industry. How one dislikes the excellence we cannot attain to! Was not Elmsley to be pitted? So many causes of dissatisfaction effectually drove him from a regular attendance at Mr. Quibble's. In the future he sought to evaporate his spleen, and console himself for his disappointments, at his own rooms in the morning and in company in the evening. It is true, that to save appearances, some such profound work as 'Fearn on Contingent Remainders,' lay constantly open on his table; but a curious observer might have noticed that it was always at the same page!

"Still, though Elmsley had virtually resigned all pretensions to the acquisition of legal learning, he did not absolutely despair of rising to eminence as a counsel, after it should have pleased Messieurs the Benchers to invest him with his wig and gown, and let him loose upon the astonished juries. That he was naturally eloquent, he knew well—perhaps too well. He had an unbounded command of language; his fertile fancy afforded him ornaments in profusion; and he had a certain readiness at starting and evading objections, which, properly managed, might have really told successfully. Then his voice was fine, full-toned, and flexible, and his gestures graceful and animated. He reflected on all these advantages; he thought of Erskine and Grattan. 'Yes,' said he, glancing complacently at the mirror, 'yes, I shall do in court.' Then his evil genius would transport him to the dusky court of king's bench—when he would gaze with a shudder at row after row of pale and motionless 'learned friends,' who looked as though they had never handled a writ, or expected to do so! Many of them, he was aware, had almost sunk beneath the severity of their legal studies; and yet had remained term after term, and year after year, the mere ornamental furniture of the courts; placed there to be looked at, but not meddled with.

"To be sure, there was a friend of his who had been at the bar only eight years, and yet was actually earning twenty-five pounds a term, and half that sum on the circuit—but that might be classed among the remote contingencies alluded to by Berton, and could not be prudently calculated upon in his own case. Then he thought of the withering proverb, 'that a barrister never earns his bread till he has not a tooth left to eat it with;' and again, of the comforting observation of a learned judge, with reference to a veteran who had commenced practice before himself—'there goes a very promising young man: he'll rise some of these days!' Rise, indeed! Faugh! it was sickening and intolerable. 'How could I have been ass enough to enter the law? I had better have tied a stone round my neck and dropped down the nearest well!' Nevertheless he looked longingly on the popularity and princely income of Sir —, the political consequence of Lord —, and Mr. —. He would have sacrificed his all—his very life, to gain equal distinction; but there was 'a great gulf between them' and himself! So, whilom, was it with the disappointed fox, his liquorish mouth running with desire, while his eyes surveyed the grapes just high enough over his head to be out of reach.

"Elmsley's most intimate friend was the Hon. Mr. Berton, with whom he had become acquainted at college. He was a gay, kind-hearted, but thoughtless fellow—an enthusiastic admirer of his friend's talents, and anxious to see them, what he called, made the most of. He was one of the very worst persons in the world for Elmsley to have been intimate with. By way of helping him to settle down to studious and sober habits, Berton introduced him to the wide circle of his fashionable acquaintance. Wherever he went he was sure to be asked again; even the exclusive earl of — declared he was a good companion, and his lady vowed he was 'a delightful creature.' All this was after Berton's own heart; but, alas! his moderate means would not allow him to indulge in such expensive habits. The seductive splendors of fashionable society but enhanced the mortifying and cheerless solitude of his chambers. The Temple began to look like a huge bastille, he thought, for the imprisonment of genius! He saw clearly that unless he adopted some profession forthwith, he should degenerate into a mere hanger-on in society. He had virtually renounced the bar; authorship was proverbially precarious; physic was now out of the question—and he would as soon have turned undertaker as a country curate. What, then, was to be done? Berton pointed to the stage. Yes, and he had done so for months, even before they had either of them quitted college. He incessantly inflamed his friend's imagination with representations of his triumphant success as an actor. What an easy, brilliant, and lucrative profession! Both of the friends had heretofore sustained parts at private rehearsals; and the applause which Elmsley—no doubt justly—obtained, proved a powerful lever in the hands of Berton. Elmsley could not doubt that he possessed every requisite qualification for an actor; still he held out vigorously, in appearance, at least, against the siege of Berton's entreaties; but, alas! his heart was more than half gained over! Such was the statu quo of matters at the commencement of this narrative.

"It may be recollected that Elmsley was engaged that evening to Lady —'s conversation. Thither, about eleven, he went. The assemblage was numerous and brilliant: the star of the evening was the celebrated actor whom we have named Scenicus. Elmsley watched his every movement with intense interest, and observed with surprise the deference that was paid him. How he envied him! In the course of the evening, Berton formally introduced him to Scenicus, speaking of him in the most flattering terms. Elmsley was charmed with the ease and affability of the actor: his habitual adoption of all kinds of character had given him a perfect command of manner: whatever he said or did was with the air of a perfect gentleman. He stood smiling and joking with the gay throng around him with unusual energy and vivacity; for which, as was not unfrequently the case, he was largely indebted to the generous assistance of champagne. Elmsley was gazing on him with looks of intense interest, when his friend Berton suddenly begged the actor to favor them with the rehearsal of a certain scene out of Hamlet, as there was a gentleman present who could support the other part of the dialogue. Elmsley's knees knocked together, for having several times recited with Berton the very scene in question, he was instantly aware who was the 'gentleman' alluded to. The actor turned his peculiar semi-glazed eye on the petitioner—eyed him steadily for a few moments—and then, being in a merry mood, consented. Berton then called upon Elmsley. Of course the company would not hear of a refusal, and he was too well bred to require baiting. It was with a fluttering heart, therefore, and eyes that seemed to glance sparks of fire, that he found the company had receded on all sides—that Scenicus had commenced the dialogue with appropriate gesture and intonation, and that it would be his turn to reply in a moment or two. Having with a strong effort overmastered his agitation, and being perfectly familiar with his part, he sustained his character with great spirit. He saw that his well-bred audience seemed determined to be pleased, and he increased his efforts. Now he was in for it, he justly reflected that he might as well acquit himself respectably as ridiculously. His efforts seemed to surprise Scenicus, and to rouse him to correspondent exertion. Elmsley gave one passage, in particular, with such force and feeling, and another with a burst of such startling and sustained energy, that Lord —, who was considered an excellent judge, and was looking on attentively, in true critical attitude, with half-closed eyes, and arms folded on his breast, exclaimed several times, 'bravissimo!' One lovely girl, too, he beheld, gazing fixedly on him with breathless interest: poor Elmsley! He returned to a sleepless pillow in the 'bastille' of Fleet-street, at a late hour in the morning, his brain reeling with the compliments and congratulations, the 'nods and becks, and wreathed smiles,' which had rewarded his exertions. When he did drop into an hour's uneasy slumber, his dreams were of pits crowded to suffocation—boxes filled with glittering lines of beauty, rank, and fashion—himself treading the stage in all the majesty of tragedy, gorgeous with theatrical costume—thousands of clapping hands—handkerchiefs waving—calls for 'Elmsley—Elmsley!'

"He rose at twelve, feverish and agitated with the previous night's excitement. As he was sitting down to his solitary breakfast, a modest tap at his door announced Mr. Quibble's demure clerk, with a note.

"Mr. Quibble's compliments to Mr. Elmsley, and would feel particularly obliged by Mr. E.'s attendance at chambers to-day, if convenient, as there are some very heavy pleadings in arrears, which Mr. Q. wishes to dispose of, before he sets out on the circuit.

— Buildings, Friday.

"The note was ipeacuanha!"

"He had hardly run his eye over it, when the knocker of his door announced other visitors, who proved to be Berton and Scenicus! What an event! The celebrated Scenicus paying him a visit at his chambers! Requesting them to be seated a few moments, he hurriedly scribbled a few lines of apology to Mr. Quibble, regretting that indisposition (!) prevented his attendance as requested. When Mr. Quibble had read his hopeful pupil's note, he was about to throw it aside, when he perceived the traces of writing within, which had escaped the hurried glance of Elmsley. The following is a copy of what met the eyes of the puzzled pleader:

"If a man be seized of certain lands, and taketh wife, and after alieneth the same lands with warranty, and, after, the feoffor and feoffee die, and the wife of the feoffor bring action of dower against the heir of the feoffee, and he vouch the heir of the feoffor, and hanging the voucher and undetermined—wife of feoffee brings action of dower against heir of feoffee; &c. Littleton, Lib. I. c. 5. § 54.

"Wilt thou upon the high and giddy mast,
Seal up the ship-boy's eyes, and rock his brains,
In cradle of the rude, impetuous surge,
And in the visitation of the winds,
Who take the ruffian billows by the top,
Curling their monstrous heads, and hanging them
With deafening clamor in the slippery shrouds,
That with the hurly, death itself awakes,
Canst thou, &c. Shak. Hen. IV. Act III. Sc. 1.

"Si mihi daretur, optio!—Cic. THOS. E.

"What the deuce is the meaning of this? How can this extract from Shakespeare illustrate Littleton?" said matter-of-fact Mr. Quibble.

"To return, however, to our student and his guests. Berton alluded to Elmsley's performance of the preceding night in terms of enthusiastic approbation; and the compliments of Scenicus, though more measured and moderate than those of his companion, almost deprived our student of the small stock of self-possession which was still left him. Scenicus assured him, with apparent sincerity, that he had not heard a more spirited amateur recitation for years; and, indeed, continued he, 'my Lord—seemed to be of the same opinion, for he whispered to me, a few moments after one scene was over, that he thought you would make five thousand pounds a year on the stage; and, on my honor, sir, I believe his lordship, if last night be a fair specimen of your powers.' In short, both he and Berton said enough to intoxicate Elmsley; and when the actor announced the chief object of his visit—to request that Elmsley would support the character of Iago, to the Othello of Scenicus, at some private theatricals of the Earl of —, under the management of Scenicus; adding, that he was joined in the request by Lord and Lady —; when Elmsley heard all this, he experienced a sudden gush of delightful agitation—a delirious tremor—a tumultuous rapture, which, for several moments, prevented his utterance. It need hardly be said that Elmsley consented to undertake the part. He did certainly make a faint show of hesitation—spoke about his solemn profession, 'it was not likely to bring the attorneys to him,' &c. &c.; but the practised eye of Scenicus saw that the proposal was accepted with ecstasy.

"A few days afterwards, Elmsley, accompanied by Berton, went to the wardrobe of Scenicus, to select a suitable dress for the character of Iago; and when he had chosen one to his mind, and felt himself

"Begirt
With the bright vesture, all o'er glittering
With gems, and rich embroidery;"

when he felt the graceful pendency of the ostrich plume, waving like the soft wing of an angel over his head—saw the glistening button of his velvet bonnet—and beheld his whole figure, reflected from the full-length mirror; when he noticed the glance of approbation, exchanged between Scenicus and Berton—and looked forward, for one instant, to the splendid scene for which he was preparing—he felt that the crisis of his destiny was at hand.—The real dignity and power of the law looked disadvantageously dusky and insignificant beside the captivating splendors of her glaring rival, the stage. The Rubicon was past. Elmsley inwardly bade adieu to the bar! Even so, when the rashness of inexperienced youth—but the sequel will moralize more eloquently than we can.

"Scenicus gave Elmsley an order, for that evening, to see Mr. Kean's Othello. That scenic sun was then in its zenith! Elmsley was seated in the dress circle at an early hour. The house was, as usual, crowded to suffocation. The solemn and impressive overture was well adapted to excite the feelings and imagination of the audience. Elmsley felt his soul swelling with mighty emotions. Did ever law give me such rapture as this? thought he, as the curtain drew up. And when the star of the evening at length appeared—when the breathless silence and suspense of the house, announced that the actor was commencing his most powerful effort—when the gaze of Elmsley was riveted on the glaring of the tiger eye—the quivering of the muscles—the fiendish mutterings and gaspings of fury—the writhings of agony and remorse; and when an unexpected display of power, drew down a sudden storm of deafening and long-continued applause—when this, at length, was hushed, and the mellow music of the actor's under-tones—telling of disappointed love—of anguish—of remorse—stole searchingly into the heart of every one present, and produced a universal sigh and tear of sympathy: when, in short, Elmsley saw the prodigious powers of the actor, and their triumphantly successful display—was not such a scene calculated to "wrap him into deep madness?" He left the theatre in a state of excitement bordering on insanity. Miserably tedious was the interval which was to elapse before the arrival of the day fixed for Lord —'s theatricals. Six times a day did Elmsley recite his part, till he knew almost every comma: for hours did he sit perseveringly poring over it, in the hope of, at last, discovering a 'point.' He had procured the dress of his character to be conveyed to his rooms, that he might familiarize himself with the costume—that he 'might prove it.' And, truth requires it to be said, that, many a time more than was necessary, did our student 'don his gay vestments,' and stand in all imaginable postures before his mirror! How many times did he so adjust matters, as that a few of his dark curls might stray, with studied negligence, beyond the velvet cincture of his bonnet! He was thus engaged one afternoon, when a gentle tap at his door, which had been left ajar by his servant, announced an applicant for admission. Without reflecting on his theatrical dress, he hastily exclaimed, 'come in!' and in walked Mr. Quibble—plain, legal, matter-of-fact Mr. Quibble! The astounded lawyer, casting a hasty glance on the extraordinary apparition which burst upon him, looked, first, aghast—then sought the door, confused and breathless, and retired, exclaiming, as he hurried down stairs, 'Good heaven! Heaven bless my life! What can be the matter with him?—must tell his friends of him!—mad!"

"A sudden twinge of compunction, a transient regret for his dereliction of duty, impelled him, the next morning, to pay a visit to the chambers, and give the law one more trial. There he found the pale fellow-student, formerly mentioned, cowering, like an owl, in a complete ivy-bush of reports, digests, papers, books of practice; engaged on a very difficult and intricate case. A common declaration on a schoolmaster's bill was put into Elmsley's hands, but even to this he could not force his attention. He was perpetually starting from his seat, standing before the fire, and gazing ruefully—perhaps enviously on his fellow-pupil. A ludicrous and characteristic specimen of the declaration he was writing, is now in existence, and has been shown to the writer, in which it is stated—

"That the said defendant was indebted to the said plaintiff, in the further sum of twenty pounds of good, &c. for the work and labor, care and diligence, of the said Iago, as schoolmaster, &c."

"When Mr. Quibble came to settle this precious performance of Elmsley, he simply assured his erratic pupil, that it was not the custom to insert the christian name of the plaintiff, but to allude to him generally as 'plaintiff.' There was certainly no analogy between master and pupil.

"At length, however, arrived the eventful day. Little sleep did poor Elmsley obtain the preceding night. He rose in a state of feverish excitement. His dress had been sent down to the earl's house the day before; and about three in the afternoon, the dashing equipage of Lord — stood glittering before the gloomy portals of the Temple. Elmsley entered it with a throbbing heart. A shrewd attorney, who was passing at the time, observing the coronet on the panels, exclaimed to his companion, 'Some protégé of the chancellor's, I'll warrant—lucky dog, that!' The carriage took up successively Berton, a noble amateur, and Scenicus; and a few hours saw them alight at the scene of Elmsley's debut. The ample mansion was crowded with amateur actors and noble visitors; all was gaiety and the soft bustle of aristocratic preparation. Elmsley, who, since his hit at Lady —'s, had been much talked of, was a decided lion. He was introduced to, and received by the noble host and hostess in the most flattering manner; and, as he moved along the rooms, thronged with rank and fashion, he met, on every hand, with that ease and affable reception for which the English nobility are celebrated. He was placed, at dinner, next to a niece of his noble host's, a girl of rare and dreamy beauty, so soft, so delicate, so lovely, that Elmsley could scarce persuade himself that he actually sat by the side of her whose likeness had fascinated him at most of the leading print-shops in London. Beauteous, however, as was the fair creature by his side, Elmsley could not help, unwittingly, furnishing her with a source of amusement, in his repeated fits of absence, and, occasionally, answering her polite questions in snatches from the language of his part.

"An early hour in the evening beheld the private theatre crowded. Wine had communicated abundant self-possession to Elmsley. It need not be related how the affair went off, any further than to state, that, with the exception of one or two trifling slips, Elmsley's performance was able and spirited. He had taken much pains to appreciate Iago's character, and his representation of it was exceedingly well conceived, and met with great applause. At one part he succeeded in drawing tears from an old virgin of sixty; and at another his well-acted villany had nearly carried off a paralytical peer. But these were not the trophies which Elmsley courted; the youth and beauty of the audience were with him. His fine person was shown to the utmost advantage by his dress; his countenance handsome and expressive, and his voice rich and flexible, spoke eloquently to many a fluttering heart. Few things are more intoxicating to a young man who has a dash of romance or ambition in his composition, than being suddenly admitted to a familiar and flattering intimacy with the great. To be elevated at once to a higher sphere of society—to be singled out, from the millions, to move among the states of rank and beauty, argues the possession of rare and admirable qualities, at least, when such a person has the consciousness that he has avoided the sneaking tone of sycophancy, and stands on the ground of his own character and accomplishments. Whether or no such was the case with Elmsley, certain it is, he was nearly giddy with the encomiums which were unsparingly lavished on him.

"What a Romeo he would make!" sighed young Lady Emily —, bending her full, blue, languishing eyes upon him.

"What a fine Italian countenance—what passionate dark eyes!" whispered Miss —, raising a gossamer handkerchief to conceal a tear that glistened in the sparkling fountains of her own eyes.

"Give him time—give him time," weezed old Sir Adam Addle Head, with a knowing nod, 'and he'll beat — off the stage.'

"A star of the first magnitude, undoubtedly," said the classical and gifted Lord —. Elmsley distinctly overheard the remark, and it sent him to bed in an ecstasy.

"Lord — was so much delighted with Elmsley, that he pressed him to remain at — till the end of the week. He lived in clover all that time! On Saturday he returned to town, and betook himself to his chambers. All Sunday he remained alone; it was a gloomy, rainy, cheerless day; and how are the horrors of such weather enhanced in the Temple! What a contrast was there between the silence and solitude of his homely apartment, and the gaiety and splendor of — house! Was it likely that his present profession would lead him into such scenes? Was it for his legal talents or prospects that he had been introduced into the highest society, and received with the most flattering attentions? The quæstionem of the affair cannot be ascertained—but the fact is certain, that an offensive copy of Archbold's Practice found itself suddenly dislodged from its resting-place, on his table, and hurled to a distant corner of the room!

"He was prevailed on, by a friend, a week or two afterwards, to accompany him to the court of king's bench, for the purpose of hearing a very interesting trial, when one of the most eminent counsel was engaged for the defence. The thing was exciting enough in its way, there could be no doubt. Elmsley sat among the counsel; he could hear them expressing their expectation of a splendid display of —'s powers; he saw the court getting rapidly thronged with spectators, all of whom directed their eyes to one spot—that occupied by —. At length Mr. — rose, adjusted his papers, and addressed himself to the jury. There was an instant silence in the court. Elmsley felt himself kindling with the eloquent and animated speaker. At one time he quailed and shrunk beneath the terrible and overwhelming recrimination, the bitter irony, the searching sarcasm of the indignant advocate; then felt himself bewildered in the maze of the most subtle and refined sophistry—then carried away with a climax of prodigious power, till the speaker, raised even beyond himself, concluded amid a storm of eloquence,

"The roar of thunders, and the lambent glare
Of lightning!"

"The judge, the jury, and court seemed exhausted with the attention they had bestowed on the speaker; who drew together his papers—gave his bag to his clerk—unrobed and retired to a new scene for the display of his powers—the house of commons. "Then did the scale" of Thespis "kick the beam." Elmsley, in a state of unutterable excitement, returned home, resolved to go on with the "law," and, with enthusiasm, sat down to draw up a plan of common-law reading—constitutional law—history; in short, such a line of reading as he thought calculated to make him such a one as Mr. —. He retired to bed, beated with his projects; rose the next morning in the same spirit; was hurrying about twelve to Butterworth's, to purchase a copy of Hale's History of the Common Law, when, as fate would have it, he encountered Berton and Scenicus, stepping out of the latter's carriage to pay him a visit. What was to be done?—They would hear of no refusal; so Elmsley got in, and away they drove to witness the final rehearsal of a tragedy that was to be performed that evening. They all dined at an adjoining hotel. Both Berton and Scenicus were eloquent in praise of the stage, and of Elmsley's qualifications for success. They urged him to "throw law to the dogs;" and how could he stand their cross-fire? He felt flattered by the pains they took; too much obliged by their solicitude to be rude enough to meet them with a firm denial; felt dazzled by the proximity of success on the stage—and discouraged by the tardy and distant returns of the bar—Berton pressed hotly.

"My dear fellow, it would be downright madness to think of it," replied Elmsley, faintly.

"Gentle shepherd! tell me why!" inquired Scenicus, gaily.

"Consider my friends—relations—sober family—my education!" faltered Elmsley, tossing off a glass of sparkling champagne.

"Are you then to be led in leading-strings all your life?" inquired Berton. "What need of such nervous sensitiveness about the opinion of a few country relations?"

"The Temple would echo with laughter whenever my name was mentioned—I should be struck off the books with disdain!"

"Easily to be accounted for, my dear fellow—they would be piqued at losing talents like your's, and as for their disdain—ha, ha! fling it back in their teeth!"

"Five thousand a year—splendid popularity—the highest society might, methinks, be a counterpoise," said Berton, adding, suddenly, 'By the way, Scenicus, how much did you make last year, including your country tour?"

"Somewhere between four and five thousand pounds," replied the actor, carelessly.

"And yours is a life," continued Berton, in a tone of affected commiseration, 'of great misery, from envy, rivalry, disappointment—'

"Faith, do I look such a one—as though

'Old care had set his tooth upon my heart!'

replied Scenicus, with a gay air. 'But I must leave—I am engaged at the Marchioness of —, a tête-à-tête—hear!**

"Darby, if any one should be inquiring after a set of chambers, you may tell them that No. —, on the third floor of — court, will be vacant in three months," said Elmsley, the next morning, to the Temple hair-dresser."

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

At the Park theatre, on Wednesday the seventeenth instant, the French company represented the opera of "Le petit chaperon rouge," in which the acting of Madame Berdoulet Paradol appeared to great advantage. On Friday, "La muette de Portici," was repeated to a fine house, although not so much thronged as on its first representation. We can with truth compliment this company upon the fire and spirit which each individual imparts to his rôle, however insignificant. It causes a general effect, which ought to afford a strong lesson to the actors of the English drama. On the departure of the French company, preparations will be commenced for opening the house with its regular business. Rumor is abroad that Mr. Price, the late manager of Drury-lane theatre, has returned to this country, and imported, for the amusement of our citizens, and the benefit of the Park theatre, a squad of pantomime actors, besides a man-monkey. In this case, we have a chance to enjoy a highly intellectual and appropriate series of "spectacles" at "the Drury-lane of America;" for, if we have an assistant in the gambols of Mr. Parsloe, the rising generation, who are extremely susceptible of the "latest fashions," will no doubt become first-rate adepts in cracking nuts, and learn to scratch themselves with natural grace. Mr. W. Barrymore, a gentleman cunning in "getting up" melo-dramas and christmas pantomimes, has arrived, and with him his lady, a veteran actress of dumb-show, of whom report speaks highly. Messieurs Sinclair and Anderson, with Mesdames Hughes and Bartolozzi, are also said to be on the Atlantic. We wish them favoring gales. This looks like activity on the part of the management; yet, although we may rejoice in bearing one and all of these vocalists, we cannot help fearing that a chance exists that the object pursued steadily and with profit by Mr. Simpson, for the last two seasons, may be lost sight of, viz. the bringing out opera strong in every department, with a company well studied in the business. The "American," on the appearance of the French "troupe," offered some valuable and sensible remarks on the folly of the star system. We warmly believe, that it is ruinous both to public taste and to the manager's finances. The French do wonders by the organization of a very little talent. And who will not prefer the ensemble of a complete company to the hearing and seeing of some "bright particular star," singing half a dozen ballads and bravuras, thrust neck and heels into a bad drama, miscalled an opera, with which they have as much to do as the cham of Tartary has with the British reform bill? We did hope, that those times were past, that the losses sustained in former attempts, and the gains acquired by the late successes, would have been a true index to the manager of the taste of the town, and his own interests. From information which we have received, we should not be astonished to find Masaniello, from the music of which the public have been anticipating a new banquet of pleasure, cut down to a melo-drama; or a pas de deux between two star-monkeys, introduced to grace the ball-room scene of Cinderella!

The regular company will re-commence operations on Monday, the twenty-ninth instant; and the manager has, with excellent taste, selected the beautiful opera of Cinderella for the opening piece. The friends of music will, no doubt, crowd the boxes on this occasion.

BOWERY THEATRE.

This establishment re-opened on Thursday, the eighteenth instant, under the management of Mr. Hamblin, with Julius Cæsar: Antony, Cooper; Brutus, Hamblin; Cassius, Booth. These gentlemen acquitted themselves extremely well before a numerous audience; and, although the public has doubtless seen each character sustained at different periods in an equal, and sometimes in a superior manner, they certainly are not accustomed to such an effective ensemble. It is to be regretted that Booth does not perform with a more equable spirit. He has a fortunate face for the stage, and reads certain passages with power; but was, on the whole, too flippant and easy for Cassius. Mr. Hamblin was more of the Roman. There are points which he seizes with great success. We suggest the propriety, however, of correcting one of his readings, which, we presume, resulted rather from carelessness than intention, although committed with an air of deliberation:

"But 'tis a common proof
That lowliness is young ambition's ladder,
Where to the climber-upward, turns his face,
But when he once ascends the utmost round,
He then unto the ladder turns his back,
Looks in the clouds, scornful the base degrees
By which he did ascend."

We quote from memory, and may not be particularly accurate; but the line alluded to, is according to the text. Mr. Hamblin read it:

But when the climber—upward turns his face, &c

The "climber" will always "upward turn his face." It would be very inconvenient for him to ascend with it turned downward. The poet clearly intended to say, that the climber-upward always turned his face to the ladder till he reached the top; when, striving to mount some other height, his back must necessarily be turned to the first. Mr. Cooper was more than usually spirited; and in the burst of passion over the dead body of Cæsar, in the senate-chamber, displayed a dignity and feeling deservedly acknowledged with applause. We were perfectly delighted with the death of Cæsar, not because of any particular elegance with which that ceremony was executed, but from the reflection that when the necessity of the piece should produce the actor again upon the stage during the evening, he would be compelled to lie still and hold his tongue. Some similar aspirant must have enacted the part of the wall in Pyramus and Thisbe. The afterpiece of the Young Widow went off well; and, with the exception of one or two mispronunciations of classical names, was pretty well sustained. For the edification of one of the dramatis personæ, we mention that Terpsichore is not a word of three syllables. We remember once before to have heard Eurydice pronounced so as to rhyme with mice. These errors are awkward. The stage should be regarded as authority on questions of orthoepy. The Park company also have at times exhibited carelessness of the same description. In a late popular piece, the s is invariably omitted from the plural of the word steed, by one whose wand might occasionally conjure up a dictionary with some advantage; "portentous" is also spoken as if the last syllable were written "tious." We can only say, to "both your houses," such oversights, though trivial, are unpardonable in these leading theatres, and may be easily corrected without those two troublesome circumstances attending all other managerial attempts to gratify the public—trouble and expense.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Conversations of the week.—We admire the off-hand way in which our friend Willis flings out a paragraph, and we sincerely sympathize with him in the sad necessities of editorial avocations. He thus commences the editor's table in a number of the American Monthly:

"It is a great misfortune to be such a walking miscellany as an editor gets to be after a while. One never knows what to do first. If we could only write as we can talk or read—braiding our subjects together, now a head from a sermon, now a pun from a play, a character from a naughty novel, and a devout flourish from Jeremy Taylor—if we could write, we say, as we often read, with two books at a time, passage for passage, one in one hand and one in the other, there would be some saving of dilemma on the tenth or twelfth of every calendar month. We have not the slightest perceptible preference, now, for a subject. It should be something cool with the thermometer at ninety. Excitement is warm—it should be a quiet theme—delicate and brief like a white jacket—transparent like a lump of ice in champagne—soft tempered like the sea breeze at night. It would stump the universality of the Admirable Crichton to come up to this warm weather standard."

In such a state of affairs we are inclined to praise the city councils of Boston, for having appointed a committee to report on the expediency of public fountains. It is said, that, after the first cost, which really need not be great, one hundred fountains could be kept constantly playing for one dollar a week! This seems not impossible. Literary, cool, and happy Bostonians! Think of making up our weekly summary of intelligence, with the freshened air from a fountain blowing on our forehead, and the dash of its sprinkling waters rising, as some modification of the dust, the doubly-heated atmosphere, the clash, the thunder, which surround us now!

The French company at the Adelphi are about to bring out a piece which has been acted with considerable applause in Paris and printed there, under the title of "Paganini." The great violinist is not the hero, but a young German, who having been charged with some crime, and being able to scrape a jig, in order to escape discovery, pretends to an ignorant old baron, who affects a fine taste in music, that he is Paganini. It is but in one act, and is said to be sufficiently lively.

The emperor of China has reproved the sheriffs for strangling the wrong subjects by mistake, and requests them not to do so in future. They should certainly esteem it a very particular favor. It is rather unpleasant to be strangled under any circumstances; but when it happens by mistake, it is positively provoking.

The editors of the Journal of Health designate as one of the means of prolonging life, "a happy married state." The same work states, that Mr. Brocnot, a French chemist, has concentrated milk into a liquor which promises to be of use to the world, or particularly to seamen. He took two pints and a half of milk, and exposed it to a heat of about one hundred and thirteen Fahrenheit. To this he added, from time to time, small portions of diluted hydrochloric or muriatic acid, or spirits of sea-salt, which produced a separation of the butyaceous and gaseous parts from the serous portion, or whey. With this churd thus obtained, he mixed seventy-five grains of the crystalized subcarbonate of soda, which, by the application of a mild heat, soon dissolved. This furnishes about a pint of cream, to which add a small quantity of water and sugar, and heat it, when an excellent syrup, superior in every respect to ordinary cream, is obtained. When in the cream, a cheese-cake from it may be kept any length of time, and is always fresh when diluted and sweetened as above.

A writer in the Courier and Enquirer asserts, that most of the associations formed by ladies in our large cities, to aid in charitable purposes, are an evil. However praiseworthy the motive, he declares they injure a large portion of respectable but indigent females, whose only dependence is on their needle, and whose profits are much diminished by the introduction of these cheap commodities into the market. The complaint is not without its foundation.

The last number of the Albion contains an interesting map, tracing the route of the cholera morbus from Jessore on the Ganges to Riga on the Baltic.

Conundrums are a vile species of wit. We crave pardon of the reader for copying this atrocious specimen, and yet we cannot help smiling.

"Why is a dumpling like the overture to La Dame Blanche? Because it is a composition of Boieldieu, (boiled dough.)"

It has been ascertained that there are in England not less than fifteen thousand steam-engines at work, some of them of almost incredible power. There is one in Cornwall of a thousand horse power! Taking it for granted that, on an average, these engines are only of twenty-five horse power each, it would be equal to three hundred and seventy-five thousand horses.

A bottle was found on the shore at Plymouth, on the eighth inst. containing the following, in manuscript, some of the words being illegible:—"Brig Charles, from Havre, Perkins,—sprung a leak off Grand —, sunk in one hour and ten minutes. Crew took to boat—two passengers,—Gilbert and Charles Demarre lost.—Twenty-fifth July, 1831.—God save us."

Two young men of Buffalo, inspired by the example of the two students, who bear a prominent part in the New-York Magdalen Report, have published a Temperance Society Report, made from actual observation, which sets down every man as a drunkard except the members of their society. A meeting of the citizens of Buffalo was held, and several strong resolutions passed, denouncing the report.

The first number of a daily morning paper, entitled the New-York American Advocate, appeared on Wednesday last; its editorial department is under the direction of Redwood Fisher, esq. a gentleman of talents. Its object is the support of the tariff in the most unlimited sense.

Six young men, concerned in the powder plot to blow up the mayor of Albany, pleaded guilty to the charge, and were each fined twenty dollars. The mayor informed the court that the damage to his house had been repaired, and recommended that the judge should not imprison them. It appears they did it out of "fun." Shade of William the Tasty! blow up a mayor in fun! and at the expense of twenty dollars!

It is gratifying to perceive so respectable a journal as the New-York American turning aside from the cant of bigotry, the frenzy of politics, and the clashing conflicts of private or local interests, to assert the rights of morality independently of either. We copy some excellent observations, elicited by the following, which appeared in the Journal of Commerce:

"We are happy to state that within a few days past, business has revived in this city, we mean the dog-killing business, and that several firms of boys and men are making very handsome profits. The whole amount paid for dog-killing, up to the present time, is two thousand eight hundred and sixty-five dollars. Two thousand eight hundred and sixty-five dogs are no laughing matter. One stout, lubberly fellow, with stentorian lungs, and his second major at the foot of the line, kept us awake night before last (there is no telling the loss to the public) above half an hour; and it is fair to presume that at least twenty families in the neighborhood, comprising say one hundred souls, were equally molested with ourselves. Now as two dogs is to one hundred persons, so is two thousand eight hundred and sixty-five to the answer: namely, one hundred and forty-three thousand two hundred and fifty. Hence it appears that the dogs already killed, were capable of making noise enough (and no doubt often did) to keep awake one hundred and forty-three thousand two hundred and fifty persons. Game is still plenty, notwithstanding. There are hundreds of dollars yet "running at large" in our streets, which any body is at liberty to pick up who will. Go at them, Billy, Jack, Dick, Tom and Harry; make hay while the sun shines; pay your debts, and lay up something for a rainy day."

"We have passed over in silence," says the American, "a number of paragraphs like the above, which, appearing, as they have, in one of the most respectable journals of the country, have been as much a cause of regret as of disgust to us. Nor have we now any intention of flying into heroics and crusading in a cause which we believe to be hopeless, as long as the public mind is in its present agitated state. We cannot, however, resist the impulse to express our unqualified abhorrence of the barbarity that is breathed in the above extract. We do not allude to the system of slaughter that is upheld in it. That we shall examine coolly and candidly some months hence, when the fears and the feelings of men are more temperate upon the subject than now. We refer to the revolting levity with which the alleged necessity of destroying nearly three thousand of God's creatures, is sported with; and these of a race, which revelation, tradition, history, and experience, have shown to be the faithful servants of our kind, under all circumstances, except when human neglect has exposed them to become subjects of a disease which impels them to turn upon their master. If there is a necessity for destroying all dogs; if there is a necessity for teaching children to imbrue their hands in the blood of an animal, which is so remarkable for its guardian care of them, let it be submitted to in silence. But why—why should so unhappy an extremity be a matter of coarse mirth, and create a saturnalia of slaughtering among us?—wherein lies the festivity of butchering? We are disposed to look upon the inconsiderate, but, we doubt not, well meaning remarks of our respectable cotemporary, as arising from bad taste rather than bad feeling; but we do not hesitate to say, that they convey to us a tone of cruelty so gross, that we feel it to be disgusting; so wanton, that we feel it to be impious."

A Mr. Mortimer, who was about opening an exhibition of Mr. West's paintings in this city, expired suddenly on Sunday morning in the bath. The report that he was drowned is incorrect. He desired his little son to take hold of the rope, complaining that he felt unwell, when he fell and was immediately removed by several persons present. We understand the fit was apoplectic.

A friend informs us, that he found the other morning, a large dead rat caught in a steel trap. By its side sat a young one, with its face near that of the other, and although perfectly free to go, it made no effort to escape, from what we presume must have been its unfortunate parent. The lovers of the sentimental will be shocked, as we were, to learn that this rare personification of filial love was forthwith handed over to the claws of grimalkin.

The scurrility of our political press has unfortunately become a theme of notoriety, and tends to degrade us to a great extent in the opinion of strangers. We have before us a paper containing an article which commences thus:

"We are indirectly accused of 'dishonesty and falsehood' by a writer in the last 'common receptacle of undigested scandal,' alias, the Rutland Herald."

"In the theatres of Paris," says a late English paper, "there is no dress—people turn from the streets into the play-houses as the whim takes them, and they are thus in the best mood to be amused. Preparation spoils pleasure. In London to visit a theatre is to a family the trouble of a day—there is a fuss, and a hurry, a dressing and frizzing against time, an agitation of spirits, a bolting of dinner, an impatience of unpunctuality, a fear of losing places, an anxious consulting of watches, and a hundred other petty annoyances which put people's minds out of the train for gratification. The ladies at last enter their box, full of thoughts of the effect of their head-dresses and their looks; and the husband, father, or brother, full of reflections on that grand and perpetual truth, that women are never ready in time. How much better that they should drop into a theatre in their walking dresses and their walking moods, thinking little of themselves and their vexations, and so the more intent upon what is subjected to their attention. Every one's experience vouches the truth that the pleasures for which no plan or preparation has been made are the sweetest; and so theatrical amusements would be without places to be taken (and oh, bitterness, paid for, at the patent houses,) and hairdressers to be appointed, and waited for, (for hairdressers have no respect for Time, as he is bald, and does not wear a wig,) cooks to be hurried, carriages to be ordered, &c. But the theatres must have a dress circle. A dress circle! and see what it comes to—see what it is—look at the tawdry and the ennui of people who would be pleased, if their whole souls were not in the effect of their appearances, and who would be respectable if they were not tempted to be fine."

If the weather and our previous pages have not rendered the reader too languid, he will smile at the annexed morceau from the Monthly Magazine:

"Avoid quotations, unless you are well studied in their import, and feel their pertinence. My friend —, the other day, while looking at the skeleton of an ass which had been dug out of a sand-pit, and admiring and wondering at the structure even of that despised animal, made a very mal-adroit use of one. 'Ah!' said he, with the deepest humility, and a simplicity worthy of La Fontaine, 'we are fearfully and wonderfully made.'"

SECOND VERSE.

Friendship's bloom may pass away,
As dreams depart the sleeper's mind;
The hopes of life's maturer day
May fade, and leave no trace behind;
But early love can never die!
—That fairest bud of summer years,
'Twill still look green in memory,
When time all other feelings sears,
My early love!—my early love!

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

THE LOVED.

They are going, one by one,
From the altar and the hearth,
With the music of their tone,
And the sun-light of their mirth;
With the hopes their bosoms cherish'd,
With the joys their morning knew;
Hopes that in their radiance perish'd,
Like fading flowers—or early dew.

From their valleys, broad and green,
From their mountains, stern and dear;
From their rivers' crystal sheen,
Silently they disappear;
All the visions of their dreaming
Fade away and are forgot,
And the brain, with wisdom teeming,
Sinks to earth and rises not.

Mark the flow'ret on the bough,
Fling its odors on the air;
Look again upon it! now
Its wither'd leaves are scatter'd there;
Death will soon all beauty banish,
Waste away its sweet perfume;
Bid youth's buds of promise vanish,
Shroud its azure sky in gloom.

On the hill-side and the lea (they?)
Forms were sporting—where are
On the air were sounds of glee;
Listen! they have passed away.
Fades the soonest all that's rarest,
Hopes the brightest first decay;
Friends the truest—forms the fairest,
Melt like summer clouds away.

POETRY.

I am an admirer of good poetry, such as we find in the best English writers; and I have read the productions of a number of our own bards with a powerful interest, but I esteem a third or fourth-rate poet a very ordinary sort of affair, and would recommend such at least to leave off publishing if they cannot overcome the cacoethes scribendi. The facilities afforded by our reading rooms at Washington Hall, the Parthenon Library, the Exchange, &c. &c. enable me to examine a vast number of newspapers, and I am of opinion that if all the stanzas, sonnets, love-sick complaints, and stale imitations in metre and rhyme should be collected together, and Hercules, that immortal bully, could be called down from his constellation, he would rather once more cleanse the Augean stable or slay the Nemean lion, than undertake to wade through such a slough of despondency and nonsense. It is mortifying to reflect how much paper and ink are wasted in this business, and also how much time on the part of the reader as well as scribblers. Our youngsters fall into a mistake in supposing that admiration for good poetry is a genius for producing it, and after having skipped through the fashionable authors of the day, they sit down at midnight, and drawing upon their memory instead of their imagination, bring forth such a sad medley of agonizing despair in bad grammar, or of passionate love in most noble contempt of rhyme, as one would suppose would be sufficient to drive sleep from their pillows for the rest of the night, and elicit a sincere pity on the part of their friends, besides wasting an indefinite quantity of lamp oil.

I have a little servant boy in my family who blacks boots, cleans knives, runs of errands, and does other odd jobs for every body in the house. Even he has caught the epidemic, and I have actually detected him engaged in "making poetry," which he thinks, with many much older than himself, is as easily done as making butter or pudding.

I found this sticking out of his vest pocket the other afternoon, and after some stammering and excuses, he confessed that he had written it, and added, that it came "out of him very hard."

"My friends alas my friends you are
A calm repose 'twas often yours
Impressed from virtue and from care
Among the shady bowers.
Flying indeed my thoughts have flew
From every care they thus have flown
Strayed far away from the evening dew
Must I then stay alone."

This little fellow doubtless believes his lines are very clear and beautiful; and I will venture to surmise, that many who smile while they peruse them, have the same opinion of some bantling of their own, which, perhaps, in reality is little better. Hundreds imagine that any thought which passes through their mind can be cut down into measure and rhyme, so as to be manufactured into poetry; and thus we have innumerable fledglings, who think themselves gifted by nature with precious genius, and that they are born poets, without the aid of other exertions, as Minerva came fully armed from the head of Jove, or the mother of love rose from the deep in perfect loveliness, and "conscious of her charms." Out of a hundred who write verses, perhaps there may be one or two capable of producing poetry; and still fewer of writing a long poem. Let the rhymers of the day measure themselves with Robert Burns, who, without education or books, striding through the fields, could compose such a complete production as the "Cotter's Saturday Night," unassisted even by pen and paper. Let them compare the pure original material of which it consists with the borrowed patches of their own pieces, and they may in some degree feel the respect due to a true poet, and the folly of their attempts to appear to be what nature has not made them. As for me I have about me a kind of modesty, which keeps me from entering the lists against so many wonderful antagonists, and a shame at being among the inferior ranks. There is something, too, so useless in the character of a bad poet, that my duty to society would scarcely permit me to devote my time to verse. Indeed, such aspirants are not only morally injuring themselves, but are a pest to the whole community in which they live; for where they abound, nothing unusual can occur but it is straightway woven into verse as coarse as the likenesses of Washington, Jackson, and Lafayette on the signs of taverns. If a beautiful belle appear in the fashionable circles, she is straightway embalmed in a very discreditable manner, and made a theme of universal ridicule by apotrophes in her praise, to her flame-darting eyes and snowy bosom. Indeed, there is no restraint upon the liberties which these gentlemen take, and they handle the lips and hands of each fair lady so freely, and assume such imaginary familiarities with her person, as render it obvious to all that she has been rather kind, or they very impertinent. When revolutionary heroes die, they have to stand a fire from these little poetic discharges, more dangerous to their fame than any they have encountered in battle, and I have on my table a sonnet to John Paulding, which is enough to make the bones of that inflexible patriot unquiet in his grave.

Shakspeare, who, like the wife of honest Dennis Bulgruddery, seems to have known "every thing and a great deal more," has cunningly introduced a fellow of this kind in order to turn him into ridicule. He comes in after the celebrated and beautiful quarrel and reconciliation between Brutus and Cassius. These would-be poets are the noisiest and most confident varlets in the universe, and our author brings him on in a characteristic manner.

STANZAS.

NAY, think not, sweet, to read my heart
With those soft searching eyes;
Thou canst not tear the veil apart
That lends me its disguise:
My words, in mood of grave or gay,
Are guarded as they flow;
But that I mean whate'er I say
To thee, my deeds shall show.
I see thee mark each look and smile,
As if they would betray
The thoughts that in my breast the while Lie hidden from the day:
Thou deem'st the changes of my face
My feelings may reveal—
But e'en from them, thou canst not trace
Aught that I would conceal.
Little could thy young sinless heart
And pure mind comprehend,
Why I should wear the mask of art
With thee, my gentle friend!
The world a cold, cold lesson taught
Too early unto me;
But from its lore with suffering fraught,
Be thou forever free.
The thoughts thy lips will not confess
Still may thy sweet face speak,
In the bright graceful bashfulness
That beautifies thy cheek;
And as some lake reflects the skies
In its pellucid breast,
So, in thy azure heavenly eyes
Be still thy soul confest.

CLARENCE.

ORIGINAL TALES.

LA PARISIENNE.

WHATEVER may be her general recollections of the past, her consolations in the present, or her prospects for the future, every country has some bright landmark in history, to which her children ever point, in the honest exultation of national pride. Whilst the great globe rolls onward to eternity, unusual causes will, at intervals, produce unusual effects in society; termed, in political diction, revolutions. They may be here to-day and there to-morrow, with perhaps no absolute dependency upon individual or immediate agency; but, as long as human feeling runs in its present current, as long as men cherish an interest in the past, who will wonder that the Parisian hails with sentiments unutterable the three days of July?

Whether it arose from an intense interest in passing events, from an indistinct perception of what was to follow, from doubt, or from these causes united, a deep and (perhaps to many at the time) unaccountable gloom overcast Paris, as the last sun that was to behold the dominion of the king of France shed its setting rays on her gay capital. The hurried step, the unquiet eye, the anxious question, the quick response, the affectionate gripings of the hand, and serious parting of common acquaintance, all bore evidence of an unusual excitement.

Long before this anxiety became general, it had reached the breast of Therese de Bastrol. The death of her mother, about a year before, had left La Belle Therese, as she was frequently called, an orphan of seventeen. Although her face was not that of a regular beauty, nor her person the figure of a fine woman, yet her appearance had something in its tout ensemble peculiarly interesting. To the natural attractions of a sweetly expressive countenance, and a slight and easy figure, Therese added much by the gentleness of her manners; and still more by a feeling of melancholy, which her countenance and complexion often, though unconsciously, betrayed. Such a girl could not live long in the city of love and suicide without admirers. But Therese had made an early choice—a choice which was the cause of much surprise to her friends, and much censure to herself.

Henri Lascelles was a youth of warm imagination and some genius; but being heir to a considerable estate, and not intending to follow any profession, his natural capacity slumbered for want of a distinct object. Sensitive but inactive, quick but fickle, apparently unconscious of his own powers, and ignorant of his own character, his reason was bewildered in romance, his prospects lost in indifference; and though meant by nature for a useful member of the community, Henri had suffered himself to fall by degrees into habitual inertness. Such was he upon whom La Belle Therese had fixed her affections; yet, though all condemned her choice, and many hinted that he seemed to suffer himself to be loved rather than to love, Therese thought she saw another nature in him, and looked forward anxiously, but confidently, to an entire change in his chaacter. While events were hurrying on the revolution of July, she felt many indistinct fears for him. She knew the unaffected fervor of his patriotism, and apprehended that, if excited, it might lead him to ruin in the hour of commotion.

These ideas were thronging through her mind, when upon that evening they sat at her window, gazing in silence upon the moon. Their eyes were on the solitary planet, but their hearts were turned fondly upon each other, in that delightful intercourse of feeling which lovers know, when they contemplate the same object. The still solemnity of the scene and hour had its effect upon both; it deepened the painful anxiety which sat upon her brow, whilst it heightened the expression of his handsome face to a glowing earnestness of enthusiasm. They turned; their eyes met: he saw the fixed anxiety of hers: she started at the wild determination of his: their hands unconsciously came together; and as Therese mechanically but affectionately locked his in her own, large drops stood trembling in her fine black lashes. Therese spoke in a low voice,

"Bon Dieu! how fearfully you look! What is in your mind?"

"Dearest Therese! my thoughts were always yours. But—"

"But what? Lascelles, whatever be your feelings, let me be the sharer of them."

The clock struck—it was midnight—Henri started.

"Hark! I must away. Therese," said he, putting a small locket in her hand, "keep this for my sake. Farewell! we must part!"

Therese was dumb with astonishment. The earnest solemnity of parting, as if for ever; the locket, too, so solemnly bestowed, were unaccountable to her. She would have spoken—she would have given words to hear him say they would meet again; but her heart was too full for utterance. For minutes she clung in unbreathing fondness to his neck, and her bosom heaved audibly upon his; tears, sweet tears, the balm to a woman's grief, at length released her from her trance. She looked into his burning eyes.

"And shall we meet no more, Henri?"

"Heaven grant we may," said he passionately, as he bore her gently to a sofa; his lips touched her cold forehead, he turned, and hurried from her sight.

She listened unconsciously to his receding steps, and as they died upon her ear, she felt as if she were alone in the world.

No eye watched the first efforts of the revolutionists with more interest than hers. In every group she looked for the fine person of Henri, but he was not among them. The sounding of trumpets and the deep rolling of the artillery, the shrieks of the dying, and the shouts of combatants were around her; and at every shock she feared more intensely for him.

Her thoughts were interrupted by the entrance of two citizens, bearing a wounded man. Therese became his nurse; and as she dressed his wounds, she asked for Henri, but her patient knew nothing of him. She heard other footsteps, she looked and beheld two soldiers enter; when their eyes caught the tri-colored emblem of the invalid, a low, muttered sound, that seemed a curse, instinctively escaped them; they sprang towards the wounded man. Therese rushed between them and their victim; but, while one pressed on towards him, the other first rudely seized her hand, then grasped her round the waist, and made an effort to bear her off. She shrieked not; one trembling hand brushed the hair from her pale forehead, the other snatched the pistol of the guard, and, before the villain was aware of her purpose, she was released from his gripe he was a corpse. As his companion turned fiercely from his mangled victim upon her, the door opened. Henri suddenly stood before him—they fought—the citizen stood, the soldier fell. Henri flew to the arms of his Therese, but the moments for congratulation were few and short. She hastily glanced at her adventure; his tale was quickly told: he had been among the first to take up arms; he had fought all day; passing her door by accident, the noise attracted his attention, and he entered, happily in time to save her. Justly, and perhaps interestedly, proud of the change circumstances had wrought in him, La Belle Therese looked tenderly in her lover's face; but, reading in its fallen expression that he was about to leave her again, and dreading the repetition of the same horrors, the courage which had borne her up till then forsook her, and she fainted in his arms. He gave her to her domestics, and once more sought his revolutionary friends.

With all his former indolence there was in Henri's character no want of natural energy. In the absence of every excitement his real character slumbered; but his latent powers needed only circumstance to become developed. Therese knew this, but the world knew it not; they see only what float on the surface, and they believe but what they see. The exertions, therefore, that he made, the talent he displayed, the fervor of enthusiasm which hurried him through every difficulty and danger, were now a subject of unaffected astonishment to all except his beloved Therese. His exploits that day were the theme of general praise; and when he again joined the ranks of his fellow-citizens, he was greeted by them with that single-hearted welcome which compatriot friends in danger alone can exchange. He did not disappoint their expectations: in every emergency he was at hand, in every danger he was intrepid, and many were the exploits of that memorable day in which Henri Lascelles was a participant.

But this is not for me; it is alike above my power and beyond my purpose, to recount the exertions of that noble people, rushing en masse over every obstacle a tyrant could raise. Stifling a sigh at the recollection of how little they have gained by the struggle, I will hurry on with my tale.

As the gray dusk approached Henri found himself, after many a bloody scene, at the foot of the street where La Belle Therese lived. A few hundred paces in advance of him was a strong party of military, and the street opposite the house was entirely blockaded. The quick feelings of the lover were on the alert. Might not the soldiery enter the house, and finding their dead comrades, revenge them on his lonely girl? A thousand mingled horrors floated through his brain, and a hectic blush sat upon his cheek, as he turned to the crowd behind him.

"Citizens, have you hearts to conquer once more? You see those soldiers; will you make one effort to dislodge them?"

"Away with them! Away with the soldiers!"

"Thanks, friends, thanks! On, then! But first, where is De La Croix? where is your leader?"

"He is dead."

"Where is Jacques Vernie?"

"He is dead also."

"You must appoint another, then. Be quick, whom do you wish to lead you?"

"Yourself."

"I? a boy—lead veterans?"

"You, only you will we follow. Lead on."

"Then follow me, if you will," said the young revolutionist, who could scarcely restrain his impetuosity during this short council of war.

How terrible it was to see a body of undisciplined soldiers rush heedlessly forward upon their oppressors, bent on revenge, and reckless of their lives!

The royalists yielded to the tremendous impulse; but retreated with their faces to their pursuers, and with their bayonets disputed the street inch by inch. As the slaughter increased fearfully, they passed Therese's dwelling; and, as her hurried eye sought him amongst the patriots, Lascelles caught a second glimpse of the pale, trembling girl.

Alas, poor Therese! this had been a trying day to her, and the agony of anxiety was now wound up almost beyond human endurance. She shook violently in every limb, and this was the only sign of life she gave, except that her trembling hand now and then parted her long black tresses upon her marble brow. She knew not where she was. She was unconscious of what was going forward; all was to her like a chaos of disturbed vision; yet her faithful eye, though dim to every other object, followed Lascelles through all his movements. From the time he passed her she had not lost sight of him, and a certain indistinct sense of his danger sat heavily upon her heart. Suddenly she regained her strength, her sight returned, the trance that had bound her was broken. She had seen Henri fall! She hurried forth alone through the dying and the dead to the spot where he lay. His death-wound was in his breast, the blood rushed fearfully from it, and as she gently raised his head it gushed into her heaving bosom. His eye turned heavily upon hers; he saw it filled with tears, but she wiped them away, to catch a last sympathizing look from him.

"Live, Therese," he murmured faintly, from lips that moved not, and a scarcely breathing frame; "live to be the mother of freemen, to be —"

"Yours—none but yours—yours in life and death," wildly, yet firmly, repeated the agonized girl; the words Henri would have added died upon his lips. She clasped his hand, it was cold and stiff; she gazed upon his face, it was fixed as marble; she looked into his eye, there was no soul there. Henri Lascelles was no more.

He died, but left behind him a living proof that no man is known until circumstance has tried him; and that none can read the heart of youth so well as she whom it loves.

And she, the widow before she was a bride? Alas! La Belle Therese lingered out five weary months after her beloved. She wept not before any, and she seldom spoke of him; but her heart was with him in his tomb, and she never was seen without the little locket: it had hung at her neck when he died, and his blood had sprinkled it. She said she would take those drops with her to the grave; but, poor girl, her tears soon washed them out. She now sleeps by the side of Henri Lascelles. Her name of De Bastrol is forgotten, her friends still calling her La Belle Therese; whilst the citizens who witnessed Henri's death, remember her only by the name of "La Parisienne."

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Ruins of Athens, with other Poems. By a Voyager. One volume, royal octavo, p. 111. Washington, Thompson & Homans. New-York, G. & C. & H. Carvill. 1831.

A MODEST volume; and, we are told, by a traveller attached to a United States ship, the result of many a lonely ramble to classic land, stolen perchance while the gallant vessel lay anchored beneath the blue Grecian sky; or composed pacing the deck in the stillness of a midnight watch, musing on the familiar stars, or glancing a gloomy eye over the tumbling ocean with its dim white-crested waves. We feel an involuntary kindness for these authors, who are not professionally so, but who carry the softening charms, of poetic thought and feeling amid the rough unsentimental influences of nautical life. We look through pages of this description for beauties, not faults; and, if we are unable to discover them, we lay the work aside gently, and with a regret that the hope of fame, which has been beaming brightly and cheerily, and lighting the imagination of the young sailor-poet through many a melancholy and many a tedious hour of absence, solitude, and danger, proves but a false meteor at last, and no true star. We are pleased to find men of literary taste abroad upon the waters, ever ready to serve their country with the blood of the same bosom which can, nevertheless, soften with these gentle emotions, and thus blend the tenderness and purity of boyhood with man's patience, firmness, and courage. We are flattered to know that such are the representatives of our nation among strangers, so that when they leave the rude deck they are yet competent to mingle in the better adventures of life. It tells of valor in battle, of mercy in victory, of honor in friendship, of fidelity in love. Who shall say how many of these wanderers, who, for a wretched pittance or a dim hope of fame, waste their youth's most precious years far away from home, and the endearing ties which form the main bliss of others; and this in order to protect their country's rights, and carry the knowledge of her greatness to every clime, and over every sea?—who shall say how many of these have gone silently down into the everlasting waters, have wasted with pestilence, have perished of gashed wounds? There is something deeply touching in the thought of a gentle, home-loving heart, mouldering in obscurity in some remote corner of the globe, with strange and careless feet, upon its unrespected grave. Shall we sit down to a little gift from one such, with a cold critic's frown, and ferret out a mischosen word, or snap at a sentence thus born among the upheaving surges, and nursed in the intervals of peril, because it has not all the polish which the student's closet labor might have imparted?

The volume before us might have been better. There are points obviously open to improvement, a few thoughts which should have been omitted, others capable of enlargement, and, in one or two instances, imitations (of Pinkney's noble piece, "I fill this cup to one made up," for example,) which are injudicious, and may provoke the wrath of the stop-watch people; but there are also numerous passages of fervid fancy and graceful simple feeling, which, we trust, will not be overlooked by the reading public.

We have not examined these pages with an attention sufficiently careful to permit of more than a cursory notice, but take the following verses at random:

TO VIOLETS.

Fair blossoms, ye are laughing now,
With your blue eyes and lids of snow;
Born for a little while:
So short-lived, that perchance had I
Not hither chanced to stray, no eye
Had seen you bloom and smile.
I joy to meet you in my walk
So daintily arrayed;
And yet, 'tis not without a sigh—
To think how soon ye fade:
Frail infants of the spring,
That play
In her green lap awhile,
Then pass away.
It were some comfort, might ye know
Ye are so fresh and fair;
Though idly now unseen ye blow
Save by the sun and air:
Or one like me; the world, alas,
Your beauty will unheeded pass;
So heedless of the volume spread,
The poetry, where'er we tread,
Of nature—they not even look
On you, the pictures of her book.
Laugh while ye may! ere night I fear
Your blossoms will be shed.
'Twill grieve me in my early walk
To come and find you dead.
So weary of a life unstead,
So long I've watched you, flowers, so long
At morning and the even-song
Ye in my path have played
Like younger sisters, that I feel
A sadness o'er my spirit steal
At parting, and could almost pray
We might together pass away.

We have penciled several other passages of much sweetness; but, in lieu of more extracts, refer the reader to the volume itself.

The Academical Speaker: a selection of Extracts in Prose and Verse, from ancient and modern authors. Adapted for Exercises in Elocution. By B. D. Emerson. New edition, revised and enlarged. One vol. 12mo. p. 344. Boston, Richardson, Lord & Holbrook. 1831.

A noble list of names greets us from the table of contents prefixed to this volume. Ancient and modern, statesman and divine, old and young, poet and orator, Webster and Channing, Irving and Massinger, Halleck, Addison, Willis, Shelley, Emmet, and a galaxy of others, that make the literary epicure smack his lips with the relish of agreeable anticipations. The work is instructive to youth, and welcome to all readers. These books of selections are particularly fascinating to the young. We remember well enough, and in the very recollection there is a charm, how when our lessons were done at the close of the afternoon session, when the sun flung out the red light that told us our confinement was nearly finished, we have pored over selections of this kind, and, as we mused upon each passionate fragment, how our awakened fancy busied itself in picturing the writer, and the scenes which he described.

Here is a characteristic specimen of the celebrated Roanoke orator. It is extracted from his speech in the late convention of Virginia:

"I see no wisdom for making this provision for future changes. You must give governments time to operate on the people, and give the people time to become gradually assimilated to their institutions. Almost anything is better than this state of perpetual uncertainty. A people may have the best form of government that the wit of man ever devised; and yet, from its uncertainty alone, may, in effect, live under the worst government in the world. Sir, how often must I repeat, that change is not reform. I am willing that this new constitution shall stand as long as it is possible for it to stand, and that, believe me, is a very short time. Sir, it is vain to deny it. They may say what they please about the old constitution—the defect is not there. It is not in the form of the old edifice, neither in the design nor the elevation: it is in the material—it is in the people of Virginia. To my knowledge that people are changed from what they have been. The four hundred men who went out to David were in debt. The partisans of Cæsar were in debt. The fellow-laborers of Castille were in debt. And I defy you to show me a desperately indebted people anywhere, who can bear a regular sober government. I throw the challenge to all who hear me. I say that the character of the good old Virginia planter—the man who owned from five to twenty slaves, or less, wholived by hard work, and who paid his debts, is passed away. A new order of things is come. The period has arrived of living by one's wits—of living by contracting debts that one cannot pay—and, above all, of living by office-hunting.

"Sir, what do we see? Bankrupts, branded bankrupts, giving great dinners—sending their children to the most expensive schools—giving grand parties—and just as well received as anybody in society. I say, that in such a state of things the old constitution was too good for them; they could not bear it. No, sir, they could not bear a freehold suffrage and a property representation.

"I have always endeavored to do the people justice—but I will not flatter them—I will not pander to their appetite for change. I will do nothing to provide for change. I will not agree to any rule of future apportionment, or to any provision for future changes called amendments to the constitution. They who love change—who delight in public confusion—who wish to feed the caldron, and make it bubble—may vote if they please for future changes. But by what spell—by what formula are you going to bind the people to all future time? You may make what entries upon parchment you please. Give me a constitution that will last for half a century—that is all I wish for. No constitution that you can make, will last the one half of half a century.

"Sir, I will stake anything short of my salvation, that those who are malcontent now, will be more malcontent three years hence than they are at this day. I have no favor for this constitution. I shall vote against its adoption, and I shall advise all the people of my district to set their faces—ay—and their shoulders against it. But if we are to have it—let us not have it with its death-warrant in its very face, with the sardonic grin of death upon its countenance."

We take one other extract from a speech made by Mr. Jeffrey, at a public dinner in Edinburgh:

"How absurd are the sophisms and predictions by which the advocates of existing abuses have at all times endeavored to create a jealousy and apprehension of reform? You cannot touch the most corrupt and imbecile government, without unsettling the principles and unhinging the frame of society—you cannot give the people political rights, without encouraging them to be disobedient to lawful authority, and sowing the seeds of continual rebellion and perpetual discontent; nor recognize popular pretensions in any shape, without coming ultimately to the abolition of all distinctions, and the division and destruction of all property—without involving society, in short, in disorders at once frightful and contemptible, and reducing all things to the level of an insecure, and ignoble, and bloody equality.

"Such are the reasonings by which we are now to be persuaded, that liberty is incompatible with private happiness or national prosperity, and that the despotic governments of the world ought to be maintained, if it were only to protect the people from the consequences, of allowing them any control over the conduct of their rulers! To these we need not now answer in words, or by reference to past and questionable examples, but we put them down at once, and trample them contemptuously to the earth, by a short appeal to the existence and condition of America!

"What is the country of the universe, I would now ask, in which property is most sacred, or industry most sure of its reward? Where is the authority of law most omnipotent? Where is intelligence and wealth most widely diffused, and most rapidly progressive? Where is society, in its general description, most peaceable, and orderly, and moral, and contented? Where are popular tumults least known, and the spirit and existence, and almost the name of a mob, least heard of? Where, in short, is political animosity least prevalent, faction subdued, and at this moment even party nearly extinguished, in a prevailing feeling of national pride and satisfaction? Where, but in America?

"America, that laid the foundation of her republican constitution in a violent, radical, sanguinary revolution—America, with her fundamental democracy, made more unmanageable, and apparently more hazardous, by being broken up into I do not know how many confederated and independent democracies—America, with universal suffrage, and yearly elections—with a free and unlicensed press—without an established priesthood, an hereditary nobility, or a permanent executive—with, in short, all that is combustible and pregnant with danger, on the hypothesis of tyranny, and without one of the checks or safeguards, by which alone they contend, the benefits or the very being of society can be maintained!

"There is something at once audacious and ridiculous, in maintaining such doctrines in the face of such experience. Nor can anything be founded on the novelty of these institutions, on the pretence that they have not yet been put fairly on their trial. America has gone on prospering under them for forty years, and has exhibited a picture of uninterrupted, rapid, unprecedented advances in wealth, population, intelligence, and concord; while all the arbitrary governments of the old world have been overrun with bankruptcies, conspiracies, rebellions, and revolutions; and are, at this moment, trembling in the consciousness of their insecurity, and vainly endeavoring to repress irrepressible discontents, by confederated violence and terror."

The Tuilleries. A Tale. By the author of "Hungarian Tales," "Romances of Real Life," &c. &c. 2 vols. 12mo. pp. 232, 228. New-York, J. & J. Harper. 1831.

These volumes are published to-day. They are from an author of reputation, whose former works have been favorably received. The "Tuilleries" is a great subject, to which a German imagination could not impart any exaggerated horrors. It contains several scenes, depicted with power, and will serve to bring more vividly before the eyes of all, who have regarded the events of the period only in their historical relations, the dreadful anguish which they must have reflected upon the paths of domestic life. The author has closely adhered to truth in many instances, where, indeed, the truth is more intensely interesting than fiction could ever be. As the book is yet damp from the press, and has scarcely found its way abroad, the reader will pardon a brief extract. It pictures the character of those self-denominated tribunals of justice which were instituted under unhappy France, for the perpetration of the most atrocious butcheries, in open day-light, and under the sanction of law. The blood curdles at the recollection of that gloomy stain upon the history of human nature.

"The spectators, both male and female, assembled in the tribunal-hall at Arras, although of a somewhat different order from the factious idlers of Paris, were by no means secondary in ferocity of purpose. They were prepared by the exordium of the new commissioner to witness a liberal outpouring of blood;—they had already accustomed themselves to the spectacle of such an effusion, and considered themselves ill used if defrauded of this habitual recreation. The sanguinary Lebon, whose age, and aspect, and profession accorded strangely with the monstrous atrocities of his official proceedings,—had been careful to select for the revolutionary committee delegated under his authority, men branded with the infamy of their previous courses of life, and capable of all excesses in the execution of their revolutionary duties. Yet in more than one instance, when even these notorious ruffians hesitated in the condemnation of an innocent person, the wretched prisoner was brought back from his dungeon to the bar of the tribunal, while the president in a violent harangue to the court announced that the first member convicted of modérantisme should be instantly dragged to the guillotine. And thus mercy became a forgotten word,—an unknown hope,—under his jurisdiction! and Camille Valazy, when on entering the gallery he cast a shuddering glance on the four prisoners standing within the bar, perceived at once in their countenances the heavy and impassive expression of utter despair!

"The individual immediately on trial was a rich merchant of Cambray; whose prosperity and opulence sufficed to draw upon him the enmity of the jacobin party of his native city. He was accused,—like the respectable and unfortunate citizens who had already illustrated by their condemnation the despotism exercised at Bourdeaux by Tallien and Isabeau,—of belonging to the mercantile aristocracy,—a crime newly invented by the convention;—of having amassed his riches by monopoly, and a usurious use of his capital;—and finally, of having openly inveighed against the law of maximum. It was in vain that the agitated and bewildered prisoner implored his judges to discriminate between pernicious monopoly and the right of warehousing, (emmagasinement) so essential to the course of commercial exchange. He was cut short in his defence as prolix and importunate, and condemned almost unheard! Dragged without ceremony from the hall, his place at the bar was immediately occupied by a young woman holding an infant in her arms, apparently a simple peasant of the province of Artois.

"As she held up her head to cast a glance of appeal towards the committee, the sinister countenances which met her view penetrated the trembling mother with such a thrill of despair, that with an involuntary movement she folded her child more closely to her bosom, and held it there for a moment, as if to guard its innocent life and her own by that mighty and protecting union of natural affections;—as if the interposition of heaven must necessarily await the helplessness of a mother sorrowing over her babe.

"To the accusation recorded against her,—which was simply that of having aided a correspondence between her former seigneur, a ci-devant noble under sentence of death, and his wife and daughter,—the poor woman pleaded guilty;—on the instigation of her counsel, that to throw herself on the mercy of the court might possibly procure a remission of her sentence—an opinion justified by the leniency marked towards her in the interrogations of several of the members. But Lebon was not prepared to see a single victim escape from the army of martyrs, with whose names he promised himself to swell the list of his services to the convention. Having applied to his tablets for the private information with which he had provided himself relative to the accused, he assumed that artificial smile characterizing the plausibility and hypocrisy of the neophytes of Robespierre, and proceeded to cross-examine the artless prisoner; demanding of her, among other things, whether she had not adorned herself in her holiday attire on a certain Sunday, and secretly confessed herself to an unconstitutional priest, who was known to be living in concealment in some village in the neighborhood of Arras?—The woman was put on her oath, and the question reiterated by one of the committee; but the prisoner only turned pale and shuddered, without venturing to deny the truth of the charge.

"Answer me! credulous idiot!" cried Lebon, with a torrent of blasphemous invectives: "The court waits your reply."

"If your lordships would consider—"

"Fool! remember that you are addressing simple citizens of the French republic.—Have you or have you not assisted in the forbidden solemnities treasonably celebrated by a priest in unconstitutional orders?"

"I have!" faltered the trembling creature; and her affirmative was instantly drowned in a vociferous sentence of—DEATH!

"But my child,—my helpless child!" shrieked the terrified mother, straining her infant in her arms, as the soldiers presented themselves to drag her away. "You will not surely murder my innocent child,

—my poor, tender, friendless babe! My husband,—my family,—all have perished who could protect it!"

"A general shudder affected the better class of the spectators, as the savage men by whom she was surrounded attempted to tear the little creature from its mother's grasp.

"Will no merciful woman here present receive it from me?" cried the frantic prisoner, extending her arms towards the audience. "Will no one purchase the fervent blessings of a dying woman?"

"A young and very beautiful girl, seated near the prisoner behind the bar, involuntarily rose on this appeal, and moved towards the unfortunate mother; when the scornful laugh of the assembly recalled to her remembrance her own predicament; and, abashed and distressed, she covered back behind an old man who was also numbered among the prisoners waiting their turn of summons,—and who whispered, loud enough to be heard by Camille, 'For pity's sake, Euphrosine,—meddle not with what so little concerns you. Consult your own dignity, child;—be silent,—wait your turn; and do not aggravate our danger by further temerity.'

"Take the urchin from its mother," cried Lebon, irritated by all this delay, "and toss it into the lime-pit with her dead body. Away with them both!—away with them! We have no leisure to institute a nursery for the bantlings of refractory royalists."

"This iniquitous sentence was instantly obeyed; and the hideous heart-piercing scream uttered by the mother as they tore the little victim from her arms, froze within their bosoms the hearts of many of the audience who wanted courage to betray their emotions, and who, by this seeming concurrence, led the way to those final atrocities of Lebon, which penetrated even into their own homes;—such, for instance, as the condemnation enforced on a miserable woman of lying for hours beneath the guillotine, with the life-blood of a beloved husband dropping on her face."*

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—In a letter already published in your journal, I have expressed the interest with which I watch the rapid strides of fashion among the higher circles of our country. I have also ventured to hope that the simplicity becoming a republican people, may never, among us, be superseded by the heartlessness, the prodigal splendor, and the reckless pursuit of mere sensual gratifications, which mark older, and, perhaps, more polished nations. These observations are intended to apply particularly to females. It is they who, in the corruption of a people, are first corrupted—it is they who, through their children, sway the character of the rising generation, and make us what we are. You may ask, "wherefore this solicitude?—what have you to fear?" I am a plain writer, Messrs. Editors, and will tell you my meaning, without any attempt at eloquence or elegant composition. I fear that, even now, our females, the best, the richest, the most beautiful and amiable of them are aspiring more to fashionable distinction, than to domestic peace. They educate themselves for belles and lovers; they forget that they will become mothers and wives. I thought very differently, at one period, upon this subject; and, when in the hey-day of youth, looked upon these kind of essays as tedious affairs, and all advisers as homely intruders. I have now lived to see the truth of much at which I then sneered; and to acknowledge the utter fallacy and worthlessness of much which I then valued, nay, worshipped. These ideas were called up by the sight of the melancholy of an esteemed young gentleman of my acquaintance, who has positively sacrificed himself to a graceful, accomplished, and extremely beautiful young girl, who is in fact as silly and shallow a little piece of pretty affectation as could possibly mince along Broadway, and flutter like a butterfly about the haunts of gaiety and fashion. I confess there is something in her lovely face from which you might expect a better character. But alas! neither her mind nor her feelings have ever been cultivated; and when she has danced for you—run her white fingers over the ivory keys of the piano—sung a song—put out her irresistible little foot upon the ottoman, and shown the pearly treasures which gleam through her pouting lips, you get tired of her as you do of one piece of music, or any one unchangeable thing which has nothing but outside to recommend it. My friend was fairly ensnared at first sight. Nothing could curb his passion. He had fortune, which he laid at her feet with his deluded self, and started off forthwith to the Springs, the happiest of human beings. He has just returned, and they are spending a few weeks with me. Poor Charles! I pity him from my soul. They are at this moment in the adjoining parlor. I see them through the folding doors. Look! She is certainly a beautiful creature; and brides (I never could tell the reason) always look doubly charming. He has found a passage in Moore. Some thought of his own, perhaps, dressed up in the dainty illustration of the poet. He calls her. She is measuring the carpet with her graceful steps, and marking off the distance with her foot—the pretty kitten. Listen.

"Sophia—look at this, Sophia. Here is the very verse of Moore's which I could not remember last night."

"Oh, hang Moore," she answers. "I hate poetry—I hate books."

"Well, with all my heart," says the good-natured husband; "then let's have some music."

"Oh, music, Charles! One gets sick of music at home. It's well enough at a party, but I am tired to death of the piano."

"Well! will you ride—or walk—or talk?"

"Talk, Charles! why what shall we talk about? It's too dusty to ride—and after dancing all night, one cannot walk you know."

"Well, I'll walk alone then."

Charles takes his hat with a gloomy look, and wends his way towards the mansion of a friend. They were at the theatre till late last evening. They will probably be there to-night. What charms has a silly, spoiled, and ignorant wife to offer to a poet, a student, a liberal, fine-minded, and yet sensitive and impetuous man, against Cinderella, and the society of a talented companion? Poor souls! I scarcely know which I pity most—the wretched belle who will soon see herself divested of every thing like influence over her partner, or the cooled and disappointed husband, who finds he has been cheated by a mask into endless slavery; for it depends on the wife whether the state of matrimony be considered a paradise or a dungeon. The idea of a female's attaching an inordinate value to her personal appearance, while she overlooks that of mental accomplishments, is well ridiculed in the following morceau which I lately met with in the London Court Journal. It reminds me of a few observations of Steele, which, as they are much in point, I will prefix to the account.

"Since our persons are not of our own making, when they are such as appear defective or uncomely, it is, methinks, an honest and laudable fortitude to dare to be ugly; at least to keep ourselves from being abashed with a consciousness of imperfections which we cannot help, and in which there is no guilt. I would not defend an haggard beau, for passing away much time at a glass, and giving softness and languishing graces to deformity: all I intend is, that we ought to be contented with our own countenance and shape, so far as never to give ourselves an uneasy reflection on that subject. It is to the ordinary people, who are not accustomed to make very proper remarks on any occasion, matter of great jest, if a man enters with a prominent pair of shoulders into an assembly, or is distinguished by an expansion of mouth, or obliquity of aspect. It is happy for a man that has any of these oddities about him, if he can be as merry upon himself, as others are apt to be upon that occasion. When he can possess himself with such a cheerfulness, women and children, who are at first frightened at him, will afterwards be as much pleased with him. As it is barbarous in others to rally him for natural defects, it is extremely agreeable when he can jest upon himself for them."

Notwithstanding there is so much truth and good sense in these remarks, few persons, and especially females, have the great moral courage to act up to them, although this quality of the mind may be ranked above the corporeal bravery of the soldier.

THE CROAKINGS OF A DOWAGER BEAUTY.

"My life is fallen into the sear and yellow leaf."

"So," said the dowager countess of Matton to her friend, Mrs. Gelatine, as her ancient bays and antediluvian coach waddled and jolted round the ring in Hyde-park, between dinner and tea, a few mornings ago; "so I find that my grand-daughter Lady Warcister's picture has been engraved, and that she is called in the print-shops 'the beauty of the house of Matton!'"

"A very lovely young creature, indeed, my lady; quite the belle of the day."

"Humph! all nonsense! mere stuff! I remember that was what they used to say of me fifty years ago."

"No one has forgotten it, my lady; all the world is struck by the resemblance between Lady Warcister at five and twenty and your ladyship at eighteen. The same eye-brows to a hair! just what our friend, the reverend Dr. Fuzbos, called the 'twin reflections of Diana's bow!'"

"That was very prettily said of the doctor; almost equal to the sonnet penned by Jerminham on my first appearance at court."

"And Merry, if I recollect, struck out some very elegant stanzas on the same interesting subject."

"Ah, Gelatine! few of the Della Crusicans but said something about me. They used to call me Alcibella in their verses. But, heaven knows, I thought very little of their praises in those days! for, after all, it was only the twittering of sparrows after the song of the nightingale. Fitzpatrick had already penned in my honor those charming lines—

"Were she but fair as hours when they wait,
Dark-eyed and soft, at the immortal gate!"

Bless my soul! nobody writes in that style now."

"And your ladyship forgets Sheridan's epigram?"

"And Hare's bon-mot."

"Ah! my dear Lady Matton! nobody talks in that style now-a-days. Nothing but political squibs and lampoons are the order of the day!"

"In fact," my dear Gelatine, "there is so much of every thing in these times, that nothing makes so much sensation as it formerly did—beauty, wit, talent, luxury, taste—on every side the million press so closely upon us—the little world has forced its pretensions so strangely upon the acceptance of the great world—that it is very difficult for any person to become really distinguished."

"Very true, my lady."

"Whereas, in my day, half-a-dozen beauties, half-a-dozen beaux ceprits, and half-a-dozen givers of fêtes regulated the ton of London."

"The influence of the court was then so considerable, that, like Gulliver in Lilliput, it imparted a character of pigmyism to the rest of society. Among such minnows it was less difficult to be a triton."

"After all, to what amounts my grand-daughter Warcister's fame as a belle? What fashion, what carriage, what whim of the day was ever called a Warcister? The utmost praise she receives consists of 'Lady Warcister looked very well at the last drawing-room,' or, 'Lady Warcister is one of the prettiest women in the circle of the opera—only she dresses too much in the extreme of the French fashion; or, 'Lady W. did not look amiss at Almack's—but she should not waltz in a hat and feathers.' Now, in my time, my dear Gelatine, in those madcap days when the prince took off my white satin slipper, filled it with Burgundy, and drank it off in my honor—there were Matton phaetons, and Matton fly-caps—Matton ponies, and Matton negligés—Matton footstools, and Matton hammercloths. Books, songs, operas, sermons, sonnets, were dedicated to the divine Lady Matton. Whenever Lady Matton's equipage appeared in the ring, there was as great a crush as on the occasion of the Don Cossack's first gallop round Hyde-park. Townsend always considered it his duty to allow me a runner for my sedan to the drawing-room; and Taylor of the opera was obliged to take precautions for the dispersion of the crowd that used to assemble in Fop's alley under my box. One never hears of so many as two or three gathered together in honor of any fashionable beauty now-a-days."

"No Lady Coventry, nothing to compare with Isabella duchess of Rutland, Georgiana duchess of Devonshire, or Lady William Gordon, or —"

"Pardon me, my good Gelatine, pardon me! For the duchess of Rutland we have her lovely grand-daughters, Lady Chesterfield and Mrs. Anson; and my friend the duchess of Devonshire, whose fascinations depended very little on the beauty of her face, is fully rivalled by Lady Gower and Lady Georgiana. I admit that there may be as many handsome faces in the days of William the fourth as in those of George the third, but they do not produce half the sensation,

"Where none admire, 'tis useless to excel;
Where none are beaux, 'tis vain to be a belle."

"The utmost tribute bestowed on these said belles of the new century is to name a horse, a dog, or a yacht in their honor. When Count St. Antonio first visited Yorkshire, he found a horse entered for the St. Leger as 'La San Catalda,' the name of his own beautiful sister, and was about to resent the affront, when the Sicilian noble was informed that such a mark of favoritism was intended as a signal proof of homage by the English noble to whose stud the racer belonged."

"Ah! Gelatine! how different were the proofs of devotion tendered to myself! If I had but a cold, Arlington-street was crowded with inquirers, to the imminent danger of every pannel in every fashionable equipage in London; and once, when my vis-à-vis was overturned, in coming from Pacchierotti's concert, for full ten days I was obliged to have bulletins issued by old Warren and Sir Walter Farquhar."

"There is not a beauty of the year 1831 but might break every bone in her skin without any such necessity."

"And again, when I accidentally burnt off my side curls on one temple, and appeared at St. James's with a bouquet of pearls to supply their place, Constable the jeweller was employed to make two hundred and ninety-three ornaments exactly similar, in the course of the following week; and before the close of the season every woman in London had cut short the ringlets over her left eyebrow! Ah! ces beaux jours de fête sont passés!"

"Your ladyship does not consider that your ladyship's influence —"

"Would not suffice to introduce a new collar for puppy dogs!"

Ah! Gelatine! It was a hard trial when the first symptoms of the crow's-foot revealed by one of those clear bright mornings in June, which no blemish can escape, told me the frightful tale that my kingdom was taken from me! I was going to the drawing-room; no friendly bonnet, no kindly frill was there to overshadow the fatal fact; it defied Goliath; pearl-powder was mere powder of post in its removal! For many nights I was kept sleepless by the excruciating discovery; and want of rest, and fretting, and fruitless repining over the past, only tended to accelerate the progress of premature old age. I tried Bath, I attempted the Harrowgate, Boston, Cheltenham, Malvern, Spa, Pyrmont, Barège, Bagnères, Plombières, Emma, and Carlsbad waters, in hopes of experiencing some renovating magic, but all without success! Not a cosmetic was advertised but I put it to the proof; not a fashionable quack assisted the depopulation of the west end but I gave a fair trial to his nostrums. Every year was signalized by some further misfortune; by an increase of hoary hairs, or a decrease of pearly teeth; my locks grew white, my enamels black! I tried succedaneum, I attempted vegetable dye, wore plumpers, or semi-billiard balls, in my hollow cheeks; slept with plaitain-leaves on my nose to keep it white, and a balsamic poultice to my face to render it fresh and blooming. At the opera I turned my white shoulders to the audience, and my withering visage towards the shadowy side of the box, and no longer ventured to encounter the stare of the ring, unless through the qualifying medium of a blonde veil! Ah! Gelatine! I soon discovered that had my vis-à-vis been shipwrecked a second time, and my neck broken, a bulletin would have been wholly superfluous!"

"Your ladyship's —! My dear Lady Matton, pray compose yourself!"

"Year after year I changed my mantuamaker, season after season threw myself on the mercy of some new milliner. I thickened the substance of the Holland blinds of my drawing-room, varied the tint of my carriage-linings, and deepened the shade of my rouge. I migrated from the pit-circle to the third tier at the opera; chose a box in discreet equidistance between the chandeliers; but all in vain! Ugliness pursued me like a shadow, old age croaked after me like an echo. Draughts of air and open doors drove my rheumatic joints from the ball-room, a red nose from the dinner-table, wrinkles and white-lead from daylight, somnolency and decrepitude from candlelight! And lo! I am here! I, the once worshipped beauty of the park, am humdrumming my afternoon, airing with a companion and a lapdog —"

"Your ladyship's pocket-handkerchief! My dearest Lady Matton, pray compose yourself!"

"Look at Lady Wycombe!" muttered the weeping dowager from behind the folds of a cambric, ministered to her use by Mrs. Gelatine; "look at Lady Wycombe; that was her chariot which just rolled by! What has she to render her discontented with the progress of time. She was a fright from her birth—her minuet never gave rise to an ode—her marriage to a felo-de-se. Nobody ever cared whether she was sick or sorry; and she is as much an object of interest now, in her old gray bonnet and mode cloak, as during the riots of eighty; while I—oh! Gelatine! Gelatine!—why was I ever born a beauty?"

"Coachman! drive home! Her ladyship is in a swoon!"

I sincerely trust our fair countrywomen will so enrich their minds and develop their affections, as to be able to meet age with the agreeable conviction, that it has only added to their means of giving pleasure to others. If there be any melancholy in the reflection that years are gradually robbing them of personal charms, it is doubly humiliating when accompanied by the consciousness that they possess no inward qualities to relieve the suddenness of their descent from the glare of public admiration to the gloom of unpitied neglect.

SAD RECOLLECTIONS.

NATURE formed me for happiness. My bosom is yearning for it always. I would still believe bright things to be what they seem. Philosophy, prudence, worldly wisdom, the faculty of guarding against the thrills of first impressions, that sweep over you sometimes, and of watching for deceit among the pure, and anguish among the happy beings of the world; they are all a labor, a low and poor occupation, and I detest them. In my livelier moments I had rather live in a pleasant hope, or cherish the joy of secret affection, dreams as they may be, than wake to truth and gloom. I wish I might be always so. I wish the influences of society might spare to me some of youth's confiding hope, some of its sanguine trust in persons and events, and its ignorance how joy and anguish, virtue and vice are linked together indissolubly in the chains which fasten down the desires of man to earth. My soul sinks within me sometimes, to think that this can never be, that the spell which cast a radiance around the child's forehead cannot be regained, and the shadow of a darker influence falls on me often; I tremble ever for the spirit of a young boy that waves, like a graceful tree, with all its bursting blossoms, to think how fearfully it may be scathed with the lightnings which are ever falling on our race; how the gnawing worm may prey upon its blooming honors; how the sleet and wintry wind will one day sigh through its naked branches. Do not look upon me, reader fair, as a dark-dispositioned intruder; mine is not a curdled spirit. I tell ye not of these things to mar your mirth. He who wantonly checks a smile is an enemy to nature. I will go out with you to the scented woods and meadows, and startle the silent places with laughter: or press through the dazzling throng of fashion, and forget myself in the revel till you shall think me a very boy for irrepressible merriment. There is no sunshine so delightful as that which streams through the rift of a parting cloud; but, even in the midst of pleasure's dominions, will ever and anon steal in the memory of some new grave, the tone of a dying voice, or the image of a gentle head absent from the group; and then gaunt, cold reflection stalks in with her overshadowed glass, and dim future years break upon the startled vision; when the silver words of every light young girl are hushed, and instead of the glowing groups of sweet happy belles, I shudder over the serious faces of the dead, and hear the fall of the shovelled pebbly clay over those gently-heaving bosoms. When the mood is on me, I wonder how beings with eyes can yield themselves so recklessly to calm enjoyment, while sleepless death is for ever lancing his bolt into some bosom; when they see every day some one struck down, like warriors in a battle. I admire the frivolous sources from which the crowds draw their delight. If the tyrant could be rendered palpable; if I could conjure his ghastly and gigantic apparition in its grisly terror, that he could be seen by all, selecting each victim, and hurling each bolt with a crash of thunder upon the theatre, the brilliant ball, or the party, how it would blanch the cheek of beauty, and appal the heart of manhood; how the undaunted spirit of the ambitious would be quelled; into what an universal silence and deep awe would be hushed the merry habitants of this thronged city, all shrinking, and trembling, and gazing aghast at the grim spectre. Benevolent nature has shrouded his form in a cloud, and his weapon glides silently to its mark; but still he strides among us, triumphant over every feeble attempt to oppose his progress. I behold his victims fall: I feel the presence of the dreadful monster. Perhaps even now his malignant eye has singled me out, and his unerring hand grasps the fatal dart.

Yet, after all, the fear of death to myself is less hideous than the agony of losing others. It has been my lot to suffer much from this cause. I have riveted my very soul upon glazed eyes, while the curious mystery of life was leaving the chamber within tenanted. I have thrilled with an agony of intense feeling to accompany the beloved to the awful gates of eternity; felt the convulsive grasp of the wasted hand, and thrilled with the deep parting look cast upon me from its threshold, as the portals closed, leaving the dead to pursue onward his lonely flight, and shutting me back for a little longer period into this poor earthly dungeon.

I remember how the first shock of this kind chilled my soul. I was in the habit of visiting with my father the splendid seat of a friend, a day's ride from the city. The gentleman was wont to receive us with a welcome truly hospitable. He was of a right merry disposition himself, loved all kinds of sport, would take a bird on the wing with unerring precision, kept a superb fishing-boat, in which whole parties of us were wont to scud over the ample Sound, to the great dissatisfaction of our finny friends below. His horses also were princely; his carriages seemed to go on wings rather than wheels; and lastly, (I was a mere boy, eleven or twelve or thirteen, it might be,) there was a girl, his daughter, fifteen years of age, and in my eyes a vision of beauty so rare and enchanting that—I need not explain. She had one of those kind of faces which makes every object bright in its presence, every thing dim and insipid when it vanishes. A perfect, soft-complexioned creature, with a fine forehead, a mouth like ripe fruit, and such eyes—blue, like the depths of the summer heavens. When she looked suddenly up, they went through you like an arrow. The whole contour of her head was perfectly classical. She wore her hair short behind, a new fashion which Clara Fisher has since confirmed; it was parted on her forehead, and brushed around her temples like a boy's. A glowing Narcissus—who would not be the stream? But mere beauty, however striking and exquisite, is nothing to me without other graces. She had them all, with a kind of voice which belongs to the highest quality of female character, and generally to the most perfectly moulded person, modulated to express every shade of thought and feeling. I think such a tone would quell me if I had my fingers on the throat of Miguel—would soothe me with gentle pleasure in the convulsive tortures of death. Her image glitters through my memory like sunshine through the clouds and tears of after times. I bade her good-by one day, with a more than ordinary delight. We had been with the good people on a fishing excursion. We started together, and sat together all day beneath the ample awning. The rest were soon fully engaged in baiting hooks, watching doblers, and drawing up the trembling creatures with their gorgeous hues. They were all unusually successful but Anna and myself. Few fish we caught. I did nothing in the way but help her to drag up a single bass, which had swallowed the hook, and pulled the cork a foot under water before either of us saw it. On our walk home the exercise and air had excited us both. I trod over the grassy fields with a firm and fearless step. The blood was bubbling in my veins. I never had been so completely and exquisitely happy since nature formed me; and the very melancholy tenderness with which, in a tremulous tone, I spoke of the necessity of leaving her on the morrow, with her reply, had a dreamy delight in it I have never since experienced. We lingered behind the rest. I knelt at her feet to pick flowers; I fixed them in her hair with my own fingers, trembling at my audacious temerity in touching the brow I had hitherto scarcely dared to dream of. I took her hand in mine as we walked, to help her over a fence, and resigned it not when the occasion no longer required my assistance; till at length, under the pretence of smelling a wild rose, which I had just fastened beneath her bonnet, our mouths accidentally came so near each other, that her breath fell on my cheek like the fragrance of honeysuckles, and the touch of her lips was softer than rose-leaves, dewy rose-leaves, in the gentlest morning of June.

It was many weeks before I visited her father's house again, and in the meantime I had heard that she was sick. It gave me little uneasiness. I had never seen death, and knew or thought little of his inexorable power. The idea of losing her, of that happy and radiant creature, so full of joy and mirth, at the close of her existence; the enchantment of those azure eyes shrouded beneath stiffening lids; that mouth, that honey mouth, stilled in icy death; that beautiful, bright, young head in a coffin, was too absolutely hideous to be within the reach of fancy.

My father proposed suddenly to visit his friend, and expressed some fears about the girl; but I heeded them so little that I had even purchased a neat volume of poetry and a set of merry plates, and had arranged a thousand things for her information and pleasure.

When we reached the spacious mansion the servant came out with inflamed eyes, and took the horse in silence.

"How is she, John?" said my father, who had been unusually gloomy during the whole ride.

"Gone, sir," answered the man.

I have frequently since wondered at the obtuseness, I might call it absolute stupidity, with which I overlooked the truth among all these dark and ominous presages. But I positively wondered to myself "where" she could have gone; and why all this extraordinary stillness everywhere? It was not till we entered the large hall, were shown up stairs by the maid, and I caught a glimpse of the group in the darkened chamber, that the truth burst on me like a thunder-bolt. The whole family and servants were standing in a circle, gazing on a motionless object upon the bed. Nothing was heard, but ever and anon a long-drawn breath, or a broken, half-smothered sigh. I was thrilling with horror in every nerve of my body. I gazed till all human things else were as nothing. There was not the slightest approach to moisture in my eyes. I was chilled, frozen, petrified into marble; with no thought, no recollection, no hope; nothing but a benumbed consciousness, a leaden, despairing, nightmare conviction that the exquisitely beautiful, cold, fixed, sleeping creature before me was the dead body of Anna. The silence of all as we looked was absolutely terrific. The father gazed and gazed on the features, the pale forehead, the closed eyes, the mouth—where the smile of an ever-joyous soul had yet left its impress—and the deathly white of the linen which bound up the chin. The sluices of my soul were not unlocked till he burst forth into an agony of uncontrollable grief. The tears gushed from his eyes in very torrents; his quivering lips betrayed the heavy workings of memory, of grief, of despair in his laboring heart; and he exclaimed, in a voice that made me drop my head and bury my face in the clothing of the bed, "I cannot bear it, I cannot bear it; my child, my child!"

He took the unconscious image to his bosom; he grasped the waxen unanswering hands; he kissed the cold dead lips; and as their icy chill struck upon his heart, he fell like a lump of clay at full length upon the floor.

I would keep children of vivid imaginations away from such scenes. They leave a shadow that never grows bright. They startle the young soul with a premature knowledge of horrors too monstrous even for the hacknied breast of age. The sight of death, and the consequent distress, are always, prostrating, melancholy, and awful. The passions ebb from their channel; ambition, hope, industry, love, all are palsied with the electric shock, and man turns to his earthly duties with a dimmed and humbled spirit; abashed, frightened, bewildered. It may be well enough to fling these influences over the stubborn interests, the up-rearing passions, the towering matured ambition of manhood, but youth is too tender for the blast. It is like letting loose the bitterest wind of winter upon early buds and tender blossoms. I have seen dispositions so cowed down by such sights that they were old at twenty. Mother, who bendest over thy bright boy's slumber, wish that death itself may rather clasp the cherished sleeper, than that the terror of it shall enter his living bosom.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

ALTHOUGH the following poem has been frequently copied, the sense has been so often marred by typographical errors, that we make room for it here, among other selections. The "History of the Alphabet" seems to be less generally known. The author will excuse us for giving these pieces to our readers in his absence.

THE DYING ALCHEMIST.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

The night-wind with a desolate moan swept by,
And the old shutters of the turret swung
Screaming upon their hinges, and the moon,
As the torn edges of the clouds flew past,
Struggled against the strained and broken panes
So dimly, that the watchful eye of death
Scarcely was conscious when it went and came.

The fire beneath his crucible was low;
Yet still it burned, and ever as his thoughts
Grew insupportable, he raised himself
Upon his wasted arm, and stirred the coals
With difficult energy; and when the rod
Fell from his nerveless fingers, and his eye
Felt faint within its socket, he shrunk back
Upon his pallet, and with unclosed lips
Muttered a curse on death! The silent room
From its dim corners mockingly gave back
His rattling breath; the humming in the fire
Had the distinctness of a knell, and when Duly the antique horologe beat one,
He drew a phial from beneath his head,
And drank. And instantly his lips compressed,
And with a shudder in his skeleton frame,
He rose with supernatural strength, and sat
Upright, and communed with himself:

I did not think to die
Till I had finished what I had to do;
I thought to pierce th' eternal secret through
With this my mortal eye;
I felt—oh God! it seemeth even now
This cannot be the death-dew on my brow.

And yet it is. I feel
Of this dull sickness at my heart afraid;
And in my eyes the death-sparks flash and fade;
And something seems to steal
Over my bosom like a frozen hand,
Binding its pulses with an icy band.

And this is death! But why
Feel I this wild recoil? It cannot be
Th' immortal spirit shuddereth to be free!

Would it not leap to fly,
Like a chained eagle at its parent's call?
I fear—I fear that this poor life is all!

Yet thus to pass away!
To live but for a hope that mocks at last—
To agonize, to strive, to watch, to fast,
To waste the light of day,
Night's better beauty, feeling, fancy, thought,
All that we have and are—for this—for nought!

Grant me another year,
God of my spirit! but a day—to win
Something to satisfy this thirst within!
I would know something here!
Break for me but one seal that is unbroken!
Speak for me but one word that is unspoken!

Vain—vain!—my brain is turning
With a swift dizziness, and my heart grows sick,
And these hot temple-throbs come fast and thick,
And I am freezing—burning—
Dying! Oh God! if I might only live!
My phial. Ha! it thrills me—I revive.

Ay—were not man to die
He were too glorious for this narrow sphere.
Had he but time to brood on knowledge here—
Could he but train his eye—
Might he but wait the mystic word and hour—
Only his Maker would transcend his power!

Earth has no mineral strange—
Th' illimitable air no hidden things—
Water no quality in its covert springs,
And fire no power to change—
Seasons no mystery, and stars no spell,
Which the unwasting soul might not compel.

Oh, but for time to track
The upper stars into the pathless sky—
To see th' invisible spirits, eye to eye—
To hurl the lightning back—
To tread unhurt the sea's dim-lighted halls—
To chase day's chariot to the horizon walls—

And more, much more—for now
The life-sealed fountains of my nature move—
To nurse and purify this human love—
To clear the god-like brow
Of weakness and mistrust, and bow it down,
Worthy and beautiful, to the much-loved one—

This were indeed to feel
The soul-thirst slacken at the living stream—
To live—oh God! that life is but a dream!
And death. Aha! I reel—
Dim—dim! I faint—darkness comes o'er my eye—
Cover me! save me! God of heaven! I die!
'Twas morning, and the old man lay alone—
No friend had closed his eyelids, and his lips,
Open and ashy pale, th' expression wore
Of his death-struggle. His long silvery hair
Lay on his hollow temples thin and wild.

His frame was wasted, and his features wan
And haggard as with want, and in his palm
His nails were driven deep, as if the throes
Of the last agony had rung him sore.

The storm was raging still. The shutters swung
Screaming as harshly in the fitful wind,
And all without went on—as aye it will—
Sunshine or tempest, reckless that a heart
Is breaking, or has broken in its change.

The fire beneath the crucible was out;
The vessels of his mystic art lay round,
Useless and cold as the ambitious hand
That fashioned them, and the small silver rod,
Familiar to his touch for threescore years,
Lay on th' alembic's rim, as if it yet

Might vex the elements at its master's will.
And thus had passed from its unequal frame
A soul of fire—a sun-bent eagle stricken
From his high soaring compass—an instrument
Broken with its own compass. He was born
Taller than a spirit walked beneath the stars;
And with he might tempted like a god's,
He was sent blindfold on a path of light,
And turned aside and perished! Oh how poor
Seems the rich gift of genius, when it lies,
Like the adventurous bird that hath out-flown
His strength upon the sea, ambition-wrecked—
A thing the thrush might pity, as she sits
Brooding in quiet on her lowly nest.

THE HISTORY OF THE ALPHABET.*

BY THE SAME.

It was a lazy, good-for-nothing afternoon in the spring season, when I sauntered, according to my usual wont, into the shop of one of the chief publishers in our modern Athens. It had been my custom for many years to seek this as a sort of literary lounging-place, where I could enjoy the delight of running over new titles, and rustling my fingers through new books just from the press. I had long before confessed myself utterly unable to buy my reading, and at the same time declared how completely I was cursed with a propensity to devour everything that came out.

"It is a disease with me," said I, plaintively—and, accordingly, in view of my resources, and then of my constitutional predicament, they very kindly gave me the freedom of the whole shop. I was to go in and out, and through it, like an owner.

I used to pitch like a horse upon the 'last novels,' and, as at such times, we are frequently guilty of a long sederunt, the boy who ran for the customers—a good-natured lad—had, in a sort of insensible way, planned out a little retreat for me, away in the futurity of the establishment, where, in a solitary chair, and with a compendious table before me, I could read undisturbed, and, if need was, think as secretly and independently as a prince. I suppose I was looked on as a part of the furniture of the place; but I cared little for the reputation in which I was held on that score; if I could only anticipate the circulating libraries, and enjoy my books in this cheap and comfortable way.

On the day I have mentioned, I swung in as usual, passing by scores of sweet belles at the counters, and casting my eye in the accustomed place, descried a new volume, in a blue linen back, soliciting observation. Without stopping, I grasped it silently, and made forward to my adyta, with the ease and manner of a master. It was Almacks—a new novel. As it had then just issued, and as I had heard, moreover, that there had been some fashionable brouillerie about obtaining it, I sat down with the determination of being supremely amused, and of enjoying an innocent laugh at the gay fooleries of the fools of Babylon.

As I read on and still onward, the hours slipped away, the shop was deserted, the light grew dim, and the book grew dull, until—joy to a happy digestion—I fell asleep with the volume between my knees, and my chin in my bosom. How long I remained in this state it is difficult to tell, but I was roused by a strong light, that seemed to flash all about me. I was just on the eve of crying fire, when I perceived it would be of no avail, as I was decidedly locked up, and I should naturally be taken for the incendiary, if I was found here in the midst of matters. I therefore determined to burn rather than suffer shame.

But in the midst of this singular train of thought, I became more fully awake, and confident, at last, that the light was too phosphoric for a conflagration. Directing my eyes to the counter, on the amplest part of which the illumination seemed to pour, my astonishment was complete.

Scattered over the superficies, that you might easily imagine a piece of brilliant green sward, or a billiard table, or the council-board (saving the color) of the Ladies Patronesses at Willis's rooms—scattered, I say, over this surface, and moving to and fro with all the non-chalance of old pedestrians, were to be seen the venerable twenty-six letters of the alphabet, in Roman capitals! Whence the power of locomotion, I was in trouble to tell, for I saw neither legs nor pinions. There was nothing like a face about any of them, yet they all seemed to have an expression. It was evidently midnight, for the carriages had done rattling. Easy was it, therefore, to hear the clear, silver-toned little voices that rung round the tapis, as these important personages met in this wide and beautiful field, on their descent from the bookshelves. I could not but pass particular observation upon some of the queer company as they marched in review. The bare idea was the most amusing imaginable. The alphabet at an airing! The Roman letters coming in good earnest out of folios, and octavos, and duodecimos to hold a conversazione on the counter! The little essences of our language sporting and chatting upon the place of shambles, where they are every day sold, dumb and innocent by the hundreds! The capitals at conference! The A B C's at a social party!

First, there was A, a tall fellow, moving about 'as if he had gyves on,' and anon poisoning himself on his head, like a mad-cap, so glad at his liberty! mocking and laughing all the time at V, who stalked sullenly at his side. There was B, like a large man in a drowsy, suddenly along in simple wonder at everything he saw about him, and S shooting away like a swan, and hissing at everything in his wake. Q flaunting his tail among the gentry, and X practising with his legs, as though he were determined to outdo the figurantes. Indeed, it appeared to be high holiday with the singular creatures, and I know not how long they would have continued their antics had not A called all hands to order, and requested and-per-se, who acted as a sort of whipper-in, to collect the scattering, that each might tell to his fellows his history after his own way. "For," said he, "we have long enough been placed beside each other without much acquaintance, like slaves whose silence has been equalled only by their labor. Let us each tell his little story; and to that effect I advise ye all, saving O, and such round-about bodies, to whom it may not be permitted, to stretch out yourselves on this green carpet and each relate according to his standing. Wherefore, methinks, I can't do better than begin. And, my friends, it seems perfectly correct to premise, that there is a vital mistake in attributing our invention or introduction among any people under the sun, to Master Cadmus, and we treat with proper contempt any part of profane history that goes to disprove the idea of our self-invention and total originality. Our brother C, who was the very making of Cadmus, can testify to this foolish falsehood, and it is therefore settled de jure that we owe our origin to no 'being of earth's world.'

"I," continued A, "was contemporary with Adam, and the first that I recollect of myself was in the service of that ancient gentleman, as I was ever the first in requisition, when he made up his despatches under his own hand and signature. I went into the Ark leading the Antediluvians—abode all his life with Abram, so that to this day, to hurry over all meaner capacities in which I have served, I stand first and foremost in Age, and, it will be admitted, in Activity over the whole world. Being a very leader in Ambition, I marshaled Alaric and Alexander in all their victories, and was the inseparable attendant of Anthony, though I always came last in the train of Cleopatra. Forworthy climax, I first introduced Assignments among merchants, a very sensible sort of instrument in hard times, and am just now the sine qua non, the factotum of Almacks." My heart misgave me—I cast my eyes about for a moment to see what had become of this sad book! By the light of the letters I saw it safe at my feet, face downward, on the floor. But I started not. I would not have broken the enchantment for a library. I was hearing a precious revelation! "My shape," continued A, "was often the occasion of rude sayings among the ignorant, who likened me to tall raw boys who walked wide; but I have the satisfaction of knowing that I first gave mathematicians the idea of a triangle; and, straddler or not, there never would have been a solitary pair of dividers without me. It has sometimes been objected that I was a mere article; but it has been admitted universally, since the art of printing, that I can boast as much influence as the combined forces of T H & Co, notwithstanding." Here the little fellows all shrugged like a trio of Frenchmen—their withers were wrong. "My friend V, quite the reverse of myself in character as well as person, will vouch for me that I, as well as myself, have been allowed to have point, when brought in my legitimate proportions before the world.

"But, my friends, in our character of letters, we are suffering, in the hands of men, a species of martyrdom, through an ungodly practice among them of typifying us in every heathenish and uncouth form imaginable. Indeed our Roman outlines are well nigh effaced by the intervention of these pestilent fellows. But I have occupied too much time already in my narrative. My neighbor B, you see, is swelling to begin his story." With these words, long-limbed A swung back on the green cloth, and stretched himself out like a young Colossus, while his right hand man commenced his tale.

"I was always," said B, "portly, from a child. If my brother A lead us in Antiquity, I can only say in offset that there were very few before me in the Beginning: I was thrown into good company in my youth, and accompanied John Bunyan in his pilgrimage. No one, from first to last, could be Beautiful or Brave without me, and big and burly as I appear, I have been the leader of all Beaux, from those of the ark to those of Broadway. I have seen enough of consequence and of the great world in all conscience; having abode in Boston on Bunker-hill monument for these last four hundred years, to speak within bounds. They say I am necessary to the making of this same tower, which is longer in the building, by the way, than was that of Babel, of which I speak knowingly, as I was head workman there, though I left the fools in the midst of it. I kept early company with the patient and the impatient, for I was first with Balaam and the last with Job; though, for that matter, it must be confessed, I was the origin of his Biles. I have been, 'tis true, distinguished in Bulls and Blunders, and the last one as it affected me, was in accompanying Bonaparte through his career, to St. Helena—but I went with Bertrand. I am now the fast friend of Mr. Brougham and the Blacks, taking the first stand for them both. This gives some color at least to my patriotism. I have sometimes been called the Bishop of the alphabet, owing, no doubt, to my rotundity, and many have shaken their heads and stowed my departure, from a combined dropsy of the chest and stomach. But I shall outlive ye all! The meddling musicians have treated me the worst, having for a long time denominated me B flat—a round piece of satire, sure enough! But this is against ocular demonstration. At present, I am indispensable in all matters of Business, Bargaining, and Botheration; and, in the upshot, I may say that by actual measurement I have about me more of the line of beauty than any of my queer-shaped brethren." Here B stroked down his respectable protuberances, and made way for C, who came next in order. Sitting all in a heap, he began:

"My shape, my dear friends, is owing to a vile practice which I contracted in my youth, of trying to imitate a circle; but like a good many country ministers and bad poets, as I could not, at last, make both ends meet, I am what I am. I have been something of a traveller in my day. I went with Cæsar through all his Campaigns, and formed a twelfth part of his Commentaries; was conspicuous in the Crusades, and came to this blessed country with Christopher Columbus. Lastly, to my shame be it spoken, I have become the leader of Craniologists." Here there was a sort of general 'pshaw!' from all quarters. "My political importance has been something, as I have long been in close connection with Clay on this side the water, and with Canning, formerly, on the other. I am now at the head of the Constitution in spite of the presidents, and always reside in the Capital. My figure has been oftentimes objected to, but it must be remembered that I first suggested the idea of the new moon—and moreover, for my own comfort, I have a happy faculty of rocking myself to sleep upon the strength of my own globular configuration. I have been deemed an obstinate character because I always seem to have my back up—but my neighbor D is a capital foil in that respect, as his development is in an opposite direction." So saying, the little fellow trundled away upon the tapis, as though he would never be done.

D, threw himself flat on his back, and commenced as follows: "I never took the trouble, my dear fellows, to inquire into my antiquity; but I am sorry to say I have strong suspicions that I am as ancient as Beelzebub, for the first stand that I took, in any way, was in the service of the D—!! I afterwards reformed, however, and was a leading character with King David, and travelled with Daniel among the lions; but am now, in sober earnest, fain to preside over the Deaf and Dumb—those unfortunate creatures of whom Saladin said, 'the soul of speech is stricken with silence between the ivory walls of his palace.' As to my figure, it is well known amongst sensible people, that I was the first model of a rainbow. I have been somewhat laughed at, to be sure, as well as my brother B, for obesity; but it is evident I have the better of him, in being without that absurd contraction in medias res, which is the destruction of the line of beauty in his venerable figure. On account of some virtue which I never had the happiness to discover, I have long been considered the representative of five hundred, whether it be of men, monkeys, or what not—it is ever the same! what would the celebrated council of Greece have said to that? thought I; 'but this is matter for mathematicians to solve, or to settle, with these foolish Romans. Meantime, for me to take a sweep of sixty is a thing of no moment at all.' So saying, he displayed for a few minutes to the infinite amusement of the assembly.

"I," said E, "first found myself with Eve in Eden. Hard it was indeed to leave such beautiful company; but I was obliged to join the Enemy. As this world grew famous and fashionable, I took the lead in Etiquette, and became the first character in England, and, of course, Everywhere, while the Edinburgh acknowledged me first in letters. It is needless to say I have the hope of nothing hereafter to be proud of. Bitter things have been said of my figure. I have been called a thing that would turn short corners. But this is judging too much like the craniologist. Yet no one can deny that I am methodical, as I come of the family of the right angles. It should not be forgotten, also, that I am a capital fellow in manufacturing Echo. I have an over-reaching way it is true, but my brother T bears me in it exceedingly well. The matter most pestilent to me is my sometimes near conjunction with my brothers A and O, in the unseemly shape of what is called a diphthong; a word, into the bargain, of most ungracious denomination. In all these cases I am thrown forcibly from my perpendicularity and am obliged to support life in a sort of inclined plane, that is far from agreeable." A and O here muttered something very contemptuously of this juxtaposition, inasmuch as the children of men considered them as mere dead letters, and E alone worthy of emphasis. This was sensible. I almost wished the publishers had been there.

E having nothing more to say, F took up the tale. "Good friends," said he, "I am cousin-german to my neighbor E. I flatter myself that the family resemblance can be traced in the length of our cervical vertebrae, and this prefix upon the sternum. I have no particular recollection where I first found myself; but remember that I came to be of importance in France, where, as well as everywhere else, I, to this day, take the lead in Fashion and Fancy. In Freemasonry I have the precedence, and of course am of notoriety in the Fudge family. My figure, (for I see we are all so marvellously composed that some account of our outward man is deemed necessary) my figure has been used in terrorem in many countries; and it naturally suggested the beautiful and ingenious idea of the gallows, since no Felon has there been whom I have not accompanied to the gibbet since the invention of capital punishments. I have always been at the head of the Flats; and why psalm-singers should denominate me F sharp, is a mystery far beyond my fathom. I am as upright and rectangular as Philadelphia; though from an unhappy propensity of throwing my head forward, I have utterly lost my balance—and the urchin at school was right enough who said I should be compelled to run forever after my centre of gravity."—Here he finished, and was succeeded by G, a stout, apoplectic-looking fellow, who delivered himself to the following purpose.

"I am distantly related to the family of the circles. My first recollection finds me in the service of Goliath, a heavy gentleman among the Philistines. I was undoubtedly chosen as one of his representatives on account of my breadth of back, in which endowment I do not yield a whit to my brother C. Growing tired, however, of the exclusive company of Giants, and afterwards, happening in Great Britain, I led wicked Gley in the Gunpowder affair in that country. I have been too plethoric for much exercise, yet in modern times they have put me at the head of a Gymnasium. This leads me to think the matter all humbug. At present I am the acknowledged head of the Gay, Grand, and Glorious. My figure is rather unfortunate to mould into an exquisite, and, compared with our friend C, my nether extremity looks like the Gout to be sure; yet it passes for only a natural bluntness of the parts, and comports with the downrightness of my character. However, as most of us, like lazy students, sit more or less on our backs, and move but little withal, the configuration of these sad extremities is hardly more than a thing of moonshine." So saying, he rolled backward

H stood bolt upright, like a piece of frame-work, while he gave an account of himself. Said he, "I was contemporary with Ham. I lived all his life with Homer; [this must settle the real existence of the bard, thought I,] "but wishing to change poetry for power, I passed into the service of Hannibal, who was something of an amateur at blasting rocks with vinegar, and afterwards of Herod the Tetrarch and the wicked. Being a tall, square fellow, that turned out his feet, I readily found a place with Harry the eighth. But not to multiply words, which I hate, for I am allowed to be but a single breathing among them, I came in time to be the leader of the Haut ton and conspicuous in all matters of Honor. As these two last are things that depend on the mere breath of this world, no one will question the propriety of my station. As to my figure, it has been said to resemble too nearly a tall ladder with a single round, to be eminently useful. I won't dispute about such light affairs, but I religiously believe that I can boast more superficial understanding than any two of this family of ours."

As no one seemed inclined to dispute this fact, I next took up

* Since the following article was written, it has been suggested to the author that a little work by Montgomery, called "Prose by a Poet," contains a piece under the same title as this. It may be needless, but not improper for him, therefore, to say, that of this fact, if fact it be, he was totally ignorant at the time of writing this grave "History." He would willingly declare, however, that should thought or language here disclose any resemblance to the production of Mr. M., he will be glad of it, as any such literary sympathy in this gay department is a pleasant thing enough on a thousand accounts.

the thread of the discourse. He was a tall fellow, and stood upon one leg. "I first lived," said he, "with Innocence in the garden. It can hardly be credited, that after this I became the origin of all Ill, and patronized by my presence the Idle and Ignorant every where. I joined myself in the old time to the Ishmaelites, and first introduced Idolatry. Quite a change, upon the whole, it must be confessed! I have ever been the greatest and most perfect of all things created or that can possibly be created. There is nothing—nothing under the moon, with reverence be it spoken, like I! I have always stood the indispensable representative of No. 1. I am the most unsocial of all creatures. I allow no one to be equal to me, and if I speak, I cannot possibly utter a syllable of any body but myself. I am the essence of all egotism, and, in short, there is not an iota of the universe of which I do not compose a part. I have been called the anatomy—the mere post of our fraternity. True it is, I am thus thoughtful and solitary in my appearance, and I have been used to go and stand alone from my youth. As to my importance among the children of men, I flatter myself that I am the original of all light-houses and monumental pillars. With this I am content." As he uttered these last words I thought the impudent rogue leered rather saucily towards Bunker Hill and some of its appurtenances, as though he was taller than the whole of them!

J had but little to say for himself, and utterly refused to reveal any thing of his history, save that he was formerly the leader of the French Jacobins, as he was of all such cattle now-a-days. He thought honesty was a poor commodity, on the whole; for he said, that though he had always been at the very head of the Just, he had never been able to keep out of Jail. "At present," said he, "I am the captain-general of all Junto-men, and stand foremost for General Jackson, as I did once for Jehu of old. [Here there was loud applause—and something like a squib was let off.] I am the maker of all Jokes, and somewhat club-footed, as you see, which might naturally be expected from the ungodly service I have latterly been in. In figure I once resembled neighbor I, very decidedly; but—I took a turn in my youth, and here I am."

K, who came next, a broad-chested fellow, with a waist like a greyhound, said that he was the last in the ARK; since that, as long as he could remember, he had been in the service of Kings and Knaves. But his life, forsooth, afforded little variety, as his friend C had done nearly all his business for him—so little had he been in demand, in propria. As he was indispensable in all Knock-down matters, it would account, however, for his having acquired such a boxing attitude. This was perfectly satisfactory.

L merely observed that he had been an upright, right-angular innocent character from his minority. As evidence of the first quality he had accompanied Lafayette thus far on his journey, and was, moreover, a leader in Lottery business. He had been called an inconsistent fellow, "for," said he, "I have always been at the head of the Law, while it is equally true that I have given myself wholly to Love and the Ladies. My foot is out of Chinese proportion, forsooth—but then the astronomers have made me a good yard long in the heavens, and I am fain to believe that I am the only one of the company that has suffered an apotheosis." This was a comforter!

M said that he had no disposition to dispute with his brother A—but it must be admitted that he was coeval with Man. He had lived some hundreds of years with Methuselah, and from his figure it was evident to the most superficial observer that he had been used to the ups and downs of life. He had always been foremost in Murders, Marriages, and Money-matters. Becoming somewhat profane in early times, he attached himself to Mahomet for a season, and after that it was no wonder that he became the head of the Materialists. "But after all," said he, "there is no Morality without me—and I take lead in Might and Mind. In my youth, though from my figure I was supposed to be something of a flat, it was still admitted that I had a good foundation to build upon. Odd as my shape is, moreover, it may be remarked that I was instrumental in introducing the Virginia fence—a matter that makes me sufficiently immortal for all common purposes." Thus saying, he subsided, and N, a slab-sided, nervous-looking fellow, next lifted up his voice as follows: "I first saw light with Noah. Afterwards, having made divers excursions with Nimrod, I finally came to preside over the land of Nod—since which time it may naturally be inferred that I took the lead in Nothing. But far from that—on the contrary, there is nothing in Name or Nature before me. I am at the head of all Nobility, Nonsense, and Natural fools. I am esteemed first in the service of the North American, as I once was in that of Napoleon, who was a great reviewer in his day; and to crown my notoriety, I am perfectly acquainted with the source of the Nile. My shape need be no matter of wonderment, when it is known that I am of the original stock of the acute-angles."

It now became O's turn to expound. He was a queer fellow, of no particular shape, but as fat as a burgomaster. After propping himself to keep him from rolling, he told the company in a wheezing voice, that he was of the ancient family of the spheres, and was low at the season of full moon. "In my youth it was naturally predicted of me that I should never be sharp at any thing; and so it seems to have proved. I first served in the vanguard of Og, king of Bashan, and afterwards in partnership with my friend E, marshaled Œdipus the parricide, in all his expeditions. But E takes the glory—I am never so much as mentioned! Being compelled into many Outrages, I grew sick of men, and led about Ourang-Outangs till better times. I subsequently originated all the Orders in council: hence, in the estimation of Christians, as well as mathematicians, I have ever been admitted to be good—for nothing! Like some nice lawyers, I represent the refined essence of nonentity. At present I am at the head of Odd fellows, Old maids, and the Opposition, and am, withal, a capital creature at exclamation! My figure, (for though I cut none myself, yet, placed at the side of others, I affect them in the ratio of ten per cent.) my figure has been the means of essentially facilitating communication between man and man—for it first suggested the notion of balloons and cannon balls. But then, pardon of our fraternity, I must do no more than take my turn, for I have a round-about way of expressing myself, and am apt to reason in a circle; and the chance is, that no one knows where I begin or where I break off."

As the sturdy little speaker ceased from his labors, P commenced in manner and form following. "I am half-brother of B above there, as my likeness will sufficiently declare. I found myself in early life a chief among the Pagans, and was the first character employed in constructing the Pyramids. Then I passed into Palestine with Peter the Hermit. I have been in many desirable places, such as Palaces and Prisons—associated much with the wise, such as Plato and the last Prince of Wales, and with a kind of ambiguity lived at the same time both in Public and in Private. I am now at the head of the Post-office and the Presidency—[here J scowled portentously] but as, after all, I am next to nothing, here, [this set all the alphabet in a laugh at poor O] the less I say the better."

Next, Q, a queer fellow enough, and a sizeable, came forward and gave the following account of himself. "I am a lineal descendant of the Tadpoles. For this my figure vouches to the full. Others have said I was an illegitimate son of master O, who sits there in a heap—aloud be it spoken, as I understand we are all and each upon the confessional. But 'whence my tail?' has ever been a staggering question at such unlettered scandalizers. For my own part, I recollect what Seneca, or somebody says, 'est nodus in rebus,' which, as it originally referred to my appendage, no doubt, leaves me without any obfuscation whatever, on that subject. Yet I have been the herald of Queens, a leader among the Quakers, and first and foremost in Quips and Quiddities from my youth upwards. I resided of old in Quiet with Quintilian, and for change accompanied Don Quixotte on his tour, and led him in all his adventures. I have been the beginning of a good many Quarrels, and am the making of all Quacks. I am something of an odd one, to be sure, in the family of the circles; and as for the good I have done, I can only say that I first introduced Quiltings and Queues."

So saying, he flourished his remnant amongst the company at a high rate, while R delivered himself as follows. "I was born in the Red Sea—but not relying so moist a life, and, to get essentially dry, I led the Rev. Mr. Rogers to the stake—a burning shame indeed; yet in all my doings I am ever in the Right; and though I am principle in all cases of Revenge that are capital, yet I am always first in Repentance. Once I was willing to take lead among Ruffians, Rogues, and Rascals, and rejoiced to head a Revolution, or a Reform! But now, I give myself wholly to Roads and Railways; and, to recommend me to engineers, I can truly say that I possess the power of leading every River by the nose. To crown my usefulness, I am chief in the department of Rhyming and Rigmorale. My figure has oftentimes been some reproach to me among those who don't understand the turn of my ankle—but as I stand at the head of the Regulars, all such oburgation is childish."

R had hardly ceased, when straight a low hissing sound ensued, and after much twisting and turning, S sibilated his little story as follows. "I descend, not in a straight line, for that is impossible, from the insinuating family of the Serpents. As might be expected, I first found myself marshaling Satan through Eden. But my abode with him was not exclusive, he was so hot and profane! and I passed into the service of Sampson, and was the leading cause of all the stout gentleman's wonderful Strength. I was also in Sodom at the burning, and of course have had much to do in the composition of Sulphur. It was said in my youth that I should always be a crooked stick, and so although I stood high in Society, I soon found myself at the head of Sectarians, Sabbath-breakers, Stealers, and Stock-jobbers. Strange as it may seem, I afterwards became chief and first of the Serious and Sorrowful, and was actually employed in writing Sermons and Sad Songs. Subsequently I fell off—being called on to help make Slander, Senators, Steamboats, and such cattle. This naturally brought me into a desperate state, and I forthwith joined me unto Captain Symmes, who was eminently delighted with such a twistical, investigating fellow, as my shape seemed to declare me. I told him I had been many a time both in Sea and Stars, and could therefore find no difficulty in getting into the South pole. Finally, to keep you all respectful, I can say that I was very intimate with master Shakespeare, and am absolutely necessary to uphold the name and Success of Sir Walter Scott and the Sea Serpent. My figure has, indeed, subjected me to the charge of 'a slippery genius'—I was but a kind of moral eel!—the mere snake of the brotherhood! But then I go with the Sun, and who can be more regular?"

Thus ended S, and T, a tall fellow, with short arms, next got up in a blustering way and swore at once that he was at the head of all Things—that he was born with Time—helped make the Twelve Tables, and was about the first to introduce Tythingmen and the Toothache; two very sensible and pungent matters. "I am now," said he, "at the head of Trade. I helped on the Tariff all in my power—and to pass from grave to lighter things, I have formed a fourth part of Toys of all kinds from time immemorial, and to that effect am now employed in constructing the Thames Tunnel. I attend the Theatre on all occasions; and in the great drama of life am ever found at the head of Treason. I am the first of Travellers, and help make Total eclipses. As to my figure, we'll let that pass. I am marvellous broad to be sure—but I represent the shoulders of more than half the fraternity."

U next called the attention of the company. "I am," said he, "the last of the vowels, in the legitimate line, and belong, you will allow, to a very shrewd and laborious family, without whose assistance you all make sad work in most of your combinations. I first dwelt in Uz—afterwards in a kind of needless conjunction with my brother E, I helped bring Europe into notice. I am now foremost in the United States—am absolutely necessary to preserve the Union—and, without me, in all its elections, no vote can be Unanimous. As to voice, you will perceive, I am capital in Undertones. I am at the head of all Undertakings, good or bad, and take the lead in Unitarianism. My situation in this last respect, of course, very enviable, I am accordingly assailed on all sides by some of the orthodox vowels—especially I—an important character, who, if there be any difficulty or evil in matters of religion or faith, is singularly apt to charge it all upon U! So much for the godly virtue of charity. As to figure, it is quite provoking that I am always obliged to appear in Undress; but then I boast somewhat of the line of beauty, and am content to undulate through life as well as I can."

V, a contracted-looking fellow about his extremities, said that he first found himself in the service of Vice, a doubtful personage of ancient days, whose origin he would not pretend to declare. In early times he was the leader of the Vandals and Visigoths—and naturally held first rank among all Vagabonds. Having latterly introduced Vaccination and the Vapors, it was pardonable that he should be chief of the Vain. He was originally as upright and as gracefully round as his neighbor U, but in his youth, having been in many deeds of Violence, his nether parts had become intimate, even to amalgamation. Nevertheless, his figure declared him to be admirable in coming to a point—and as for the utility he had been of in mechanics or to the military, he would merely say that he first suggested the astonishing ideas of the inclined plane, and the tunnel, and above all the disposition, of any given army in the form of a wedge—a melancholy contrivance, no doubt, but still an excellent thing in the hands of driving characters.

W said he was a poor thing at best, having first found himself in a Wilderness, with Wretchedness and Woe. Yet Wealth has acknowledged his presence indispensable, as well as Want—the Wicked as well as the Worthy, the Witling as well as the Wise. In short, for such an up and down fellow as he appeared to be, he was a complete riddle—as good as a conundrum. "In my youth," said he, "I found myself at the head of many Wonders, and among others a Wife. Being the first in Weight wherever I went, I naturally panted for fame, and sought it at Waterloo with Wellington—and afterwards at the head of a Woolen-factory. At present I am content with the immortality of residing perpetually in Washington. [Here the whole alphabet groaned aloud!] I am indispensable, equally to bring about Wars, Witchcraft, Weddings, and all such desperate doings. I first introduced Wigs and Water-Works—and to crown my notoriety, though it is no matter of glorification, or proof of orthodoxy, I am allowed to be the first character in Wall-street. My figure is not straight—and reason good—for from a single glance at it, it is evident, that, in sailors' phrase, I am constrained to beat through life, which is a trying affair."

X stood in a corner, with his legs athwart, and gave but a short account of himself. Where he came from, he had never found out. If he recollected aright, he was first in the service of Xantippe, a body of some vinegar in the ancient time; hence he had necessarily acquired in his youth the reputation of a cross-grained fellow. He was a chief with Xerxes, a foolish, water-flogging character of old; but to retrieve himself, he passed over to Xenophon, and made a conspicuous figure in the retreat of the X,000. It was evident that he was naturally calculated to take the lead in every thing Xcellent and Xtraordinary; but then his friend E, a meddlesome fellow at best, always interfered to prevent him. His figure could declare him admirable at cross-purposes, and therewith he was content. He would merely mention, to wind up, that as he was easily converted, outwardly, at least, he was wonderfully popular with the Roman Catholics.

Y said that from the earliest time he was so promising a wight that he was ever at the head of the Youth, wherever he went. "In late years," said he, "I accompanied Ypsilanti in Greece—and at present am in glory complete—being a leader of the Yankees, and comfortably lodged in the centre of New-York. In morals I am something of a retrospective character—for, look for me when you will, you will always find me with Yesterday. Some say I am of the stack of the vowels, while others declare I am a legitimate V with the simple addition of a tail; in short, as the gowmsmen have it, that I am a sort of a tenant in tail special in that venerable family. Meanwhile my fame is, that my figure first engendered the idea of the 47th Proposition of Euclid. This was a geometrical consolation which admitted of no denial."

Z, a fellow of some angles, who sat near the bottom of the company, gave the following account of himself. "I am the last of the letters. If I mistake not, my first appearance was in the ancient city of Zoar, in the warm latitudes. For a change, I transferred myself to the middle of Nova-Zembla, and abode successively in each of the Zones. I have been foremost of all things in Zeal—for, with a speed that has astonished Mr. Symmes, I have led the Zephyrs themselves, been before the sun in the Zodiac, and the first in the Zenith on all occasions. After this confession it is needless to say that I have always led a zig-zag sort of a life. My figure shows that I have some good points about me, and it is generally known, as might be expected, that I first took out the patent for chain-lightning."

Meanwhile AND,* a demure little personage enough, who had all the while lain in a corner, with his tail over his shoulder, began to unbend; and hoped, though he was but a kind of illegitimate amongst so large an assembly, that he might yet be permitted by the honorable company to observe, that he was peculiarly unhappy in the connection he had so long sustained with a young c, whom they might observe continually at his heels. He made bold to say that he conceived the creature of no use at all in the alphabet. This matter was put to vote by A, who acted as moderator, but not carried in favor of the complainant; so he merely turned to the poor petitioner and consoled him as follows: "Your connections are certainly greater than those of any of us. Your fame and usefulness are in all languages. What can you want more! Live on—and be a conjunction."

These words were scarcely uttered, when there was a great rattling at the door! On the alarm there was a sudden electric snapping among them; and I could see the little camp breaking up on all sides, and the whole company of capitals scampering, huddling and headlong from the centre, and disappearing up the shelves among the octavos, just as the master of the establishment entered. I found it was morning, and myself standing in the midst of the floor.

My friend was considerably startled. I approached, and taking his hand, it was all explained in a moment.

"But," said I, "my dear sir, I am concerned for you—leave this business—leave it by all means—you are dealing in art magic. Faust was no fool—and I am sadly superstitious just now—about these things. I know some matters more than all booksellers, or bank dealers are aware of. Meanwhile allow me to make the best of my way into the street." And with these words I hurried out, and went home in a very musing and melancholy condition.

"What," thought I, as I passed along—and I have thought of it a thousand times since—"what a thing it is to be a man of letters!"

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

At the opening of this establishment the house was thronged from the stage-lights to the Shakespeare. No piece could have been selected so appropriate as Cinderella. There is a morning brilliancy about this enchanting opera, well calculated for the dawning of the season; a kind of daybreak over the theatrical world. Indeed, on this occasion, everybody and everything wore an imposing appearance. The ladies looked beautiful, and the critics good natured. The interior of the building had been thoroughly cleaned, the actors and actresses were glittering in new dresses, the scenery had been retouched, and the players, just returned from recruiting excursions into the country, were in excellent voice. The delicious air of "Morning its sweets is flinging," floated in upon the tide of music like a spell; and, when the first plaintive liquid tones of poor Cinderella in her chimney corner were heard chanting "Once a king," the audience vented their pleasure in peals that rose and died away, and rose again; a distinct and gratifying expression of public opinion on the question of opera, and a just reward to the manager for his hitherto able and successful endeavors to contribute to its improvement. We have one or two complaints to prefer against several of the dramatis personæ in this piece, but will defer them till some future occasion, when, perhaps, they will be unnecessary. From the unusual run of Cinderella we argue well for Masaniello, if it be produced with the same care and strength. The public have full confidence in the judgment of Mr. Simpson to appreciate their taste, and in his knowledge of the best means of affording it an ample gratification.

The interlude of "Winning a Husband," introduced Mrs. Barrymore to the audience. This little piece affords the actress an opportunity of displaying her versatility of talent in personating several dissimilar characters: an old lady, a learned Scotch girl, a French mademoiselle, a sturdy widow of the true cockney school, a bashful country maid, a young officer, &c. It is scarcely possible to form a decisive opinion of her extent of talent from a single representation; but she evidently possesses qualities which render her an agreeable acquisition to our stage. She is graceful in her manner; correct, distinct, and easy in her enunciation; and with a low-toned, lady-like voice, that would insure a cordial welcome to a much less experienced performer. She speaks broken English delightfully. Her "it's very warm," was full of genuine humor, and the dance unexceptionable. She appeared again on the same evening as the Dumb Savoyard, in the melo-drama of that name, and played chastely and with spirit. Somebody has been smuggling a monkey across the great waters, to elevate the tastes and empty the pockets of us simple Yankees. The creature has come all the way from London on purpose. "What an honor for the Pumpolinos!" We recommend Mr. Barry, however, to hand him over to the circus, or the "East river tea garden," forthwith. He did nothing but scratch himself, and turn head over heels in a most clumsy manner; and, "no offence to the general or any other person of quality," he was the sorriest representative of the tribe we have seen for many a day. There seems to be ever a fatality about our stage. It no sooner begins to assume a refined character, to become a school for morals, for poetry, music and manners, and an intellectual feast calculated to collect audiences of education, talent, and respectability, than the current takes some new turn, or "the moon comes nearer the earth than is her wont," and we have catarrhs of real water, explosions of powder-magazines, murders, and melo-dramas crammed down the people's throats; vulgar singers of mongrel rhymes like Mr. Sloman, people who scream like cocks and hens, and squeak like pigs, as Mr. Holland; geese, cows, horses, and monkeys. These may fill the house for a time, it is true; but in what way? The theatre should never address itself to vulgar tastes. Its interest is to draw support from the better classes of society, whose applause, if not so riotous, are more useful and permanent. We regret these "common-place appeals to the gallery." We dislike any thing that can foster coarse prejudices, and interfere with the legitimate drama. We have a hearty hatred of catarrhs, and a true Shylock antipathy to the beasts in question; and should rather see one good play or opera decently got up, than be wearied with the stupid vulgarities of "a wilderness of monkeys."

THE BOWERY THEATRE.

They are gradually disciplining the forces of this house into an excellent tragic company. "The time has been" when the attraction, every evening presented by Mr. Hamblin, would have ensured an overflowing audience; and even now, notwithstanding the heavy demands made upon the public during the last successful season at the Park, the novelties there in preparation for the ensuing campaign, and the absence of so great a number of our fellow-citizens from the city, a large assemblage, and sometimes a crowded one, nightly sit down with an excellent relish to partake of the substantial banquet which the enterprising manager spreads for the public. Douglas has been sustained with much skill. With one or two exceptions, an agreeable strength is spread throughout the whole piece, and several of the scenes were admirably effective. A lady, Mrs. Drake, not altogether a stranger among us, has been playing the first female parts. She is valuable in the establishment; and, in a quiet unostentatious way, reveals good sense, feeling, and animation. As the wretched wife and mother in the "Stranger," she appeared to great advantage, and with the aid of Mr. Hamblin, imparted to the piece an unusual degree of interest. Mr. Booth's performance of Sir Giles Overreach was a spiritless affair; noisy where it should have been subdued—tame where it should have been passionate—until the last act, wherein he several times flashed with a fine talent, which redeemed his character for the evening. It is these sudden bursts of excellence that help Mr. Booth through his part. He shuffles along most of it with unpardonable carelessness. He appears quite satisfied with a few touches sprinkled over his personation, and rather more numerous towards the conclusion. He resembles an artist who finishes a face here, and an arm there—and leaves all the groups and landscape in the back ground, rudely sketched. The whole scene with the lord—"and though I do condemn report"—and the emphatic "kiss close," were entirely without weight. Nothing could be finer than his entrance after having challenged his foe, and indeed numerous passages in the same scene. We were agreeably surprised with his "old Norval."

It is a truly beautiful piece of acting, and raises him high in our estimation; and his "Jerry Sneak" is a nil ultra. Mr. Hamblin as Norval, was graceful and spirited, and succeeded in displaying the erect proud daring of the young noble; something too much declined into the vale of years, perhaps, "but that's not much." Mr. Cooper, as Glenalvon, stalked before us in all the by-gone glory of ten years since, when his misconceptions were esteemed originality, or forgotten in the elegance of his demeanor, and the richness of his mellow-toned voice. Who, that the gods had made theatrical at that almost forgotten period, will not remember the peculiar high tone of his Virginia? "I said I would be patient, and I am"—with the in-drawn breath and the characteristic flourish of the arm. It is not fair to judge him now with a "critic's eye." We look upon him as the property of former times. An old fallen oak, putting out a few green branches—a broken column, supporting some roof erected over its carved beauties to supply the purposes of strangers to those by whom it was sculptured and admired. We are glad ever to have an opportunity to welcome a gleam of ancient light across the paths of this once idolized veteran; and when his faults become too conspicuous to be hidden beneath the cloak of charitable recollections, we shake our head like aged Osean over the "joys that are departed," and think "old Cassius still."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Commerce and revenue.—The present prosperous condition of the commerce of the United States cannot fail to be a theme of general felicitation. We contemplate in the picture the evidences of growing strength and multiplied enjoyments. At no period, it is believed, has this country exhibited a more gratifying spectacle in all its commercial transactions and relations than it does at present. Our vessels whiten every sea, and, almost without exception, have unrestricted intercourse with every part of the world. The rapid increase in this great national pursuit is an unerring indication both of the ability and enterprise of the merchants; and that they realize a corresponding reward, is sufficiently shown by two very important facts. In the first place, it is rarely that we hear of a mercantile failure of large amount in any part of the Union. This evinces a degree of health and soundness in the commercial ranks, calculated to inspire the utmost confidence. In the second place, the integrity of the merchants in meeting their engagements with the government, and the consequent increase in the amount of the revenue. It is ascertained that the proceeds in the custom-house for the second quarter of the present year will not fall materially short of five millions of dollars! We need no stronger proof of the vigorous growth of, and the liberal measures connected with, this powerful arm, which conveys the superabundance of our soil to distant regions, bringing home in exchange the rich and valuable products of foreign climes, and with a facility unknown to former times. This must continue to be the case so long as agriculture and the arts are able to furnish unlimited supplies, and to infuse life and spirit into every other pursuit. These are known to be the real fountains of wealth; but, without the agency of commerce, the numerous channels which now fertilize the body politic, would become inanimate, sluggish, and putrid. Commerce, too, is the agent which gathers light, knowledge, and riches from every other dominion, and transfers them to our own, with a celerity that is most wonderful, thereby conferring benefits of the highest character, and which can be derived from no other source.

And here we must be allowed to express our full conviction—and in this we are persuaded our readers will cheerfully concur—that the concerns of the custom-house were never before managed with more capacity and skill, nor with more scrupulous fidelity. The principals are gentlemen of acknowledged fitness and qualifications; and notwithstanding the heavy amount of business transacted, and the severe duties required in its fulfilment, it seems to be the general sentiment, that less cause of complaint has on no former occasion been experienced. We deem it no more than an act of justice to the collector, to say that no person ever filled that office in a more satisfactory manner. It is no small matter to the great body of merchants, in their daily intercourse with this officer, to find the evidences of good sense, intelligence, a disposition conciliating and obliging, linked with every other characteristic of a gentleman.

Conversations of the week.—Chancellor Kent will deliver an oration before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, at the annual commencement of Yale College, which will take place on the fourteenth instant. A poem will be pronounced at Brown University, Providence, on Tuesday next, by N. P. Willis, Esq.

The Horticultural Society of this city, will give their annual exhibition of fruits and flowers on Wednesday next, at Niblo's garden. The usual fête and ball will take place in the evening.

The late ascension of Mr. Durant seems to have created a pretty general desire for a repetition. The aeronaut is skillful and daring, and the first American who ever navigated the regions of the air.

The French company of comedians are playing in Philadelphia, previously to their return to New-Orleans.

Our hitherto deserted streets are gradually assuming something of their former cheerfulness. A few cool days have a wonderful effect upon the wandering votaries of fashion and pleasure. Some reappear quite invigorated, others with ague and rheumatism. All, however, seem pleased to return, and the sweet voices come back humming "there's no place like home."

Judge Hall's "Illinois Magazine" continues to be deservedly encouraged. The work is admirable. The tenth number has appeared.

Every one has been chilled with the accounts from Virginia. A strict system of justice towards the wretched criminals will no doubt be pursued.

The female writers of England are turning their attention to dramatic literature. The tragedy of "Inez de Castro," by Miss Mitford, has been recently improved by the writer, with the view of rendering the part of the heroine worthy of the efforts of Miss Fanny Kemble. It was several times rehearsed during the winter, but was thought capable of being strengthened and polished. This gifted authoress has also a tragedy upon the story of "Otto, of Wolfenbützell."

Mrs. Norton (known in this country by several graceful effusions, some of which have been copied in the Mirror,) has produced a new comedy, entitled "The School for Coquettes." It was read in the green-room before the fair authoress, who cast the piece herself.

The poet Campbell is determined to win a reputation for industry as well as genius, and to disprove the charge of indolence which has sometimes been alleged against him. Besides editing one of the most popular magazines in Great Britain, and being engaged in the composition of a poem on the subject of Poland, he has undertaken to write the life of Mrs. Siddons, in consequence of her own request, expressed a few days previous to her death. This renowned actress has bequeathed to him ample and valuable materials for her biography, and her daughter and friends have promised many additional particulars.

We have unintentionally omitted to state that the premium of five hundred dollars, offered by Mr. Pelby, for the best original tragedy, has been awarded to Mrs. Caroline L. Hentz, of Covington, Kentucky.

We have heard a number of anecdotes of Paganini, illustrative of his amiable disposition and good heart. Among others is the following: "One day, while walking in the streets of Vienna, he saw a poor boy playing upon a violin, and on entering into conversation with him, he found that he maintained his mother and several little brothers and sisters by what he picked up as an itinerant musician. Paganini immediately gave him all the money he had about him; then, taking the boy's violin, commenced playing, and when he had collected a vast crowd, pulled off his hat, made a collection, and gave it to the lad amid the acclamations of the multitude."

The following paragraph appears in several of the French papers. "The countess Camerat, a daughter of Eliza Baciocchi, and niece of Napoleon, who was under the surveillance of the Austrian police, has succeeded in carrying off her son from Ancona, in order to convey him to Rome. She also, a few months ago, conceived the bold project of carrying off the duke of Reichstadt, and conducting him to Rome, to have him crowned in the capitol as king of Italy, but she was not sufficiently well seconded in her enterprise."

The original manuscripts of the Waverley novels, romances, and tales, in the hand-writing of Sir Walter Scott, will shortly be sold at auction in London. The property in them for some time having been contested between Sir Walter Scott and the creditors of the late Mr. Constable, the court of law in Scotland has decreed that they of right belong to the estate of Mr. Constable, on which account they will be sold. The public, it is said, will be surprised to perceive the few erasures, alterations, or additions, which occur from the first conceptions to their final transmission to the press.

Some new verses from Moore! In relation to the rarity with which this true poet now gives his pieces to the world, and the resolution he seems to have formed to abandon the path where he has gathered so many green laurels, the reader will find a ready application for the third verse of the annexed "remonstrance." It was composed "after a conversation with Lord John Russell, in which he had intimated some idea of giving up all political pursuits."

What! thou, with thy genius, thy youth, and thy name—

Thou, born of Russell—whose instinct to run

The accustomed career of thy sires, is the same

As the eagle's, to soar with his eye on the sun!

Whose nobility comes to thee, stamp'd with a seal,

Far, far more ennobling than monarch e'er set:

With the blood of thy race offered up for the weal

Of a nation that swears by that martyrdom yet!

Shalt thou be faint-hearted and turn from the strife,

From the mighty arena where all that is grand,

And devoted, and pure, and adorning in life,

Is for high-thoughted spirits, like thine, to command?

Oh no, never dream it—while good men despair

Between tyrants and traitors—and timid men bow—

Never think, for an instant, thy country can spare

Such a light from her dark'ning horizon as thou!

With a spirit as meek as the gentlest of those

Who in life's sunny valley lie sheltered and warm,

Yet bold and heroic as ever yet rose

To the top cliffs of fortune, and breast her storm.

With an ardor for liberty, fresh, as in youth

It first kindles the bard, and gives life to his lyre;

Yet mellowed, even now, by that mildness of truth

Which tempers, but chills not, the patriot fire.

With an eloquence—not like those rills from a height,

Which sparkle, and foam, and in vapor are o'er;

But a current that works out its way into light

Through the filtering recesses of thought and of lore.

Thus gifted, thou never canst sleep in the shade;

If the stirrings of genius, the music of fame,

And the charms of thy cause have not power to persuade,

Yet think how to freedom thou'rt pledged by thy name.

Like the boughs of that laurel, by Delphi's decree

Set apart for the fame of its service divine,

All the branches that spring from the old Russell tree

Are by liberty claimed for the use of her shrine.

SECOND VERSE—My heart with joy o'erflows, love, When I see thee near; || Each pulse with rapture glows, love, When thy voice I hear; || In thine angel smile, love, Heaven appears to be; || 'Tis as free from guile, love, 'Tis as dear to me.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

EXTRACTS FROM THE JOURNAL OF A STUDENT AT LAW.

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

IN the early stages of society laws were few and simple; and many well-meaning individuals, in casting a retrospective glance upon distant times, mourn over the intricacy into which the science of jurisprudence has fallen. Our profession is far from holding an elevated rank in the estimation of numerous persons, who are both liberal and sensible upon other subjects. Wits of every description loosen their shafts upon us as fair game. If we are introduced upon the stage we are sure to be tossed in a blanket, or treated in some way or other to the particular derision of the audience; and I have no doubt that the United States abounds with good people, who would look upon an assembly of students as little better than a knot of young vipers, silently and secretly gathering strength to crawl forth for the ruin of the unwary. Mr. Noah, or some other facetious observer of the times, remarked, after the examination of a pretty numerous class of young professional gentlemen, that "forty or fifty hungry young lawyers were just let loose upon the community," and the multiplication of laws, is a common theme of complaint. I have always set this down as mere idle vaporing.

When we observe how modern society is constructed, its artificial wants and distinctions, the various methods which prevail among men of supplying the wants or pampering the luxuries of life, and the different relations in which they are continually placed to each other, where their interests must clash, and their opinions differ, we are not surprised that laws are voluminous and uncertain, that actions are frequent, and that lawyers are necessary. I have been betrayed unconsciously into these observations in considering the nature of our insolvent laws, as laid down in the revised statutes. The true relation of debtor seems never to have been rightly conceived by our legislators. I do not mean fully to discuss either the policy or the justice of imprisonment for debt. Men will hold various opinions upon the subject, as they are swayed by interest, prejudice, or passion. But it is certain, that while insolvency may result from design, it may also be the effect of accident. The debtor may be unfortunate. It is cruel and barbarous to plunge him into a dungeon, at the very time when he has the strongest claim to our sympathy and assistance. On the other hand, he may be cunning, avaricious, dishonest, and wealthy. Here it seems but natural and proper to place in the hands of a creditor the power to compel him to disgorge the prey which he has snatched, perhaps, from the needy and the defenceless.

The error of legislatures seems to have been this. They have perceived the distinction which I have drawn; but instead of submitting the circumstances of the insolvent to the investigation of a superior disinterested tribunal, they have been accustomed to lodge the privilege both of judging and of punishing in the hands of the creditor. The incongruous offices of accuser, judge, jury, and executioner, have thus been in a measure united in one person. We are not surprised that this should have been the case among the ignorant and furious jacobins of the French revolution; but it is singular to find that it has ever, in any degree, prevailed in a nation whose boastings of freedom have reached over all the civilized globe. We cannot wonder then, however just imprisonment for debt may have often been, that there have too frequently occurred instances of peculiar and startling misery—that the law has sometimes been wrested into a subserviency to personal revenge—that innocence has been oppressed with the disgrace and penalties of guilt, without the hardihood to endure the one or facilities to elude the other—that family hopes have been blighted, and pride and industry have either been driven by the pressure of anguish into the paths of guilt, or suffered to perish in utter hopelessness and neglect. That these laws have gradually received revisions by which their harsher features are softened, is one of the many signs that the character of civilized man is undergoing a change for the better. The native principles of truth and justice, which lurk in the depths of every human heart, are becoming developed and palpable to the understanding. The rugged and bleak forms of private passions are melting away before schemes for the general good, as the rocks, heaths, and hills of physical nature yield to the hand of cultivation and improvement. Much has been done—much remains to do; for this is a branch of law most intimately connected with the national prosperity, as well as individual happiness. Many questions of paramount importance remain to be considered. From what debts is the insolvent not discharged? To what degree are the state insolvent laws valid, when pleaded against aliens or citizens of other states? Are they operative in the courts of the United States? What are the disadvantages of the present system of insolvent laws—and what beneficial effects might be anticipated from the adoption of a uniform law upon the subject of bankruptcy? Each of these might form interesting subjects for pens much abler than mine. The young lawyer, who would obtain for an insolvent the benefit of any of the acts, finds that subtle distinctions and unexpected dilemmas are continually multiplying around him. The unfortunate debtor has chosen him for his guide through a very intricate labyrinth, in the course of a progress through which may be required many branches of jurisprudence, with which, at first sight it seems to have no connection. I am myself in favor of abolishing imprisonment for debt, which, like the practice of duelling, I consider the remnant of barbarous ages. The principal object which its friends propose, is to give to the creditor the power of enforcing the payment of just debts. Whatever strengthens the security of tradesmen, and imparts vigor to commerce, must be considered advantageous, when it infringes no private right vested in individuals, by the constitution of the United States, as well as by the laws of nature. It is all important that business men should possess every power to protect themselves from fraud. So it is that they should have the right of appealing to the laws for the redress of every wrong; to punish assault and battery, theft, or any other crime. But suppose the legislature should pass an act authorizing a man who suspected that another had stolen his hat, or slandered his reputation, or perpetrated any injury whatever to his person or property, to seize upon the supposed malefactor, or to prescribe the limits of his walk abroad, excluding him from his residence and place of business; or if he be poor and friendless, to cast him into a loathsome dungeon, and to keep him there till the bitterness of private hate, or the tumult of unrestrained passion had subsided. Yet this is exactly the situation of the debtor. It is the only case wherein the law vests the right of punishment in the complaining party. But the creditor demands, how am I to get my money this man owes me? I know he can pay me, but conceals his property? If this can be proven, the debtor should be punished with all the severity of the criminal laws, and the creditor can appeal to those laws for redress. "But," says my creditor, "I cannot prove it. I know it. I am sure of it—but I cannot prove it." I reply, if you cannot prove the fraud of which you complain, you should not punish it. No crime, not even murder, can be punished unless the criminal be regularly accused, tried, and upon ample proof, condemned. Shall we give to the malignant surmises of disappointed speculation, the force of legal testimony? Shall we enact laws which may be rendered subservient to the worst purposes of individual passion, to whose fury the distressed and the innocent, at least those who have never been legally proved otherwise, may fall victims? I cannot but believe, from the present progressive state of human wisdom, that this gloomy idol of barbarous superstitions will be torn from its dusty pedestal and trodden under foot.

BLACKSTONE.

Young writers may study with advantage the nervous and lucid style of this work—its entire freedom from all superfluous words and meretricious ornaments. Style is one's peculiar manner of relating his thoughts. That of some authors is striking and quite their own; of others, is less perceptibly different from ordinary narratives. The first is easily imitated; the latter is by far preferable and more difficult of attainment when its peculiarity does not consist in any unnatural disposition of sentences, or the selection of uncommon words, but in the plain, clear, and artless way in which the treasures of an observing and intelligent mind are displayed to the easy comprehension of the reader. This is the species which the erudite commentator has chosen. The style of Phillips, the orator, is of the former description. Full of broad and dazzling metaphors, sudden antitheses, broken exclamations, and bursts of passion. You conceive the man to be always in a fury; and although many of his studied displays are calculated to arouse attention and animate the spirit of an assembly predisposed to think with him, yet they are often turgid when they should be serene, and frequently address the passions before they have convinced the reason. Dr. Johnson is another example of style; peculiar, studied, and pompous. But it conveys profound wisdom, pure morals, and a wonderful acquaintance with all the innermost recesses of the human character. It heaves and swells like the billows of the ocean; but, like the ocean, it is deep and powerful.

TYRANTS.

When I look upon the political state of the world, the kings and rulers seem so many keepers and jailers, who have accidentally acquired the power of placing millions of the human race under confinement. The slaves are not, it is true, all actually enclosed within dungeon walls, but they have been kept down in the lower caverns of society, in the dark and unhappy places where their spirits are chilled, and their prospects bounded; for, although happiness is said to dwell among the middling classes, it is in countries where freedom resides. The history of England presents a continual struggle between the people and their masters, from whom they have, at long and bloody intervals, wrenched reluctant admissions of rights, as broad and palpable as the meridian sun. First, by the great charter of liberties, which was obtained sword in hand from John; next by a multitude of subsequent corroborating statutes; then by the petition of right, which was a parliamentary declaration of the liberties of the people, assented to by King Charles the first, on the commencement of his reign; and the habeas corpus act, passed under Charles the second. To these succeeded the bill of rights, delivered to the prince and princess of Orange by the parliament, February thirteenth, 1688; and lastly, by the act of settlement, passed at the commencement of the eighteenth century. This tide of improvement is still flowing on.

ENGLISH NATIONAL DEBT.

The clear net produce of the several branches of the British revenue, after all the charges of collecting and management paid, amounted in the time of Blackstone to about ten millions sterling. This immense sum is first and principally appropriated to the payment of the national debt. The American war cost the British nation one hundred and sixteen millions of pounds sterling. In 1777, the capital of the national debt amounted to about one hundred and thirty-six millions. How is this ever to be discharged? A certain class of political economists assert that the discharge should never be desired, as the debt is advantageous to the nation. It may be so to a few capitalists, to whom it offers a safe method of investing their funds; but the interest of this stupendous debt must be paid annually. This at the period mentioned above amounted to upwards of four millions and three-quarters. Whence is this to come? From the poor classes; in taxes upon candles, soap, salt, and beer.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Drawn by Davis.—Engraved by Anderson.

THE above is a view of the OLD JAIL, at the north-east extremity of the Park, which, with its grated windows, cells, iron-bars, and bolts, is now nearly transformed into a handsome edifice, for the accommodation of several public municipal offices. The following communication, relating to this once gloomy prison, has been politely furnished for the Mirror by our venerable fellow-citizen, JOHN PINTARD, Esq.

THE OLD JAIL.

It was erected many years antecedent to the American revolution, being the second jail, in succession, in this city. The first was in Pearl-street, at the corner of Coenties-lane, under the same roof with the first city-hall, which, as the population increased, was found too small and inconvenient for the imprisonment and security of debtors and criminals.

This modern bastille was memorable during the occupation of the city by the British forces, from 1776 to 1783, as the provost, under the superintendence of the noted Captain Cunningham, provost-marshal, and his deputy, Serjeant Keefe. The former lived in New-York previous to 1776, and during the conflicts between the whigs and tories, the "liberty boys" and "loyalists," was the bully and champion of the latter in the many battles fought in "the fields," now the Park; in front of which, and near the present Bridewell, the whigs set up their liberty-polls, which were successively demolished by the tories, until one was erected so completely cased with iron bars and hoops as to set all attacks at defiance; and which remained, it is believed, until the British took possession of the city, on the fifteenth of October, 1776. On one occasion Cunningham, a stout, double-fisted Irishman, after a bloody scuffle, was compelled by the "liberty boys" to kneel down and kiss the liberty pole; an indignity that rankled in his heart, and was afterwards avenged with unrelenting severity on the American prisoners; when, as a reward for his loyalty, he was dignified with the post of provost-marshal. A more cruel tyrant could not be found, except in his deputy, Serjeant Keefe, who was one of the most cold-blooded monsters that ever existed.

Several public buildings were successively occupied as places of confinement for American, or, in the language of the times, rebel prisoners. In the first instance, the new or middle Dutch church in Nassau and Cedar-streets, where the prisoners (taken on Long-island and in fort Washington) were confined; the sick, the wounded, and well, all indiscriminately huddled together by hundreds and thousands, large numbers of whom died by disease; and many undoubtedly poisoned by inhuman surgeons, for the sake of their watches or silver buckles. This church was afterwards converted into a riding-school, for training dragoons. The extensive sugar-house in Liberty-street, and the North Dutch Church, were also used as prisons. The new Quaker Meeting-house, formerly in Pearl-street, was appropriated as a hospital. The seamen were confined on board of prison-ships, where they suffered every possible hardship, to compel them to enter into the British service. The officers were paroled on Long-island, at Flatbush, New-Utrecht, and Gravesend.

The provost was destined for the more notorious rebels, civil, naval, and military. An admission into this modern bastille was enough to appal the stoutest heart. On the right hand of the main door was Captain Cunningham's quarters, opposite to which was the guard-room. Within the first barricade was Serjeant Keefe's apartment. At the entrance-door two sentinels were always posted by day and night, two more at the first and second barricades, which were grated, barred, and chained; also at the rear-door, and on the platform at the grated door at the foot of the second flight of steps, leading to the rooms and cells in the second and third stories. When a prisoner, escorted by soldiers, was led into the hall, the whole guard was paraded, and he was delivered over, with all formality, to Captain Cunningham or his deputy, and questioned as to his name, rank, size, age, &c. all of which were entered in a record book. What with the bristling of arms, unbolting of bars and locks, clanking of enormous iron chains, and a vestibule as dark as Erebus, the unfortunate captive might well shrink under this infernal sight and parade of tyrannical power, as he crossed the threshold of that door which possibly closed on him for life. But it is not our wish to revive the horrors attendant on our revolutionary war; grateful to Divine Providence for its propitious issue, we would only remark to the existing and rising generation, that the independence of the United States, and the civil and religious privileges they now enjoy, were achieved and purchased by the blood and sufferings of their patriotic fore-fathers. May they guard and transmit the boon to their latest posterity.

The north-east chamber, turning to the left, on the second floor, was appropriated to officers, and characters of superior rank and distinction, and was called Congress-hall. So closely were they packed, that when they lay down at night to rest, when their bones ached on the hard oak planks, and they wished to turn, it was altogether by word of command, "right—left," being so wedged and compact as to form almost a solid mass of human bodies. In the daytime the packs and blankets of the prisoners were suspended around the walls, every precaution being used to keep the rooms ventilated, and the walls and floors clean, to prevent jail fever; and, as the provost was generally crowded with American prisoners, or British culprits of every description, it is really wonderful that infection never broke out within its walls.

In this gloomy terrific abode were incarcerated at different periods many American officers and citizens of distinction, awaiting with sickening hope and tantalizing expectation the protracted period of their exchange and liberation. Could these dumb walls speak, what scenes of anguish, what tales of agonizing woe, might they disclose!

Among other characters there were at the same time the famous Colonel Ethan Allen and Judge Fell, of Bergen county, New-Jersey. When Captain Cunningham entertained the young British officers, accustomed to command the provost guard, by dint of curtailing the prisoners' rations, exchanging good for bad provisions, and other embezzlements practised on John Bull, the captain, his deputy, and indeed the commissioners generally, were enabled to fare sumptuously. In the drunken orgies that usually terminated his dinners, the captain would order the rebel prisoners to turn out and parade, for the amusement of his guests; pointing them out, "this is the d—d rebel, Colonel Ethan Allen—that a rebel judge, an Englishman," &c. &c.

The exploits of the undaunted Colonel Ethan Allen on the northern frontier in the earliest stages of the revolutionary war are known to every reader of American history. Every effort was made by bribery to detach him from his country's cause, but in vain. After a long course of imprisonment in England and in this city, he was eventually exchanged.

Judge Fell was a most respectable character, of great meekness and humanity. In 1776 he had been chairman of the committee of safety for the county of Bergen, at a period when the colonial governments were suspended, and before the state governments were organized. The power of chairman, almost absolute, was exercised with the greatest discretion by Judge Fell. In the same county lived a Mr. Buskirk, whose influence and activity were employed by the chairman to execute his most confidential orders. After the disastrous fate of New-York, New-Jersey was overrun by the British; Buskirk's patriotism failed him, and he joined the British at Powles-hook, where his apostacy was rewarded with the commission and rank of lieutenant-colonel in a regiment of New-Jersey refugees. His influence seduced many young men, to their ultimate grief and sorrow, to abandon their homes, and join the British standard against their country.

Judge Fell, who lived at Parsamus, was surprised and brought as a prisoner to Powles-hook in 1777, where he was recognized by Colonel Buskirk.

"Times are altered since we last met," observed the colonel.

"So I perceive," the judge coolly and sarcastically replied, looking at the colonel's uniform.

"Well, you are a prisoner, and going over to New-York, where you will be presented to General Robertson, the commandant, with whom I have the honor to be acquainted. I will give you a letter of introduction to him."

The judge thanked him for the proffered favor, and accepted the letter, which, on introduction to the general, he presented. It so happened that General, then Colonel, Robertson and he were old acquaintances, and had been associates at Pensacola, after the old French war and peace of 1763. The general, a frank, open-hearted

Scot, renewed their friendship, telling the judge that he must be sent to the provost, which painful duty he could not avoid, but that he would do every thing in his power to alleviate his imprisonment. He inquired of the judge whether he was personally acquainted with Colonel Buskirk? to which he replied by mentioning their former intimacy. General Robertson immediately placed the colonel's letter in his hands, the purport of which was, that "Judge Fell was a notorious rebel and rascal, and advising that due care be taken of him." When the judge, after perusing, returned the letter, with his usual meekness, the general observed, "My old friend John Fell, you must be a very altered man, and a very great rascal indeed, if you equal this Colonel Buskirk."

General Robertson fulfilled his promise to Judge Fell with every possible kindness, and more than once called to see him, and recommended him to the humanity of Captain Cunningham. The American officers, his fellow-prisoners in "congress-hall," treated the judge with the utmost attention; and, out of regard to his advanced years, allotted, as he used jocosely to tell, the softest plank on which to repose his aged limbs at night. After languishing some months in close confinement, General Robertson effected his enlargement on parole, until he was exchanged.

It was an old custom in former times with prisoners sent to jail to pay garnish; in other words, to treat their new acquaintances. But alas! the poor American prisoners doomed to the provost had neither money nor friends, to enable them to pay garnish; in lieu whereof it was a practice with those who could afford it, to send a treat, on their liberation, to their brethren in bondage. Judge Fell, on his release, did not forget his brethren; he sent two hampers of porter and an English cheese, to regale his friends in congress-hall.

Among other prisoners at this juncture were Major Wynant Van Zandt, taken near Hackensack, and Captain Travis, of the Raleigh brig of war, captured by a British cruiser, and brought into New-York. Captain Travis, a high-spirited Virginian, could not tamely brook the insulting taunts of his captors, and was committed to the provost, as the greatest place of punishment, for the insolence, as it was termed, of his replies.

On the occasion of Judge Fell's liberal treat, the poor prisoners made a grand set-to, and demolished the whole at one bout. With mellowed hearts they turned in at night, each man on his own plank. Colonel Allen and Captain Travis were accustomed to banter each other on the superiority of the "Green Mountain boys" and "Virginia buckskins." It so happened that on this occasion Major Van Zandt was the middle man between Allen and Travis, who from words fell to blows about the prowess of their respective countrymen, and between them almost kneaded the major's fat sides to a jelly. Travis, feeling the blows of Allen's enormous fists, accustomed to fell oaks and to split rails, falling on him like sledge-hammers, and his dead-lights almost stove in, sprang with the agility of a deer across the major, and planting his knees in Allen's bread-basket, twisted his forefingers in the colonel's locks, and began in the true Virginia backwoods style with his thumbs to gouge out his peepers. The colonel, with his stentorian voice, to save his eyes cried out for quarters, ceding the palm of victory to Captain Travis. Major Van Zandt, indeed all the prisoners, chimed in in full chorus. The unusual uproar soon produced Serjeant Keefe, with a file of his myrmidons, to quell the riot, and the hall was cleared by locking up its inmates, to fight it out, as he said, in the dungeons. Next morning Captain Cunningham paraded the whole squad, half naked as they were, to learn the particulars—Irishman like, dearly fond of a row—regarding the black rings that encircled Allen's eyes, and Traver's battered scone, with a broad laugh he dismissed them to their hall, with an injunction not to quarrel over their cups in future.

Such is a brief outline of the pastimes of rare occurrence that beguiled the lingering hours of imprisoned life.

At an early period of the war Mr. Varick, of Hackensack, an aged, harmless, inoffensive man, was dragged from his home, and immured in the provost for eighteen months, where he contracted a violent rheumatism, that afflicted him the remainder of his days. The only charge against him was, that he had a son, a captain in the rebel army, and secretary to General Schuyler, who eventually effected his father's exchange. This son, Colonel Richard Varick, the late venerable and munificent president of the American Bible Society, died but a short time since.

Another highly respectable gentleman, of this city, still living, and far advanced in years, endured every suffering, short of death, in this dreadful provost. He was confined alone in an upper dungeon through the extreme severe winter of 1779–80, when the Hudson, opposite this city, and bay were frozen over; without fire or candle-light, and compelled to pace its narrow precincts to keep himself from perishing. Delicacy forbids naming the person, who was spared to fill many honorable stations in society; and who evinced his magnanimity by forgiving his oppressors, although it was impossible to forget the barbarous cruelties he suffered.

At the evacuation of this city by the British, twenty-fifth November, 1783, the main guard in the city-hall, head of Broad-street, and the provost guard were the last that abandoned their stations. As General Washington, with a small body of continentals and a numerous escort of citizens, restored to their long deserted homes, was moving down Chatham-street, and turning into Pearl-street, to proceed to the old fort, Serjeant Keefe considered it time to retreat. A few British subjects remained, for various crimes, in his custody. As he was stepping over the threshold, one of them inquired,

"Serjeant, what is to become of us?"

"You may all go to the d—l together," was his reply, as he threw the ponderous bunch of keys on the floor behind him.

"Thank you, serjeant," was the answer; "we have had too much of your company in this world to follow you to the next."

It has been asserted, that both Cunningham and Keefe came to an ignominious end.

THE QUIET MAN.

"Expressive silence."—Thomson.

YOU would have been delighted with him. He was so unobtrusive, so thoroughly imbued with the spirit of stillness. He was a living rebuke to every thing in nature. His tongue was a superfluity. The rose that unfolds its soft leaves noiselessly in a green-house, and blooms and withers and says never a word, had an existence that he might have envied, or a stream that lapses along delusively without a ripple, his abhorrence of confusion, exercise, and riot was so deep-rooted. I have seen him walk fifty yards around an old cow, reclining in the shade, rather than disturb her cogitations. At school he used to let the birds out of the cages, the mice out of the traps. He would rather suffer any privation than speak. It was wonderful. He was a statue. A bustle acted on him like a spell. A stranger put him on the rack. He closed up in company like a sensitive plant; and the exquisitely susceptible leaves of his mind drew themselves in and shrunk, the moment he was driven from the atmosphere of his own circle. Poor, dear Alfred, to what excruciations he must have been exposed. How the rattle and thunder, the jolting, pushing, and pulling, and all the everlasting agitations and discords of this restless world, must have jarred upon his gentle spirit. What loathings and thrillings, what tremblings and shudderings must have made up the history of his existence. Have you never observed, my attentive reader, if you are afflicted with any wound, a broken arm, a gash upon your finger, or a foot encumbered with one of those visitations of humanity, which defy philosophy to tell the use of, what a tacit and unanimous consent appears to prevail among all your acquaintance to bring themselves violently in contact with the affliction? So it was with Alfred. Every disturbance pursued him. He went to a remote country village, and a barrel of powder exploded under his window. He visited a vessel of war in the bay, and he had no sooner set foot on deck than orders were given to fire a salute. He spent a month in the West Indies, and was driven away by an earthquake. He was on board the steam-boat—when the boiler burst; and in the Albany stage when it overturned. They have lately enlisted him in the militia, though a drum sets his teeth on edge. Poor, dear Alfred! my heart bleeds for him. Yet, in a private corner, who ever spoke more to the purpose? Who ever amassed a greater fund of observation? Who could unbosom himself to a friend more delightfully? Who could whisper more persuasively in a woman's ear? How he pours out his very soul in a letter. What a companion he would make in a prison! What a husband! What a father. What an ornament to society, if he could but talk. What a happy fellow if nature had given him nerve to bear the crash and riot of worldly life.

I met him one morning last summer on my way to the Albany steam-boat, and was pleased to learn that he was bound on the same journey.

"I am going," said he, "to fly from the hubbub of the city, and indulge myself for a month with a country life. Nothing like rural quiet! I shall live till I come back to this infernal bedlam."

As we approached the ferry, a gigantic, ruffian-looking personage grasped his arm with,

"Have a hack, sir?"

"Any oranges to-day, sir?" said a boy.

"Buy a paper?" screamed another.

"Out of the way!" thundered a cartman, as the wheel passed within an inch of our feet.

"Clear the road!" bawled a traveller, panting and dripping with haste, thinking he was too late for the boat.

"All on board," shouted the captain.

The man rang the bell. The steam was let off, bursting by fits from the pipe, the wheel turned and splashed, and the dusty throng gave way to the green waves.

"Thank heaven," said Alfred, uncovering his ears, and taking a long breath, "and now for the country."

A shower came up suddenly, and drove all the passengers into the cabin. Babies screamed. A lap-dog, banished by the corporation law, began to bark. A gentleman at our back favored us with random passages from Cinderella, out of tune atrociously. Alfred had armed himself with a book, and was striving to read; but five worthies, on the same bench, commenced talking politics, and after a few civil preliminaries on the subject of the general state of the country, Poland, the reform bill, the three days, and the doctrine of nullification, started off upon General Jackson and Major Eaton, with that calm and dispassionate temper, which peculiarly distinguishes American gentlemen on board steam-boats, when discussing the affairs of the nation. Alfred shut his book, leaned back, folded his arms, and closed his eyes. Resignation is a virtue. I felt for him from my soul. He is the gentlest of all human creatures. But if Major Eaton had shown himself at the moment, I would scarcely have answered for the consequences. Indeed a little miniature dandy, with plaid pantaloons and a rattan, offering, at the same time, his silver snuff-box, asked him if he did not think Major Eaton had been sadly misused?

"No, sir," replied Alfred. "I abhor his name—he has been ringing in my ears these six months."

Alfred shut his mouth; the person shut his box, and the bell rang for breakfast. Accepting an invitation to accompany him to his retreat, we landed at Newburgh, and crossed over the river to a farm-house, at some distance in the interior. I had only time to spend a day and night with him. He was fond of reading, and had brought with him a few choice authors, to be enjoyed in uninterrupted seclusion.

"Now," said Alfred, as we seated ourselves beneath the low moss-covered shed, which formed the piazza of this humble habitation, "I am entering upon a kind of new existence. 'Happiness,' says Addison, 'is an enemy to pomp and noise;' and, believe me, there is no quiet like that of an obscure country farm-house. Here the thunder of carts and stages over the trembling pavements is never heard. The beating of drums, the shuffling of crowds, and all the innumerable noises of the town are strangers; and where can a man expect to find a more delightful shelter from these pests than here? Where can his memory more clearly recall the passages of his past life, or his wisdom conceive plans for the future? Here for a time evil passions lose their hold, a holy influence deadens our hatreds, and defines more strongly the outlines of our many friendships. I look down on the world from this scene of repose. There is no enemy to whom I would not here extend my hand; my bosom owns an unwonted yearning for those who, however beloved, are overlooked and neglected in the revel and riot of the town; and what lofty temple softens the heart to adoration like this simple and lovely landscape, reposing in a peaceful beauty, untainted with the evils of the world? Here no troubles disturb, no interests clash, no accidents terrify, everything is—"

We were startled by a sudden shout from friend Simon, the farmer. After a pretty profane ejaculation, and a sudden rush by us, so as nearly to overturn the chair on which my friend was seated, he went on shouting,

"Jacob, run, you lazy scoundrel; the hogs are in the corn. Here, Watch; here, Watch; seize 'em, boy. Run, Jacob; seize 'em, boy; run, Jacob; let down the bars."

An enormous house-dog, just from the pond, started through the entry at the call, and shaking the contents of his saturated hair over Alfred, laid his course, barking furiously, towards the intruding, and now alarmed quadrupeds. Simon and Jacob shouted; the pigs squeaked; Watch added to the clamor; the cows bellowed; the geese hissed; the ducks, guinea-hens, and all the inhabitants of the farm-yard, joined the confusion.

"Nothing like rural quiet!" thought I.

At supper we were interrupted by the screams of Jacob. Friend Simon was promoting his education with the end of a rope.

"Poor Jacob!" said Alfred.

"Poor Alfred!" said I; "no interests clash, no accidents disturb!"

We retired to rest early. In the room allotted to us was a clock.

"What a happy thought!" said Alfred. "A clock reminds us that time flies as it proclaims the passing hour."

We were just sinking into a sleep, when the clock struck ten. A rattling noise preceded the operation, and the bell might have been heard through the whole house. It awakened us regularly through the night, at the termination of every sixty minutes.

"What a happy thought!"

The next day was intensely hot. The sun glanced down fiercely. The leaves hung on the trees motionless. The dog lay panting in the shadow, with half a yard of tongue hanging from his mouth. The hens, &c. gathered in secret meetings under the carts and hedges. Alfred got his Shelley, and handed me Milton. Every thing was silent enough. A woman interrupted us with a mop.

"Will the gentlemen please to sit in the other side of the house?"

"Why, what are you going to do?" inquired Alfred, looking up from his book.

"Going to wash the stoop," said the fair intruder, dashing a pail of water over the boards.

We had no sooner fairly settled ourselves in another situation than Jacob came by with a load of wood.

"Pretty Poll," said Jacob.

"Pretty Poll," screamed a voice at our shoulder, in such a discordant tone, that Alfred again put his hands to his ears. It was a parrot, whose tongue thus set in motion, regaled us with such choice specimens of colloquism, as "Pretty Poll! Pretty Poll! Ha, ha, ha! Huzza, huzza! Come to dinner. Ha, ha, ha!"

Alfred looked resolutely at his Shelley. There was a dead silence. He went on with his book, and suddenly turned to me to read a passage of rare beauty.

"Go to work, go to work," said Poll.

"The devil take the fool," said Alfred, flinging down the volume in a passion.

"Stupid fool! Stupid fool!" screamed the bird. "Ha, ha, ha! Ha, ha, ha!"

Poor Alfred! He must soon learn that there is no refuge from a misfortune, the source of which is in himself. Instead of seeking to fly from tumult, he must strive to become familiar with it. The world was not formed for the fastidious or the refined. There is only one place of rest, and long may it be ere he lies in its stillness. SEDLEY.

LETTERS FROM ENGLAND.

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

THE OPERA—PASTA—TAGLIONI, ETC.

WHO has not heard of Pasta? The "glorious Pasta"—the "divine Pasta"—the "immortal Pasta"—the Pasta whose fame has reached every part of Europe where a musician lives or an opera-house exists; and who, despite of professional rivalries and jealousies, is allowed by universal acclamation—by competent and incompetent judges—to have "touched the topmost point of greatness" in her profession? After an absence of three years from England, she made her appearance at the King's theatre, upon which occasion nearly all the beauty and fashion of the metropolis assembled to welcome her return; together with a few individuals, like your humble servant, neither particularly beautiful nor fashionable. I cannot say but that I attended rather to appease my feelings of awakened curiosity than from any sanguine anticipations of pleasure, because I thought that my ignorance of the Italian language would be a drawback, not to be counterbalanced by the talents of the actress, or a bald English translation or version of the opera; but, without any affectation, I can safely say I came away as much gratified as astonished, and as much astonished as a person of an equable temperament can well be. Pasta is certainly sui generis. There have been many good actors and many good singers, but such a union of musical excellence and Siddonian power, passion, grace, and majesty does not, never did, and it may be, never will exist again in the same person. She stands alone: no comparison between her and any other will hold good—though not so much on the score of inferiority as dissimilarity. The piece selected for her debut was Mayer's grand serious opera of Medea, a part with which Madame Pasta has become identified, and of which she holds undisputed possession. All who have the slightest smattering of classicality are familiar with the history of Jason and the Golden Fleece: his desertion of his lawful spouse Medea, his subsequent bigamous conduct in espousing the Princess Creusa, and the fearful retaliation of his ex-wife. The dramatist has followed the old story or fable very closely; and the predominating passions are consequently love, jealousy, rage, and revenge, with a suitable climax of horror. I have seen many fine performances, but I never saw one in which the actor appeared more terrifically in earnest than in this instance. She was a complete whirlwind of the passions: a southern vehemence pervaded every look and gesture; yet, for all that, there was not any thing in her acting in the slightest degree overstrained or artificial, or which the most phlegmatic spectator could point out as not justified by her situation in the scene. In the first act, when endeavoring to prevent Jason's marriage, she is merely a sublime temptress; and it is only in the second, after all her efforts prove fruitless, and she resolves upon revenge, that her real triumph commences. Certainly nothing could be finer or more touching than the irresolution with which she regards her children when meditating their murder—her alternate fierceness and tenderness—her unavailing wish that she could only kill their father's part in them—the deadly hatred with which she regards them as Jason's offspring, and the love and pity into which she relapses as she feels they are likewise her own. Despair was never more truly or beautifully personified, than, when about to strike the fatal blow, she suddenly feels all a mother's fondness tugging at her heart-strings—her uplifted arm falls powerless by her side, her head sinks upon her bosom, and she stands for a few seconds as in a trance—helpless and desolate. The voice of Jason, heard in pursuit of her, rouses and lashes her into fury, bordering on insanity, and the unnatural murder is at length consummated. I have somewhat of an Indian contempt for gesticulation on ordinary occasions, holding it to be Frenchified, frivolous, and ridiculous; and all species of attitudinizing is my especial abhorrence. If ever I be executed for murder, it will be for discharging a pistol from the pit of the theatre at some fellow who, at sight of a ghost or an injured friend, has thrown his legs and arms into what he conceives a beautiful position, and loath to give the audience too little of a good thing, continues them in it, until the applause his evolution has excited subsides, to the entire destruction of the illusion of the scene. But action, when there is heart and soul in it, and when every movement is apparently the result of the feeling of the moment, is a universal language; and it is extraordinary what a sensation may at times be produced by the sweep of an arm or the pointing of a finger. Pasta is continually in motion. I do not know whether she wants repose in other parts—in Medea the violence of the passions called into play will not admit of it—but there is a grace, variety, and fiery vehemence in her gestures and manner, the very opposite of theatrical calculation and display. Some of her attitudes are the very essence of the "sublime and beautiful." She appears to have something else to think about than how the extremities of her person are conducting themselves. The closing scene, when, after the murder of her children, she confronts Jason, throws the dagger reeking with their blood towards him, exclaiming, as he turns away with horror, "Ha! traitor—dost thou shun me?" is perfectly appalling. Of Pasta's astonishing voice it may be said that its claims to pre-eminence rest rather upon its enormous power than its quality—not that it is deficient in the latter respect, but that the former is its distinguishing characteristic; the manner in which it fills and rings through the immense opera-house is wonderful. It is, in the lower tones, what is termed a "veiled" voice—that is, in plain English, rather husky; but this, which to others would be a serious disadvantage, is, on many occasions, of signal service to Pasta, particularly in depicting the stronger passions, such as despair or horror; the upper tones are remarkably full and clear, and all that can be desired. Upon the whole, I think she is one of the wonders of the age, whose merits have not been over-rated; and, if ever she cross the Atlantic, I am not afraid that what I have ventured to say in her behalf will appear at all exaggerated.

London is certainly a pleasant place in many respects—you can have the very best of every thing if you desire it, and merely for paying extravagantly for it. As soon as the first singer in the world, in her line, had withdrawn her claims to public attention for the evening, the first dancer in the world, to wit, Taglioni, put in hers. Do not be afraid! My enthusiasm about her was only transitory, and I am not going to be eloquent or tedious (as the discriminating or foolish reader may think me) in her praise, to any alarming extent. Besides, there is nothing astonishing about Taglioni—at least according to the common acceptance of the word—nothing to gape and wonder at; and in any of the minor theatres in London, or elsewhere, I have no doubt she would be accounted immensely inferior to Mademoiselle Celeste, Constance, Heloise, and other spinners around on one leg, who unblushingly call themselves dancers. Her style is rather distinguished by ease, grace, and elegance, than energy and spirit. She has not the fire or nimbleness of Ronzi Vestris, but her manner is more refined; and she has less of the trickery of the art than even that polished danseuse. Perhaps there are as many points of resemblance between Taglioni and Mrs. Austin as can possibly exist between two accomplished mistresses of such widely different arts. (Every thing now-a-days, dancing, tailoring, and cookery comes under the comprehensible head of "arts and sciences.") Both exhibit the same heedlessness of mere effect, and appear to have about an equal contempt for what the French term a tour de force. A degree of languor, almost amounting to indifference, seems to pervade both, and both achieve the most difficult triumphs in their art with so little effort that the uninitiated spectator remains almost unconscious that any thing particular has been accomplished. Both, in short, belong to that scarce and valuable class of public characters who seek rather to delight than astonish—who appeal rather to the good sense and good taste of the few than the "ignorant wonder" of the many.

Of the Opera-house or King's theatre itself, I have but little to say. It is very large and very plain—almost shabby. If there be no ostentation in having it so, there is a good deal of pride—and pride, whether it seek to distinguish itself by glitter or plainness, is much the same thing. The great attraction at it now is the "wonderful, most wonderful, and yet again wonderful" Paganini. John Bull and he had some words about the prices of admission; when John, for the first time in his long life, resisted being imposed upon by a foreign artiste of distinction, which I take to be one of the most remarkable events of the year 1831. Paganini modestly requested that the prices should be advanced to three guineas per head, (fifteen dollars!) upon which some wag petitioned that sixpences be no longer called, as they have been from time immemorial, "fiddler's change." THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 116.

"Oh, Gilderoy, bethought we then
So soon, so sad to part."

As I was sitting, the other night, in my obscure room, the lamp grew dim, shot up a gleam, and expired. I bent from the window, for I was weary of solitude and sad thoughts, and my eyes wandered, instinctively, upwards across the unlimited expanse. A calm was on all nature; a few parted clouds were arranged in a kind of order across the sky, like silver waves breaking over that azure beach, and the brilliant stars flashed like precious gems strewn along the shores of some lovelier world. The northern constellations had gone far on their silent way, around their central star, betraying the flight of time; and, ever and anon, from the zenith dimly gleamed forth the gibbous moon with a pale and waning glory, like a hero fallen and still struggling on; or a dying beauty, faintly smiling as the flood of life ebbs from her veins. What a stupendous page doth nature nightly open for the perusal of men in the midnight heavens! I know not with what emotions others contemplate the turning of this wonderful leaf in the volume of the universe, but it teaches me with a spirit's language. The voice of all my passions is still. Calmness and grandeur are in my imagination, and the ever multiplying local motives which make men vile and groveling, fade to specks and melt into nothing. You should read Milton at such an hour, or think over his sublimest passages. You will wish night eternal, and your existence to be thus borne upwards with the wings of contemplation, drinking the everlasting glory like an element.

While these reveries were lapsing in fragments through my fancy, like the broken leaves and branches which mellow autumn strews along the bosom of her winding streams, a cloud, that had gradually gathered itself together in silvery masses, floating by the moon, opened its side and gave forth a rosy light different from the trembling lustre of the heaven. It emitted a meteor star, which fell from the height, and suddenly the Genius stood by my side.

"The blessing of the night upon thee, Master Student," he said. "Thou art a right good fellow; and I love thee better for that thou art poorly equipped with worldly wisdom, and therefore doomed to pass obscurely among thy fellow-creatures. Elsewhere troublest thou thy silly brain touching the unprofitable times of midnight. Canst thou coin the moon and those precious gems thou drestest of but now? What jeweller will take them and give thee gold? Thou art riding bravely among the stars to-night; but when thou shalt wend thy way to-morrow among the crowd, with heavy eyes and a solitary bosom, what hast thou learned to get thee dollars? Where are thy books—thy plans—thy bargains? What scheme hast thou formed to cheat thy neighbor, or speculate on thy friend? What stock hast thou examined? What league hast thou formed? Fair, indeed, gentle student, showy on beaming heavens; but not over those sparkling fields lies the path to wealth."

"But to knowledge," said I, "to reflection—lead they not thither?" "Tush," simple youth. "What care the eaters and drinkers around thee for these, unless they may be turned into money? But come, I am thy friend; and thou shalt at least learn that thy very obscurity and solitude shelter thee from dire evils, and that even in this, thy time is not lost."

The glass revealed a magnificent mansion, from the window of which the wealthy owner leaned like me, and looked out upon the night; but not like me, to find a joy in every object. He turned his dim eyes wearily abroad, and laid his hand upon his forehead with a groan. His cheeks were flushed with hectic, his temples racked with pangs. A few white hairs told of age, and the wrinkled and haggard features betrayed sickness and sorrow.

"What avails his wealth," said the Genius, "although he hath acquired gold beyond his amplest expectations? But look at him as the leaden lids fall over his blood-shot eyes, and that sigh heaves his breast. Listen—he speaks."

"Oh death," said the sufferer, with a tremulous voice, "wilt thou never end this anguish? Wherefore have I drawn upon me this protracted mockery?" A slight breeze came rustling over the treetops, and blew the gorgeous damask curtain across his face. He put it away. "Cursed splendor," he exclaimed. "For these hollow ornaments I have wasted my youth. Dear spirit of health, I have driven thee from my bosom. What spell hath gold to strengthen these shrivelled limbs—to smooth this seamed brow—to banish these agonizing tortures? What affluence can recall the simple joys I have trampled down in this accursed pursuit? Have I quenched the fire of my eyes and the lustre of my soul, to be a word in the mouths of men—to please my palate with poisons—to enervate my frame with fatal luxuries? Fool—madman that I have been."

He paused again, and regarded the being who reposed on the couch. A faint light fell on her features. A cold repulsive face—and I knew her mind was coarse and her heart bad.

"Foul minion, and instrument of my ruin!" he muttered, "thou too hast come to me linked with gold. For thee and thy cankered treasures, I turned from the dear face of that gentle creature who sleeps now where no cares oppress. For her sweet lips I took thy abhorred kisses—for her thrilling words of love, thy repulsive murmurs—for her pure and devoted bosom—"

He laid his forehead upon a carved marble table—agitation shook his nervous form—the cool air played unfelt in his dishonored locks.

"Weep on, old man," said the Genius, as the scene disappeared; "thousands like thee learn too late the perils of sacrificing nature to fashion. But look, yonder is a scene of a different description."

My heart leaped at the picture of fairy happiness and beauty, the most enchanting that earth can present. No chaste temple gleaming with classic columns in the moonlight was this—no dazzling army in triumphant march—no throned monarch, or glittering revel. Simpler by far, but surer to strike upon the finest chords of feeling, and make them vibrate with the dearest touch of pleasure. A father—a noble and happy father—gazing with folded arms on his children—the loveliest children you ever saw—a group of unshadowed morning flowers conjured up in the beauty of some summer wood, or gems newly formed by the hand of nature, yet unbroken or unsoiled in the dark traffic of life. To me there is an irresistible attraction in such a sight. There is something holy in their perfect innocence and joy. There is a rebuking spirit in their presence which turns the eyes of the dark-thoughted man inward, with a gloomy consciousness that he has wandered forever from their sunny places. It oppresses him with a mournful envy. It is Satan gazing over into the garden of Eden.

Happy the man, if any there be, who can muse on such a group, and be stirred with no unwelcome comparisons. As for me, I feel that I am almost an intruder in these bright circles, and quite a hypocrite. I have a knowledge of evil which would blast their budding hopes, yet I gaze on them with a trembling tenderness and solicitude. I marvel at their power to win upon my feelings. What pictures of bewitching and unconscious beauty forever strike my eye; how the outreaching tendrils of my soul twine around them with a sweet impulse in every motion, and with what reluctant duty I loosen their hold to go abroad coldly upon my worldly path! Oh! could they linger forever thus about the beautiful threshold of life, forever preserve the tones of their silvery voices, the glances of their unabashed and beaming eyes, the smiles that play even in sleep about the freshness of those cherub lips, and the sinless thoughts that float through their minds, like daybreak clouds, through heaven. Could I touch those perfect creatures with a spell to fright away the gaunt and hungry demons of human life—to roll from them the pestilential vapors that shall soon chill their tender limbs—to crush the reptiles that shall sting—the monsters that must tear them!

Something of these ideas employed the thoughts of the father, as he left this brightly peopled home to go abroad and amass gold. Forth went the proud parent, and fortune blessed his toil. His ships came safely and swiftly from their far wanderings, laden with precious treasures. His buildings rose up like palaces. The key of the great temple was in his hand, and with a triumphant step he entered and counted the vast heaps that constituted him lord over his fellow-men. If this potent charm can gloss over baseness, and invest the dull and ignorant with power to sway mighty minds,—if it can wash white the crimson hands of murder, and transform dishonesty into wisdom, what unlimited grandeur doth it give to him, who even in the lowest vale of poverty, would have been great and noble.

The successful laborer was forming vast plans of benevolence. The fragrant incense of flattery rose up around him, and the Genius pointed out to me the transcendent form of happiness, invisible to all else, as she leaned over from a radiant cloud in the act of placing a wreath upon his temples, when the massive gates were burst open with a sudden violence, and a pale and breathless messenger rushed into his presence. The form and the wreath faded away; a shadow fell upon all things; the sounds of revel were hushed like the audacious hopes of his bosom; and the hollow voice of the messenger was heard with fearful distinctness: "Death has entered thy mansion."

The glass changed; I saw the father bending over the dead form of his youngest born, a fair boy, with his mother's face. His eyes were only half closed. Their blue light yet came faintly through the lashes; words seemed bursting from the parted lips, and the little cold hands laid on the bosom as he had placed them, when he murmured "father," and grew thus still. The bereaved parent was yet gazing on the lost treasure. The sun was slowly sinking and gorgeously, even as it had gone down yesterday, when the voice—never again to thrill his bosom—greeted its golden hues. A rosy beam glanced suddenly into the darkened chamber, and lighted its dead, sweet face. When the heart is full of grief, what a touch overflows it. No one saw the father's features buried in silence by his wrecked hope. How apt are mortals to deem themselves sunk into the lowest grade of misery, till Providence opens a yet deeper chasm to their startled sight. As he clasped his surviving child, he gazed with pride on the tall princely boy who bore his own manly features—fashioned for daring enterprise, and inspired with high ambition. What hideous fancy casts over him the same fatal sickness which had bereft him of his lowlier flower? With re-awakened horror he marks the drooping of the boy's spirits—the fever-flush of his cheeks.

"Dear father," said the fading invalid, "shall I be like my brother? Must I leave you and lie so still—my head is dizzy, father—my flesh burns—oh save me from these dreadful pains."

I dare not stand with the parent by the bedside of so beloved a creature, while disease is putting him to excruciating tortures and death waits ready to receive him. At length the little victim held up his lips, wiped the damp drops from his veined forehead, and said, "I am better,—my pain has gone—kiss me, dear father—it is very dark—where are you, my father?"

A gleam of vivid hope shot like lightning through the mind of the watcher over that sick bed; and with a convulsive joy he pressed his lips upon the murmuring mouth, when—why broke not his bursting heart at once?—he unfolded his embrace from a soulless image—a warm statue that mocked his gushing love—only silence answered his call, and he knew that his son was dead. Anguish pierced his bosom like an arrow. A ghastly paleness blanched his horror-struck face—his lips quivered, and he clasped his trembling hands together. "Mercy, mercy, oh God, on a childless man!—Stifle in this crushed bosom this yearning, wasted love—drive from my ears these young voices—from my memory these radiant forms. Let the lightning strike me. Let this monstrous disease feed on my shuddering frame. Why have they been blasted in their innocence and joy, and I left, against the course of nature and my own will? Why has this heavenly vision gleamed before me to plunge me in ten thousand fold darkness?" He tore his hair. He uttered fearful words. My soul shrunk appalled, and I covered my face with my hands, and strove to shut out from my ears his piercing shrieks.

"Look again," said my companion. Slowly I cast around my eyes. The everlasting heavens were before me as I had at first seen them, and a quiet grave-yard. Two green mounds and freshly covered lay there. A silent man stood by their side. His face was very pale, but calm with holy meditation. "Here," said the Genius, "is the spell of reflection. The tears that glitter in the moonlight come from a softened and elevated heart. Keep thyself, therefore, Master Student, ever open to the influences of nature. They will temper the gross feelings that grow up from the earth. In triumph they check ambition—in anguish they banish despair. Evil passions are abashed in their presence, while the timid virtues that shrink from the glare of day come forth and speak forgotten lessons of truth. But see, the moon now dimly lights the scene with level beams, and many stars have vanished behind the west. What earthly pleasures mayest thou look to grasp firmly, when even these thousand orbs pass away from thy enamored gaze? Remember, when the flaming sun shall usurp this tranquil scene, yield not thou to the temptations of pleasure or the importunities of despair—and when again the revolutions of the universe shall bring back night and silence, measure thyself, thy joys and thy sorrows with the vast objects around, and acknowledge the fallacy of the one and the folly of the other."

A strain of music, like blended voices in the distance, swelled softly on the breeze as I found myself alone; and far off, through the transparent heavens, I traced the track of the fiery star, till it melted away in the faint morning light.

"Strange," I thought, "that life should be made of paradoxes; that nature should be thus the friend and the enemy of man; that she should be years in rearing a fabric of bliss, and yet dash it to the ground in a moment. Yet death being necessary and inevitable, what else than a conviction that the ground on which we here tread is unstable, and ever passing away beneath our feet, could reconcile us to our own evanescence? How instinctively the soul turns from the blow of misfortune to the consideration that it is readier to take its flight upon the untried hereafter! Who could meet, with composure, the sublimely terrible crisis to which all are hastening, but that fate has ever been dissolving, one after another, the earthly objects which his affections had grasped? It is in the deepening midnight of human anguish that the star of religious hope beams with the brightest lustre." F.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

A POET'S DAUGHTER.

Written for Miss * * *, at the request of her father,
BY MR. HALLECK.

"A LADY asks the minstrel's rhyme."
A lady asks?—There was a time,
When, musical as play-bells chime
To wearied boy,
That sound would summon dreams sublime
Of pride and joy.

But now the spell hath lost its sway,
Life's first-born fancies first decay,
Gone are the plumes and pennons gay
Of young romance;
There linger but her ruins gray
And broken lance.

"This is no world," so Hotspur said,
For "tilting lips" and "mammets" made,
No longer in love's myrtle shade
My thoughts recline—
I'm busy in the cotton trade,
And sugar line.

"Tis youth, 'tis beauty asks—the green
And growing leaves of seventeen
Are round her; and, half hid, half seen,
"A violet flower:
"Nursed by the virtues she hath been
"From childhood's hour."

Blind passion's picture—yet for this
We woo the life-long bridal kiss,
And blend our every hope of bliss
With her's we love;
Her's—who admired a serpent's hiss
In Eden's grove!

Beauty—the fading rainbow's pride,
Youth—twas the charm of her who died
At dawn, and, by her coffin's side,
A grandsire stands;
Age-strengthened, like the oak, storm-ried,
Of mountain lands.

Youth's coffin—hush the tale it tells!
Be silent, memory's funeral bells!
Lone in my heart, her home, it dwells,
Untold till death,
And where the grave-mound greenly swells
O'er buried faith.

"But she who asks hath rank and power,
"And treasured gold, and banner'd tower,
"A kingdom for her marriage dower,
"Broad seas and lands;
"Armies her train, a throne her bower,
"A queen commands!"

A queen? Earth's regal suns have set.
Where perished Marie Antoinette?
Where's Bordeaux's mother? where the jet-
Black Haytian dame?
And Lusitania's coronet?
And Angoulême?

Empires to-day are upside down,
The castle kneels before the town,
The monarch fears a printer's frown,
A brick-bat's range—
Give me, in preference to a crown,
Five shillings change.

"Another asks—though first among
"The good, the beautiful, the young,
"The birthright of a spell more strong
"Than these hath brought her;
"She is your kinswoman in song,
"A poet's daughter!"

A poet's daughter? Could I claim
The consanguinity of fame,
Veins of my intellectual frame,
Your blood would glow
Proudly, to sing that gentlest name
Of aught below!

A poet's daughter! Dearer word
Lip hath not spoke, nor listener heard;
Fit theme for song of bee and bird
From morn till even,
And wind-harp, by the breathing stirred
Of star-lit heaven.

My spirit's wings are weak—the fire
Poetic comes but to expire,
Her name needs not my humble lyre
To bid it live;
She hath already from her sire
All bard can give.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

INTERCEPTED LETTER FROM SARATOGA.

Congress-hall, August 22.

TWELVE, dear Imogene—only twelve! and every footfall is hushed in this castle of folly, and even the rioters in "Rattle-row" seem to have mistaken the hour, and are still. The ball broke up—no one knew why. There was something in the air, or, perhaps, a string out of tune in the orchestra, or there was a conspiracy among the wall-flowers, or there were poppies among the wreaths, or something—the gods know what—which, on the very stroke of twelve, turned every face to the door, and compressed every lip with a smothered yawn of weariness. And so here I am, in a place called by courtesy a room, but better described as an office in the wall, wakeful as a "nightingale with her breast against a thorn," and just so much out of humor with my newest flame that I can think pleasantly of you—you, who are so constant, (to caprice,) and who, if you were not my cousin, and unsuspicious of a cut, I should weary of, offend, and forget, as, in my utter fickleness, I weary of the rest of your delicious sex, one by one, and offend and forget them. Is this profane?

I am to "send you a chronicle"—of what? You did not specify, and it is so pleasant to gaze at one's self, that I have half a mind to fill it with my own dear experiences—cutting you out of all your expected scandal and news of matches made and marred, (or, as Phil writes it, since the pretty Julia's mother dismissed him, ma'd.) I say I have a great mind to tell you what I have achieved and suffered, whom I like and don't like, and who likes me and does not like me, instead of feeding with the world's opinions and the world's preferences, the appetite to which I have all my life contributed, and which is so morbid as to need all my memory, and a great deal of my imagination—your curiosity, my lady cousin!

If you would not show my letter, I could be so scandalous! But you will. Abuse of one's friends is the only sweet morsel human nature is eager to share, and like the fragrance of your own flowering orange, it is infinitely divisible—though, unlike it, too, it is never dissipated in air. Oh, such precious calumnies! Such deliciously diabolical suspicions! Such magnificently desperate deductions as I will whisper to you across your scrap work-table on the first evening you shall devote to me after my return! Ah! it is a sweet world, cousin Imogene! You have no enemy so pure that they have not a slander in pickle for her! No rake on your visiting list so delightfully wicked that they cannot whitewash him with a "but." Things are better managed now than they "used-to-was." The wind is tempered to the shorn lamb. The sins are saddled upon the saints. "Cause why?" They are better able to bear them! Commend me to an enlightened philosophy if I ever should grow wicked.

You would know what we are doing at Congress-hall. It is the same old chapter of agreeable inconsistencies—the same old round as ever of fun, folly, and flirtation. He must be a young observer who does not know that the bad passions are the best dressed part of the Feeling family, and he must be "very hignorant," as Paul Shack would observe, who thinks there is one heart in a thousand beating under those satin bodices that forgets every thing but the pleasure of the dance, and keeps time with light pulses to Johnson's leading fiddle. Oh, heavens! I have seen such expressions flit over an admired lip! I have heard such tones as I loitered about the staircase, when "that circumstance called a husband" received his admired wife from the hands of her waltzing partner! It was a wise writer of allegories that represented pain and pleasure as changing masks in the dance after happiness!

Yet is there much here to soften a cynic, after all. There is a distinguished belle, who deserves all her brilliant reputation, and, I verily believe, has a heart beyond incense, and a world of her own into which the flutterers about her never enter; and there are celebrated women—one, certainly, if no more—whose freshness of feeling, and delicacy, and taste, are as unimpaired as her transcendent beauty, and whose feet, my dear Imogene, (and this is saying much) are as pretty as your own, and whose immense dark eyes (and this, too, is saying much) look a passion as movingly as yours, and far more powerfully. Mrs. — walked into the drawing-room on the evening of her arrival, leaning on her husband's arm, and I think I never saw the five hundred nonchalants who throng that immense hall so strongly impressed. With a figure as majestic as Juno, and her long fine neck drawn up to its fullest height, she fell into the tide of promenaders, and passed her Webster-like, lamping eyes slowly over the revolving multitude as they turned and re-turned, and I made up my mind at once, that if she was not the Rebecca of Ivanhoe, rediviva, she was some celebrated woman of whom I had heard, and whom I must contrive, at any hazard, to know. She soon found an acquaintance, whose acquaintance I instantly made, and now, after a week's devotion, I write of her with a mounting of reverent admiration in my heart, for she is all she has been said to be and more, and I—will tell you more about her when we meet.

Then there are others, some of whom I have met before, and some of whom I have not—two much admired women, not long married, of whom I had often heard, lovely beings both, and a Green Mountain belle, riant and brilliant, and one or two lady-autocrats, an intellectual and a fashionable, and a troop of others of various degrees of attractiveness, in the obscurest of whom it is possible there exist charms, which, in this confused manner of life, we have not discovered, and who, with every claim to admiration and preference, go about with the wheel of society, completely lost among its more dazzling radii.

Among other bagatelles the wits here have got up a manuscript gazette, of which I inclose a specimen or two. It is circulated, of course, only among the illuminati, and, of course, is tolerably harmless.

The following is said to have been found by the blanchisseuse in the pantaloons pocket of a celebrated beau:

TO —.

I love you, lady Mary, dearly,
I've told you so a thousand times,
In all my notes 'twas hinted clearly,
And said expressly in my rhymes.
I think your voice is very sweet,
I think your eyes are very blue,
You have the dearest little feet,
And you've a winning way with you.
But, do you know, sweet lady Mary,
You're very, very visionary!

Oh yes! for you're in love with me!
I'm very glad of it, I'm sure,
But then you are not rich, you see,
And I—you know—I'm very poor.
'Tis true that I can drive a tandem,
'Tis true that I can turn a sonnet,
'Tis true I leave the law at random,
When I should study, (plague upon it!)
I waltz (you told me so) divinely,
I know the color for a glove,
I think I flatter (don't I?) finely,
And I'm the deuce at making love;
But this is not (excuse me) money,
(A thing they give for house and land,
And we must eat in matrimony,
And love is neither bread nor honey,
And so—you understand!)

The following is addressed to the gentleman who keeps Congress-hall. It is bagatelle of course, for the assiduous kindness and politeness of Mr. W. leave no apology for complaint. The wonder is, that so far from the city, he supplies the wants of his immense number of guests so well. Colonizing is a method of accommodating those (and there are many) who will go to no other house—i. e. sending them out to lodge, though they dine, &c. at Congress-hall table.

LETTER TO MR. WESTCOTT.

Colony of Batchelors—Extreme Settlement.

Six o'clock, A. M.—Mr. Westcott! Mr. Westcott! this is an overall! That I am alive, I thank the gods! That I am up so early, I may, without gratitude, thank you. I left your house last night at an early hour. With a repetition of your instructions, I departed for my probable lodgings. It rained. I was in pumps. Most pumps stand water. Mine do not. I reached the colony as a wooden clock in the next grocery struck twelve. There was no lamp, and you had given me no hint of the household geography. I felt for a door—entered—felt for a bed—woke a woman and a child, and retreated precipitately. I opened the next door, and listened. From a quintette of snorers (male) I concluded it was occupied by my half-a-score of room-mates. Entered very gingerly, upon tiptoe, and put out my feelers for a bed. Laid my hand upon a whisker, and heard instantly the cock of a pistol. With a cold sweat and a prayer for safe deliverance, I dropped upon my knees and remained crouched for five minutes. Ventured once more to feel for a bed. Woke a very profane person, and missed a dress looking-glass, which shivered to pieces on the wall, just behind me. Found a bed in the general disturbance, and turned in with a delusive hope that my trials were over.

In about fifteen minutes after the quiet of the room was restored, the door opened, and a gentleman entered with a very heavy tread. I remembered meeting a remarkably fat person on the piazza. I was in the sixth bed. He came along, laying his hand on each of my fellow-lodgers—by their impressions, not very softly. He had felt of five, and I discovered by his soliloquy that he thought there were but six beds in the room, though the natural syllogism in his mind, (that the sixth should be empty) did not occur to me. He was down upon me the next moment with the weight of an elephant. That my ribs are not broken, I consider a special providence. I have the satisfaction of knowing what I can bear and survive. I write in a state of superfluities. I have no thickness. I shall take you literally if you call me a fat.

Nine o'clock, forenoon.—We are all prisoners. The porter has carried off our boots, and forgotten to return them. There are no slippers in the house, and it rains like a waterfall. The fat gentleman is in a mounting passion. Of the rest, some swear by fits, and some sit, playing a tune with their heels, upon the bed, in sulky resignation. There is a mute understanding that breakfast should not be mentioned.

Eleven o'clock.—No signs of the porter. The fat gentleman has walked to Congress-hall in his stockings. There is a faint hope in the colony that the porter may remember us by noon. Two of our fellow sufferers have begun to dress for dinner. I think I could chew a little twine, or brown paper with some satisfaction.

One o'clock.—We have chosen a committee to strangle the porter—if he come. Two of the gentlemen are delirious. We have enacted a play—"Ugolino and his children starving in the Tower." You-go-lean-o was played feelingly. Some of the audience were in tears.

Half-past one.—Thank heaven our boots are here! The porter was to have been strangled, but the committee were too weak. I wait for my turn at the glass to dress for dinner.

The following was written to a lady who tied her broken shoe-string round the author's wrist, and bade him swear fidelity upon it for a week.

A lady's favor on my wrist!
'Tis not of silver, nor of gold,
'Tis not a wreath that she has kissed,
Nor beads in lovely penance told.
'Tis not of flowers and not of pearl,
Nor dainty silk, nor braided curl,
Yet over it my fancy lingers,
And on it fondly gaze I now—
She tied it with her own fair fingers,
And bade me swear on it a vow;
What was it, think you? Entire nous—
The string that tied my lady's shoe!
Oh Cupid! that I have it here!
The band that laced her fairy feet!
That this old string, at sixpence dear,
Should e'er have felt her pulses beat;
That this old broken string has swayed
To her slight ankle's springing nerve,
Mas with her motion stirr'd and played,
Still clinging to the graceful curve.
And now that mine—my pulse should flow
And swell to the same ribbon's touch,
To the same limit come and go!
Great Venus! is it not too much?
Take the starr'd cestus from your waist,
A shoe-string would be better taste.
Yet is my fate well imaged here,
For, though I live in beauty's eye,
And though I breathe in beauty's sphere,
My boon's at best, a broken tie.
If e'er I win a parting token,
'Tis something that has lost its power,
A chain that has been used and broken,
A ruined glove, a faded flower,
Something that makes my pleasure less,
Something that means forgetfulness.
And yet my tears are little worth,
For could I win a seraph's smile
To light me through this weary earth,
'Twould tire me in the briefest while;
For, lady, (is it very wrong?)
We hate you when you love too long!

The foregoing article was received from Mr. WILLIS, with the information that he would be in town, and prepared to enter upon his avocations in this establishment, in the course of a few days. The announcement of his accession to the editorial department of the Mirror will be found in a succeeding page.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE ADVENTURES OF A SAILOR.

"Misery acquaints a man with strange bed-fellows."

I NEVER gaze upon a fine ship without emotion. It fills my mind with striking images, and seems like a messenger from the other world. It teems with spirit-stirring associations of dangers and wonders; of fields where the earth is clothed with a different verdure; of mountains that mingle with the skies; of climes where man and nature are seen under surprising forms, and where the very stars that crowd out upon the soft blue floor of heaven, like maskers at a revel, would flash on me with strange faces and in novel groups. Immortal Jove, what a sensation! to gaze upon the broad sky, and miss the very constellations you have traced since your childhood, or to behold them in such altered positions that you are bewildered even there, where, at home, through every change in the fickle hearts about you, these ever watchful and familiar friends were sure to be constant. How the mind of one who has sojourned for years in a single spot, contracts with the perpetual contemplation of its petty features, its common-place insignificant interests, its bargains, its friendships, its loves! How it opens and expands, as if endowed with new attributes, when borne from the narrow circle, abroad over opposite quarters of this revolving globe, where even the common earth and the everlasting heavens speak to it in a new language. I should fear to expose myself to the intensity of such feelings. I should tremble lest the flood of vast thought rushing through my mind, should overwhelm and wash away a world of pleasant prejudices and simple tastes; and, as some philosophers have argued upon the possibility of propelling an object so far beyond the attractive power of the earth as to prevent its return, so the impulse received by my imagination might hurl it too far above the gentle ties that keep it now for ever lingering about society, and force it, irrevocably, upon an endless and solitary flight. I was partly cured of this passion by hearing the history of poor Tom Harvey. He too had a propensity for travelling, from which the death of all those whom he most loved took every restraint. He also burned to fly from his tedious routine of stale objects and melancholy meditations; and was eager to depart, as a prisoner is to be released from his dungeon. He longed to see the shores of his native land melting away, like a storm-cloud, in the horizon; and feel himself bounding over the waters in one of those winged creatures, and perusing with his own eyes each wonder in the page of life and nature. He had been quick and studious at school, and had therefore acquired a good education, although his parents, who held a respectable station in society, died before he was fourteen. The four succeeding years were spent in heart-sickening struggles among the crowd for leave to breathe the air of heaven, and keep up the poor existence of which he had already grown weary. Every month was fraught with labor unrewarded, and hope mocked. Disappointment, humiliation, insult, at length drove him to a species of desperation. Poverty, grief, sickness, which came over him about that period, and certain other circumstances, needless to mention, completely cowed down his hope and ruined his peace. He saw nothing before him but the prospect of want and misery, and nothing in the retrospect but youth's clear and sunny tranquillity now passed away forever. To such a being a ship was full of fascination, and it was not long before he found himself on board the good brig Commerce, bound to the East Indies.

Alas! how different is the reality from our anticipations of it! The farther he sailed from his once despoised home, the more strongly his heart yearned towards it. The glorious freedom he expected he found but slavery in one of its worst forms. Poetry has a trick of shedding lustre upon things which, in real life, are dark and miserable. Poor Tom soon discovered the difference between his old dreams of the sea, while watching the vessel as she lay like a rock upon the smooth water of the harbor, the silver-crested ripples breaking against her side, and the toil of the laboring mariners when the brig hung upon the mountainous billows, or shook as they thundered over her deck. Behold the young sailor-boy treading his native fields on his way from home, with the beauty of youth in his countenance, and its light in his heart, and you will scarcely recognize him in the wretch wearied with work, submissive like a dog to his master's commands, drenched with the wintry waves, stiffened with cold and toil, creeping from his berth at midnight, just as the "honey-heavy dew of slumber" had sealed his eyes, and forced to mount the reeling mast amid the roar of surges. Poor Tom! Let not the children of luxury and ease complain at the outbreaking of thy merry soul on shore. Brief moment of mirth, and dearly bought with many an hour of toil and danger. On their way to the East Indies the master of the Commerce had directions to touch at a cluster of islands in the South Pacific, for the purpose of obtaining a supply of a curious fish, only to be taken there, and of great value in China. These islands were peopled by a race of savages, of which little was known. Report had sometimes represented them as ferocious cannibals, and again, as a peaceful and harmless people, with whom might be carried on a lucrative trade. The brig, after a long and stormy voyage, at length reached these beautiful places. Tom, for a moment, forgot his troubles as a group of islands appeared in the tranquil sea, clothed with luxuriance, and loading the surrounding air with fragrance. It is a thrilling sight, after months spent upon the upheaving deck, gazing on the everlasting ocean and sky, and breathing the salt-sea air, with not a living creature abroad to remind one of his race, as if a new flood, never to subside, had overwhelmed nature, and watching only the monsters of the deep, as they come forth by chance from their hidden haunts, or the restless sea-birds wheeling and screaming; it is a thrilling joy, for the eye to dwell upon the grateful green of forests with their quiet shadows, to smell the scent of flowery meadows, to tread upon the "firm set earth," to hear the bees and birds, and recognize the goings on of nature, as we loved them in our boyish days of idle hope and pleasure.

I do not know whether our poor sailor felt all these as I should feel them. Perhaps he thought too much of his safety, for he made one of twenty-five muscular fellows who, each armed with musket and sabre, and with pistols in his belt, slowly and cautiously approached the Eden-looking spot, which might nevertheless be inhabited by fiends. As they drew near the land they could see crowds of figures running to and fro upon the beach, and rapidly increasing in numbers. It was a glorious summer morning. Neither cloud in the sky nor ripple on the sea, and the air so transparent as to render objects distinctly visible at a great distance. The boat touched the beach. The captain ordered his crew to kneel down and kiss their hands as a token of friendship. He then produced a tin vessel, and made signs for water; then laid the cup at some distance upon the sand. The savages approached. They were of a black hue, but beautifully formed, with athletic persons, round heads covered with soft curled dark hair, and large fierce eyes, which flashed with a singular fire, and rolled in strong contrast with their tawny skins. They were armed with wooden spears and large bows and arrows. At this moment one of the pistols was accidentally discharged. The troop of barbarians were struck first with terror, and then apparently with rage. They fled howling and yelling, but paused at the distance of three hundred yards.

"All hands to the boat," shouted the captain.

The crew were together in a moment, and in such a way as to present the least front to the foe. A shower of arrows darkened the air, wounding several slightly. Another and another came, and they rushed forward within a more dangerous proximity. There was but one thing to be done. The word was given for ten of the men to fire their muskets, but above the heads of the enemy, so as not to shed blood unnecessarily; while the captain himself, to convince them of his power over them, levelled his piece directly at a ferocious giant, who rushed forward, spear in hand, and yelling like a very demon. The discharge was simultaneous. The natives fled again. The nearest fell, weltering in blood, rolled over several times on the sand, which he tore up with his hands and teeth, and then lay quiet enough. There was a moment's pause, broken by the low voice of the captain.

"Load your pieces, men. I think our big friend there won't trouble us again in a hurry."

The muskets were loaded, all hands ordered to the boat, and they put off for the ship, from the deck of which they could see hundreds of the natives thronging down around the body on the beach. The next day the crew of the Commerce were again seen by their foes steering towards the island. They were received by a greater multitude, but with more marks of kindness. They selected one, who came timidly, but without any other arms than a spear. When the whites pointed to their mouths, to intimate thirst, and held up their cup, the ambassador directed them to a wood not far off; then took the cup, went away, and presently returned with cool fresh water. The others came down slowly; but, as the men raised their muskets to their shoulders, they betrayed signs of terror, and would have fled again had not the captain, satisfied that they were sufficiently intimidated, boldly thrown down his piece, and walked forward alone to meet them. One after the other the crew did the same, leaving ten by the boat, prepared for action.

In this way familiarity and confidence were gradually established between the parties, until they became so friendly, and so far able to understand each other's wishes, as to enter upon a regular system of bargaining. The whites gave beads, axes, and other useful utensils; looking-glasses, feathers, with innumerable worthless gewgaws, and received in exchange pearl, spices, and particularly the fish before alluded to.

In the course of a couple of weeks they were on the most friendly terms. The chiefs of the tribes came freely on board the vessel, and the crew went about the island in perfect security. It seemed understood that their communication would be mutually advantageous, and so much progress had they made in each others good will in a month from the arrival of the Commerce, that the savages granted the crew permission to build several rude log huts on shore, where they might dry the fish and prepare them, at their leisure, for the East India market.

One day the captain had sent the mate and about twenty-five of the hands on shore. Tom was of the number. It was a pleasant afternoon, and, after having landed the party, two rowed the boat back to the brig, which lay at anchor about a mile off, in a little harbor sheltered from the open sea. The men were very leisurely preparing for work; some wandering about among the cocoa-nut trees, others were drinking at the springs. Tom was cutting down a tree at a distance from the rest. There was a boy belonging to the crew of a girlish face and form for so rough an enterprise, but much beloved by all on board. He was Tom's favorite, in particular. They were always together when on shore, and Tom had sworn to stand by him through all weathers as long as they lived. This youth was lounging on the turf, and his companion had ceased his work for a while and laid down by his side.

"I wonder, Tom," said the boy, "what sort of wild beasts there are in these woods?"

"None," said Tom, "but those two-legged monsters, that cut their ears, and paint their skin, and kick up such a devil of a dust when they get on all their trumpery."

"But I tell you, Tom," replied Jack, "there are beasts here, though, shiver me, if I know what. Yesterday I walked into the big wood there, by that cocoa-nut tree, to get some of the nuts, when I heard a stirring in the bushes, and something like a couple of great eyes—"

"Why did not you shoot him, Jack?"

"I did shoot at him, but the devil of anything could I find. I did think once—"

They were interrupted by a startling whoop; an arrow whizzed through the air, and lodged, quivering in the boy's bosom. He gasped a moment, there was a shivering over his young limbs, his eyes seemed wrenched around in his head, which fell back convulsively, and Tom knew well enough that poor little Jack's pains in this world were over. Thunderstruck and frightened, he heard the united yell of hundreds of savages. He started on his feet, and fled towards the shore. His companions had done the same; but were pursued by those ferocious devils with screams that might have almost aroused the dead. The boat was gone. He could not swim. The rest were completely surrounded; shouts, oaths, groans, yells rung in his ears; arrows were flying in the air, and, while the confusion called every eye to the spot where the principal butchery was going on, he climbed into an immense tree. There, his blood freezing with horror, he beheld a scene that almost deprived him of strength to cling to his hiding place. The wretched victims were literally cut to pieces. The whole body of combatants moved so near his place of concealment that he could distinctly behold every minute circumstance of the massacre. There were all the brave fellows with whom he had spent so many months of close intimacy hacked down before his eyes. Here, a well known head rolled ghastly in the sand; there, a generous friend was cloven down, and trampled beneath their feet. The mate was well armed, and fought like a tiger; each pistol laid a savage head low; his musket stretched out another, and, when even transfixed with arrows, he dealt his sabre blows about with such ferocity, that many a brawny bosom was gashed open, and many a muscular limb crippled for life. At length a wretch hewed him down with an axe from behind, and the next moment his head was hurled through the branches of the tree wherein the shuddering spectator sat. One of the men, with four or five miscreants at his heels, flew to the water and swam for his life. An arrow pierced his arm, and he sank, but Tom could see him rise again, pull the weapon through the wound, and ply his desperate strokes till a boat from the brig took him up. The sun went down. All the whites were slaughtered but three. Tom knew them and loved them well. Two had mothers and sisters, and one a wife and children in his native town. They were bound, and on the spot a fire was lighted. What demon thrust all these monstrous sights before the eyes of the trembling fugitive? The cannibals, for such they proved to be, danced and howled about the lurid blaze as it cast a gloomy glare upon the surrounding scene; and, after an hour spent in this awful triumph, the three were led forth. Tom moved to leap down, and defend them, or share their fate; but he recollected he was unarmed. None can tell how sweet is life, even in its most haggard form, till brought to the crisis. First they selected a sturdy veteran, the old Ulysses of the crew, the most experienced and prudent of them all. There was little alteration in his countenance. He had been close to death a thousand times before; life had never wooed him with many charms. They made him kneel down; he cursed them heartily all round from mere habit; then commended his soul to mercy. They were still for a moment. A fearful fascination kept Tom's eyes fastened to the spot. The old man then looked up firmly, and received the blow that felled him like an ox at the stall. Amid shrieks and yells, he was cut to pieces, and the atrocious appetites of his murderers were glutted with human flesh! When the next was selected, he shrunk and trembled. A scream of anguish and desperation, that went through that one pitying listener's bones like an electric shock, was ended by the fierce blow which consigned him to death. The last, feeling himself drawn on the ground, wept, fell on his knees, and prayed them to spare his life. In his confusion, he told them he had a wife and children, that he would give them money, and, when they dragged him forward, and a gigantic butcher grasped him and lifted his massive club, the forest rung with his frantic shrieks of agony, mingled with the yells of triumph and rejoicing. Tom covered his ears with his hands convulsively. Again he was about to spring down and deliver himself up. He closed his eyes. A fearful calmness of thought came to him that moment; and yet, strange to say, it was followed by a vivid hope that he might himself yet escape. He could not swim, but he could easily procure a log; and, with that, paddle out to the brig. He opened his eyes, and saw one of the savages holding up by the hair the dismembered gory head, the echo of whose voice had scarcely yet died away through the forest.

"What would his wife and children say to that?" thought Tom. "They are, perchance, at this moment wrapped in peaceful sleep. Sleep on! sleep on!"

It is strange, but true, so curious is the construction of the human mind, that in the most awful crisis, after the first shock it is calm and clear. We can become familiar with any thing; and, while the orgies of these human fiends went on, and broke the silence of the night with riot, the sole survivor of the massacre had arranged his plans, and was sanguine, nay, sometimes happy to a trembling excess, at the anticipations of being once more in safety. Gradually the wearied barbarians hushed their clamors. The flames died away, and darkness came over the scene of blood. Tom would have descended, but still several of the foe were awake. He climbed silently up into the thickest part of the tree, and sat there, watching the dawn. All that day he could hear the yell of warriors, and durst not therefore descend. At night he came down softly, and wandered towards the sea-shore; but there were figures moving about. The sky was dark with clouds. He crawled beneath a cocoa-nut tree, and breaking some of the nuts, drank the milk and ate the tender meat. But soon as the first sign of day appeared he slunk back to some secret hole, and hid himself again till night. Nothing could have kept up his spirits through that period but the conviction that he should reach the ship as soon as he could get to the beach. At night again he ventured forth; the clouds had all passed away. A bright full moon poured her radiance down upon the water. The savages were no where to be seen. He trembled with delight. As he stole cautiously along the skirt of the wood to the well known beach, every step was a thrill. He could scarcely repress a shout of joy. Tears of rapture rolled down his cheeks; when, at length, he suddenly turned the angle of the thick shadowy forest, and came in full view of the harbor. He sprang forward as if hope had absolutely lent him wings; when, horror of horrors!—the brig was gone—gone, and left him alone, to die! The thought froze his warm blood in an instant. It seemed as if death had grasped his high-beating heart with his skeleton fingers. He flung himself upon the sand. "I will go back to these fiends," he said, "and perish at once."

Night rolled onward, and morning came. The unfortunate sailor skulked about for three weeks, sleeping all day, and coming out for food in the night, when once again he stole down towards the beach, wretched and brooding over the best means of putting an end to his existence. "And yet," said he, "I can but die at last; why should I hasten death? who can say what unlooked for accident may occur? what other ship may seek these shores?"

He casts his eyes over the bay; he starts; he clasps his hands; rapture chokes his utterance: tears gush into his eyes. A sail floats beautifully in like a spirit. The breeze swells her canvass. She steers towards the very spot where he stands. It is his own brig. Is he dreaming? Is it a mockery? By heavens, she nears the shore! He dare not shout; he cannot make them see a signal. He kneels to heaven for assistance.

And now the gray morning ushers in another day. He has raised a white signal which flutters in the wind. A boat is put forth from the vessel. He is in the arms of his companions, who had only visited a neighboring island. They look upon him as rescued from the jaws of death. The shores of his home rise up in the horizon. He tells the story to his children around the winter fire.* X.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MR. CHARLES KEAN made his appearance last week in Richard the third. The house was well filled with a discriminating audience, who greeted the return of this young favorite with a right friendly welcome. The first three acts were rather tame, but correctly, and at times, beautifully read. Mr. Kean's faults, "for every man" hath faults, are such as practice and experience will correct. He sometimes overlooks a point, and occasionally manifests a want of self-possession, which may be ascribed to the diffidence of youth, alone, in a land of strangers, amid a galaxy of other dissimilar and powerful attractions, and necessarily in his range of parts, following close upon the track of the most skillful, brilliant, and extraordinary players of the age. Notwithstanding these disadvantageous influences, he wins his way, with a steady progress, in the esteem of the public by dint of actual and increasing merit. His requisites for the stage are gradually becoming more clearly apparent. As a reader, he is chaste and impressive. His voice is not powerful, but its want of strength is in a great measure counterbalanced by the distinctness of his enunciation. The words come from his lips like new coins. His eyes are large and finely expressive, and sometimes light up with that passionate and speaking look peculiar to his father, hushing the house to stillness. Thus is rendered distinctly audible the lowest sound of a voice, the under tones of which are extremely sweet, and easily modulated to the note of any feeling. His person is well formed, his gestures graceful and appropriate, and his attitudes carefully studied and picturesque. The last two acts of Richard were fiery, impetuous, and beautiful; open to criticism, but more open to admiration; and his transformation was acknowledged by frequent bursts of applause. His second appearance was in Sir Giles Overreach. The house was again good, and evidently gratified. On Saturday, he played Hamlet excellently, and, in passages, strikingly well. Mr. Kean is naturally a quiet actor. His violent scenes are sudden, and show better by the contrast. He seldom, if ever, resorts to stage trick. If he can avoid ranting, without violating the intention of the text, he always appears to prefer the judgment of the critic to the acclamations of the crowd, although an unostentatious display of thought will sometimes be received in silence, when a piece of noisy declamation would have secured applause. The leading characteristics of his acting are tenderness and reflection. His "to be or not to be," is delightful for its calm, quiet simplicity, its depth and feeling. It is the meditation of a philoso-

* We thank our correspondent X. for his sketch. He informs us in a note, that it closely adheres to the facts of an adventure which actually occurred to a person at present in this city. He has found it impossible, from the great number of occurrences, to relate them all, as they would fill a volume. Two of the savages are at present exhibited at Tannum's Hall. We visited them the other day. They are worth seeing. The spectator will be struck with the finely formed head and face of one. The clear large fierce eyes, in particular, of our savage Othello will attract notice. They have a supreme contempt for shoes and hats, wear over their shoulders a kind of mantle of their own manufacture, and display a variety of their implements of war. The curious observer will be surprised to learn several interesting items respecting this singular race of savages. They have no idea of a Supreme Being, are ignorant of every form of worship, and kill all the children except those of their chiefs, to make room for their overgrown population. Although inhabiting adjoining islands, their languages are not understood by each other; one appears much older than his companion, but they are ignorant of all means of designating their age.—Eds. N. Y. Mir.

phic mind, not the raving of a wandering one. It is like the stirring of a stream lapsing with the tide, not lashed with the tempest. We admire these appeals to the reflection of the people. They may lose him temporary plaudits, but they form the surest foundation for permanent fame. His last appearance and benefit were on Monday, in Richard.

A fashionable audience assembled on Tuesday to enjoy the fiftieth representation of the best opera, and one of the most popular entertainments ever produced on any stage—Cinderella. It is curious to observe the respectability of the pit on these occasions. It is sure to be thronged with gentlemen, who listen with attention and applaud with taste. There are no cat-calls, no whistling, no apples and peanuts, by which the patrons of a lower order of dramatic exhibitions help along the passage of the old gentleman with the forelock. By the way, although it goes sadly against our inclinations, we shall never win character as critics by praise too unmixed. Indeed, errors of grammar and orthoepy in this attractive piece, are not venial. Mr. Placide invariably mispronounces "portentous." There is no such word as "portentious" in the language. Mrs. Wallack continues to inform us, that the mice will "make excellent steed," and Mr. Jones yet receives applause for the following little piece of sentimental bad grammar: "Condescension and humanity to our inferiors becomes all ranks," which he delivers with suitable dignity, Murray to the contrary notwithstanding.

We shall sustain a temporary loss in the absence of Mrs. Austin, who is about to visit Baltimore for a few weeks.

Rossini's overture to William Tell has been several times performed for the purpose of displaying a pleasing and picture-like representation by Mrs. Barrymore, and others of the company. It illustrates Scheffer's print of the "Soldier's Widow." The groupings are rich and beautiful, and the adaptation of action to the expressive and sweet music by which it is accompanied, is highly effective in arousing the mind and hurrying away the imagination. It is altogether quite prettily got up.

We learn, with pleasure, that Mr. Forrest will appear on the nineteenth instant. It is his purpose, in the course of his engagement, to produce the "Gladiator," a tragedy written expressly for him. After so long an absence, he will, no doubt, as he richly deserves, meet a cordial reception.

THE BOWERY THEATRE.

This establishment has built up a high reputation for tragic performances, and the taste and enterprise of the manager will not, we trust, go unrewarded. The company have sustained, among others, "A new Way to Pay old Debts," "Macbeth," "William Tell," "King John," &c. Mr. Pearson has appeared, of whom we have not yet had an opportunity to form an opinion. It is to be hoped, that the engagements entered into with the several gentlemen who have so ably supported the best standing tragedies, are not to be relinquished. Whatever may be their faults, they are counterbalanced by their merits, and we believe the public are ready to warrant their permanent employment. Mrs. Drake is also an interesting actress, and her services in the laudable undertaking of representing a number of the best plays properly, can scarcely be dispensed with. The present company require but few alterations to make it strong and successful. Supernumeraries should not be thrust forward into prominent parts. Surely, it is not impossible to procure those able to fill them. If there be any difficulty, it results from the abuse of the starring system. An individual no sooner feels himself advanced beyond the awkwardness of a mere debut, than he will be satisfied with no less than the first line, forgetting that he may be excellent in Antonio, and ridiculous in Shylock. The stage will never be correctly disciplined and arranged till such aspirants receive a rough handling from the critics. We would suggest to Mr. Hamblin the feasibility of strengthening the company in every branch, for the purpose of producing plays, with which the audience are not so familiar. Shakspeare may be drawn on largely, and, doubtless, with profit. Messrs. Booth, Hamblin, Cooper, and several others whom we could name, with Meadames Duff, and Drake, would sustain the leading characters, with advantage to themselves, and to the gratification of the public. Where is Mr. Thayer, for the comic parts? He is an universal favorite. Mrs. Drake took her benefit on Monday evening. Mr. Booth's engagement has closed, it is to be hoped, only for a time. The popular drama of the Water Witch has been re-produced. Although no friends to this species of exhibition when it excludes more elevated entertainments, it may be judiciously used as an auxiliary, and the present one is "got up" with unusual effect.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Anastasis; or Memoirs of a Greek. Written at the close of the Eighteenth Century. Two vols. 12mo. pp. 333, 339. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

EVERYBODY has read Anastasis, or everybody ought to read it. It is a story, however different the scenes into which the hero is led, not unlike Gil Blas, that is, marked throughout by the development of striking practical truths, naturally illustrated by easy and yet extremely interesting incident. Although a romance, it will not be fully appreciated but by an effort of the mind, which the mere seekers after mawkish sentimentality will be unwilling or unable to make. It is calculated to amuse the leisure of the intelligent and learned, and highly deserves its place in the library of select novels. As the reputation of Anastasis is firmly established, we refrain from any other extract than the following vivid and dark picture of the bagnio in Constantinople:

"The vast and high enclosure of the bagnio, situated contiguously to the arsenal and the docks, contains a little world of its own, but a world of wailing! One part is tenanted by the prisoners made on board the enemy's ships, who, with an iron ring round their legs, await in this dismal repository their transference on board the Turkish fleet. This part may only be called a sort of purgatory. The other is hell in perfection. It is the larger division, filled with the natural subjects of the grand signior, whom their real or supposed misdemeanors have brought to the abode of unavailing tears. Here are confined alike the ragged beggar urged by famine to steal a loaf, and the rich banker instigated by avarice to deny a deposit; the bandit who uses open violence, and the baker who employs false weights; the land robber and the pirate of the seas, the assassin and the cheat. Here, as in the infernal regions, are mingled natives of every country—Turks, Greeks, Armenians, Jews, and Gipsies; and are confounded individuals of every creed—the Mahomedan, the Christian, the Hebrew, and the Heathen. Here the proud and the humble, the opulent and the necessitous, are reduced to the direst of equalities, the equality of torture. But I err: for should some hapless victim—perhaps guilty of no other crime than that of having excited the sultan's cupidity—still wear on his first entrance the livery of better days, his more decent appearance will only expose him to harsher treatment. Loaded with the heaviest fetters, linked to the most loathsome of malefactors, he is compelled to purchase every alleviation of his burthen, every mitigation of his pain, at the most exorbitant price; until the total exhaustion of his slender store has acquired him the privilege of being at least on a level with the lowest of his fellow-sufferers; and spared additional torments, no longer lucrative to their inflictors.

"Every day a capital, fertile in crimes, pours new offenders into this dreadful receptacle; and its high walls and deep recesses resound every instant with imprecations and curses, uttered in all the various idioms of the Ottoman empire. Deep moans and dismal yells leave not its answering echoes a moment's repose. From morning until night, and from night until morning, the ear is stunned with the clang of chains, which the galley-slaves drag about when toiling at their tasks. Linked together two and two for life, should they sink under their sufferings, they still continue thus linked after the death of either; and the man doomed to live on, drags after him the corpse of his dead companion. In no direction can the eye escape the spectacle of atrocious punishments and of indescribable agonies. Here perhaps you see a wretch, whose stiffened limbs refuse their office, stop suddenly short in the midst of his labor, and, as if already impassable, defy the stripes that lay open his flesh, and wait in total immobility the last merciful blow that is to end his misery; while, there, you view his companion foaming with rage and madness, turn against his own person his desperate hands, tear his clotted hair, rend his bleeding bosom, and dash to pieces his head against the wall of his dungeon.

"A long-unpunished pirate, a liberated galley-slave, Achmet-reis by name, was the fiend of hell who, by his ingenuity in contriving new tortures, and his infernal delight in beholding new sufferings, had deserved to become the chief inspector of this place, and the chief minister of its terrors. His joys were great, but they were not yet complete. Only permitted thus far to exercise his craft on mortals, he still was obliged to calculate what degree of agony the human frame could bear, and to proportion the pain he inflicted to the powers of suffering which man possessed, lest, by despatching his victims too soon, he should defeat his own aim. He was not yet received among his brother demons, in the blissful abodes where torments do not kill, and where the sufferer's pangs might be increased in an infinite ratio.

"Of this truth the very hour of my arrival had afforded him a sorely lamented proof! An Armenian cashier, suspected of withholding from the sultan—sole heir to all his officers—the deposit of a deceased pasha, had just been delivered over into Achmet's hands; and many were the days of bliss to which the executioner looked forward in the diligent performance of his office. On the first application of the rack, out of sheer malice, the seraf expired!

"Two days later, the whole of Achmet's prospects of sublunary happiness were near coming to a close. Some wretches, driven by his cruelty to a state of madness, had sworn his destruction. Their hands, tied behind their backs, could be of no use to them in effecting their purpose. They determined to crush him with their bodies. All at the same instant fell with their whole weight upon the executioner, or upon their own companions already pressing to the ground the prostrate monster, in hopes of burying his corpse under a living tumult. But Achmet's good star prevailed—ere yet his suffocation was completed, soldiers rescued the miscreant. He recovered to wreak on his disappointed enemies his fiercest vengeance."

Life and Death of Lord Edward Fitzgerald. By Thomas Moore. Two vols. London Edition. 1831.

We greet every work from the pen of Mr. Moore with renewed interest. The munificent gift of poetic genius bestowed upon him by nature does not seem to unfit him, as it has done others, for the pleasures and the duties of ordinary life; and he descends from the regions of Lallah Rook and Anacreon to examine the details of the busy world about him, with a modesty and industry which cannot fail to endear him to his friends, as it has served to keep him in a continual familiarity with the world.

Lord Edward Fitzgerald is thus represented by his biographer:

"I cannot," says he, "resist the gratification of adding a few words of my own; though conscious that the manner in which his frank, simple character has unfolded itself before the reader of the foregoing pages, renders any further comment on it almost wholly superfluous. Both of his mind and heart, indeed, simplicity may be said to have been the predominant feature, pervading all his tastes, habits of thinking, affections, and pursuits; and it was in this simplicity and the singleness of purpose resulting from it, that the main strength of his manly character lay. Talents far more brilliant would, for want of the same clearness and concentration, have afforded a far less efficient light."

We have glanced through the edition before us with sufficient care to perceive that it comprises incidents calculated to interest the reader, and more peculiarly valuable from the flowing and easy style of the writer; but as we understand that it will form a forthcoming number of the Family Library, we postpone more minute notice of it until its re-publication by the Harpers.

THE FINE ARTS.

ENGRAVINGS.

WE have before us three copperplate engravings, forwarded by the politeness of Carey & Lea, of Philadelphia. The first is entitled the Hungarian Princess, by Illman & Pilbrow: a very pretty face and attitude; the costume light and graceful. The next is a spirited battle-scene in the Holy Land, by Ellis. The two prominent figures are Richard and Salladin. The majestic, Macready-like head of the lion-hearted warrior, and the whole front and bearing of his horse, will be particularly admired. The last, by Durand, represents the faithful Sancho, seated in presence of the duchess, and several members of her family. The groupings are natural. The homely countenance of the squire, and the acid expression in the antique physiognomy of the matron, afford a striking contrast to the youthful beauty of the lady. The drapery and furniture are skilfully executed. These fine engravings will embellish the Atlantic Souvenir for the coming year.

THE BRIDESMAID.

A number of superb plates are to be seen at the store of Peabody & Co. among which is that bearing the above title, engraved by Bromley, from a painting by E. Varris. It is one of the most unexceptionable specimens of the art with which our transatlantic friends have furnished us. The extreme loveliness of the female face and form, the tear glistening on her cheek, the forgotten wreath, the polish of the marble table, the reflection of the flower and column in its mirror surface, and the wonderful softness and transparency which overspreads the whole piece, are evidences of a superior hand. The original painting from which this masterly production was taken attracted unusual attention at the British gallery. The New Monthly Magazine observes, that it is "a delicious illustration of one of Haynes Bayley's songs. The bridesmaid is mournful, but not from envy; it is for the loss of one who has passed the threshold of her own home to enter that of another."

"The bridal is over, the guests are all gone,
The bride's only sister sits weeping alone;
The wreath of white roses is torn from her brow,
And the heart of the bridesmaid is desolate now."

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Since our last notice Bourne has issued "Here, 'tis set down, my lord," from Cinderella; "A Grecian Air;" "Now to the lists," by Lee; "Away with grief and sorrow," a duet, by Pons; and the "King of England's waltz," by Wolfe.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

TO THE PUBLIC.

THE fact is universally conceded that no periodical can exercise a beneficial influence upon the literature of a people, unless directly supported by a variety of talent to secure a continual supply of ORIGINAL composition. The time is rapidly passing away when our reading community will be satisfied with the refuse of a foreign market. We are not blind to the excellence of many articles written abroad: a moderate number of selections, chosen with care, add to the piquancy and spirit of a publication; but the groundwork must be ORIGINAL; the principal fountain must be within itself, or it cannot possess an individual and national character. Mere compilations, which profess to be such, have a value, but it is distinct from that of native literature, which must be formed upon internal circumstances, and result from the healthy development of native writers. The foundation is already laid in the taste and disposition of our countrymen, on which may be reared a system of painting, engraving, music, poetry, and every branch of literature, altogether our own. When this journal was commenced, the field was comparatively uncultivated. Few American periodicals were then embellished with plates or music, or contained much original composition; little or no attention was paid to the typography, and they were printed on paper of inferior quality. Impressed with the belief that every improvement would be promptly supported, we were the first to introduce these embellishments, and we have strenuously persevered in the endeavor to impart additional interest and value to each successive volume. Notwithstanding a throng of difficulties, we have been cheered on our way by almost every respectable press in the Union, and generously assisted by the unbought and unsolicited aid and encouragement of scholars, and authors, and the most enlightened individuals of the country; to whose approbation and influence we here gratefully ascribe much of our success. Our list of correspondents thus embraces many of the first writers of the land. We pass over without comment the unkind, unprovoked, we must add, undeserved attacks, which have occasionally produced a discord in the general voice.

Having completed numerous arrangements for the future ornamental and typographical embellishments, we shall hereafter direct more exclusive attention to the LITERARY DEPARTMENT. We take much pleasure, therefore, in announcing to our readers that the American Monthly Magazine has been united to the New-York Mirror, and that NATHANIEL P. WILLIS, Esq. will, from this period, be an associate editor of the joint establishment.

The American Monthly Magazine has been hitherto conducted in a manner which has elicited general admiration; and the literary productions of its editor have been so widely circulated, both here and in Great Britain, and with so many testimonials of public favor, as to render superfluous any observations on his ability from our pen. To doubt that the pages of the Mirror will derive new interest from this accession, would be, on our part, only an affectation of diffidence which we are far from feeling, and would offer but an equivocal comment upon the taste of our patrons.

We trust that the subscribers to the American Monthly will be satisfied with an arrangement which insures to them more frequent productions from Mr. WILLIS, and the results of his ample and exclusive exertions.

In conclusion, we take occasion to say that we shall persevere in our design to render the New-York Mirror an instructive, amusing, and diversified journal, adapted to the tastes and wants of intelligent families of all classes, calculated for preservation in volumes, and furnishing sufficient practical and scientific information and literary merit to form a useful, elegant, and permanent source of gratification long after the date of its appearance.

The steel engravings.—We have intentionally delayed the publication of two engravings, in order to afford time for the artists to finish them according to their own taste. These will be superior to any ever published in this journal. The first is a beautiful VIGNETTE title-page, from the burin of Mr. DURAND; the second, a view of a SECTION OF WALL-STREET, including the old Federal Hall, in which General Washington was inaugurated President of the United States, and displaying the costume, &c. of the times. This interesting subject was executed by HATCH and SMILLIE. They were both painted by Mr. WEIR, (the latter from an old picture,) expressly for the Mirror, and will appear in the course of a few weeks.

Meeting of American citizens in Paris in behalf of the Poles.—We have lately received a communication from a friend in Paris, enclosing the proceedings of a numerous meeting of American citizens, resident in that metropolis, assembled for the purpose of adopting measures to afford aid to the Poles. The aim of the resolutions passed on the occasion was to invite General Lafayette to become the agent for remitting the money collected here and in that city, to the proper Polish authorities. The amount received was six thousand three hundred francs. In glancing over the list of subscribers, which is highly respectable, we find the names of several ladies. We are gratified to observe the unanimity of sentiment which pervades Americans in every quarter of the globe, and, especially, to perceive that our fair countrywomen participate in those generous feelings which, after all, derive their greatest impulse from them. Natives from almost every part of the Union were present, and the greatest harmony prevailed. The co-operation of Lafayette is a sufficient pledge that the donations, which may be transmitted to his direction, either from this country or any part of France, will not suffer the fate which attended the funds collected for the Greeks. Our readers will remember with anxiety for the reputation of the country, that these were shamefully wasted and misappropriated. From a recent conversation, however, with Dr. Howe, (author of the valuable "History of the Greek Revolution,") who sailed in the last packet for Havre, on his way to Greece, we learn, with pleasure, that the Greeks themselves continue to express the most ardent gratitude towards, and confidence in, the citizens of the United States; and were prompt in attributing the misuse of their supplies to certain speculators among the agents, who richly merit the infamy. Dr. Howe related to us several interesting occurrences to prove this fact. "We do not believe," said a Greek to the historian, "that the American people would send us donations with one hand, and rob us of them with the other." The relief forwarded to Lafayette, no one can fear will be subject to any casualty of this description. Among those present at this meeting, we notice several of our acquaintance, and others greatly esteemed in this country, and we should feel unfeigned pleasure in transferring the entire proceedings to these columns, if our space would permit. The chair was filled by Mr. Cooper. We make room for the following address from his pen:

TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

"Your countrymen at Paris venture to address you in behalf of the ancient republic of Poland. Their position, comparatively near the scene of a disastrous war, their means of intelligence, and a desire to be useful, form their chief claims to your attention; as they come, however, the advocates of humanity, they forget the smallness of their number, and urge their requests with the confidence of men familiar with your philanthropy.

"The necessity of order and of defence has given birth to nations. In the course of ages, families swell into communities, and from the intimate relations of origin, language, and usages, are derived the feelings and interests which bind a people together. Next to the tie of blood, that which unites man to his country is the strongest. The sentiment of patriotism is among the purest that adorns human nature, and experience has shown that it cannot be destroyed without bringing with it a moral abasement that disqualifies its subjects for all aspiring and noble enterprises. In every case in which distinctive character and habits have been formed by social organization, national virtue seems nearly necessary to national existence. Conquest falls upon a people like a blight, checking the currents of its generous ambition, and withering its hopes for ages. We cannot find an extensive territory which has been brought, by violence, from the high condition of a state to the dependent lot of a province, which does not furnish manifest proofs of its bad administration. The restraints that are necessary to secure an ill-gained ascendancy, and the impositions which the weak sustain from the strong, are among the more obvious evils of the calamity. To these must be added, the downward tendencies of defeat, personal humiliation, and personal corruption, with their train of depressing consequences. Such a fate, befalling the smallest community, would be entitled to—and we are certain would awaken—your pity; but when Poland was overcome, the fifth power of Christendom was trodden upon. There are circumstances of unmitigated wrong, of peculiar aggravation, that must be added to the picture. The crime of Poland was too much liberty; her independent existence, in the vicinity of those who had reared their thrones on arbitrary will, was not to be endured. Fellow citizens, neither the ancient institutions nor the ancient practices of Poland have been understood. The former had, in common with all Europe, the inherited defects of feudal practices, but still were they among the freest of this hemisphere. The latter, as ever has been, and as ever will be the case, until man shall generally enter into the possession of those rights of which he has so long been deprived by political combinations and lettered monopolies, were calumniated and distorted to serve the ends of the few who desire to live on the toll of the many. Poland was accused of faction and anarchy. The free transmit their errors and their virtues to posterity, as the companions of their greatness, while the sluggish vices of the slave sleep in the eternity of the obscure. We hear of the factions of the Greek republics, while we search in vain for even the names of most of their contemporary despots. But we need not examine the annals of antiquity in order to estimate the value of these calumnies, or to investigate their motive. People of America! You too are accused of living in the midst of anarchy and lawless confusion—you are said to be tired of liberty—you are reviled as forgetting God—you are quoted as pining for a monarchy! What you know to be false, as respects yourselves, was, with the exceptions incidental to the differences in the ages and the governments, also false in respect to Poland. With the liberty of Poland, fell the sovereignty of the state itself. Nor was this all; allegiance was not only transferred, but it was divided. Pole can be summoned, at the word of his master, to contend with Pole, and in this very war of existence, all the deep sentiments connected with the past are liable to be violated to uphold the detested and pernicious sway of strangers. There was wanting but a single aggravating circumstance to render the partition of this fine country more odious, and, unhappily, this too is to be enumerated among its sufferings. When Poland was subdued, by far the larger portion of her territory became subject to a people less advanced in civilization than her own citizens. She was thus excluded from the only solace of defeat, and was doomed to witness the gradual decay of those arts and opinions which form the basis of national prosperity.

"Against the injustice of their lot, and the further accumulation of their manifold wrongs, the Poles have protested before God and man. They have proclaimed their sufferings; they have asserted their rights; and nobly have they staked every worldly interest on the issue. Under the most adverse and disheartening circumstances they have shown themselves worthy of their high descent. Cut off from the sea—enviored by a specious neutrality—and deserted by all but their courage, and the sacred justice of their cause, they have elevated the struggle from an insurrection to a war. We make no appeal in the spirit of propagandism: Warsaw, the government of the country, and all the essential immunities of sovereign power, are already regained; and before Russia can ever again rule in Poland, Russia must again conquer Poland.

"The constancy with which this heroic nation has clung to its recollections, its martial promptitude in rising in its own defence, and its entire frankness and dignity, since it has resumed the sword, excite our esteem. The kingdom is a camp; its men are in the field, its women in the hospitals. While, in his own case, neither person nor means are withheld from the public necessities, the Pole disdains deception; he sees his danger, he proclaims it, and he meets it as becomes the Pole.

"People of America! Of all the nations of the earth you are the most favored. You dread no enemies; you anticipate no famines; you hold at command every bounty which a beneficent Providence has lavished upon man. The self-denial and hardships of your ancestors are required to their descendants in a tenfold return of peace, security, and happiness. To you, then, do we apply, to contribute from your abundance to the urgent wants of this wronged nation. Remote from the scenes of this hemisphere, you are not familiar with the great advantages you possess, nor with the moral power you wield. The religious emancipation of millions has quite recently been effected, more by a strong exhibition of your feelings than from any other cause. Your great example is silently wearing away the foundations of despotism. That moral ascendancy, of which others boast, you exercise, and exercise only, because you are the true repositories of the persecuted rights of human nature. Be not, then, unworthy of your trust, by coldly withholding yourselves from an exhibition of your real sentiments. Remember that not a freeman falls, in the most remote quarter of the world, that you do not lose a brother who is enlisted in your own noble enterprise. Your gold will assuage many griefs, heal many wounds, purchase much relief from suffering and sorrow; but your sympathy will be dearer than all. Let it not be said, that while cold and heartless traffickers in human rights are combining their means to overwhelm twenty millions of men, struggling and worthy to be free, thirteen millions, animated by the same qualities, looked coldly on, because an ocean lay between them. But for this ocean, you too would be assailed, that another pernicious example might be destroyed. Thousands of bleeding hearts look to the success of this appeal less in the wish to benefit by your liberality, than in the noble hope of being cheered in success by your acclamations, or solaced by your sympathies in defeat.

"We have put the case of Poland simply before you. Her cause is so obviously just as to require no aid from the embellishments of language, nor to need any labored appeal to your charities. We do not conceal from ourselves the delicate relations which exist between our own country and Russia. We do not deny, on the contrary, we have pleasure in publishing that Russia, by her wisdom, foresight, and liberality has established lasting claims on the friendship and esteem of America. There are numerous interests to keep them friends; there are some which might easily render them allies. We do not accuse Nicolas of tyranny, for we know he is the subject of circumstances, of which Poland is unhappily the victim. As our philanthropy is not quickened by national interests or national dread, we can do justice equally to the assailant and the assailed. In this exemption from personal accusation, we have pleasure in including the two mild princes, who, in common with the Czar, have been the inheritors of a false system entailed by former reigns. But while we revolt at heaping injuries on others, who may find themselves enthralled by opinions different from our own, we bow to the majesty of truth. The wrong exists, and we should be false to our origin, our principles, and that mild religion in which we are nurtured, could we hesitate between Poland and her enemies.

"To our gentle countrywomen we confidently apply in behalf of the suffering. They are the companions of men taught to consider force as subject to reason. The blessings they themselves so eminently enjoy, can never become general, until the power of the strong shall everywhere be taught to yield to the persuasion of the good. We appeal to them for succor to the fatherless and the broken hearted; we ask for their countenance to encourage the desponding, and to confirm the bold. We call upon them to appear as charitable mediators in this holy cause, and to take the lead in doing good with the fearless generosity with which their sex is instinct, whenever the principle of right is invaded by the wantonness of force.

"Come then, people of America, to the relief of this much injured and gallant people. Your aid will be offered to those who are willing to sacrifice all for liberty; to those who are willing to work out their own redemption; who have already shown themselves worthy of their ancient fame in twenty fields, and who will never yield until resistance shall have been carried to extremity.

J. FENTWORTH COOPER, Chairman."

In consequence of the above, a crowded and highly respectable meeting was held on Monday evening, in Clinton-hall. W. A. Duer, Esq. was called to the chair. The speeches, etc. were received with enthusiastic cheering. The resolutions approved of the address of our countrymen in Paris, and a committee was appointed, consisting of a number of the most intelligent citizens, to provide measures for collecting a general subscription. The following sentiment, in which we heartily concur, leaves no excuse for the reluctance to come forward and contribute their mite:

"Resolved, That although we have great confidence that the brave Poles will succeed in their unequal struggle, and establish themselves as an independent people, yet if an inscrutable Providence shall permit them to be overcome, the said committee, in that event, (which God forbid) are instructed to apply the contributions and donations in their hands to the relief of the Polish sufferers."

In these musical days, in order to furnish a greater variety of excellent productions, we deem it expedient, occasionally, to introduce compositions arranged for the flute and guitar, as well as for the piano. It is also our intention not to publish songs exclusively, but to vary the order with duets, glees, waltzes, marches, &c. The selection which follows, it will be observed, is printed with smaller notes than those hitherto used. The great perfection to which the art of casting music type has arrived in this country enables us to compress within a small space, pieces which, in the ordinary copperplate style, would occupy several pages. The annexed is of this description. The type is extremely neat, distinct, and beautiful, being every way equal, if not superior, to the best in Europe. It is from the foundry of Mr. James Conner, of this city.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

THE MONTH OF SEPTEMBER IN NEW-YORK.

BY S. WOODWORTH.

THIS month was so called from the Latin word septem, seven, it being the seventh month of the ancient year, which commenced with March. The Saxons called it grist month, because they carried their new corn to mill at that period.

September has been distinguished by many remarkable events, a few of which shall here be recapitulated. A. D. 1757, Lafayette was born on the sixth; 1759, Quebec was taken by the British, under General Wolf, who fell in the contest on the twelfth; 1776, the city of New-York was taken possession of by the British army on the fifteenth; 1780, the treason of Arnold was detected by the capture of Major Andre, on the twenty-third; 1783, the treaty of peace between England, America, France, &c. was signed at Paris on the third; 1812, the city of Moscow was destroyed by fire on the fourteenth; 1813, the American Enterprize captured the English Boxer on the fifth; Perry's victory on Lake Erie occurred on the tenth; and McDonough's victory on Lake Champlain, on the eleventh in the following year.

The eighth day of September is observed by the Roman Catholics as a religious festival, in honor of the "Nativity of the Blessed Virgin." It is celebrated with much pomp in Spain and Italy, and indeed generally by the Marian religionists, who place the greatest reliance on the efficacy of the virgin.

The fourteenth, called the Holy Rood Day, was formerly observed in England, as well as in other countries of Europe. It was instituted on account of the recovery of a piece of the cross, or holy rood, by the emperor Heraclius, after it had been carried away on the plundering of Jerusalem by Cosroes, king of Persia, about the year 615. It was once a holiday with the boys of Eton school, who were permitted to go out into the woods and gather nuts, with a portion of which they were to make presents to the different masters. It was ordered, however, that before this leave was granted, they should write verses on the fruitfulness of autumn, and the colds and storms of advancing winter.

The seventeenth is St. Lambert's day; the twenty-first St. Matthew's; the twenty-sixth St. Cyprrian's; the twenty-ninth St. Michael's, or Michaelmas day, which is a grand festival in the Romish church, and celebrated with extraordinary splendor. An expositor on the Common Prayer Book tells us, that "the feast of St. Michael and All Angels" was instituted that the people may know what benefits are derived from the ministry of angels. As heathenism (says he) has its tutelary deities for particular countries, towns, and places, so the Romanists assigned patron-saints and angels not only to these, but to professions and trades, and to each member of the human body, besides invoking separate saints against various diseases, and even making them guardians over different animals." In England, a universal custom prevails of eating a goose on Michaelmas day, which is generally attributed to the circumstance, that Queen Elizabeth on that day happened to be feasting upon that savoury bird, when she received the news of the defeat of the Spanish armada. "But this only proves," says the author of "Festivals, Games and Amusements, Ancient and Modern," "that the practice then prevailed; and it is known to be not only much more ancient than Elizabeth's time, but to have obtained in other countries. Antiquaries have exhausted conjecture and research upon this subject; and it seems hardly necessary to seek any other origin for the custom than the simple fact, that stubble geese are at this season in their highest state of perfection."

On the twenty-third of this month the sun enters the sign Libra,
The hanging balance that doth weigh the light,
Giving an equal share to day and night,

the days and nights now being of an equal length, as they were on the twenty-first of March. This sign of the zodiac is represented by our figure of the goddess Astrea, or Justice, on the cupula of the city-hall;

Who, while her friends below dispute,
Now tramples Time beneath her foot.

Speaking of time, however, induces us to ask when will his face be illuminated with gas? a spectacle long since promised by the fathers of the city, who seem "To take no note of time but by its loss;

"To give it then a tongue is wise in them."

But for some time past the old dotard appears to have been actually tongue-tied, and if we mistake not, the string can now be seen extending from the bell to the steeple. Our present business, however, is with Justice, and it requires an expert penman to write against time with success.

Astrea was said to be the daughter of Astræus, king of Arcadia, though some assert that her father was Titan, the brother of Saturn, and that her mother was no less a personage than the blushing Aurora. Others, again, make her the daughter of Jupiter and Themis. Thus, it appears, that opinions vary as much on the origin as on the character of Justice. For ourselves, we most cogently and piously believe, that she is "the child of twenty-eight fathers," in common-council assembled. The poet tells us, however, that she lived upon earth only during the golden age; and that in the succeeding ages of brass and iron, she was driven to heaven by the wickedness and impiety of mankind. She was then placed among the constellations of the zodiac, and employed in distributing an equal proportion of light to all mankind. She is represented as a virgin, with a stern but majestic countenance, holding a pair of scales in one hand, and a sword in the other.

September, in New-York, is the first pleasant month after June. That sultry period of six weeks, yclept the dog-days, terminates on the fifth instant, and the heat generally begins to abate about the same date. This year, however, the change occurred on the twenty-eighth of August, since which the longest article in the Mirror might be read by an alderman, after dinner, without sensibly increasing his perspiration, or putting him to sleep much sooner than usual. The citizens who have been rusticated in the Jerseys, bathing at Rockaway, or quaffing draughts of love and soda at the Springs, are now eagerly flocking into town, with the economical resolution of redeeming their recent expenses by a close application to business. The ladies—heaven, in its mercy, for ever bless them!—the ladies return with thoughts and ideas various, indefinite, and fleeting, like their own personal charms. Some to sigh in single blessedness, some to revel in newly awakened hopes, and to dream of autumn wedding-dresses, plumb-cake, and plain gold rings; and some to superintend the affairs of their own little kingdoms, "home, sweet home."

OSSIAN.

Notwithstanding Blair's dissertation upon Macpherson's splendid book, and the ingenious reasoning with which he advocates the authenticity of Ossian's poems, there is a strong argument against it, to be derived from the works themselves. In the first place the male characters are too sensitive, romantic, and effeminate for any age or country, especially for their own, and the females act under the continual influence of tender and excessively refined feelings and impulses totally incompatible with their avocations. There is a want of that wild disposition inherent in human nature, and which the course of life pursued by the heroes and their mistresses would render hardened, practical, ferocious, and revengeful. Yet do we find a father pardoning the slaughterer of his son from an abstract principle of high-minded honor, and other equally incredible examples of unnatural virtue. The women are accustomed to all the hardships of war and the chase, and inured to wants and exposures sufficient to render them independent and masculine: yet they preserve their beauty, their skins are like snow, their bosoms are tender and tremblingly alive to all the most refined and exquisite feelings of nature, and they die for love, with a fidelity worthy the most sedentary, novel-reading, and nervous daughter of luxury in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one.

THE HALL OF RECORD,

As we understand this edifice is to be denominated, is situated in the park, near the east side of the city-hall; the walls being the only remaining part of the "old jail," a view of which accompanied our last number. It is eighty feet six inches in depth, and sixty-two feet six inches in breadth, and in height forty-eight feet six inches—the portico of each front is supported by six solid marble columns, from the Sing-Sing quarries, manufactured by the convicts at that place. The height of the columns is thirty feet, the diameter at the base four feet eight inches, and at the top three feet four inches. The exterior is to be stuccoed, in imitation of marble, and the roof covered with copper. The apartments are to be thoroughly fire-proof—the floors formed of solid mason-work, and the arched ceilings finished in the same manner. The register, county clerk, surrogate, street commissioner, and clerk of the supreme court, together with others, are here to be accommodated in order to secure the valuable records and papers from the possibility of conflagration. The common council have already appropriated twenty-five thousand five hundred dollars for this improvement, and it will require a further appropriation to complete it. Scientific gentlemen and artists pronounce the building the most perfect and chaste piece of architecture in this city. Its style is Grecian, from the model of the temple of Ephesus.

MANNERS AND MORALS.—A TRUE STORY.

Nothing is more common than for parents to pay greater attention to the manners than the morals of their children. The perfection of a system of education would be to unite the two, and certainly they are by no means incompatible with each other. They are both important, but not equally so, to the happiness of the community. In the general intercourse of the world, manners constitute the light coin which circulates from hand to hand, or rather the medium of barter and exchange, through which certain habits of good will are established among strangers and ordinary acquaintances. In domestic life, and in the closest relations of society, manners have also a vast influence in cementing and brightening the chain of love and friendship. They form those gentle imperceptible ties which operate by an unseen and charming influence, and prevent the familiarities and little collisions of the fire-side from degenerating at last into corrosive bickerings, that end in alienation and misery. Indeed, manners are of such consequence to the well-being of us all, that they never can be too dearly acquired, except at the expense, or by the neglect of morals. It is only when the manlier, more indispensable, and elevated qualities of the mind, the virtues of truth, justice, and benevolence are sacrificed to outward forms and polish, that these latter become mischievous and dangerous.

Gilbert and Charles Westcott were first cousins, of a respectable family. Charles was a ward of Gilbert's father, and they were brought up together like brothers. The easy obliging temper of Charles made him a favorite with the family, and especially with Gilbert, who early exhibited a different disposition. He loved him as a brother, indeed, better than some brothers love each other. He was a few years older than Charles, whose battles he fought, and whose rights he defended at school, at college, and everywhere else, on all occasions. Soon after finishing his education, he settled on the farm where he was born, and from that time resided entirely in the country. His manners were rustic, and his mode of speaking harsh and abrupt. Yet he was a man of the most inflexible integrity, as well as of the kindest, most generous heart. All without was blunt and unceremonious—all within was solid gold. He was married to an amiable woman, and had a fine family of children.

Charles, on the contrary, was one of the most easy, polished, agreeable fellows in the world. He had spent all his time, since manhood, in cities, among the gay, refined, and dissipated. He had spent something else too—and that was his fortune. Everybody liked him, except a few of his most intimate friends, of whom it was suspected he had borrowed money. In proportion as he became poor, the polish of his manners and the extreme courtesy of his deportment increased. The most insinuating people in the world are those who find it necessary to live by their wits. It is their business to make themselves agreeable. Charles was a single man.

One fine summer morning, finding himself without money, and without amusement, of course, the idea struck him to pay a visit to his cousin, whom he had not seen for years past, in the country. The thing was convenient, and besides, he thought to himself, "Who knows what may come of it?" Accordingly he forthwith put his design into execution.

Gilbert received him with a hearty welcome.

"Better late than never, Charles," said he, as he shook his tiny hand till he writhed. "I thought you had forgot you had a cousin and friend."

"What an Orson is this relation of mine," thought he—but he did not say it. He made a hundred polite excuses, and expressed so much pleasure at seeing the old house, the old trees, and the old neighbors, that Gilbert was delighted. He called all the children, and piled them on his lap. Gilbert scolded them and bade them go about their business.

"What an Orson," thought Charles again; "but his wife is a perfect rural Venus."

He accompanied his cousin to see his farm, his cattle, his improvements, and his old neighbors; and he made himself so agreeable that they, one and all, declared they liked him a thousand times better than Gilbert, who was frequently so short with them that they were half afraid of him.

"To be sure," said they, "there never was a kinder heart, or a better neighbor," and they said true, for, in lending and giving, and in kind offers, no man could be more liberal. But he did not give with a good grace, not from unwillingness, but a coarse habit of doing things, and the consequence was, that those most obliged often vilified him the most. But Charles was the favorite of all, before he had been a fortnight among them; and such was the fascination of his manner, that one half the belles of the country round could not sleep at night for thinking he was in love with them. He staid about a month, went to town, and was observed for some time to have plenty of money.

"Charles must have had a run of luck, or a windfall," thought the tailor, as he paid a bill of three years standing, and ran up a new one.

Not long after his departure, a friend came to Gilbert to borrow some money, and for the first time in his life he was obliged to refuse. He had none just then to lend.

"The mean hunks!" exclaimed the wife of the farmer when he got home. "The mean hunks! I know to a certainty he dunned Squire Allen for a large sum, just before his cousin Charles went away, and received it too. But I don't know—heigh! I believe all men get to be stingy when they grow old."

"I don't think any such thing," said the first.

"I do," said the other, and they had a little tiff on the occasion.

The good woman appealed to her acquaintances, who all agreed she was right, and indeed it seemed that Gilbert every day verified her opinion. By degrees, he discontinued a number of little luxuries in which he used formerly to indulge. His children were ere long dressed in homespun; his old-fashioned coach broke down and was never repaired; the pleasure horses were put to the plough; and, what had never happened before, the neighbors came and went without being asked to take a glass of wine.

His wife urged him to get the coach mended, but he abruptly replied, "he couldn't afford it." She was offended, and said to herself, "Who would have thought my husband could ever become mean?"

The villagers went further. They abused him for his parsimony only the more for his having been before so generous. They now seldom went to his house, and did him various offices of ill-nature. If they saw his fences down, and cattle trespassing, ten to one if they ever sent him word; and if the truth were known, I suspect they sometimes were at the bottom of these depredations.

Gilbert Westcott saw and felt all this, and knew the cause. He could have explained in one word, and regained the good opinion of all. But he could not bring himself to utter that word, though his heart yearned to retrieve what every just man looks upon as the great sublimary reward of virtue—the good-will and respect of all.

In the mean time Charles was pursuing his career in the city. He had cash again, and every body was at leisure to admire the fascination of his manners. He was the most generous, liberal fellow in the world—the life and charm of fashionable circles; and those who remembered his cousin, wondered at the astonishing difference between them. To that cousin he frequently wrote; and, every time he wrote, it might have been observed that Charles was more flush of money, while Gilbert daily became more mean and avaricious in the eyes of his wife and neighbors. She began to lose that affectionate feeling of respect which she had hitherto always cherished for her husband, in spite of his rough manners. Had he been really poor, she would have born these little privations with the charming resignation of a reasonable woman; but in the catalogue of those causes which undermine the respect and alienate the affections of a wife, unnecessary closeness in household affairs holds a high rank.

"My dear Gilbert," she would sometimes say, "you only fancy yourself growing poor, when you are growing weakly. Come now, let us invite Squire Allen and his New-York friends to dinner."

"Pshaw! I tell you I can't afford it," would he say, and stamp out of the room.

"I've a great mind to go to town and run up a bill of a thousand dollars," thought Mrs. Westcott. "What a difference between my husband and Charles," she would sometimes say, and she looked at a beautiful amethyst ring he had sent her not long before.

By and by, old Time came round again with a basket of flowers, which he sprinkled about wherever he went, making the earth gay, the birds sing, and the young lads and lasses dream of love and kisses. The winter campaign had left Charles as destitute of funds as the earth was of verdure, and having no means of living in town, he once more resolved to busy himself in the country till he could find a way to replenish his purse. Accordingly he again visited Gilbert, who received him with the same welcome with which he greeted him the year before. Mrs. Westcott was pleased to see him again; the children delighted; the old country folks held out their rough hands in honest good-fellowship, and the young damsels blushed as he complimented them on their rosy cheeks and sparkling eyes. It was quite a holiday every where around. Charles had a point to gain, and no man could make himself more agreeable when that was the case.

He was all attention to Mrs. Westcott, all affection to the children, and all the friend and schoolmate to Gilbert. In short, he was as smooth as a lake in a dead calm to every body. But though he never forgot the slightest attention, or missed an opportunity to oblige, it was observed that he seemed frequently out of spirits, and sighed deeply when he thought he was not noticed. He took long and solitary walks, and sometimes neglected to return to dinner. Mrs. Westcott began to pity him, and Gilbert frequently inquired what was the matter.

"Charles," said he, one day, "you seem melancholy—are you sick?"

"No," replied the other, despondently.

"Are you unhappy?"

Charles made no reply, but sighed more deeply than before.

"Pooh! nonsense! why don't you speak out, man. I hate this affectation of mystery between friends. Come, out with it, boy," and he gave him a hearty slap on the shoulder as evidence of his good will.

"I have abused your generosity," at last the other replied. "I owe you, and cannot pay."

"Pshaw! never mind that, Charles. You shall settle when you can—and if you never are able, why—I shall never dun you. Clear up your cloudy brow, and think no more about it, boy."

Charles brightened up, and thought to himself if Gilbert was so easy about past loans, perhaps he might raise the wind again before he went to town. He became still more attentive to Mrs. Westcott, kissed the children ten times more than ever, and declared they were little angels. But he grew tired to death of the place in the course of a few weeks, and determined to make a desperate effort upon the purse of his liberal cousin.

"Gilbert," said he, one morning, as they were leaning over a gate, talking of their schoolboy days, just as the golden sun was darting his mellow beams athwart the rural landscape—"Gilbert, I am ashamed to take advantage of your good nature, but if I go to town without a few hundreds in my pocket, I shall be thrown into prison and disgraced forever."

Charles did not choose to remember that the disgrace was in wantonly running in debt, not in going to prison.

Gilbert started at this hint. He will bleed no more, thought Charles; his generosity has run around at last. He was mistaken, it was only his purse that had become dry.

"Charles," said the other, in a tone hoarse with mortification—"Charles, I comprehend—but—but—upon my soul I can't assist you. You have had all I could spare, and you were welcome to it. I am now poor and in debt." And his rugged nature was chafed by the thought of being obliged to deny him.

"My dear cousin," cried Charles, softening his voice into tones of the deepest sensibility, "I did not mean to trespass further on your generosity; I was only pouring my griefs into the bosom of a sympathizing friend. If you were to offer me thousands I would not, I could not accept them. I could not bring myself to abuse your liberality."

"Pshaw! hang sentiment. I'll tell you what, Charles, though I have no money, I have a home and a welcome for you. Stay with me until we can devise means to pay your debts. My crops promise well, and by autumn who knows what may happen?"

Charles consented, with a thousand protestations of gratitude, which put Gilbert so out of patience, that he was half rude to him.

"What the plague do you make such a fuss about nothing for? Am I doing anything for you you could not do for me? Have done with your nonsense. You are welcome—that is enough."

"What under the sun shall I do to pass the time in this infernal dull place," thought Charles. "I can't live without excitement, and what excitement is there in green fields, silent woods, and murmuring streams? The pretty country girls, 'tis true; but then one may get into trouble there. I abhor books, I can't shoot, I hate fishing, and riding about in search of nothing is the very d—l. What shall I do to kill time?"

At this moment Mrs. Westcott came in, leading a little girl of about two years old. They had just returned from a twilight visit to a neighbor, and looked like a full blown rose, and an opening rosebud. Mrs. Westcott had a rich luxurious form, and such charming sparkling black eyes, that even although partly obscured by shadowy curls and long silken eye-lashes, they were quite dangerous to contemplate. She addressed Charles with a bewitching smile, and a sprightly conversation took place, which lasted till the return of Gilbert.

"Hum," thought Charles, "perhaps I may not be altogether without excitement here, after all."

Men, ay, women too, who have drank deep of the cup of pleasures, which are considered to be lawful and authorized, and get sated with their insipidity, are prone to seek the lost relish, and obtain a new zest, by plunging in guilty schemes of gratification, that carry with them the violation both of divine and human laws. It is the nature of a life of pleasure to be for ever progressive; it begins in innocence and ends in guilt; and if not abandoned in time before the habit has grown unconquerable, brings with it at length an insatiate appetite, that becomes only the more keen and glutinous with time.

Such was the situation of Charles Westcott, who, though but a young man, had already outlived his youthful sensibilities, and was incapable of enjoying the ordinary gratifications of life. To make the bauble worth pursuing, it was necessary that difficulty should attend the pursuit, and guilt the consummation.

From the evening when the demon whispered to his corrupted imagination, that even among the rural shades and in the bosom of the family of his benefactor, he might find interest, he never lost sight of one wicked purpose. He became a thousand times more amiable and attentive than ever to Mrs. Westcott and her children. His voice, his manner, his very footsteps partook of sentiment and sensibility; and he laid out all the arts of a finished man of the world, in exhibiting a touching contrast to the rough uncourtly sincerity of Gilbert.

We reverence the divinity of women, and acknowledge their charms; but they have their weaknesses as well as virtues; and one of the most dangerous is that of losing sight of the morals of men, in their admiration of polished demeanor, and sly insinuating servility, aiming in secret at the attainment of its own interested purposes. Perhaps it is natural that they should do so, since much of their education is devoted to the formation of manners, and they are early taught to rely upon these for their influence over the other sex.

It was some time before the simplicity of the rural wife began to comprehend the nature of Charles's attentions, or even suspect them. When she did, she ought not to have lost a single moment in withdrawing from them at once and for ever. The woman who neglects that one important moment, deceives herself wilfully, and becomes an accomplice in her own ruin. But there was something so touching in the tones of his voice, so eloquent in the downcast beechings of his melancholy eyes, and so different from the roughness of her husband, that often she caught herself making comparisons between them, and, like Desdemona, wishing "that heaven had made her" such a husband.

They often walked out in the quiet twilight of the woods, accompanied by one of the children, and while the little innocent was sporting hither and thither, talked of one thing and looked another, until the poor foolish dame scarcely knew which way to look, or what she was talking about. When they returned she would perhaps encounter her husband, just from his toils and occupations; dusty, fatigued, and sometimes perhaps a little impatient; though, alas! he little knew the diabolical plan meditating and maturing against his happiness. He did not, like Charles, embody his soul in every glance, or pitch his voice to the melting melody of witching sensibility, but spoke to her with unstudied frankness, and looked at her with the honest free confidence of a heart faithful itself, and suspecting not the faith of the wife of his bosom, the friend of his soul.

"What a contrast between my husband and his elegant cousin!" thought Mrs. Westcott, and from that moment she was lost.

"What a dolt is this country squire," thought Charles. "He must be blind, or he wants to get rid of his wife. Well, I owe him a good turn, and will try to oblige him."

Mrs. Westcott became every day more sad, and her husband sometimes remonstrated with her in his usual uncouth way. The struggle was long, and the resistance obstinate. But the wary serpent prevailed at last. The faithless wife and base ingrate fled away together, to enjoy the wretched triumph of a day; one at the price of a sudden guilty death, the other of years of repentance and shame.

When the secret of the elopement transpired, as soon it did, Gilbert said not one single word. He kissed his little children, mounted his horse, and burying his spurs in its sides, dashed out of sight in a moment. He traced the fugitives to the city, to the place of their refuge; gave Charles the choice of a pair of pistols, and the vile traitor paid the penalty of his perfidy, in the presence of his still more wretched companion.

He then, without speaking to or even looking at his wife, went and delivered himself up to justice. The guilt of Charles, being detailed at length, so disgusted the jury and the court, that Gilbert was finally acquitted. He returned to a home which only brought to mind his lost delights, only reminded him of a guilty mother. He shut himself from the world, and became a misanthrope. His children grew up, neglected little weeds, that throve apace among tares and briars; and Mrs. Westcott—we need not dwell on her fate. It is written in the history of woman, with the finger of almighty justice, that the wife who forsakes her home, her husband, her duties, and her offspring, shall live the life of guilt, and die the death of infamy.

ORIGINAL CRITICAL NOTICES.

THE POETRY OF KEATS.

THERE is a great deal of justice in the following critique upon Keats; but it is one side of the truth only. That young and ill-fated poet wrote with a beauty sometimes as transcendent as his errors were positive. His points, good and bad, were all salient to no ordinary degree. We admit the criticism, but we deem it just to make this qualification.—Eds. N. Y. Mirror.

The poetry of John Keats is of a style and character not a little peculiar. If we believe, with Lord Byron, that Pope and his school are the only true standards of poetical taste and execution, certainly Keats will fall very far short of the poetical character; for with them he has scarcely anything in common. In correctness, ease, and elegance of versification, he strikes us as much inferior to most writers of far humbler pretensions. However the faculty divine may be one of the "gifts that God gives," certainly no endowment is susceptible of higher cultivation. So far, poetry is an art; and in cultivating it to abandon the pursuit after freedom and propriety of versification, is as if an artisan should neglect to acquire the art of imparting polish to steel. We are not inclined to give Keats much credit for good taste; but if we were to specify the poetical quality in which he is extraordinarily deficient, it is that good sense which is as essential to the poet as to the man of business, and which alone can render enthusiasm available and useful, because it alone prevents the reveries of the former from appearing absurd and ridiculous to the latter. No man in his senses ever pretended to find any thing ridiculous in the writings of Pope; but we will venture to say that few men can read a page or two of Keats without experiencing that highly disagreeable sensation, half disgust half ridicule, which is excited by violations of good taste. Perhaps there is nothing so likely to produce this feeling as the introduction of certain obsolete, quaint, and unusual expressions. We say certain words, for there are some, and there is a degree of quaintness, and even familiarity in many kinds of poetry which add not a little to its grace and effect. But it is in the nice judgment and between these expressions in their discriminating selection that the taste of the poet is most eminently displayed. A sentence, for instance, like the following, displeases at once, because there is scarcely a term in the whole which does not betoken a ridiculous affectation:

"By the feud
Twist nothing and creation, I here swear,
Eterné Apollo! that thy sister fair
Is of all these the gentler-mightiest."

Against the introduction, too, of such words as "lush," "rillet," "pipy," (1) and a thousand others of a similar character, which are either the corrupt coinage of a diseased taste, or obsolete, because they were not worth keeping in use, we enter our solemn protest and remonstrance. Nevertheless, we would by no means be understood as objecting to the revival of ancient language in general, where the words in former use serve to express the author's ideas in a more forcible and elegant manner than it can be done in modern phraseology. On the contrary, regarding the English poet as eminently the guardian of English language, we consider it his duty, the more especially as he has higher opportunity, to recall to life and light when occasion requires, the pure and noble speech of his mother tongue. He who will go sit by that old sparkling well which Chaucer once held in fee, and which Spenser, Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, and the rest have one after the other owned and beautified, and will thence take in general draughts undefiled to fertilize his country's language and literature, is in no small degree a public benefactor.

Throwing out of the question, however, the frequent affectations and conceits which disfigure the lines of this poet, we remember no one who has at such an early age displayed a clearer perception or a more teeming imagination. In the lines which we shall here quote, there seems to us to be a certain freshness and simplicity, and, so to speak, naturalness of feeling, which are enough to make one "pant and faint" for the country and its pleasant places, almost like one of our author's own lovers.

"— 'Tis with full happiness that I
Will trace the story of Endymion.
The very music of the name has gone
Into my being, and each pleasant scene
Is growing fresh before me as the green
Of our own valleys: so I will begin
Now while I cannot hear the city's din;

Now while the early budders are just new,
And run in mazes of the youngest hue,
About old forests; while the willow trails
Its delicate amber; and the dairy pails
Bring home increase of milk. And, as the year
Grows lush in juicy stalks, I'll smoothly steer
My little boat, for many quiet hours,
With streams that deepen freshly into bowers.
Many and many a verse I hope to write,
Before the daisies, vermillion rim'd and white,
Hide in deep herbage; and ere yet the bees
Hum about globes of clover and sweet peas,
I must be near the middle of my story.
O may no wintry season, bare and hoary,
See it half finished; but let autumn bold,
With universal tinge of sober gold,
Be all about me when I make an end.
And now at once, adventuresome, I send
My herald thought into a wilderness:
There let its trumpet blow, and quickly dress
My uncertain path with green, that I may speed
Easily onward, thorough flowers and weed."

The beauty of this passage depends upon the extreme simplicity of the feeling, and, in part, no doubt, upon the appropriateness of some of the expressions, which seem to call up at once whole and finished pictures of nature with all her surpassing attractions. A little further on, in the same poem, comes a strain of a higher mood, which has all the author's faults, while at the same time it is distinguished by an uncommon share of his excellencies. It is the song, or chorus, of the Arcadian shepherds and maidens to their peculiar divinity, Pan. We make no apology for quoting the whole.

"O thou, whose mighty palace-roof doth hang
From jagged trunks, and overshadoweth
Eternal whispers, glooms, the birth, life, death
Of unseen flowers in heavy peacefulness;
Who lovest to see the hamadryads dress
Their ruffled locks where meeting hazels darken;
And through whose solemn hours dost sit, and hearken
The dreary melody of bedded reeds—
In desolate places, where dank moisture breeds
The pipy hemlock to strange overgrowth,
Bethinking thee, how melancholy loth
Thou wast to lose fair Syrinx—do thou now,
By thy love's milky brow!
By all the trembling mazes that she ran,
Hear us, great Pan."

"O thou, for whose soul-soothing quiet, turtles
Passion their voices cooingly 'mong myrtles,
What time thou wanderest at evening
Through sunny meadows, that outskirt the side
Of thine enmossed realms: O thou, to whom
Broad-leaved fig-trees even now foredoom
Their ripen'd fruitage; yellow-girded bees
Their golden honeycombs; our village leas
Their fairest blossom'd beans and popped corn;
The chuckling linnet its five young unborn,
To sing for thee; low creeping strawberries
Their summer coolness; pent up butterflies
Their freckled wings; yea, the fresh budding year
All its completions—be quickly near,
By every wind that nods the mountain pine,
O forester divine!

"Thou, to whom every fawn and satyr flies
For willing service; whether to surprise
The squatted hare while in half sleeping fit;
Or upward ragged precipices sit
To save poor lambskins from the eagle's maw;
Or by mysterious enticement draw
Bewildered shepherds to their path again;
Or to tread breathless round the frothy main,
And gather up all fancifullest shells
For thee to tumble into Naiads' cells,
And, being hidden, laugh at their out-peeping;
Or to delight thee with fantastic leaping,
The while they pelt each other on the crown
With silvery oak-apples, and fir-cones brown—
By all the echoes that about thee ring,
Hear us, O satyr king!

"O hearken to the loud-clapping shears,
While ever and anon to his shorn peers,
A ram goes bleating: winder of the horn,
When snouted wild-boars routing tender corn,
Anger our huntsman: breather round our farms,
To keep off mildews, and all weather harms:
Strange minstrel of undescribed sounds,
That come a-swooning over hollow grounds,
And wither drearily on barren moors:
Dread opener of the mysterious doors
Leading to universal knowledge—see,
Great son of Dryope,
The many that are come to pay their vows
With leaves about their brows!"

"Be still the unimaginable lodge
For solitary thoughts; such as dodge
Conception to the very bourne of heaven,
Then leave the naked brain: be still the leaven,
That spreading in this dull and clodded earth,
Gives it a touch ethereal—a new birth:
Be still a symbol of immensity;
A firmament reflected in a sea;
An element filling the space between;
An unknown—but no more: we humbly screen
With uplift hands our foreheads, lowly bending,
And giving out a shout most heaven-rending,
Conjure thee to receive our humble prayer,
Upon thy mount Lycean."

It is strange and piteous enough that a writer capable of a hymn generally so splendid as this, could be guilty of the unimaginable absurdity of the last verse!

"The dreary melody of bedded reeds."

What heart might not be affected by the sad ideas conjured up by a line so doleful? And where can be found a collection of images more exceedingly beautiful than in the passage beginning "O thou," &c., in the second stanza? The whole poem of Endymion is, perhaps, as remarkable for faults and beauties as any other of the same length in the English language. This observation is hazarded in the face of the critics, and in absolute opposition to their decrees. It is indeed an unweeded garden; but to assert that

"Things rank and gross in nature Possess it merely,"

as the Quarterly chose to proclaim and maintain, is an instance, amongst many, of the signal injustice of that celebrated periodical, whose managers must have seen and ought to have acknowledged, that, with all its failures and short-comings, the poem we speak of is full to overflowing of admirable fancies and luxuriant beauties. We are compelled to omit further remarks upon this poem, and some which we intended to make upon the magnificent fragment of "Hyperion," which, although defaced by instances of our author's occasional weakness, is otherwise as grand in thought and language, as the giants whom it celebrates were noble and lofty in stature.

If Keats, however, succeeded well in his more extensive and higher efforts, his lyrical effusions are by no means unworthy of his genius. The "Ode to a nightingale," which we have quoted entire, below, is inferior to none other in our knowledge; and though we do by no means approve of the kind of sentiment too evidently cherished by our melancholy poet, still it seems prompted by such an utter self-abandonment to dull, drooping, irrepressible forlornness, that it must in some measure touch the very frostiest bosom.

My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains
My sense, as though of hemlock I had drunk,
Or emptied some dull opiate to the drains
One minute past, and Lethe-wards had sunk:
'Tis not through envy of thy happy lot,
But being too happy in thine happiness—
That thou, light-winged Dryad of the trees,
In some melodious plot
Of beechen green, and shadows numberless,
Singest of summer in full-throated ease.
O for a draught of vintage, that hath been Cooled a long age in the deep-delved earth,
Tasting of Flora and the country-green,
Dance, and Provençal song, and sun-burnt mirth!
O for a beaker full of the warm South,
Full of the true, the blushful Hippocrene,
With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,
And purple-stained mouth;
That I might drink, and leave the world unseen,
And with thee fade away into the forest dim:
Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget
What thou among the leaves hast never known,
The weariness, the fever, and the fret
Here, where men sit and hear each other groan;
Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last gray hairs,
Where youth grows pale, and spectre-thin, and dies;
Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
And leaden-eyed despair.
Where beauty cannot keep her lustrous eyes,
Or new love pine at them beyond to-morrow.
Away! away! for I will fly to thee,
Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,
But on the viewless wings of poesy,
Though the dull brain perplexes and retards:
Already with thee! tender is the night,
And haply the queen-moon is on her throne,
Cluster'd around by all her starry Fays;
But here there is no light,
Save what from heaven is with the breezes blown
Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy ways.
I cannot see what flowers are at my feet,
Nor what soft incense hangs upon the boughs,
But, in embalmed darkness, guess each sweet
Wherewith the seasonable month endows
The grass, the thicket, and the fruit-tree wild;
White hawthorn, and the pastoral eglantine;
Fast-fading violets covered up in leaves;
And mid-May's eldest child,
The coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine,
The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves.
Darkling I listen; and, for many a time
I have been half in love with easeful death,
Call'd him soft names in many a mused rhyme,
To take into the air my quiet breath;
Now more than ever seems it rich to die,
To cease upon the midnight without pain,
While thou art pouring forth thy soul abroad
In such an ecstasy!
Still wouldst thou sing, and I have ears in vain—
To thy high requiem become a sod.
Thou wast not born for death, immortal bird!
No hungry generations tread thee down;
The voice I hear this passing night was heard
In ancient days by emperor and clown:
Perhaps the self-same song that found a path
Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
She stood in tears amid the alien corn,
The same that oft-times hath
Charmed magic casements, opening on the foam
Of perilous seas, in fairy lands forlorn.
Forlorn! the very word is like a bell
To toll me back from thee to my sole self!
Adieu! the fancy cannot cheat so well
As she is fabled to do, deceiving elf.
Adieu! adieu! thy plaintive anthem fades
Past the near meadows, over the still stream,
Up the hill-side; and now 'tis buried deep
In the next valley-glades:
Was it a vision, or a waking dream?
Fled is that music: do I wake or sleep?

The allusion to Ruth, in the seventh stanza, has in it something inexpressibly affecting and tender; and as we read it, even now, our eyes fill with unwonted, but pleasant tears.

Among the lyrical pieces in the volume before us, is one on a Grecian urn, upon whose sides was the sculptured story of some ancient entertainment, with the rustic music and dancing—the maidenly flight and the lover-like pursuit under the branching trees, by which people were accustomed to amuse themselves in more Arcadian days. Our author says:

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on;
Not to the sensual ear, but, more endear'd,
Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone:
Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave
Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
Bold lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
Though winning near the goal—yet, do not grieve;
She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

We suppose that this and the rest of it may be liable to some objections, but we confess that there is a quaintness and originality about it which affect us delightfully. We make extracts from our volume with great liberality, because the work is very uncommon and the writings of the author very little known in this country. Here is a remarkably fine, manly sonnet "on first looking into Chapman's Homer."

Much have I travelled in the realms of gold,
And many goodly states and kingdoms seen;
Round many western islands have I been
Which bards in fealty to Apollo hold,
Of one wide expanse had I been told
That deep-brow'd Homer ruled as his demesne:
Yet did I never breathe its pure serene

Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and bold:
Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken!
Or like stout Cortez, when with eagle eyes
He stared at the Pacific—and all his men
Look'd at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent, upon a peak in Darien.

If any thing were necessary to make our heart warm for Keats, it would be the admiration he expresses for old Chapman. We do not know how Chapman's sounding hexameters would seem if they were disfigured by a modern dress; but when we have read him in the homely garb of our ancient edition, we have exulted in the communion of the old poet's bold, hearty, uncereceremonious, and fiery spirit as if our pulses were playing to the "sound of a trumpet." We cannot at this time devote more attention to Keats. Perhaps we may on some future occasion examine his poetry more critically.

LITERARY NOTICES.

First Lessons; or Elements of Thought and Language, expressed by Pictures and Words; according to Walker's pronunciation. By Miss Oram.

It is the crying sin—(we do not mean to be guilty of a pun)—of our modern school-book makers, that their definitions of words are often more obscure than the words themselves. How many tears have been, and are, shed by the little pupils, on this very account! The compiler of "Hazen's Speller and Definer" has much to answer for in this respect. We should not wonder if he were nightly haunted by the ghosts of innocent children, who had broken their hearts in attempting to understand him! We will open his book at random, and test him by a child of six years:

"Clap—a loud noise made by collision?"
"Caroline, my dear, what is the meaning of the word collision?"
"I don't know, sir."
"What is the meaning of the word clap?"
"The noise we make when we strike our hands together."
"That is correct, my dear."
Again—"What do you understand by the words hazard and challenge?"
"I don't know, sir?"
"What do you mean by the expression, I dare?"
"I mean that I am not afraid."
Right. Once more—"What do you understand by the words inflexible and formal?"
"I don't know, sir."
"What do you mean by the word stiff?"
"Any thing that is hard to bend is stiff; so is one that walks straight and proud."
"Well defined. Voracious?"
"I don't know, sir."
"What would you call a little girl that eats too much?"
"I should say she was very greedy."
And so on to the end of the chapter.

The reader will please to take notice, that the words which the little girl could not define are the very definitions which Hazen has given for those which she could and did define.

These remarks, however, are not applicable to Miss Oram's book, because she has illustrated her tangible nouns by pictures, which are generally easily and instantly comprehended. But without these cuts the poor child would often be terribly bewildered. For instance, the first cut in Miss Oram's book represents an ape, which she thus describes—"An animal distinguished by having four hands." In another page is the picture of a hand, very properly defined "the extremity of the arm." The pupil's opinion must, therefore, inevitably be, that an ape has either four arms, or else two hands on each arm. Her definition of the word urn is also very indefinite—"A vessel, the body of which is much larger than the mouth." Without the picture before him, a child would have but a vague idea of an urn from this explanation, which is equally applicable to an earthen jug or a tin canister. So also even with the figure of a saw, what idea can the following definition convey to a child, who never saw one in use—"An instrument made of steel; it is used to separate things." This is not correct. A sieve is used to separate things, for it separates the flour from the bran; and a fan-mill separates the grain from the chaff. But a saw is used to cut one substance into two parts, and not to separate two or more things. A quill is thus defined—"That feather in the wing of a bird that has a horny substance at one end." Can the fair authoress show us a feather from any part of a bird that has not "a horny substance at one end?" Again—"Eggs—the product of birds." So are the feathers which ladies wear in their hats. "House—a covered place of abode." So is a tent, and sometimes a cavern. "Lamp—a vessel made to hold oil for burning." There are a variety of vessels made to hold oil for burning; but the lamp is a vessel made to consume this oil, after receiving it from the other vessels, by converting it into light. "Snake—an amphibious animal without feet." So is a seal. But all snakes are not amphibious. "Pail—a wooden vessel to hold liquids." So is a keg, barrel, hoghead, &c. "Spade—an instrument for digging the ground, made of iron, with a wooden handle." So is a pick-axe.

These objections, however, as before intimated, are obviated by the cuts; which, being the representatives of objects that are generally familiar to children, supply the place of more simple and particular definitions. We therefore do not hesitate to pronounce this book of "first lessons" a useful auxiliary in teaching the "young idea how to shoot," being, as the author justly observes, in conformity to principles deduced from the nature of things; pictures or images of things, being first presented to the eye; then the names and words which express their qualities and uses; and, lastly, the letters or separate sounds, of which these names are composed.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

It is curious to observe how entirely dependent we savages, democrats, horn-flint-and-wooden-nutmeg-manufacturers of the western world are upon the dramatic talent of other countries; and with what a Lazarus-like eagerness we have been accustomed to snap up the crumbs from their tables! The British drama is overflowing with aspirants, a few of whom have been sprinkled over here upon us within the last several weeks. The monkey led the way, but wasted a superfluity of scratching and tumbling upon an audience not sufficiently enlightened to relish his beauties. People require to be civilized to judge matters of refined taste. Poor Pug, we regret to state, made a flat failure; as the publishers say, he fell dead from the press; he will never run through a second edition. Mrs. Pindar followed. She made her courtesy to the American public as Helen Worret; and a very pretty courtesy it was; in the succeeding melo-drama of the Broken Sword she appeared as Myrtillo. She has a sprightly manner, and not unpleasant person, and would probably acquire some fame in several among the parts formerly identified with Mrs. Wilson—although in depth of feeling, grace, and general talent the latter is altogether her superior. Barnes as Ponder was capital. The author has made the character a broadly ludicrous delineation, and it lost nothing of its effect in the hands of our old favorite. In the melo-drama Mrs. Pindar was fair. Placide and Simpson unusually good. By the way of the music, we thought in the overture to Anacron that the wind instruments were not correct in their entries. One violoncello, too, cannot give force to the violoncello passages. The Marriage of Figaro brought out Miss Hughes, as Susanna. She leaped with one bound into the favor of the audience. Her fine round voice is of a fair soprano compass: strong and sweet, though slightly veiled. She was promptly engaged in her songs, which, notwithstanding an evident and extremely graceful diffidence, were given with spirit and effect, particularly "Away, away to the mountain's brow." In addition to her vocal ability she is fortunate in the possession of a youthful and prepossessing person, a very pretty mixture of modesty and archness, and some tact as an actress. Mr. Jones gleamed out in one or two fine songs in Fiorello; and Mrs. Sharpe was well received. Placide's Antonio was in his best style; and Mr. Richings, as Figaro, was as tolerable as a player in the Lord Austincourt line of business could be. The part should have been given to Thorne. Sinclair, a vocalist of established reputation, is on the eve of making his debut. Mr. Forrest's Gladiator has been read among the critics, and made some stir. Mr. Kean is about producing a new native tragedy, entitled Waldemar, which promises well; and the public are eagerly waiting for the fulfilment of their expectations in Masaniello.

BOWERY THEATRE.

A number of excellent pieces have been produced at this house, during the past week, and were generally well sustained. "The Iron Chest," "Virginius," "The Midnight Hour," and "The School for Scandal." Master Russel has several times appeared in the melo drama of the Woodcutter, and Mr. and Mrs. Russel as Sir Peter and Lady Teazle. The first was favorably received, and the two latter come deservedly recommended by acknowledged reputation. This theatre has strong claims to attention. You may sometimes find a scene struck off there in a superior manner. Mr. Hamblin is industrious, persevering, and skilful, and is generally happy in his endeavors to please as an actor. He only requires a reasonable share of patronage to produce theatrical exhibitions of a kind which will not interfere with the entertainments at the Park, where opera will undoubtedly monopolize a large portion of the season. The Bowery has frequently proved strongly attractive to the most fastidious audience; and we should not forget that Mr. Forrest was once wont to fill it nightly to overflowing, and that the Signorina, termed by the critics "divine," warbled her last farewell within its walls.

THE NEW COMEDY.

Our play-going readers will, doubtless, recollect Mr. Paulding's prize comedy, the "Lion of the West," the principal character of which was played by Mr. Hackett; and they will be gratified in learning that it will shortly be re-produced, with very material alterations.

It was evident on the representation that the author had given his whole attention to the principal character, which, though drawn with great force, and with a remarkable fidelity to nature, was scarcely enough by itself to sustain the piece, which, however, was sufficiently successful to warrant a belief that the public would welcome it still more cordially were the plot less simply constructed, and the Kentuckian's sphere of action somewhat enlarged. The author, having neither leisure nor inclination for the task, it was, with his full approbation, committed to Mr. Stone, (well known as the author of Metamora) who has arranged an entire new piece, with the exception of Colonel Wildfire. This popular hero continues to stand out in bold relief, while the new characters are made to bear a conspicuous and important part in the intrigue of the play, which, with these additions, cannot fail of being eminently popular. The irresistibly comic style in which Mr. Hackett represented the "half horse, half alligator" original, cannot be forgotten by those who witnessed the performance, and we shall take the earliest opportunity of again enjoying a hearty laugh at the eccentric, brave, and generous representative of the west. Having read the manuscript, we may hereafter give an outline of the plot, with sketches of the principal characters.

NUMBER TWO.

THE moon streams broadly across my chamber, dear Imogene, and the night-air comes in soft and balmy, and I cannot sleep—though long ago, I presume, the gentle goddess must have “sealed up your eye-lids with her silver wand,” and I am probably, among those, whom neither sickness nor care should keep waking at this late hour, the only willing watcher. The clock has just struck two, and its clear, quivering cadences have left me here, the dream that I was weaving with my head out of the window, broken and unwound, and my indefinite desire for converse and sympathy changed into a definite remembrance of one whose society alone ever left me without a wish beyond, and whose sympathy alone ever answered the wild and imperative questioning within me. It is a glorious night—a broad, sparkling band of moonlight lying across the bay, from the fort to my window, as if Dian had flung down her spangled ceasus upon the water, and the stars just perceptible through the white silvery atmosphere, and this heavenly silence so absolute and spiritual (oh, what a relief it is after the dizzy hurry and turmoil of day-time!) settling upon one's very soul, like the wings of the Angel of Contemplation. It is at hours like this, that I wish for you. I may almost say, it is at hours like this alone. It is rarely that refined spirits can meet in this perturbed world, without wronging the clear sense of each other's delicacy and heavenly temper. I should fear to marry from the same feeling, and of the many women to whom I have been, in my wandering life, partial, I remember but one whom I should be willing to see in any mood, and at any hour. Whether it is the fault of our nature, or whether we commence our passionate intercourse on too high a key of romance, I know not, but I seldom fail to be shocked and mortified at the daylight moods of women. You are perhaps, more than we, subject to impressions from things about you, and your daylight circumstances are more common-place and frivolous than ours. I come away from my books, for instance, for a morning lounge, the tone of my mind elevated rather than lowered by my occupations, and I meet the beauty that talked intellectually and fervently by last night's moon, and find her engrossed with the fashion of a hat, or a new chapter of scandal, or what is worse, vacant and common-place, her very tone flattened, and the very eyes I thought so brilliant, grown dull and glassy—and it is not that I was deceived then, or that she is changed essentially now, but that the exhaustion of the over-night's fatigue, or the unromantic details of a toilet, or the degrading minutiae of shopping, and street idling, have brought her mind insensibly to a vulgar level, and it will need music, and lights, and excitement, and all the inspiring appliances of society, to arouse and wind it up again to its passionate key. It makes, I think, a nice distinction in the sexes. Men seldom lower their mental dignity in the presence of others—women often.

I wrote you last from Saratoga. With the rest of the gay world I turned my face to the east in the middle of August, and after a day or two at Troy, (among the sweetest of scenery, and I am sure the kindest and most hospitable of people) I took the stage at the melancholy hour of two in the morning, for the route by Greenfield. I do not think there is more magnificent scenery in the world. The road lies along in the bed of a winding valley for a great distance, the most superb uplands swelling away from your feet to the tops of the mountains on either side, and exquisite surprises of perspective constantly opening right and left, as you get on, and streams, and rich forests, and rocks, and all the lavish material of the sublime, breaking in upon your eye, with almost too hurried a succession of beauty and majesty. We came about noon to the foot of Hoosack mountain, and walked up of course. The views back from the turnings of the road were on a scale of unequal grandeur. You must traverse the route yourself, for I cannot describe it. The descent on the east side to Deerfield river, is a business to hold one's breath upon; but once fairly and safely accomplished, the wonderful loveliness of that little stream creeping along so thinly and slenderly at the feet of the tremendous ranges that overhang it, gives you a sensation of novelty and quiet delight, as delicious from its own excess, as it is from the abrupt contrast.

We arrived in Boston duly, and here we are, Phil and myself, at the Tremont—a palace of granite, the most magnificent hotel probably either in Europe or America, and filled just now with all the fashion and half the talent of the country. They are a fine people here:—more intelligent than fashionable, more sumptuous than elegant, more Roman than Grecian,—a compound of Southern hospitality and Northern coldness, of the most self-devoted attention, and the nicest discrimination of the claims to it. There is but one authentic circle, and when once introduced to a member of it, you make the entire revolution. There is but one lady-autocrat, the most imposing and the gayest and most gifted of fashionists, and her acquaintance is an insurance to all parties and to all proper people, and, more important than either, to her own perpetual atmosphere, one which no man can breathe without intoxication, and no woman (forgive me, dear Imogene) without envy. But this is getting personal.

Phil is in high feather. He drives and flirts, and writes verses almost without changing his gloves, and, creature of occasion as he is, he does it all well, and the two first certainly, if not the last, with great brilliancy. Last night he drove me to a fete-champêtre given at one of the seats in these most exquisite of environs. The atmosphere and the stars, and the rich, golden moonlight, if they had been ordered for the occasion, could not have come in a better humor for beauty and softness. The grounds were the finest, and the decorations, and the music, and the spirits of the company, were all a little more exalted than, in my humble sphere, I had been accustomed to. I was as bewildered as Christopherus Sly. One thing I did observe, however—the singular devotedness of manner with which Phil addressed every woman to whom he had anything in the world to say. There was an earnest and yet timid respectfulness about it which I had been in the habit of supposing beyond counterfeits, and a sign of true passion always. We rode home somewhere in the ‘small hours;’ and as I sat beside him in the tilbury, silent and half transeid with the pleasure I had received, I could hear, by an occasional jingle in his soliloquy, that, without diminishing his attention to his trotting roan, he was composing. We reached home, and sat down to a cold woodcock, and Phil called for a pen, ink, and a bottle of claret, and in some twenty minutes handed across the table the following verses:—

TO —.

’Tis midnight deep. I came but now
From the bright air of lighted halls,
And while I hold my aching brow
I gaze upon my dim-lit walls;
And feeling here that I am free
To wear the look that suits my mood,
And let my thoughts flow back to thee,
I bless my humble solitude,
And bidding all thoughts else begone,
I muse upon thy love alone!

Yet was the music sweet to-night,
And fragrant spices filled the air,
And flowers were drooping in the light,
And lovely women wandered there—
And fruits and wines with lavish waste
Were on the marble tables piled,
And all that tempts the eye and taste,
And sets the haggard pulses wild,
And wins from care, and deadens sadness,
Were there—but yet I felt no gladness.

I thought of thee—I thought of thee!
Each cunning change the music played,
Each fragrant breath that stole to me,
My wandering thought more truant made.
The lovely women passed me by,
The wit fell pointless in my ear,
I looked on all with vacant eye,
I did not see, I did not hear.

The skilled musician's master tone
Was sweet—thy voice was sweeter far;
They were soft eyes the lamps alone on—
The eyes I worship gentler are;
The halls were broad, the pillars tall—
With silver lamps and costly wine—
I only thought how poor was all
To one low tone from lips like thine—
I only felt how well I forgot
Were earth's best joys—where thou wert not.

You would think now that those verses, which, by the way, are uncommonly pretty, were an effusion of the most natural and sincere feeling, by a man whose love was more to him than all the pomp and circumstance under heaven. Not at all. The next morning he ordered Alfonso, who imitates his master's hand to perfection, to make six copies upon rose-colored paper, and carry them to six of his admirations who did not happen to visit in the particular circle in which the party was given. I should be willing to stand a shot for every thought he bestowed upon either of them till the evening was over. I'll believe in nothing short of tears and a pale cheek after this!

I have stolen from his portfeuille another little bagatelle, which he read to me a night or two since, written in a more serious vein than usual, after a conversation with one of the loveliest—the very loveliest of women. She said something to him about her morning devotions, and his verses are probably his inferences from her description:

She rose from her delicious sleep,
And put away her soft brown hair,
And, in a tone as low and deep
As love's first whisper, breathed a prayer—
Her snow-white hands together prest,
Her blue eyes sheltered in the lid,
The folded linen on her breast,
Just swelling with the charms it hid—
And from her long and flowing dress,
Escaped a bare and snowy foot,
Whose step upon the earth did press
Like a new snow-flake, white and mute—
And there, from slumber soft and warm,
Like a young spirit fresh from heaven,
She bowed that slight and matchless form,
And humbly prayed to be forgiven,
Oh God, if souls unsouled as these Need daily mercy from thy throne—
If she, upon her bended knees,
Our loveliest and our purest one,
She, with a face so clear and bright
We deem her some stray child of light—
If she, with those soft eyes in tears,
Day after day in her young years,
Must kneel and pray for grace from thee,
What far, far deeper need have we!
How hardy, if she win not heaven,
Will our wild errors be forgiven!

Quite pretty—is it not? I verily believe Phil once had a heart—but, as the author of the Young Duke very truly remarks, “there are men, who, if disappointed once in a true passion, are the most heartless beings in the world for ever after.” With a knowledge of his history, the philosophy may easily be fitted to his character.

By the way, did I send you his definition of a heart, and some similar matters? It is included in one of his nonsenses for the “Gazette,” called, “A Short Catechism for Congress Hall.” As well as I remember, it runs somewhat thus:—

What is the chief end of man? Impression.
What is the chief end of woman? Flirtation.
Who made you? The tailor.
What is a heart? A trite mineral used for barter.
What is matrimony? A game for money.
What is pleasure? The art of fatiguing all the faculties at once.
What is dinner? A tete-a-tete with interruptions.
What is lunch? An operation to appease appetite.
What is beauty? The result of education—better defined by “style.”
What is nature? The vulgar defect common to the uneducated.
What is truth? A traditional fable—qualities not known.
What is religion? Etiquet.

What is atmosphere? A compound of manner and talent.
What is music? A concord and two discords.
Who exist? Those who are here to-day.
Who are dead? Those who went away yesterday.
Who are remembered? God only knows!

Heigho! it's very late—or very early—for the clock is striking four! What vigils for a man who values his complexion! Good night, dear Imogene. Yours always,

SKETCHES BY AN EDITOR.

“WHAT a medley lies on my table this morning. Here's a work in sheets—London edition—the only copy that ever crossed the Atlantic. It will be re-published here soon.”

“You have read it?”

“No.”

“Then you know not how it will go, Mr. Editor?”

“Just as well as if had appeared last year, Mr. Reader.”

“The author is here himself, has dined with the critics, the reviews are all written; it is to be ushered into existence with a flourish of trumpets in the —, which is to be re-echoed in the —. Mr. A. has pledged himself, Mr. B. is the writer's boon companion, Mr. C. will praise it because he hates the author of the —, to be issued at the same time; and Mr. D. puffs every thing in the lump, and gets the books for his trouble.”

“But the public, Mr. Editor, the public—”

“The fiddlestick, Mr. Reader, the fiddlestick. That modest looking thin octavo yonder is the new satirical poem, damp from the press; it lies by the side of the Christian Expositor. These engravings are from —. What scratching. The man there looks like a monkey. Mem.—three creditable engravings—meet the encouragement they deserve. Notes, too—a season-ticket to the dancing bear; a prospectus of a new journal; the first number of a periodical, just established in Louisiana; new music, new magazine, specimen of improved type, and—but here comes Peter from the post-office with letters and papers.”

“Why what a mass of information you must receive from that immense heap!”

“You forget, sir Reader, you forget. We gain from them news of a freshet, or a blow; but these are streams, not fountains. They bear from the large cities the enormous reservoirs, the floods of news with which they irrigate the distant country. For one moment look over those lying by your elbow. Open at the first page. Now read.”

“Mr. Ingham's letter—the cabinet.”

“Now the next.”

“The cabinet—Mr. Ingham's letter.”

“And the next.”

“Heavy fall of rain. Mr. Berrian. Mr. Ingham's letter.”

“Peep into that little blue seven by nine. What says its worship?”

“Mr. Ingham's letter. Mr. Calhoun. Ah! here are some critical observations. ‘Mr. Calhoun's letter is now before the public. It is pervaded throughout by a remarkable tone of candor and manly vigor. The sentiments of this invaluable document should be widely circulated through the nation!’”

“Well, well, that will do. Now unfold that brown fellow in the large type. ‘The Independent United States Champion.’”

“Read the motto.”

‘To wake the soul by tender strokes of art.’

‘Mr. Calhoun. The infamous epistle of this traitor to his country is now before the public. We have given the concluding portion a place in our columns of to-day. The reader will observe the tone of groveling pusillanimity and hypocritical cunning which pervades the whole of this monstrous confession of apostasy and wickedness. The abandoned and licentious character of the writer can only be equalled by the —’

“Well, a truce to politics. You see how the world wags, dear reader; and may conceive the labor of a poor editor, in endeavoring to pick the grain of truth out of all this chaff. But yet who cares? These are but the weeds of a luxuriant soil; let them sprout up; among them much good is accomplished. Here's the ‘Invincible Patriot’—an arrant, time-serving creature as ever breathed; and the ‘Greenburgh Messenger’—that growls and grumbles like a bear; and so on to the end of the chapter. Though (to change the figure) many a one shines through the crowd with the native light of intelligence and honesty, and sheds its beams of wit and wisdom upon the local subjects of the town or village, where it has chosen its orbit.”

There is one thing which provokes a smile upon the visage of a person accustomed to the large scale on which matters are transacted in a populous city: viz. the exaggerated importance which occurrences receive from the country prints and country places; for instance, a fire. Who cares for a fire in New-York? When the bells peal through the wide silence of the night, the sleepy citizen, perchance, raises himself on his couch, and gazes a moment at the glare reflected upon the heavens, then turns again to sleep; and if a house or two or a few blocks are burned down, how carelessly the eye glances over the paragraph in the corner of the next day's paper, and passes from “Twelve new buildings in the Bowery,” &c. to the marriages, theatre, auction sales, &c. &c. Look into a country village on such an occasion, or read the next Saturday's gazette, and you learn, “That the inhabitants of the peaceful village of —, while wrapped in the mantle of unconscious slumber, were startled at the dead of the night by the awful and appalling cry of ‘fire!’ The hideous conflagration first laid hold of Mr. Jenkins's barn, then burned on to the building used as a store by Mr. Jackson, which, dreadful to relate, was totally consumed,” &c.

This peculiarity is yet more visible in case of death. Neither nature nor art has a sound so utterly and inexpressibly mournful as the toll of a funeral bell in the country. It is the very voice of the universal tyrant whispering to your ear, and sinking thrillingly to the innermost core of your heart. A perfect shadow broods over all things. The gloom hushes every dwelling, and is reflected from every face. You cannot shake off the impression. It weighs on your soul like lead; and when the simple crowd come forth, and the coffin heavy with that which a few hours before was a breathing, thinking, perchance, hoping being like yourself, meets your eye; how the chilling influence curdles the blood in your veins, and makes it creep around your shoulders. Yet what is death in a city? What an empty mockery is a funeral to all but the stricken bosoms which are bleeding and writhing with the cruel bolt. With what apathy, peradventure mirth, the shuffling crowds glance at the ominous train? The clattering hoofs of the beau's steed strike fire as he dashes recklessly along, the clerk hurries onward with his bundle, the stage-driver's whip echoes as he hastens his jaded team; the rapid notes of the piano may be heard through the damask curtain that shades the apartment of fashion; and the sweet belle floats by gracefully with the never-ebbing tide, and dreams not that she herself, maugre those sunny eyes and that placid bosom may, even before the flower on her brow has faded, be thus borne on, and thus disregarded.

"Hey-day, sir, here's a digression—from an editor's table to a graveyard."

"A digression, gentle reader, suffer me to hint, neither unnatural nor uncommon."

"But I set out with you, in the hopes of being amused, and you have wheedled me into a sermon. I thought you would fling off your suit of sables, and laugh with me, not preach."

"True, true, my kind and merry companion; pardon the transgression, but remember that the mind is restless as the magnet, and sadness is written on so many points of the moral compass, that the thought, in its thousand vibrations, cannot always point to pleasure."

"Hush, sir editor, what have you to do with sadness? Your health is good, your conscience is unseared, your journal is popular, you count on your list of patrons, names that make the heart leap, and your avocations lead you through the most enchanting scenes. What other men seek as amusement you enjoy from the necessity of business; and instead of wasting life in some pursuit which requires neither literature nor reflection, you are continually called upon to study the one, and to develop and cultivate the other. Your existence is like that of bees and birds. You are forever fluttering around fruit and flowers. You feed upon all the elegant essences of fashion, pleasure, and science. Nearly all other professions lead man aside from these paths, into something groveling and tedious, which he pursues only from considerations of business, as the sailor imprisons himself in a floating dungeon, and consents to toss for months on the deep, at the peril of wind and waves; or as the miner digs into the bowels of the earth for the hidden metal. When such as these find themselves in the light and pure regions which you inhabit, well may they look upon you with envy."

"Talkest thou thus to me, dear reader? Then do I know thee for one with a bright fancy, but an inexperienced mind. Art thou yet so fresh in the pilgrimage as not to have learned that the most delicious food the soonest palls upon the palate? That honey may become loathsome; that you may weary even of the warble of a bird? There are times when the eyes ache with the glitter of splendor. It is decreed that nothing, literally nothing, in this system of imperfect perfection, called physical and moral nature, can stand the test of close familiarity. The most polished marble betrays its coarseness when exposed to the microscope. There is no music but you will at length turn away from it with sated ear, or detect in it some jarring association; no face but some unlooky angle or repulsive expression may flash upon you from an unexpected position, or in an accidental glare of light; no character but at some of these dull cold moods, which occasionally float dimly and darkly along the atmosphere of all minds, you shall stumble upon a weakness or a vice, a perception blunted to delicacy, a blindness to what you deem a truism, a string in the heart that refuses to vibrate when you touch it affectionately, a something indefinite, as a chill in the air of a summer day, which after all may be in yourself. This is the craving of unlimited expectation, for more than nature has created—the fineness of keen love, whose exquisite edge can only live in the fancy, and is turned by the touch of any thing human. I remember I once had occasion to travel over a country scarcely settled, upon a journey of many weeks' duration. My way lay directly through oak forests, across the sources of large rivers, and by the most romantic spots that ever traveling painter treasured in his sketch-book. I had cherished the love of forest scenery like a passion. Its magnificent clumps of giant trees, its calm air of primeval silence and grandeur, the vast variety of branches, which sometimes bent superbly over my head like an arch, and sometimes extended to the ground like the walls of a fairy palace, faintly reflecting its green light around, and fringing the sides of the scarce-trodden road. For the first week or two these perfectly enamored me. I was utterly alone, with a steed that might have borne Richard the lion-hearted through the proudest tournament of England; and as I mused on the broken bridge, or watched the wild squirrel leaping from tree to tree, or descended into the Eden depths of the luxuriant valley, or mounted to the summit of the hill, and caught a panoramic view of the wide woods and shining rivers below, I almost vowed, in my soul, to abandon the trickery of artificial society, and fly here, where nature's gifts might be enjoyed on her own bosom."

"Pray, Mr. Editor, this is all very fine, but what has that to do with your profession?"

"Patience, dear reader, patience; youth is so impetuous, even as thy fancy has painted the charms of an editor's life, so was this journey to me. In three weeks I was so tired of the eternal recurrence of similar images, beautiful as they actually were, that I pined for an open field or paved street, and the hum and bustle of the town. I was fairly sick of leaves, branches, tall woods, and the trunks of trees. When I went to bed and closed my eyes, the everlasting boughs were waving around me, the squirrels were leaping across the ceiling, the wind was rushing over the foliage, I could not exclude them from my imagination, and when I galloped into a town of some fashion, and entered the ample hall of a large hotel, I felt as if I had been saved from drowning. Thus may the seeming fair things of earth become valueless and unwelcome if forced upon the enjoyment. Even Rasselas was wretched in the happy valley."

"And pray, Mr. Editor, of what may these indefinite disadvantages thou speak'st of be composed?"

"One of them, my respected reader, is the impossibility of chatting long in the morning, with an agreeable friend like thyself. Business must be attended to. I have already staid with thee too long. Come in some other time, good reader, then, I will confess all. Had I but time,

"I could a tale unfold
Would harrow up thy soul, freeze thy young blood,
Make thy two eyes—"

But here's Peter, with his melancholy face, for more copy, to cram down the throat of my voracious publication; therefore, by your leave, I shall postpone this eternal blazonry till a future visit. SEDLEY.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—It is curious to observe the distinct variety of minds which nature has brought into the world. They present more striking contrasts than you detect in human countenances. When you look along a row of faces, seated, for instance, in the pit of a theatre, the peculiarities of each are brought more forcibly before you by your opportunity of forming comparisons, without an effort, and by the mere act of vision. I amused myself the other evening during a dull piece, by watching, I hope, innocently, the physiognomies of some of my fellow-creatures. Next me was a huge fat face with a double chin and small eyes; by his side was a haggard visage, with a nose like a triangle. In some, the features had a general inclination upward, in others, downward, while here and there was one with a twist sideways, a sinister cast of the eye, or a ludicrous amplitude of mouth. A storm-beaten, iron looking front, seamed over, as if it had been struck with lightning, was wrinkled into distortion by unaccustomed fits of laughter, and by its side the smooth, soft-complexioned, sweet face of a young boy, who, one might swear, came from a lovely mother, or resembled a charming, saucy sister, was illumined with a glow of perfect animation; his large, liquid blue eyes beamed with pleasure, and the lurking smiles about his lips, came and went, with a touch of girlish beauty, as the scene stirred up the pure stream of his thoughts, and made them flash out over his features.

Minds are just so opposite, but it is not so easy to find it out. You must open your moral eyes to detect the invisible mental qualities of the good people around. Yet when once discovered, what wonderful differences appear! How some are distorted, and some blind! How some contemplate nature with a squinting misanthropy, and some, like the boy, are in soul all clear and beautiful. Here, you behold one scarred by misfortune, another pure in innocence, a third, wrinkled with age, a fourth enervated and bloated with indulgence. If we could change, for a little while, our moral perceptions with each other, and be thus enabled to gaze on the world with the "mind's eye" of our neighbor, we should not recognize the scenes now most dear and familiar. For example, request a poet, and practised observer, and an individual of dissimilar experience and disposition to give you their ideas upon any subject; probably the qualities which instantly flash on the one, and afford him keen pain or pleasure, will be totally unperceived by the other; and so all things convey different impressions, and are in fact different objects to different minds. This faculty of discovering attributes and relations, invisible to others, constitutes, in a great measure, the secret of an author's success. I was thrown into this train of reflection by the name of an essay in one of the numbers of the New Monthly Magazine, entitled "Free Admissions."

"Now," said I to myself, "what can there be in this with which to cke out an article? What can be said but that it is more convenient to attend the theatre gratuitously than to pay your dollar. Yet see what a vein of humorous imagination the writer has opened. The subject was to me opaque like a rock. See what a pretty spring has gushed out at the touch of his wand."

THE FREE ADMISSION.

A FREE admission is the lotos of the mind: the leaf in which your name is inscribed as having the privileges of the entrée for the season is of an obnoxious quality—an antidote for half the ills of life. I speak here not of a purchased but of a gift-ticket, an emanation of the generosity of the managers, a token of conscious desert. With the first you can hardly bring yourself to go to the theatre; with the last, you cannot keep away. If you have paid five guineas for a free admission for the season, this free admission turns to a mere slavery. You seem to have done a foolish thing, and to have committed an extravagance under the plea of economy. You are struck with remorse. You are impressed with a conviction that pleasure is not to be bought. You have paid for your privilege in the lump, and you receive the money in dribblets. The five pounds you are out of pocket et does not meet with an adequate compensation the first night, or on any single occasion—you must come again, and use double diligence to strike a balance to make up your large arrears: instead of an obvious saving, it hangs as a dead weight on your satisfaction all the year; and the improvident price you have paid for them kills every ephemeral enjoyment, and poisons the flattering illusions of the scene. You have incurred a debt, and must go every night to redeem it; and as you do not like being tied to the oar, or making a toil of a pleasure, you stay away altogether; give up the promised luxury as a bad speculation; sit sullenly at home, or bend your loitering feet in any other direction; and putting up with the first loss, resolve never to be guilty of the like folly again. But it is not thus with the possessor of a free admission, truly so called. His is a pure pleasure, a clear gain. He feels none of these irksome qualms and misgivings. He marches to the theatre like a favored lover; if he is compelled to absent himself, he feels all the impatience and compunction of a prisoner. The portal of the temple of the muses stands wide open to him, closing the vista of the day—when he turns his back upon it at night with steps gradual and slow, mingled with the common crowd, but conscious of a virtue which they have not, he says, "I shall come again to-morrow!" In passing through the streets, he casts a side-long careless glance at the playbills; he reads the papers chiefly with the view to see what is the play for the following day, or the ensuing week. If it is something new, he is glad; if it is old, he is resigned—but he goes in either case. His steps bend mechanically that way—pleasure becomes a habit, and habit a duty—he fulfills his destiny—he walks deliberately along Long-acre (you may tell a man going to the play, and whether he pays or has a free admission)—quickness his pace as he turns the corner of Bow-street, and arrives breathless and in haste at the welcome spot, where, on presenting himself, he receives a passport that is a release from care, thought, toil, for the evening, and wafts him into the regions of the blest! What is it to him how the world turns round, if the play goes on; whether empires rise or fall, so that Covent-garden stands its ground? Shall he plunge into the void of politics, that volcano burnt out with the cold, sterile, sightless lava, hardening all around? or con over the registers of births, deaths, and marriages when he may be present at Juliet's wedding and gaze on Juliet's tomb? or shall he wonder at the throng of coaches in Regent-street, when he can feast his eyes with the coach (the fairy vision of his childhood) in which Cinderella rides to the ball? Here (by the help of that open sesame! a free admission,) ensconced in his favorite niche, looking from the "loop-holes of retreat" in the second circle, he views the pageant of the world played before him; melts down years to moments; sees human life, like a gaudy shadow, glance across the stage; and here tastes of all earth's bliss, the sweet without the bitter, the honey without the sting, and plucks ambrosial fruits and amarantine flowers (placed by the enchantress Fancy within his reach,) without having to pay a tax for it at the time, or repenting of it afterwards. "He is all ear and eye, and drinks in sounds or sights that might create a soul under the ribs of death." "The fly," says Gay, "that sips treacle, is lost in the sweets;" so he that has a free-admission forgets every thing else. Why not? It is the cheap and enviable transfer of his being from the real to the unreal world, and the changing half his life into a dream. "Oh! leave me to my repose," in my beloved corner at Covent-garden theatre! This (and not "the arm-chair at an inn," though that too, at other times, and under different circumstances, is not without its charms,) is to me "the throne of felicity." If I have business that would detain me from this, I put it off till the morrow; if I have friends that call in just at the moment; let them go away under pain of bearing my maledictions with them. What is there in their conversation to atone to me for the loss of one quarter of an hour at the "witching time of night?" If it is on indifferent subjects, it is flat and insipid; if it grows animated and interesting, it requires a painful effort, and begets a feverish excitement. But let me once reach, and fairly establish myself in this favorite seat, and I can bid a gay defiance to mischance, and leave debts and duns, friends and foes, objections and arguments far behind me. I would, if I could, have it surrounded with a balustrade of gold, for it has been to me a palace of delight. There golden thoughts unbidden betide me, and golden visions come to me. There the dance, the laugh, the song, the scenic deception greet me; there are wafted Shakspeare's winged words, or Otway's plaintive lines; and there how often have I heard young Kemble's voice, trembling at its own beauty, and prolonging its liquid tones, like the murmur of the billowy surge on sounding shores! There I no longer torture a sentence or strain a paradox: the mind is full without an effort, pleased without asking why. It inhales an atmosphere of joy, and is steeped in all the luxury of woe. To show how much sympathy has to do with the effect, let us suppose any one to have a free admission to the rehearsals of a morning, what mortal would make use of it? One might as well be at the bottom of a well, or at the top of St. Paul's, for any pleasure we should derive from the finest tragedy or comedy. No, a play is nothing without an audience; it is a satisfaction too great and too general not to be shared with others. But reverse this cold and comfortless picture—let the eager crowd beset the theatre-doors, "like bees in spring-time, when the sun with Taurus rides"—let the boxes be filled with innocence and beauty, like beds of lilies on the first night of Isabella or Belvidera, see the flutter, the uneasy delight of expectation, see the big tear roll down the cheek of sensibility as the story proceeds—let us listen to the deep thunder of the pit, or catch the gallery's shout at some true master stroke of passion; and we feel that a thousand hearts are beating in our bosoms, and hail the sparkling illusion reflected in a thousand eyes. The stage has, therefore, been justly styled "a discipline of humanity;" for there is no place where the social principle is called forth with such strength and harmony, by a powerful interest in a common object. A crowd is every where else oppressive; but the fuller the play-house, the more intimately and cordially do we sympathize with every individual in it. Empty benches have as bad an effect on the spectator as the players. This is one reason why so many mistakes are made with respect to plays and players, ere they come before the public. The taste is crude and uninformed till it is ripened by the blaze of lighted lamps and the sunshine of happy faces; the cold, critical faculty, the judgment of managers and committees asks the glow of sympathy and the buzz of approbation to prompt and guide it. We judge in a crowd with the sense and feelings of others; and from the very strength of the impression, fancy we should have come to the same unavoidable conclusion had we been left entirely to ourselves. Let any one try the experiment by reading a manuscript play, or seeing it acted—or by hearing a candidate for the stage rehearse behind the scenes, or top his part after the orchestra have performed their fatal prelude. Nor is the air of a play-house favorable only to social feeling—it aids the indulgence of solitary musing. The brimming cup of joy or sorrow is full; but it runs over to other thoughts and subjects. We can there (nowhere better) "retire, the world shut out, our thoughts call home." We hear the revelry and the shout, but "the still, small voice" of other years and cherished recollections is not wanting. It is pleasant to hear Miss Ford repeat Love's Catechism, or Mrs. Humby sing "I cannot marry Crout;" but the ear is not therefore deaf to Mrs. Jordan's laugh in Nell; Mrs. Goodall's Roelind still haunts the glades of Arden, and the echo of Amien's song, "Blow, blow, thou winter's wind," lingers through a lapse of thirty years. A pantomime (the Little Red Riding-Hood) recalls the innocence of our childish thoughts: a dance (the Minuet de la Cour) throws us back to the gorgeous days of Louis XIV. and tells us that the age of chivalry is gone for ever. Who will be the Mrs. Siddons of a distant age? What future Kean shall "strut and fret his hour upon the stage," full of genius and free from errors? What favorite actor or actress will be taking their farewell benefit a hundred years hence? What plays and what players will then amuse the town? Oh, many-colored scenes of human life! where are ye more truly represented than in the mirror of the stage? or where is that eternal principle of vicissitude which rules over ye, the painted pageant and the sudden gloom, more strikingly exemplified than here? At the entrance to our great theatres, in large capitals over the front of the stage, might be written MUTABILITY! Does not the curtain that falls each night on the pomps and vanities it was withdrawn awhile to reveal (and the next moment all is dark) afford a fine moral lesson? Here, in small room, is crowded the map of human life; the lengthened, varied scroll is unfolded like rich tapestry with its quaint and flaunting devices spread out; whatever can be saved from the giddy whirl of ever-rolling time and of this round orb, which moves on and never stops, all that can strike the sense, can touch the heart, can stir up laughter or call tears from their secret source, is here treasured up and displayed ostentatiously—here is Fancy's motley wardrobe, the masks of all the characters that were ever played—here is a glass set up clear and large enough to show us our own features and those of all mankind—here, in this enchanted mirror, are represented, not darkly, but in vivid hues and bold relief, the struggle of life and death, the momentary pause between the cradle and the grave, with charming hopes and fears, terror and pity in a thousand modes, strange and ghastly apparitions, the events of history, the fictions of poetry (warm from the heart; all these, and more than can be numbered in my feeble page, fill that airy space where the green curtain rises, and haunt it with evanescent shapes and indescribable yearnings.

Who can collect into one sordid pulsation, the thoughts and feelings that in the course of his life all these together have occasioned? or what heart, if it could recall them at once, and in their undiminished power and plenitude, would not burst with the load? Let not the style be deemed exaggerated, but tame and creeping, that attempts to do justice to this high and pregnant theme, and let tears blot out the unequal lines that the pen traces! Quaffing these delights, inhaling this atmosphere, brooding over these visions, this long trail of glory, is the possessor of a Free Admission to be blamed if he "takes his ease" at the play; and turning theatrical recluse, and forgetful of himself and his friends, devotes himself to the study of the drama, and to dreams of the past? By constant habit (having nothing to do, and little else to think of,) he becomes a tippler of the dews of Castaly—a dram-drinker on Mount Parnassus. He tastes the present moment, while a rich sea of pleasure presses to his lip and engulfs him round. The noise, the glare, the warmth, the company, produce a sort of listless intoxication, and clothe the pathos and the wit with a bodily sense. There is a weight, a closeness even, in the air, that makes it difficult to breathe out of it. The custom of going to the play night after night becomes a relief, a craving, a necessity—one cannot do without it. To sit alone is intolerable, to be in company is worse; we are attracted with pleasing force to the spot where "all that mighty heart is beating still." It is not that perhaps there is any thing new or fine to see—if there is, we attend to it—but at any time, it kills time and saves the trouble of thinking. O, Covent Garden! "thy freedom hath made me effeminate!" It has hardly left me power to write this description of it. I am become its slave, I have no other sense or interest left. There I sit and lose the hours I live beneath the sky, without the power to stir, without any determination to stay. "Teddy the Tyler" has become familiar to me, and, as it were, a part of my existence: "Robert the Devil" has cast his spell over me. I have seen both thirty times at least, (no offence to the management!) and could sit them out thirty times more. I am bed-ridden in the lap of luxury: am grown callous and inert with perpetual excitement.

—"What avails from iron chains Exempt, if rosy fetters bind as fast?"

I have my favorite box too, as Beau Brummel had his favorite leg; one must decide on something, not to be always deciding. Perhaps I may have my reasons too—perhaps into the box next to mine a Grace enters; perhaps from thence an air divine breathes a glance (of heaven's own brightness,) kindles contagious fire;—but let us turn all such thoughts into the lobbies. These may be considered as an Arabesque border round the inclosed tablet of human life. If the muses reign within, Venus sports heedless, but not unheeded without. Here a bevy of fair damsels, richly clad, knit with the Graces and the Hours in dance, lead on "the frozen winter and the pleasant spring!" Would I were allowed to attempt a list of some of them, and Cowley's Gallery would blush at mine! But this is a license which only poetry, and not even a Free Admission can give. I can now understand the attachment to a player's life, and how impossible it is for those who are once engaged in it ever to wean themselves from it. If the merely witnessing the bustle and the splendor of the scene, as an idle spectator, creates such a fascination, and flings such a charm over it, how much more must this be the case with those who have given all their time and attention to it—who regard it as the sole means of distinction—with whom even the monotony and mortifications must please—and who, instead of being passive, casual votaries, are the dispensers of the bounty of the gods, and the high-priests at the altar?

* This lady is not, it is true, at Covent-Garden: I wish she were!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—Among the various tributes of praise elicited by the death of our late fellow-citizen, Dr. Samuel L. Mitchell, I crave a small space in your journal, in order to add my voice as a token of respect to the memory of that great and good man.

He has at length closed a long life of labor in the city whose character he has elevated by his fame. Surrounded on all sides by the monuments of his usefulness, he had nearly completed the three score and ten years, the measure of man's days; scarcely one of which passed unmarked by the exercise of high talents, applied to the discovery of new truths, or by the traits of a benevolent mind, manifested in the eager adaptation of them to increase the comforts and advance the moral dignity of society. Few have ever risen in our land so assiduous in their zeal to enrich the scientific treasury of the country, and none ever wore the honors of intellectual supremacy with more true republican simplicity. He put away the magisterial stateliness and peremptory tone of the pedant; yet, in his constant communications with the world, he did not divest himself of the respect and deference he was entitled to require. He was to be seen mingling with every class of men, imparting or receiving instruction; conversing with the artisan on the mysteries of his craft, and communicating the principles of science in exchange for the results of the other's practice. In this manner he accumulated those inexhaustible stores of fact and experience, the possession of which threw open to him the doors of every learned society in either hemisphere, and diffused his name co-extensively with civilization and science.

Doctor Mitchell was prosecuting his studies in foreign institutions at the time when chemistry, rescued from the fanciful speculations and random experiments of the alchemists, first became entitled to the name of a science; and to him undoubtedly belongs the honor of having introduced in this country the then recently announced theories of Lavoisier. In the subsequent disputations which led to the establishment of the present more perfect system, he took an active part; and, with other distinguished men, attempted to occupy the still remaining debatable ground of the science with ingenious speculations.

In return for his unremitting exertions in their behalf, his countrymen have conferred upon him many and various marks of approbation. They have entrusted to him the guardianship of their rights and interests, both in the state and federal legislatures. None ever denied that the confidence was judiciously reposed. His death will be regretted, not by those alone who admired his talents and learning, but by many who cherish his memory with less exalted, though not less fervent esteem for his benevolent mind, his bland and affable manners, rendered more winning by their union with many amiable eccentricities.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—Questions are frequently asked touching the state of the orchestral departments of the Park and Bowery theatres for the present season. I state the observations which have occurred to me. Mr. Simpson having contemplated making opera a first-rate consideration, (in which the public manifest the most liberal disposition to support him) has been much more careful in his selection of a band than his brother manager of the Bowery. I do not conceive that music ever stood a chance of being better performed in this country than at present at the Park theatre. Mr. De Luce is still the chef d'orchestre; the three first violins are played by Messrs. Metz, Smith, and De Luce, jun., the latter a mere boy, but of much promise; the second violins are handled by Messrs. Otto and Heidelberg, both excellent musicians, who bring a powerful and correct tone from their instruments; a viola (with occasional assistance) by Mr. Goodwin; the double bass and violoncello by Messrs. Davis and Taylor; the flute by Mr. Kyle, jun., who reads well and plays fairly, without being distinguished either by brilliancy of execution or taste, in both of which he might improve himself—this young gentleman uses an inferior octave flute, the tone of which resembles a fife; the clarionets by Messrs. Herwig and Zeigler, both excellent; the bassoon by Mr. Reiff, a firm, good musician; the trombone by Cioffi, who needs no comment; the horns by Messrs. Nids and Brown, the former first rate, the latter useful; the trumpet by Newattney, a good musician, although not of the calibre of Norton; the drums by Mr. Murray. This band, when accustomed to play together music arranged to their force, cannot be exceeded, nor even equalled by any other in America. Much has been said, chiefly by way of puff, of the celebrated orchestra of the French opera, and when "the second Paganini," as certain wisacres have nick-named one Mr. Segura, announced a concert at Niblo's Garden, these terms were brought into requisition. The gentleman drew together a select few by taking in vain the name of Madame Feron, and other talented artistes, and then fled incontinently, and left his wondering proselytes to recover their dollars and good temper as they could. But let us examine (putting Segura out of the question) what pretensions the persons who constituted the band under Monsieur Paradol, at the Park theatre, have to the title of "the unrivalled French band of New-Orleans." The fact is, that of an orchestra of eighteen personages, not more than seven are French, and half, at least, were engaged by Paradol in this city. The French band, then, like every other band, depends upon the talent of the persons at present engaged, not upon its former fame; and at this time of day people are not to be deceived into a belief of excellence by high sounding names and puffs, but will rather trust to their own discrimination. The band of the Bowery theatre is capable of conducting a melo-drama through, or playing a ballad without committing any breaches of manners, which is precisely what is required by the manager.

Should opera offer itself in an eligible shape, there is talent enough unemployed in the city to render the attempt safe. Before concluding this communication, I have to point out an error, into which, until within the two last years, managers have fallen touching their musical arrangements. In getting up opera, or rather in the face of getting up opera, they have invariably prided themselves upon Drury-lane or Covent garden parts for their band. That is, in plain terms, the music arranged in England for thirty is placed before half that number of persons here; and notwithstanding the want of many of the instruments which are not even in the country, the manager gravely says, "never mind, play away, gentlemen!" They do play, and when strange sounds from incomplete harmony result; and when confusion is covered by the absence of hautboys, two sets of horns, an alto and a bass trombone, a coro di bassetto, a contra fagotto, &c., begin to be felt, the soi-disant critic sticks his hands in the pockets of his inexpressibles, and deplores the want of talent in America; "for," says he, "this same music went well in London!" The operas of Cinderella and the Caliph of Bagdad, thanks to the fact that the arranger of the same chanced to light upon a manager whose auricular membrane is decently constructed, were adapted to the strength of the band; and "Anis coronat opus." In the music of Rossini and Auber, the great desideratum is the hautboy, of which this country is entirely destitute. Monsieur Gilles, of Baltimore, is an artist of decided talent, but he plays only in private; an Englishman likewise, a fair professor of the hautboy, arrived here about two years ago, but could not find employment, meeting in answer to all his applications the usual reply, "we can do without you, because we have hitherto done so." He therefore went back. A German professor, we believe, still resides somewhere in the backwoods; he found that no engagement could be effected in the cities, and therefore turned his reed into a shepherd's pipe, took a wood, cleared as much land as possible, and

"—sub tegmine fagi
Sylvestrem tenui musam meditaris avena."

It is believed that he is still in a log-hut piping to the bears and squirrels. Monsieur Paradol, whose talents as a leader and musician are well known, in the absence of a hautboy, substitutes a C clarinet in his band, and thus secures the necessary leading points; but this he allows not to be so effective as dividing the hautboy part between the clarionets and flute, as in the case of Cinderella, because the flute can better express the upper notes of the hautboy than the clarinet; the lower notes, on the contrary, will probably fall better within the clarinet range. The enormous trouble attendant upon this undertaking is the only cause assigned by Paradol for entrusting the hautboy part entirely to a clarinet player; and indeed any person acquainted with the duties incumbent upon a French chef d'orchestre, will acknowledge that such an excuse is valid.

THE FINE ARTS.

ENGRAVINGS.

THE public, particularly strangers, passing through the city, are not aware that, for a comparatively trifling sum, they may procure four admirable and splendid views of Niagara Falls, engraved by Hill, from paintings by Bennet, and published by H. I. Megarey. We have seldom met, among the numerous delineations of this stupendous wonder of nature, any conveying a more forcible impression. The sweep of the immense body of water over the precipitous ledges of rocks—the volumes of foam floating away with the breeze, and every thing but the deafening thunder, are represented to the life. These prints would form valuable morceaux for travellers from Europe, desirous of carrying home with them correct sketches of American scenery.

EXHIBITION OF PAINTINGS,

COLLECTED IN SPAIN BY THE LATE RICHARD W. MEADE, Esq.

During the revolution in that country.

This collection is now open to the public at the National Gallery, Clinton-hall, and consists of specimens from the Italian, Spanish, and Flemish schools, all by masters of distinguished reputation, and several by those of the very first class. Among these may be enumerated the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, by Titian; the Calling of St. Matthew, by Jordano; the Vision of St. Anthony, by the same; the Savior expounding the Law to the Doctors in the Temple, by Paul Veronese; the Entrance and Departure from the Ark, by Bassano; Moses and the Brazen Serpent, and a Madonna, by Rubens; two Landscapes, by Salvator Rosa; Jacob wrestling with the Angel, by Dominichino; a Magdalen, by Vanduyke; and two pieces by Murillo. Besides these, the exhibition contains a variety of others, all of decided merit, and presenting in the whole a collection such as the citizens of New-York have rarely, if ever, had an opportunity of viewing. Among the great attractions here displayed, is the original, and the only original bust of Washington, by the celebrated sculptor Ceracchi, the master of Canova, and his equal in genius, to say the least. This bust was purchased by the then Spanish minister to the United States, and carried to Spain, when several years afterwards his widow disposed of it to Mr. Meade, for two thousand dollars.

It has been common to suppose that it was difficult, if not impossible, for any first-rate specimens of the fine arts to emigrate to this country, considering the eagerness with which they are purchased in Europe, by men whose wealth is superior to that of any single individual in the United States. But Mr. Meade possessed peculiar means and opportunities, as well as a disposition to make use of them. He resided in Spain during the early part of the struggle between the king and the constitutional party, of which latter he was the rallying point at Cadiz. At this period many families of the ancient nobility were reduced to poverty, and willing to dispose of those valuable specimens of the arts, which they had no security of retaining any longer; many ecclesiastical establishments, containing masterly pictures, had been rifled; and in this way frequent opportunities presented themselves of obtaining possession of what otherwise would have been locked up for ages to come, as they had been for ages past. Mr. Meade then had vast means of availing himself of this peculiar state of things, and he did so with that munificence and liberality which formed a part of his character. He secured and transmitted to his native country a treasure of art, such as had never been before possessed by an American citizen. A collection of genuine, authentic specimens, from which we may form a judgment, and by which we may model a taste, founded on a comparison of the works of some of the most celebrated masters.

We understand the object of the exhibition is to offer the pictures for sale, either together or separately; and certainly our affluent individuals, and our church establishments never had so tempting an opportunity of embellishing their houses and their sacred edifices. Both the size and subjects of many of these pieces render them most peculiarly fit for the latter purpose; and it is hoped some of our wealthy congregations will avail themselves of the chance, by at once displaying their taste, their liberality, and their piety.

SACRED MUSIC.

In an article on music, published some time since in this paper, we expressed surprise that, notwithstanding the visible increase of musical knowledge, no complete oratorio had ever been given in this city, "the public performances by that name being merely selections or parts, and never embracing an entire work." That the foundation for this reproach may hereafter be obviated, the "New-York Sacred Music Society" propose to give, in October next, an entire oratorio, consisting of the celebrated composition, "Handel's Messiah." The musical public will be gratified to hear that preparations are making to present this splendid piece in a manner worthy of the increasing taste of the town, and the reputation of its author. We learn, that should the attempt meet with sufficient encouragement, this spirited and useful society will produce, in addition to the selections now given at their annual performances, the oratorios of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, &c. The best solo-singers and orchestra are engaged; the chorusses have been engraved in single parts; and the accompaniments, with all Mozart's additions, procured. No one will doubt the success of this enterprise.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

A CARD.

IN assuming the duties of a new station, there is little the incumbent can say beyond an unqualified assurance that his best powers will be devoted to their performance. This the subscriber gives unhesitatingly. Having transferred the only literary undertaking in which he has any interest to the proprietor of the Mirror, his whole time and attention will hereafter be given to this work. Trusting that the experience of several years in editing a similar periodical has afforded him some facility, and bringing with him the best of his former contributors, he enters upon his task with a sanguine hope that the already successful enterprise of his fellow-editors may be still further advanced in public favor by his industry. N. P. WILLIS.

To correspondents.—We have before stated that it is not our practice to publish a notice of the various communications received at this office. Of these, indeed, we have so great a number, that it is sometimes incompatible with other avocations to give them all even an immediate reading; correspondents, therefore, must not suppose when their favors do not appear as soon as sent, that they are consequently rejected. They are not unfrequently necessarily delayed for a long period. Some of our satirical friends have of late favored us with several essays on the subject of public dinners and the dog law. Of these we must decline the publication. Our sentiments in regard to both are well known, and we trust are participated in by a large majority of our fellow-citizens. Touching the dinners, the visit of Washington Irving to this country, we have already mentioned as an exception, as indeed should be all really important occasions. We never intended to say more than that entertainments, got up by a few interested personal friends, for a local purpose, dignified with the appellation of public dinners, just as we see some little, ragged, obscure, wooden tavern in the country, almost hidden by a sign of "United States Hotel," are rather ludicrous in their nature. The minuteness, too, with which the details of these gatherings are paraded in the newspapers, is, on certain occasions, merely the result of some injudicious personal partiality, and by no means tends to make the affair appear less ridiculous.

Singular and Plural.—It is now more than a year since we asked a question, under this head, which has not yet been answered by any of our correspondents. It was respecting the formation of the plural of the word staff, with a few others of the same termination; and, in putting the interrogatory, we made use of the following remarks: "None of the lexicographers, whom we have consulted, give any direction on the subject, except as regards the word staff; which, they say, becomes staves, (rhyming with waves) in the plural. But is it also proper to say, 'every sloop and schooner ought to be provided with several extra gaves?' And if speaking of more than one graff, (a ditch or moat) must we call them graves? and follow the same rule with respect to the words distaff, whip-staff, and tipstaff? Why not form the plural of each, by simply adding an s? or if it be necessary to change the f to v, why not pronounce the word so as to rhyme with halves and calves? There is such a noun as stave, belonging to a barrel, &c. Although Dr. Johnson might have been ignorant of the circumstance, Webster gives it, and the plural is undoubtedly staves. But these things are not walking sticks! "nor weapons of offense or defense, as the word is sometimes used in our translation of the Bible. 'Why should not the plural of staff, (a walking-stick) [or weapon] rhyme with gaffs? He quaffs, and he graffs, or he laughs?' A few days since, we referred the above question to Dr. Noah Webster, from whom we received the following answer, which we take the liberty to lay before our readers.

New-Haven, September 10, 1831.

GENTLEMEN—In reply to your favor of the sixth instant, I would observe, that in my dictionary all words in which an irregular plural form of nouns is not noted, are considered as having a regular plural, gaff, gaffs, &c. Such words are not, therefore, left without directions, as they fall under my general rule.

With regard to staff, I would observe that the plural staves is given from the authority of the version of the Bible, in which it occurs many times. I regret this deviation from analogy, and am disposed to correct it, as staves is the plural of stave. I would alter this, make staffs the plural of staff, if I could hope to be followed.

The truth is, there are many errors or blunders in English orthography, which must have originated in heedlessness, ignorance, or want of system among writers; and which I should exert my influence to correct, were it not for the difficulty of overcoming long established usages. I have noted some of these errors, but the misfortune is, that few men, even literary men, can take the trouble to examine the reasons of my proposed innovations, and they make objections often merely because they do not know my reasons. Others object because they prefer to follow custom, even when admitted to be wrong, rather than be at the pains of correcting discrepancies.

There are some errors which I will not receive into my book, as they are too palpable and absurd to admit of an apology. There are others which I have barely mentioned, and left to the decision of usage hereafter. Some of our anomalies are considered as incorrigible, and I think it not best to attempt corrections. Others might be corrected without much inconvenience, but I have not attempted them, contenting myself with barely mentioning or proposing them.

This subject presents difficulties which the lexicographer alone can justly appreciate. The English books furnish no certain guide, as they differ in many particulars, and in some points they are all most obviously wrong. And in this country opinions differ so much that the lexicographer can find no aid from them, but on the other hand, much embarrassment. I have, however, settled many points irrevocably, as far as my own books are concerned. Others I would settle, if I might expect support from my country. Accept the respects of, gentlemen, your obedient servant, N. WEBSTER.

The Philadelphia Gazette.—This journal has been enlarged and improved. The editor, Willis Gaylord Clark, Esq., is persevering and successful in his endeavors. There are few more ample and well filled sheets than that which he presents to his readers; and we are gratified to see a gentleman of his talents, education, and standing, devoting himself with so much zeal to the responsible duties of his station. Editing papers and teaching school have been, in too many cases, the last resort of broken-down adventurers, or men without character and intelligence to succeed in any other career. Yet no professions exercise a more powerful influence upon the reputation, morals, and happiness of a people; and it is a mystery how, in these times, when light is pouring in upon all other branches of political and domestic economy, this subject could have so long remained in the darkness of the barbarous ages. We rejoice to observe that the feeling of the nation in this particular is undergoing a radical and rapid change, and that the public, both by their tributes of respect and more substantial favors, are rendering the two avocations mentioned above, neither beneath the dignity nor beyond the means of men of sense and talents. If there be any class of society whose competency for their situation should be tested with the severest scrutiny, and rated by the most elevated standard, it should be those devoted to the instruction of youth and the direction of public journals. They are to the rising generation what sentinels are to an army, and have entrusted to them the safety of the whole country. It is important, therefore, that they should be selected from the best, and we trust that a similar opinion will be generally adopted and acted on.

British opinions.—"The time is rapidly approaching," says the London Courier, "when the only security for one class against encroachments by another, will be found in the influence of education, and the due enjoyment of privileges peculiar to each. It would be well, therefore, for those who have received the benefits of knowledge, to follow the course which well informed and enlightened minds must recommend, and provide at once for a state of things which must soon come."

The Southern Review.—The number of this periodical for August has been announced in the Charleston papers of last week as ready for publication. The following are the contents:—Jeremy Bentham and the Utilitarians; Operations of Poisons; French Novels; American Literature; Theory of Association in matters of Taste; Codification; Small Pox, Varioloid Diseases and Vaccine; Woolrych's Life of Judge Jeffreys; Waterhouse's Junius.

American literature.—The last number of the London Monthly Magazine quotes from Mr. Halleck's Poem of "Burns" with the sapient prefix, "as Wordsworth says." We frequently find similar instances of the non chalance with which our worthy transatlantic friends pocket our property. Numerous articles, which have gone silently and modestly forth from American journals, over an humble A. B. or C. return with a flourish of trumpets and an impudent demeanor, having received the name of some foreign distinguished bard as a passport to the admiration of our countrymen.

The following is an extract from the poem recently delivered at Brown University, by N. P. Willis. The entire production, together with some other pieces from the same pen, will be published in a few days, by the Messrs. Carvill.

Another lesson with my manhood came.
I have unlearned contempt. It is the sin
That is engender'd earliest in the soul,
And doth beset it like a poison-worm,
Feeding on all its beauty. As it steals
Into the bosom, you may see the light
Of the clear, heavenly eye grow cold and dim,
And the fine upright glory of the brow,
Cloud with mistrust, and the unfetter'd lip
That was as free and changeable as the wind,
Even in sadness redolent of love,
Curl'd with the iciness of a constant scorn.
It eats into the mind till it pollutes
All its pure fountains. Feeling, reason, taste,
Breathe of its chill corruption. Every sense
That could convey a pleasure is benumb'd,
And the bright human being, that was made
Full of all warm affections, and with power
To look through all things lovely up to God,
Is changed into a cold and doubting fiend,
With but one use for reason—to despise!

Oh, if there is one law above the rest,
Written in wisdom—if there is a word
That I would trace, as with a pen of fire
Upon the unsunn'd temper of a child—
If there is any thing that keeps the mind
Open to angel visits, and repels
The ministry of ill—'tis human love!
God has made nothing worthy of contempt.
The smallest pebble in the well of truth
Has its peculiar meaning, and will stand
When man's best monuments have past away.
The law of heaven is love—and though its name
Has been usurp'd by passion, and profaned
To its unholy uses through all time,
Still the eternal principle is pure,
And in these deep affections that we feel
Omnipotent within us, we but see
The lavish measure in which love is given;
And in the yearning tenderness of a child
For every bird that sings above his head,
And every creature feeding on the hills,
And every tree, and flower, and running brook,
We see how every thing was made to love;
And how they err, who, in a world like this,
Find any thing to hate but human pride!

We have ventured several shrewd conjectures touching the authorship of the following lines. The writer in a modest note informs us that they were sketched rapidly, from the impulse of the moment. When it is the breathing time of day with him again, we hope to hear more, especially if, as in the present instance, he succeeds in making such "a palpable hit."

TO MR. HALLECK,

On reading in the Mirror of the tenth instant, among his other verses
"To a Poet's Daughter," the following:

"This is no world, so Hotsput said,
For 'tilting lips,' and 'mammets' made;
No longer in love's myrtle shade
My thoughts recline—
I'm busy in the cotton trade,
And sugar line."

Thou, busy in the "cotton trade,"
And "sugar line?"
What thou—on whom the muse has laid
Her gifts divine?—
Upon a high three-legged stool,
The bard repenting, seeks to cool
His frenzy fine!

"Stocks" and "price currents" he devours,
As new found manna;
At "rise of flour"—don't read it flowers—
He sings hosannah!
He deals in "sugar"—bright example!
Behold him boring out a sample
Of "brown Havana!"

Shame on thee, though each passing day
I love thee closer;
Has thought grown dim? thy locks grown gray?
Thou answer'st "no, sir."
And yet to prove a recreant!—
Bright poesy's best beloved gallant,
To turn a grocer!

By the gay wand'rings of thy muse,
I'll ne'er forgive thee;
Each golden prize thy brain pursues,
Fleet, and deceive thee—
By heav'n, my breast the falsehood spurns
"Bozzaris!" "Fanny!" "Alnwick!" "Burns!"
I'll not believe thee.

Where is the bird of summer song
Would seek a cage,
Though bruised and faint, with battling long
The tempest's rage?
Couldst thou then, free! with soul of fire!
Forsake the muse—unstring thy lyre,
Grasping like age?

No more of trade, but bid the muse
Of "Fanny" wake,
And glittering with Castalian dews,
Her pinions shake!
Fame shall regild her favorite one,
And classic bakers stamp thee on
Their new-year cake!

RISE, GENTLE MOON.

SUNG BY MISS LOVE—WRITTEN BY J. R. PLANCHE, ESQ.—COMPOSED BY JOHN BARNETT.

Allegretto ma non troppo.

Day has gone down on the Bal-tic's broad bil-low, Ev'-ning has sighed her last to the lone wil-low; The Bal-tic's broad bil-low, Ev'-ning has sighed her last to the lone wil-low; Night hur-ries on, night hur-ries on, earth and o-cean to co-ver: Night hurries on, night hurries on, earth and o-cean to co-ver: Rise, gen-tle moon, and light me to my lov-er; gen-tle moon, gen-tle moon, and light me to my lov-er.

2d.—'Twas by thy beam he first stole forth to woo me;—Brighter since than hast thou ever seem'd to me;—Let the wide waves still the red sun roll over,—Thine is the light of all lights to a lover.—Rise, gentle moon, &c.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

RADIANT CLOUDS AT SUNSET.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

BRIGHT clouds! ye are gathering one by one,
 Ye are sweeping in pomp round the dying sun,
 With crimson banner, and golden pall,
 Like a host to their chieftain's funeral,
 Perchance ye tread to that hallowed spot
 With a muffled dirge, though we hear it not.

Yet methinks ye tower with a lordlier crest,
 And a gorgeous flush as he sinks to rest;
 Not thus in the day of his pride and wrath
 Did ye dare to press on his glorious path;
 At his noontide glance ye had quak'd with fear,
 And hasted to hide in your misty sphere.

Do you say he is dead? You exult in vain,
 With your rainbow-robe, and your swelling train;
 He shall rise again with his strong, bright ray,
 He shall reign in power when you fade away,
 When ye darkly cower in your vapory hall,
 Tintless, and naked, and noteless all.

The soul! the soul! with its eye of fire,
 Thus, thus shall it soar when its foes expire;
 It shall spread its wing o'er the sinews that pain'd,
 The evils that shadow'd, the sins that stain'd;
 It shall dwell where no rushing cloud hath sway,
 And the pageants of earth shall have melted away.

LOVE'S WEATHERCOCK.

BY WILLIAM P. PALMER.

O Love is a comical rogue, you know,
 And full of all strange caprices,
 And he's ever frolicking to and fro,
 With his crown of roses and fearful bow,
 Whose arrow never misses.

Said Love one eve, "As aloft yestreen
 On my airy way I flew,
 I marked, through the twilight's purple sheen,
 A vane on the bower of the fairy queen,
 And, sooth, I'll have one too."

So he drew from his quiver a shaft of gold,
 As the glance of a sunbeam bright,
 And deep in a rosebud's opening fold,
 Deftly he fixed its artful hold,
 And raised the staff upright.

"A vane! a vane, for its breezy crest!"
 Cried he of the rosy crown;
 And away he sprang to a wild-swan's nest,
 Where he stole from a sleeping cygnet's breast
 A tuft of the lightest down.

And he spied a butterfly's painted plume
 In a tulip's gorgeous bowl,
 Shaming the rich flower's tinted bloom
 Mid sparkling dew-drops and sweet perfume,
 And the tinsel thing he stole.

And then from the skirt of a feathery cloud
 O'er the moon's soft smile that lay,
 Like the fold of a spirit's gleamy shroud,
 He clipped, as his flashing wing he bowed,
 Its thinnest fringe away.

All these, with a fillet of gossamer
 By a gentle fairy wrought,
 And shapes that buoyantly floating were
 In the tremulous starlight every where,
 To his waiting bower he brought.

And there, while the fire-flies glanced around,
 Mid the shades of the sweet parterre,
 He tried them all in turn, and he frown'd
 Till his brow grew dark, for alas! he found
 They were all too gross by far.

"N'importe," sighed Love, with a bitter smile,
 That curled his lip with shame,

As he turned away to a shady aisle,
 Where his doating mother watched the while
 His unsuccessful aim.

"What, foiled, my boy?" said the goddess dear,
 "Love never should try in vain;"
 So she whispered a word in his bending ear,
 And away he shot like a meteor,
 But soon he came again:

And high on the golden spire he set
 The airy thing he bore;
 And it danced from point to point, and yet
 So faint were the winds, that the violet
 Its morning dew-gems wore.

With the spirit of mutability,
 Instinct, the thing appeared;
 For e'en at the glance of a passing eye,
 Or the breath of a soft lip's melody,
 The light vane lightly veered.

"Bravo!" cried Love, in a merry strain;
 "I'll wager my favorite dart,
 That ye'll find, if ye search the broad domain
 Of earth, air, sea, for a delicate vane,
 There's nought like a COQUET'S HEART!"

LINES TO MARTHA.

BY JAMES NACK.

My child! my sister! every name
 That innocent endearment gives,
 Thou from my heart of hearts canst claim,
 Where, cherish'd most, thy image lives!
 Of all whom I have loved the best
 None have been faithful—none but thou;
 No matter—I condemn the rest,
 For, dearest! thou art left me now!

How often when my spirit feels
 The weight of ills too hard to bear,
 Thy dear remembrance on me steals,
 To save me from my soul's despair!

A ministering angel's part
 Is thine—to pour affection's balm
 Upon my often wounded heart,
 And all my soul's convulsions calm!
 I well remember, once, oppress'd
 Thou found'st me, in my hour of pain;
 Thy hand my throbbing brow caress'd,
 'Till pleasure thrill'd its every vein!
 That touch—it was enough to heal!
 And often in my suffering hours
 I sigh, again that touch to feel,
 And bless its sweet and soothing powers.

All other hope, all other joy
 Have fled—no matter, let them go!
 But may no power thy love destroy,
 The only comfort I can know!
 Thy innocent affection makes
 My all of heaven that earth can give;
 And till that love thy heart forsakes
 I can through every sorrow live.

My child—my beautiful—my own!
 Unless my fondest prayer be vain,
 No sorrow shall to thee be known,
 Nor shade of sin thy soul profane!
 No boon could fortune ever yield
 To me so welcome as the power
 Thy angel innocence to shield,
 And blest to make thy every hour.

PRISON WIT.—The following epigram was found etched upon the wall of a cell in Bridewell, after the translation of one of the temporary inmates to Sing-Sing. He was detected by HAYS.

'Gainst all philosophy I do insist,
 'Tis quite impossible Hays (haze) can be miss'd. (mist.)

A VIEW AND SKETCH OF GROTON MONUMENT.

NATIONAL gratitude, especially in republics, though slow to reward, is eventually just in its decision, even if it devolve on children to commemorate the details by which their fathers were distinguished. The spirit of perpetuating the patriotism of our ancestors, by monumental fabrics, more conspicuous to observation, and of more durable materials than printing or painting, seems, however, to have slumbered for nearly half a century from the commencement of our revolution, an epoch as fertile in events of devotedness and heroism as the days of Marathon and Thermopylae. The memory of Washington, indeed, has been a standing subject for holiday orators, as well as honest eulogium and legislative enactment, from the federal congress down to city corporations. But in the universal acknowledgment that history, which survives brass and marble, presents an imperishable tribute to worth, in every state and district of our country, the public has rested too much satisfied with the bare and empty expressions of regard so common, so cheap, and often so hollow, towards their brightest ornaments and greatest benefactors. It is left, in some measure, for the practical philosophy of Franklin, the steam-boats of Fulton, and the canals and other public works of Clinton, to perpetuate the memory of their names—and for ever will they live in the grateful recollection, not only of their admiring countrymen, but of all generations in after-times, by whom the benefit of their discoveries, improvements, and patriotic labors, will be appreciated and enjoyed. Thus we have an apology in the comparative uselessness of ordinary celebration, even for the rich and flourishing commercial emporium of our republic, to neglect "the marble monument and sculptor'd praise" of the father of our country.

With objects and scenes, however, of less extensive fame and more humble pretension, the case is materially different. Local transactions and individual heroism, although undistinguished in the general glare of national renown, are no less entitled to honorable remembrance, and are the more worthy of special note from their solitary and private character. The burning of New-London and storming of Fort Griswold, on the sixth of September, 1781, form an event of this description, inferior only in point of magnitude to the more glorious and fortunate actions, to which monuments at Bunker-hill, Yorktown, (why is Saratoga omitted?) Baltimore, &c. have been erected.

The expedition against New-London proceeded from New-York, under the command of the traitor Arnold, who was born near the place, and well acquainted with its situation and defences. New-London is on the west side of the Thames, partly commanded by Fort Griswold, in Groton, high on the opposite bank of the river, four miles from Long-island Sound. The invaders divided into two parties: Arnold leading to the attack on the New-London side, and the other division landing in Groton. New-London soon being in possession of Arnold, he perceived that Fort Griswold had been strengthened by additional works, and sent an aid across the river to countermand the attack; but the express arrived too late, as the storm had already commenced. The assailants were at first bravely repelled, their commander mortally wounded, and the next in rank killed. They rallied under their third officer, and returned to the charge, but were again received with firmness, and vigorously repulsed. In this second attack, however, the American haulyards being shot away, the flag fell from the staff, and though instantly re-mounted on a pike-pole, was supposed by the enemy to be intentionally struck for surrender. On the continuation of the firing after the momentary disappearance of the flag, the assault was renewed by the enraged soldiery with redoubled fury. A lodgment was made in one of the bastions, and the work of slaughter and destruction ferociously continued upon the garrison, from their supposed violation of the laws of war, in refusing to surrender or firing after their flag was struck. The American commander, Colonel Ledyard, finding the fort entered, ordered the garrison to throw down their arms, and cease resistance. On being called for, he handed his sword to the commandant of the enemy, a Colonel Beckwith, a refugee from New-Jersey, who returned the act and instrument of submission by thrusting it through the body of the brave antagonist by whom it was presented. On seeing fire and scattered powder surrounding the magazine, the British ordered the slaughter to cease, and prevented all from being blown up together.

The peculiar cruelty, distress, and other circumstances attending this most unfortunate and bloody affair, transacted within a short distance of promised aid from a regiment of militia, the sufferers being principally citizens and volunteers from the immediate neighborhood, are intentionally passed over. Some of the actors and many of the witnesses of this tragical scene are still alive, and it is yet fresh and vivid in their recollections. (One of them, the since famous Mrs. Bailey, on the sudden approach of Commodore Hardy's squadron, during the late war, threw off part of her apparel to make flannel cartridges, though the volunteers refused to apply it to that use, and made a standard of it.)

The monument, of which a south front view is here given, was erected in 1829 and 1830, from the granite with which the country abounds. It is one hundred and twenty feet high, twenty-four feet square at the base and eleven at the top; its walls from four feet six inches to one foot four inches in thickness, having a spiral staircase within, reaching to a balustrade, sky-light, and spire on the summit. The form is quadrangular, and its base is furnished with tabular inscriptions, and the names of the departed worthies, in number about a hundred, whose fate and memory it was raised to perpetuate. Situated on the hill near the memorable battle-ground, it affords a view of the Sound, the islands, the rivers, and the country, for a great extent around it. Uncommonly picturesque, noble, and interesting in its associations, (including the station of the squadron blockading Commodore Decatur, and the bombardment of Stonington,) the scene richly pays for the tread-mill operation of climbing the observatory, and amply gratifies the patriotic sympathy, the revolutionary gratitude, the republican philanthropy, or the merest stranger curiosity, by which the spectator may be influenced in visiting the consecrated spot.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

THE MOTHER'S CHOICE.

A FACT.

MRS. WELLWOOD was once a charming girl, full of romance and sentiment. She married for love, and, wonderful to tell, was disappointed in her anticipations of celestial happiness! Her choice was a gay, indolent, young man, with little or no fortune, and without a profession. Being both destitute of habits of economy, and equally thoughtless of the future, they soon dissipated what they had, and having exhausted both money and credit, fell into poverty. For some years they suffered under its stern, withering gripe, and endured all the complicated ills of privation and neglect.

At length Wellwood became moderately independent by the bequest of a distant relation, and they re-entered the world of fashion, with an only daughter, just old enough to be spoiled by admiration and indulgence, had not a happy disposition and great good sense acted as her safeguards. Poverty, while it had made Mrs. Wellwood impatient of the ills that ever follow in its train, had taught her daughter cheerfully to endure them.

Orinda Wellwood—the mother could afford a romantic name, though in want of almost every comfort of life—Orinda Wellwood was one of the most attractive—I might almost say, alluring women, except that the phrase carries with it an idea inconsistent with her perfect artlessness—Orinda Wellwood was the very beau ideal of a lovely and innocent woman. The mild lustre that animated those eyes, which peeped through the long lashes like the moonbeams playing at bo-peep among the dewy branches—the graceful, negligent curls of her bright brown hair—the red luxurious ripeness of those half-smiling lips—above all, their combined expression; the soul that animated each gesture—the mind that dwelt in this little heaven of beauty—and the voice which was subdued as music winding in softened distance far away, as it rather sighed than spoke its thoughts and wishes—who shall venture to describe these? Not I. If there is one among my readers capable of imagining such a being in his moments of most passionate inspiration, on him I devolve the task of drawing her full-length likeness.

Orinda had not long appeared in the fashionable world, when she became an object of general notice. Among her admirers I shall merely mention two, as these alone had an influence on the destiny of our little favorite maiden.

Jack Hilary was heir to an ample, I may say enormous fortune, and a great blockhead. He was not only ignorant, but exemplary in ignorance. Indulgence, and the prospect of one day being so rich, had spoiled him for any thing useful. Yet he had no prominent vices. He was good-natured, and what was called well-meaning, when he had any meaning at all. In short, he might be said to have no positive character, and it remained to be seen whether he ever would acquire one, and what it would be. His person was not disagreeable, nor his manners rude, but they wanted refinement; his countenance expressed but little, and his tongue nothing—at least nothing worth hearing. Yet, with these disadvantages, I believe there was not a mother in the whole routine of the fashionable circle in which he moved, who possessed the treasure of a marriageable daughter, that would not have exulted in sacrificing her at the shrine of this golden calf.

Wilford was a very different person. In the first place he was not rich in money, lands, nor in expectations, except such as were dependent on the exercise of his talents alone. But though not so wealthy, he was much handsomer than Jack Hilary. There was something striking, as well as affecting, in his bright dark eye, beaming with spirit and intelligence, and his white cheek, blanched with study, and the restless intense anxiety of a soul burning for honorable distinction. Wilford had finished his college course with high honors, and was now a practitioner of the law; that is to say, he had opened an office, put up a sign, and sat ready to welcome his clients whenever they came. But their visits were about the same distance as the terms are from each other. Wilford was often discouraged, but did not remit his studies, nor his constant attendance at the office. He was determined to qualify himself for business, whether it came or not.

If he ever remitted his labors, it was when he sometimes—and I will confess, rather often—stole out of an evening to see his pretty second, or third-cousin Orinda Wellwood. They had been school-mates and playmates in early days, and now admired, not to say loved each other, with a steady, long-enduring passion, that seemed destined to defy both time and chance. So gentle, so unobtrusive, so almost unconscious was the silken tie that drew their souls together, that it was long before Mr. and Mrs. Wellwood had the least suspicion of its existence. Indeed, how should they, when the young pair had no suspicion of it themselves?

But Mrs. Wellwood was a mother—a fashionable mother. She had been poor, and there was nothing in this world she had such a horror of as poverty. From this naturally resulted an adoration of its opposite, wealth. All between the two extremes seemed a perfect void; and it never happened to occur to her that comfort, happiness, everything worth living for, everything that gives a real zest to existence, might possibly be found in the medium. I have generally observed that no people in the world have such a false and overweening estimate of the value of affluence as those who have suffered the evils of want. Mr. and Mrs. Wellwood—I place the husband first, as we put ciphers before figures, to diminish their value—Mr. and Mrs. Wellwood, were in this predicament. They had one opinion, at least, in perfect unison—they summed up all their wishes respecting their only daughter, in a husband of large fortune.

When, therefore, Mrs. Wellwood perceived that Jack Hilary admired, and Wilford loved her daughter, from that moment she had but a single purpose—to secure the one, and get rid of the other. Every latent imperceptible art; every little manœuvre that mocks detection; and every spring that is potent in entrapping such fat woodcocks as Hilary, was set in motion, and arranged with consummate discretion to assure her darling object.

The limits of my tale will not allow me to unravel, if I were capable of such a task, the means she took to catch this gilded butterfly. Fulsome flattery, and degrading servility to the one; cold, heartless, cutting neglect of the other; little white-lies, conveying the fine things Jack and Orinda never said of each other; engagements which perpetually threw her into his society, and all the webs which cunning weaves around its prey, were resorted to. Every day did Jack Hilary parade his splendid equipage past the windows of our heroine; and often did the anxious mother enlarge most eloquently on the substantial delights of wedded riches, and the deplorable concomitants of wedded poverty. If she paid a visit to a young married couple, it was only to declaim on the splendors of their house, the taste of their furniture, the size of their rooms; or, on the other hand, to deplore their folly in being united without the means, or the prospect of ever enjoying such charming requisites for happiness. Then she would sigh and exclaim:

"Alas! if they only knew what I know, they would be sensible of the consequences of sacrificing such substantial comforts, for the sake of an imaginary feeling which never survives its own gratification."

For months, Orinda was blind to the schemes of her mother; not so with Wilford. He saw, and felt her neglect, and the stings which passed unobserved by others, wounded him to the heart. He gradually remitted his evening visits, and studied, and thought, and wished, and lamented, until his cheek grew paler than ever, and his person exhibited a lassitude and weakness which Miss Wellwood at length observed. She inquired anxiously, and he answered vaguely. It was nothing—or at any rate he could not tell what. At this moment the mother entered, for she never left them alone if she could help it—and seeing strong symptoms of a mutual sympathy between the young people, desired her daughter to retire.

She then sat down and entered into a long, and, as she called it, frank explanation with Wilford, under pretence of asking his advice, or, at least, making him her confidant, as an old friend and relative.

"As to my husband," said she, "you know he is nobody. But you are a man of sense, and I can speak to you with a certainty of not being misunderstood. You know I am naturally anxious to see my daughter settled in life"—Wilford pricked up his ears—"I mean well settled. Heaven knows I have suffered enough of poverty to feel the importance of wealth. But as I was saying, though I value money, I value talents and character still more."—Wilford pricked up his ears higher than ever, and listened out of breath. "Don't you think Mr. Hilary a young man of talents and character?" asked Mrs. Wellwood, after a little embarrassment.

"Upon my soul, cousin, I—don't, he was going to say, but he thought it might sound ill-natured—"I—I—can't say it ever struck me."

"O, excellent talents and character, I assure you," replied Mrs. Wellwood. "You haven't studied him like a mother anxious for the happiness of her daughter."

"Happiness of your daughter, cousin?—why?"

"Yes—I am going to tell you. Hilary is distractedly in love with Orinda, and says he came near oversetting his barouche, as he was driving out the other day, only for thinking so intently about her."

"If he had broken his neck now, I wonder if I should have been very sorry?" thought Wilford; but he said nothing, and only stood with his eyes wide open, asking questions as fast as it was possible for eyes to do.

"He has proposed for her, and—"

"And Orinda has consented?" asked Wilford, turning as white as my paper.

"Why—not exactly—the truth is, I have not spoken to her about it yet. I wish to let her consult her own heart—that is, her own reason—and decide for herself."

Wilford felt as if a mountain was removed from his mind.

"Now, cousin," continued Mrs. Wellwood, in the kindest, most confidential tone, and sideling close up to his ear—"I hope I am not deceived when I suppose you are a sincere well wisher of Orinda. You, therefore, approve Mr. Hilary's proposal, of course."

Wilford muttered something to himself. The lady did not see fit to notice this, but proceeded, as if taking it for granted he assented to the proposition.

"It would be such an excellent match, you know; he is a young man of such talents and character, you know; and then, you know, you could do all his law business, you know, cousin Wilford."

Cousin Wilford began to feel as if he was sitting on thorns instead of a patent spring sofa. He could not utter a word, and a woman always takes silence for consent.

"I knew you would agree with me," continued this great politician; "the thing is so reasonable. But, some how or other, girls are so full of romance and nonsense, and young men so jealous now a-days—somehow or other, Mr. Hilary thinks Orinda likes you better than himself."

Wilford's face glowed, and you could hear his heart thump like a distant fulling-mill.

"Because—because—you know you have been brought up together—and you know the force of habit creates a sort of delusion. People, particularly young people, are so apt to mistake it for the dictates of reason, and the preference of the heart. But though I know Mr. Hilary is entirely mistaken in his suspicions, yet I think—if you were to keep out of the way only for a few months. I wouldn't propose such a step if I wasn't sure you didn't care any thing about it. Orinda don't exactly want it, but then she thinks it isn't worth while to make Mr. Hilary jealous, you know."

Wilford turned pale again, and his heart stilled its tumultuous throbblings as suddenly as if the fulling-mill had stopped going for want of water.

I will not particularize any more of this conversation. It is sufficient to say that Mrs. Wellwood, in the kindest, most affectionate manner, managed to let Wilford understand she considered him an obstacle in the way of her daughter's splendid establishment, merely on account of the force of habit, and that it was her desire, as well as that of Orinda, that he should keep out of sight till the happiness of her daughter was secured by the possession of this precious prize.

"I certainly shall not stand in your way or Miss Wellwood's happiness," said Wilford, proudly, and buried his anguish in the deep recesses of his bosom.

"That's my dear, kind cousin," said Mrs. Wellwood; "I knew you would do it with the greatest pleasure—if I hadn't, I'd rather have cut my tongue out than ask it of you. I know you don't care about Orinda, except merely for old acquaintance sake."

She then cordially shook hands with Wilford, telling him that as soon as the marriage took place she should insist on his making up for this short absence by the frequency of his visits. He could not answer, but departed to his solitary office with a heart wounded in its two master feelings—love and pride.

Wilford, however, was not a man to yield to unavailing sorrow under any calamity whatever. He sought, in the dry studies of his profession, an antidote to sentiment; and found in its vigorous, manly reasoning, strength to his intellect, as well as solace to his disappointment. He labored long, but acquired his reward at last. An eminent counsellor wanted a partner to take upon him the more active duties of his business. The character and attainments of Wilford, although they had hitherto produced no palpable advantages, had been silently clearing away, as they always will sooner or later, those obstacles which beset a youthful career. They were known and respected by a few, who cherished him highly. Among these was the counsellor in question. All that is wanting to merit, talent, and industry, is a field for exertion. That field was now open to Wilford, and he entered upon it with ardor and perseverance.

In the mean time the siege had been carrying on against the citadel of poor Orinda's heart, which, half broken as it was by the abrupt and unaccountable desertion of Wilford, made a stout and long resistance to the arts of her mistaken mother and the equipage of Jack Hilary. The total cessation of Wilford's visits perplexed, mortified, and pained her. She did not know the reason, nor did she discover it till long afterwards. The gentlest and the truest woman resents desertion and neglect, and cherishes too often a disposition to sacrifice herself only to be revenged on the chosen object of her affections. Yet still Miss Wellwood resisted the seductions of Hilary's wealth, and the arts and entreaties of her mother, who assailed her from day to day. Mrs. Wellwood finding this course unavailing, at length called in the aid of her husband, and both together, by the combined force of persuasion and threats, by appealing to her sense of duty to her parents, her respect for herself, her pride and her delicacy, at length worried the poor girl into a slow, reluctant sacrifice of her heart and her happiness. She went a pale and trembling bride to the altar, and the hand she gave away carried with it neither confidence, respect, nor affection.

Now it was that the bosom of the mother swelled with the exultation of having accomplished the great scheme of her existence. She had married her daughter to the richest young man about town, and had the pleasure of seeing her the mistress of a house and equipage, and an establishment superior to all her fashionable competitors in the race of glory. Heavens! with what a pride did she talk of Orinda's curtains, china, cut-glass, carpets, sofas, and candelabras that were the envy of the city, and how she triumphed in being the mother of so splendid a victim! She did not know, or perhaps she could not possibly conceive, that in the midst of these gorgeous decorations her daughter was ashamed of her husband, of herself, and of all those glittering appendages, at whose shrine her happiness had been sacrificed.

"What must Wilford think of me?" thought she, full many a time and oft. "He will scorn me as one who sold herself to a man whom he must be conscious that I myself despise."

Her spirits gradually failed, and much of her beauty faded away under the blighting influence of sorrow. Hilary was a good-natured man, and tried all the usual means of common-place minds to rouse her from this state of depression. He daily brought home some present for herself, or some embellishment for her household; he lavished on her caresses, which she could not return; and he almost forced her into gay scenes which she could not enjoy. She sometimes, though very rarely, met Wilford at these parties, who always bowed with stately politeness, but never approached her; and it was with mingled pride, anguish, and disappointment she noticed the respect paid to him by the most distinguished people, contrasted with the total neglect of her husband.

Hilary at length grew tired of these unavailing attempts to win back a bloom and a smile on the cheek of his wife. His home became tiresome and disagreeable, and he sought amusement from other sources. He gradually fell into a habit of dissipation, gave and received dinners, sat late, gambled, lost, and played again to recover his losses. Besides this he was careless of his affairs, which he intrusted to others, who duped and robbed him. Need I record the end of such follies? The most ample fortune must sooner or later sink under a habit of reckless extravagance, assisted by high play, and in the course of a few years Hilary was surprised to find himself in want of money to support his establishment. The most natural way of remedying all this would have been to curtail his extravagance—but this seldom occurs to people now-a-days, I believe—at least I have not observed any examples of the kind.

Instead of this, Hilary only gambled higher than ever, and attempted to supply his losses by entering into various speculations to retrieve his fortunes, which, as he was without sagacity or experience, always resulted in new misfortunes. As his affairs grew more involved, he became more desperate. Without strength of mind, or talent to recruit or retrieve his catastrophes, he gradually sought auxiliaries in the excitement of occasional intemperance. From occasional, it became constant, for the habit of drinking is the cancer of the soul, which eats its way, gradually and by degrees, until there is no longer any vivifying principle to banquet upon. In less than ten years from the triumph of her most masterly plans, Mrs. Wellwood saw her daughter and son-in-law inmates of her house—the former broken-hearted, the latter a sot and a beggar.

In the meantime Wilford had been running a brilliant and noble career, which gradually placed him at the summit of fortune and fame. He rose by degrees to the head of his profession; he became the first among his equals in the councils of the land; and was at length elevated to a situation almost as high as his ambition could expect to attain, or even wish to attain. He never married, and there were times when all the excitements of honorable success, all the gratifications of wealth, and the blessings of a conscience void of offence, failed in driving a gloomy shadow from his brow; a sigh from his inmost heart, as he remembered the beauty, the innocence, the speaking smile, the kind, touching voice, and the charming symmetry of form of the companion of his youth, who had sold herself, or perhaps, he sometimes thought, had been sold to another.

The disappointment of Mrs. Wellwood in the husband she had chosen, was heightened by the contrast now exhibited by the husband her daughter wished to choose. Every new honor received by Wilford, every new accession to his fortunes or his fame, was a stab to her heart. It reminded her of what her daughter might now have been, compared with what she was. In the spirit of injustice, which actuates people to lay the blame of the failure of their own arts on the faults or the follies of others, she now began to reproach Orinda with the loss of Wilford.

"See what you might have become," said she, one day handing her daughter a paper announcing Wilford's promotion to one of the highest and most dignified offices in the nation. "You might have been the wife, and I the mother of a —"

"O stop, for the sake of justice—for the sake of pity," said the weeping daughter. "Spare me, mother—it is misery to think of what I am, without reflecting on what I might have been. But I am saved that pang at least. Wilford left me of himself. I never gave him cause. He never loved me, or wished me for his wife."

Carried away by the wayward impetuosity of her feelings, the mother forgot her disgraceful participation in the desertion of Wilford, in the vehement desire to prove the truth of her assertion.

"He loved you," cried she, incautiously, "he loved you with his whole soul. But I deceived him, while you foolishly suffered yourself to be deceived. I told him you wished him not to come to the house any more, as it made Hilary jealous—and I sacrificed him to gain that brute you see coming yonder." She pointed to Hilary, who was staggering towards the door.

"O, mother!" exclaimed Orinda, "how could you do this?—and why—why do you tell it to me now?"

"Forgive me for it, my poor child!" said the wretched woman.

The shock of this communication was too much for the gentle spirit and worn-out frame of the sacrificed daughter. A few weeks terminated her life and her sorrows. But the mother lived many years to lament her mistake, in considering riches the only source of happiness in married life, and placing their hollow splendors above the possession of talents, genius, integrity and perseverance.

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

MISS ALBINA M'LUSH.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

I HAVE a passion for fat women. If there is any thing I hate in life, it is what dainty people call a spirituelle. Motion—rapid motion—a smart, quick, squirrel-like step, a pert, voluble tone—in short, a lively girl—is my exquisite horror! I would as lief have a diable petit dancing his infernal hornpipe on my cerebellum as to be in the room with one. I have tried before now to school myself into liking these parched peas of humanity. I have followed them with my eyes, and attended to their rattle till I was as crazy as a fly in a drum. I have danced with them, and romped with them in the country, and periled the salvation of my 'white tights' by sitting near them at supper. I swear off from this moment. I do. I won't—no—hang me if ever I show another small, lively, spiry woman a civility.

Albina McLush is divine. She is like the description of the Persian beauty by Hafiz:—"her heart is full of passion, and her eyes are full of sleep." She is the sister of Lurly McLush, my old college chum, who, as early as his sophomore year, was chosen president of the Dolce-farniente Society—no member of which was ever known to be surprised at anything—(the college law of rising before breakfast excepted.) Lurly introduced me to his sister one day, as he was lying upon a heap of turnips, leaning on his elbow with his head in his hand, in a green lane in the suburbs. He had driven over a stump, and been tossed out of his gig, and I came up just as he was wondering how in the d—l's name he got there! Albina sat quietly in the gig, and when I was presented, requested me with a delicious drawl, to say nothing about the adventure—"it would be so troublesome to relate it to every body!" I loved her from that moment.

Miss McLush was tall, and her shape, of its kind was perfect. It was not a fleshy one, exactly, but she was large and full, and, without her rosiness, which would have made it vulgar, healthy. Her skin was clear, fine grained, and transparent: her temples and forehead perfectly rounded and polished, and her lips and chin swelling into a ripe and tempting pout, like the cleft of a bursted apricot. And then her eyes—large, liquid, and sleepy—they languished beneath their long black fringes as if they had no business with daylight—like two magnificent dreams, surprised in their jet embryos by some bird-nesting cherub. Oh! it was lovely to look into them!

She sat usually upon a fauteuil, with her large full arm embedded in the cushion, sometimes for hours without stirring. I have seen the wind lift the masses of dark hair from her shoulders when it seemed like the coming to life of a marble Hebe—she had been motionless so long. She was a model for a goddess of sleep, as she sat with her eyes half closed, lifting up their superb lids slowly as you spoke to her, and dropping them again with the deliberate motion of a cloud, when she had murmured out her syllable of assent. Her figure, in a sitting posture, presented a gentle declivity from the curve of her neck to the instep of the small round foot lying on its side upon the ottoman. I remember a fellow bringing her a plate of fruit one evening. He was one of your lively men—a horrid monster, all right angles and activity. Having never been accustomed to hold her own plate, she had not well extricated her white fingers from her handkerchief, before he set it down in her lap. As it began to slide slowly towards the floor, her hand relapsed into the muslin folds, and she fixed her eye upon it with a kind of indolent surprise, drooping her lids gradually, till, as the fruit scattered over the ottoman, they closed entirely, and a liquid jet line was alone visible through the heavy lashes. There was an imperial indifference in it, worthy of Juno.

Miss McLush rarely walks. When she does, it is with the deliberate majesty of a Dido. Her small plump feet melt to the ground like snow-flakes, and her figure sways to the indolent motion of her limbs, with a glorious grace and yieldingness quite indescribable. She was idling slowly up the Mall one evening just at twilight, with a servant at a short distance behind her, who, to while away the time between his steps, was employing himself in throwing stones at the cows feeding upon the common. A gentleman with a natural admiration for her splendid person, addressed her. He might have done a more eccentric thing. Without troubling herself to look at him, she turned to her servant and requested him with a yawn of desperate ennui, to knock that fellow down! John obeyed his orders; and as his mistress resumed her lounge, picked up a new handful of pebbles, and tossing one at the nearest cow, loitered lazily after.

Such supreme indolence was irresistible. I gave in—I—who never before could summon energy to sigh—I—to whom a declaration was but a synonym for perspiration—I—who had only thought of love as a nervous complaint, and of woman but to pray for a good deliverance—I—yes—I—knocked under. Albina McLush! thou wert too exquisitely lazy. Human sensibilities cannot hold out forever!

I found her one morning sipping her coffee at twelve with her eyes wide open. She was just from the bath, and her complexion had a soft dewy transparency like the cheek of Venus rising from the sea. It was the hour, Lurly had told me, when she would beat the trouble of thinking. She put away with her dimpled forefinger, as I entered, a cluster of rich curls that had fallen over her face, and nodded to me like a water-lily swaying to the wind when its cup is full of rain.

"Lady Albina," said I, in my softest tone, "how are you?" "Bettina," said she, addressing her maid in a voice as clouded and rich as a south wind on an Æolian, "how am I to-day?"

The conversation fell into short sentences. The dialogue became a monologue. I entered upon my declaration. With the assistance of Bettina, who supplied her mistress with cologne, I kept her attention alive through the incipient circumstances. Symptoms were soon told. I came to the avowal. Her hand lay reposing on the arm of the sofa, half buried in a muslin fowlard. I took it up and pressed the cool soft fingers to my lips—unforbidden. I rose and looked into her eyes for confirmation. Delicious creature!—she was asleep!

I never have had courage to renew the subject. Miss McLush seems to have forgotten it altogether. Upon reflection, too, I'm convinced she would not survive the excitement of the ceremony—unless, indeed, she could sleep between the responses and the prayer. I am still devoted, however, and if there should come a war or an earthquake, or if the millenium should commence, as is expected in 1833, or if any thing happens that can keep her waking so long, I shall deliver a declaration abbreviated for me by a scholar-friend of mine, which, he warrants, may be articulated in fifteen minutes—without fatigue.

WANDERING TO THE WEST.

It was a day for a painter to have gone crazy about when I sprang into the stage at Utica, and ordered the curtains up all round. There was a sky overhead worth going a pilgrimage to see, of a deep blue, with here and there the thin woof of a cloud lapsing over the sun, and then raining into the depths of the heavens in invisible vapor. The whole atmosphere seemed moving to the eastward with an equable motion, and as we passed through the streets, children were standing here and there, unconsciously subject to all the positive deliciousness of the mingled currents from the lakes and from the south—and now and then a beautiful face was seen at a window or door, with the unbonneted hair blowing freely in the sunshine. The grass had sprung up anew between the paving-stones, and here and there a vine clinging to the house side was swinging its green buds in the warmth which was rapidly developing its leaves; and, added to all this, we were told that the road would be for some distance good. And this, assure yourself, was no small consolation to us, who had been dragged some sixty miles through roads almost impassable—who had ridden the whole distance with eight in the stage—had been forced to drag the coach out of a mud-hole at midnight, and after all, had obtained but some four hours' sleep. In consequence of which, to my shame be it said, I was caught once or twice "developing the mood of ancient Nox," by getting into a kind of slumbrous dream—even in the midst of beautiful scenery. Some time passed pleasantly by, however, and not far from Utica we took in two new companions. The one was a middle-aged, stout man, with a face of the most implacable acidity; which acidity, too, was manifestly of the Scottish species. His nose approximated fiercely towards his chin, his eyes were small, eyebrows shaggy, and his voice like the brattling of a tin trumpet. In short, he was the very man to put to shame all sentiment, and to ask a cause for every burst of laughter. If there is any being who is to be prayed against and avoided in a coach, this were the man. Your best story hath no point to him, and he lights up his little optics with a twinkle of savage amazement at every hearty symptom of existence which develops itself in a cachinnation. Your finest pun cannot unlock the wrinkles into which he purses up his mouth. Your most brilliant sally cannot separate his eyebrows—nay, not even the stoutest jolt of the stage can extract a groan—for that even would cheer the solitude. To sum up all in one word, such a being is a fire-damp to the hilarious atmosphere of a coach.

His companion was a collegian from New-York—one who knew the localities and the ladies, and the on dits of the city—what more need I say of him? He was the antithesis of our Polyphemus—the very antipodes of him—having store of jests of which he was not niggardly, and some acquirements of which he was not proud—so that we soon were intimate—and in spite of the visage just opposite we contrived to amuse ourselves. The worst of the matter was, that old November, who seemed to delight in interrupting us, would just in the middle of some story pour forth such a torrent of coughing that you could hardly hear yourself—till at length we determined to revenge ourselves.

"Have you heard of the bank robbers?" inquired my collegian of me—then continued addressing the cross passenger—"I take it, sir, that you are one of the constables, or perhaps a deputy-sheriff sent out with a search-warrant"—then added, as if soliloquizing—"I know he is not a high-sheriff by his looks."

Jove! how our friend looked. Astonishment kept him motionless for an instant or two, when he uttered—"I a sheriff—I'd let"—and swallowed his anger with an inhaling of the breath like a wild Highlander.

We stopped again ere long, and found a new passenger waiting for us. It was a chattering Irishwoman, with a child. Finding that she was going with us, we informed her privately that our old tormentor was an Irishman—at which she opened her eyes widely, and ejaculating, "and why won't I talk to him thin, sure?" she rushed to the coach and seated herself—another person who had waited for a stage also, getting in, took the front seat, and my fellow-traveller, the collegian, and myself occupying the other part of the front and all the middle seat, our crabbed gentleman, when he set down his glass, emptied of its brandy and water, and advanced to the coach, found no seat for himself except that by the Irishwoman. This was a bitter pill for him, but there was no alternative, so he made the best disposition of himself possible—drew down his eyebrows, contracted the space between his chin and nose, and we drove on. The first crack of the whip was hardly over, when his self-constituted countrywoman began upon him, and well did she perform her part. She recounted her voyage from Ireland—her husband's departure to the west—her troubles and her joys. I know not how it is that those who have little in their heads are ever the most prodigal of it. I cannot explain how it is that the ignorant are always the fastest talkers—but so it is—the fact is established and stands firm, and that is, and then was, enough for our purpose, and it always will be. Directly the child opened her throat and commenced a solo; and this was in truth enough to try the patience of any being, not to mention one with a disposition as crooked as was our friend's; and to say the truth, had it not been so tormenting to him, I myself should have writhed under it. I never could be in favor twenty-four hours where a cross child was in the course of my life. Add to this, there was all the silly affectation of a mother talking with her child—and that mother an Irish one. We were amply revenged—but if I had been called upon to insure the bodily safety of the squalling infant, I should have uttered a decided negative after seeing a private look or two which the crabbed gentleman shot at it. Did you ever see the grin that a tiger puts on when his keeper urges him with his iron rod or wooden bar to show his points to the gaping rustics about him? That's it for all the world. It is the exact look of old Verjuice. I verily believe that he wished he had the infant's neck between his fingers. Did you ever observe the crying of an infant philosophically? I have tried sometimes to subject it to rules—but it always defies me; it is more irregular than the data of comets. Now there shoots out a long yell, till the little imp turns black in the face—then a scattering fire of short, sharp screeches, with dead silence between—then a low, constant moaning, like that of a sick panther—then sobs at intervals; and all these variations tortured into as many combinations as any sum in the rule of permutation has shown five numbers to be susceptible of. No wonder Calvin thought that children were totally depraved. They are very demons when they take to crying in earnest.

We rode in this way through a long tract of poorly settled country, and about ten in the evening arrived at Manchester; and here I fell asleep, and hardly woke, except at the stopping-places, till morning. I heard that same dinning chatter till I fell asleep, and as soon as I awoke, till I began to believe that our companion, the Irishwoman, talked without effort, as other people breathe.

Towards sunrise I was waked by a loud noise. The old gentleman had given the child of Madame la Irlandoise, a sound cuff in the midst of a symphony, which operated finely in stopping it, but raised a tempest between him and the mother. She had scolded till she was hoarse, and just as I waked, in the midst of her gesticulation, she had let the child roll to the bottom of the stage. Exasperated at this, she attacked our old friend à et armis. He, however, seizing her by the hands, removed her from him—picked up the squalling rapparee, and then told her if she was not quiet he would tie her hands up. She was beaten at her own weapons, we thought; not so. She accused him of striking her, and called upon us as witnesses. We gave our evidence in her favor—and "Now," said she, "I'll be giving you an illigant bit of the law whin we get to Auburn." I have always had a good opinion of that law about striking a woman—from the time when I saw a tailor—five feet in his boots—fined and imprisoned for not letting his eyes be torn out by a virago—standing six feet two in her stockings. Our old friend was like a chained bear till noon, when we arrived at Auburn; and he only pacified her at last, by taking the infant upon his knee, and showing the little wretch some attentions; and the look of piteous agony, mingled with rage, with which he did it, would have warmed the heart of a Cruickshank—and the look with which he left us at Auburn was worthy of Shylock.

A VALUABLE WIFE.

A woman was lately buried in a grave-yard near London, who had been dead upwards of five years, a near relation having left her an annuity of thirty pounds, to be paid on the first day in each and every year, "as long as she should remain on earth." In consequence of this legacy, her surviving husband hired a little room over a stable in the neighborhood of his dwelling, where she was kept in a lead coffin until after his death!

SKETCHES OF EMINENT AMERICANS.

DR. CHANNING.

Dr. CHANNING's appearance out of the pulpit is not prepossessing. He is below the middle stature, and of the slightest possible frame. Constant illness of late years has reduced even his natural proportions, and when seen in the street, wrapped with a shrinking closeness from the air, and pursuing his way with the irresolute step and the subdued countenance of an invalid, it is difficult to reconcile his appearance with the prodigious energy of his writings. In the pulpit he is another man. The cloud of anxiety passes from his face as he rises. The contracted expression ordinarily visible about his mouth gives place to a dilated and serene calmness. His fine eye expands and brightens, and the whole character of his face is one of the most pure and elevated humanity. A hearer who saw him for the first time there, if indeed he remembered anything but the eloquent beauty of his thoughts, would go away impressed with his noble dignity, and the air of calm power in his look and action. His face itself is diminutive, smaller even than a child's; but there is great breadth at the temples, and his forehead, over which he wears his hair long and carelessly, is of the finest form and amplitude. On the whole, we think the common impression after seeing Dr. Channing would be that of a mind, a mere intellect, wrapped in the slightest drapery of flesh that will confine it—a coil of mortality so loosely worn, that, whenever its errand was complete, the inhabiting spirit would release itself by the simplest heavenward volition.

Dr. Channing's delivery is not at all oratorical or passionate. It may have been so in the earlier days of his ministry, for he is naturally of a kindling and enthusiastic temperament; and it is a source of natural wonder to those who hear him after having read his fervent composition, that he should yield so little to the sway of feeling. His manner is earnest and absorbed, but, unless excited by a favorite or opposed opinion, perfectly unimpassioned. You may not doubt for a moment that the whole truth of his soul is breathing on his lips, but he seems to you under the influence of an inward power which is too holy for human excitement, and which chastens and subdues his whole spirit like a mighty spell. We know of nothing more strangely and deeply impressive than this almost unnatural suppression of enthusiasm. He is gifted by nature with a voice of singular depth and sweetness, which debility seems only to have made more low and musical, and with the calm serenity, nay, majesty of his manner, and the high order of his thoughts, it has sometimes seemed to us a very spirit-tone—the voice of a being without passions, breathed into utterance by the pure inspiration of truth. The vigorous beauty of his style is too well known and admired to be more than alluded to, but a mere reader can have little idea of its effect when heard from the writer's own lips. His emphasis and cadence are very peculiar. His tones seem the most simple effort of articulation; but he has a way of lingering on what we can only express by calling it the crisis of a sentence, and of giving a depth and richness to the forcible word, which yield an exquisite satisfaction to the ear, not easily described. You sit and listen, as it might be, to music. The sense is, for the time, captive; and, if the melody in which it comes clothed does not wholly disguise the sentiment, it, at least, gives it a winning persuasion, most dangerous to the charmed judgment of the hearer.

THE FINE ARTS.

LAYS AND LEGENDS OF THE RHINE.

A CHOICE musical compilation, bearing the above title, is in the course of publication by Bourne. The English edition, through which we have looked with much pleasure, is accompanied by plates, by Hughes. The music is by Bishop. Such an acquisition to the drawing-rooms of our fair belles will undoubtedly be promptly appreciated, and the publisher be thus amply remunerated for heavy expenses. We select from it the following song of

THE VINEDRESSERS.

Joy, brothers, joy! Above the Rhine
Is stony brow "the Altar" rears!
Not vainly bends the laden vine;
Each grape shall melt in golden tears!
Such sweet weeping, brothers dear,
Only may we witness here!
Joy, sisters, joy! For this your prayer
Was duly to the virgin sung,
And through the blossom-scented air
All night the May-bells sweetly rung!
May the hopes of your young spring
Know as fair a ripening!

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

BY BOURNE.

"Delightful hour of rapture;" "No, no, no, with steps as light;" "Back from his morning chase;" "Softly, softly, in a whisper," the quartetto by the Prince Alidora, Thisbe, and Clorinda;" "Here 'tis set down;" "My lord, deign but to hear me;" "In light tripping measure;" "Midst doubts confounding," the quintetto, with the chorus. Also, "Away with care and sorrow," duet in Rokeby; "I stood among the glittering throng;" "Now to the Lists, or the Field of the Cloth of Gold;" and "The Little Mountaineer," with a beautiful vignette. The entire score of Cinderella will, we understand, be ready for delivery in a few days, embellished with several lithographic designs by Gimber.

BY HEWITT.

"Away to the mountain's brow," as sung by Miss Hughes; "The Zephyr;" "There's not a word thy lips have breathed;" "Oh peerless nymph;" "In this frigid planet;" "Meet me at sunset;" and "The Plattburgh March."

FURTHER EXTRACTS

From the Poem (now in press) delivered at Brown University,
BY N. P. WILLIS.

WHAT is ambition? 'Tis a glorious cheat!
Angels of light walk not so dazlingly
The sapphire walls of heaven. The unsearch'd mine
Hath not such gems. Earth's constellated thrones
Have not such pomp of purple and of gold.
It hath no features. In its face is set
A mirror, and the gazer sees his own.
It looks a god, but it is like himself!
It hath a mien of empery, and smiles
Majestically sweet—but how like him!
It follows not with fortune. It is seen
Rarely or never in the rich man's hall.
It seeks the chamber of the gifted boy,
And lifts his humble window, and comes in.
The narrow walls expand, and spread away
Into a kingly palace, and the roof
Lifts to the sky, and unseen fingers work
The ceilings with rich blazonry, and write
His name in burning letters over all.
And ever, as he shuts his wildered eyes,
The phantom comes and lays upon his lids
A spell that murders sleep, and in his ear
Whispers a deathless word, and on his brain
Breathes a fierce thirst no water will allay.
He is its slave henceforth! His days are spent
In chaining down his heart, and watching where
To rise by human weaknesses. His nights
Bring him no rest in all their blessed hours.
His kindred are forgotten or estranged.
Unhealthful fires burn constant in his eye.
His lip grows restless, and its smile is curl'd
Half into scorn—till the bright, fiery boy,
That was a daily blessing but to see,
His spirit was so bird-like and so pure,
Is frozen, in the very flush of youth,
Into a cold, care-fretted, heartless man!
And what is its reward? At best, a name!
Praise—when the ear has grown too dull to hear!
Gold—when the senses it should please are dead!
Wreaths—when the hair they cover has grown gray!
Fame—when the heart it should have thrill'd is numb!
All things but love—when love is all we want,
And close behind comes Death, and ere we know
That even these unavailing gifts are ours,
He sends us, stripp'd and naked, to the grave!

Yet oh! what godlike gifts neglected lie
Wasting and marr'd in the forgotten soul!
The finest workmanship of God is there.
'Tis fleetier than the wings of light and wind;
'Tis subtler than the rarest shape of air;
Fire and wind and water do its will;
Earth has no secret from its delicate eye—
The air no alchymy it solveth not;
The star-writ heavens are read and understood,
And every sparry mineral hath a name,
And truth is recogniz'd, and beauty felt,
And God's own image stamp'd upon its brow.

How is it so forgotten? Will it live
When the great firmament is rolled away?
Hath it a voice forever audible,
"I AM ETERNAL!" Can it overcome
This mocking passion-fiend, and even here
Live like a seraph upon truth and light?

How can we ever be the slaves we are,
With a sweet angel sitting in our breasts!
How can we creep so lowly, when our wings
Tremble and plead for freedom! Look at him
Who reads aright the image on his soul,
And gives it nurture like a child of light.
His life is calm and blessed, for his peace,
Like a rich pearl beyond the diver's ken,
Lies deep in his own bosom. He is pure,
For the soul's errands are not done with men.
His senses are subdued and serve the soul.
He feels no void, for every faculty
Is used, and the fine balance of desire
Is perfect, and strains evenly, and on.
Content dwells with him, for his mind is fed,
And temperance has driven out unrest.
He heaps no gold. It cannot buy him more
Of any thing he needs. The air of heaven
Visits no fresher the rich man's brow;
He has his portion of each silver star
Sent to his eye as freely, and the light
Of the blest sun pours on his book as clear
As on the golden missal of a king.
The spicy flowers are free to him; the sward
And tender moss, and matted forest leaves
Are as elastic to his weary feet;
The pictures in the fountains, and beneath
The spreading trees, fine pencilings of light,
Stay while he gazes on them; the bright birds
Know not that he is poor, and as he comes
From his low roof at morn, up goes the lark
Mounting and singing to the gate of heaven,
And merrily away the little brook
Trips with its feet of silver, and a voice
Almost articulate, of perfect joy.
Air to his forehead, water to his lips,
Heat to his blood, come just as faithfully.
And his own faculties as freely play.
Love fills his voice with music, and the tear
Springs at as light a bidding to his eye,
And his free limbs obey him, and his sight
Flies on its wondrous errands every where.

What does he need? Next to the works of God,
His friends are the rapt sages of old time.
And they impart their wisdom to his soul
In lavish fulness, when and where he will.
He sits in his mean dwelling and communes
With Socrates and Plato, and the shades
Of all great men and holy, and the words
Written in fire by Milton, and the king
Of Israel, and the troop of glorious bards,
Ravish and steal his soul up to the sky—
And what is it to him, if these come in
And visit him, that at his humble door
There are no pillars with rich capitals
And walls of curious workmanship within?

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

PENCILINGS BY THE WAY.

PROVIDENCE.—A common traveller would as soon think of requesting to be set ashore at Hurl-gate as to stop at Providence. The coaches are in readiness upon the dock, and at the arrival of the boat the whole body of passengers usually take the seats severally allotted to them, and with no knowledge and less curiosity about the pretty town, whose diagonal 'only they describe, they roll away at ten miles in the hour to Boston. And so on their return. It is a mere channel of travel. The world rushes through it, tide after tide, and though there is probably no one spot over which so much of the beauty, wealth, and fashion of this great western world passes and re-passes, the quiet inhabitants live calm and undisturbed on the airy eminences above, the grass growing before their doors, and the moss gathering green upon their stepping-stones, as secluded in their retirements, and as unweary in their thoughts and habits, as if there were a hundred wildernesses of forest and prairie between them and the daily passers by. I have hitherto been in the same injudicious hurry myself. I knew nothing of Providence but its lower street, and remembered nothing but that the prevailing baptismal name upon the signs was "Pardon." Here I am, however, now, a sojourner at the Roger Williams' hotel; and I can only say, after two days' experience, that I wish I had stopped always, or could stay longer. I like the place, I like the people, I like the management of "mine host." What can a traveller say more?

Providence, from the river, looks like a confused mass of buildings, heaped up the side of a precipitous hill, with no order, and no attention to convenience. The summit is crowned with the college buildings, and they seem the only distinct feature of the place. A walk up the hill, however, (and it is a very toilsome one,) soon opens to you broad and handsome streets, along which stand spacious and beautiful houses, not exceeded, for style and apparent comfort, by any private dwellings I have ever seen. There is an appearance of wealth and munificence all over the upper portion of the town. The courts are large, the houses all at ample distances from each other, and the gardens unusually tasteful and liberally apportioned. I was exceedingly taken with the baronial, independent look of some of these citizen-palaces. I have not been here long enough to judge fully of the harmony of the style of living inside; but if they all live as well as the few specimens I have seen, they understand the savoir vivre in this small town much better than we do in the cities. A machine in each of these perpendicular streets, on the principle of two buckets in a well, to translate the inhabitants from one region to the other, would complete its charm as a location to my taste.

I am here, you know, just at the time of Commencement in the University. With all the rest of the intelligent world, you have read and admired the occasional sermons of President Wayland. He is admitted to be one of the best thinkers and one of the most forcible and original writers in the whole country; and under his liberal and decided government, the college, as was to be expected, flourishes and stands high. The performances of the graduating class were singularly free from the cant of college exercises. I was pleased with them altogether, and as this particular trait shows always the finger of the fashioning hand, it added to my conviction of the admirable adaptedness of the president to his office. May the institution succeed under him!

I depart to-morrow for New-York with real regret. From the glimpse I have had of the society it strikes me as composed of material that one cannot always find. The middle-aged men, particularly, seemed to me, as a class, singularly intelligent and social; and, if I may speak of the brighter radii of the circles I have seen, the fame of Providence for beauty has been truly trumpeted, and I have never seen the pleasant gifts of refinement and wit more generally and freely distributed. In the hope that this humble tribute from a stranger may meet some one at least of the eyes that beamed upon him, he records here his mingled pleasure and regret, in the remembrance of their kind hospitalities and the brief measure in which he is permitted to enjoy them.

NEW-YORK CITY.—"How it strikes a stranger," is always an amusing, though not always a correct light for looking at the picture of a great city. I occupy a sky parlor in the city-hotel, celebrated for its Willard of immortal memory, and its accommodations of inexhaustible capacity—the most convenient and thronged hotel, perhaps, this side the water, though it is a pity it is not a little more visited by one universal guest—the common light of heaven. Hence, over innumerable chimneys and through a medium like a smoked glass, I see the broad mouth of the Hudson, and Hoboken with its industrious ferry-boat plying to and fro, and, nearer to my eye, the flags and long pennants of vessels at the pier, and the black pipes of steam-boats smoking and hissing, and more immediately in the foreground, scenes of poverty and misery that would have moved the heart of Howard with the deepest yearnings of compassion. I know not how it is, but poverty in New-York seems to me incomparably wretched. In Boston, the poor never impress you with that sick-hearted sense of their misery that is unavoidable in crossing their unhappy pathways here. They are cleaner, elsewhere, or, not so closely pinched by necessity, they have more cheerful faces, and move with a less broken and dejected gait, and their children do not acquire "the trick of sorrow" so unchangeably. There is a poor woman, now, hanging clothes upon a line on the top of a building, some three stories below my window level. She is perfectly gray, and her hair is tied together and falling over her back, hardly distinguishable, in its mingled dingy sprinkling of white, from her smoked and wrinkled forehead, and her hands, lean and cramped, stretch up to the line, with a weakness and effort that seem like the struggling of sickness more than the healthy action of labor. The expression of her face is that of the most worn and hopeless anxiety. I never saw one of more wretchedness. But this is enough of such a picture.

The great impression made upon a stranger's mind on leaving his room, is that of general and undistinguishable hurry and confusion. The carmen halloo and lash their horses into a trot almost impossible from the nature of the vehicle, the omnibuses whip and hurry to pass each other, the jarveys, with their handsome coaches and "frames of horses," (perfect miracles of leanness) outwhip both carmen and omnibuses; every man you meet, avoids you by a most adroit instinct, apparently without being aware that you are near him; the boys are never seen playing, but hurry about with shop-bills or Magdalen reports, or lottery programmes—every moving creature (save the ladies and the dandies) seems bent upon its extreme errand, and the stranger walks through it all like a man in a dream, bewildered beyond the power of rallying. At twelve or one, however, Broadway, like a well-contrived panorama, changes its aspect. The perspective of the sidewalk, as far as you can see, is becoming brighter and brighter with gay colors; the busy, care-worn faces disappear, or occur less frequently; slight, airy figures, with their feet dressed more daintily than any you have ever seen, pass you at every step; well-dressed men of all ages, and foreigners of all complexions, and fashion of apparel and manner, throng the way; the shops look like drawing-rooms on a bridal morning visit, and the whole scene is gay, and dazzling, and delightful. Broadway against the world—we allow it! No other city in America, at least, can show its equal. I do not know that the women are prettier than ours, but they dress so tastefully! I do not know that they have more grace or are more delicately framed, but they walk with the prettiest affectation in the world, and Mrs. Cantelo's "philosophy" is perfect. No women appear so well—apply the unction to what department you will. By the time you have reached Canal-street, you have seen more striking figures, and faces to be remembered, than in all your life before. The men too are better dressed, the horses more tastefully caparisoned, the shops and hotels more thronged, and more showily set out. You gaze at the first citizen that passes you with his look of domesticity, and wonder how he ever became accustomed to such a turmoil, or can think two consecutive thoughts without interruption.

A week's acquaintance with New-York does not diminish your surprise. The coffee-houses, with their admirable adaptation to the wants of all comers, and the size of all purses; the readiness with which every thing you want springs to your call, showing you modes of getting a living, of which, in more primitive cities, you never dreamed; the facilities for going to every quarter of the city or the world; the wondrous union of business and courtesy in the wealthy inhabitants, their profuse hospitality and their regular return to their vocations; the prodigious extent of the city, and its singular crystallization of pursuits and classes; the total absence of quietness, and the absolute order beneath all—the whole city unravels to you like a beautiful enigma—order out of disorder—contrivance and system out of apparent confusion and turmoil.

But I am interrupted. I will speak of the society of New-York and other matters hereafter.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Festivals, Games, and Amusements; Ancient and Modern. By Horatio Smith, Esq. with additions by Samuel Woodworth, of New-York; being the twenty-fifth number of the Family Library. 12mo. p. 355. New-York: J. & J. Harper. 1831.

THIS is a re-publication of the fifth number of the "National Library," a popular English series, conducted by the Rev. G. R. Gleig, M.A.; and one might suppose that the sanction of the reverend gentleman's name would have shielded the work from the imputation of any injurious influence on the morals or religion of mankind; but we perceive it has not escaped condemnation from a quarter where, indeed, it was to be expected. The Wesleyan Methodist Magazine for August, 1831, has devoted several pages to prove the book totally unfit for "family use;" and that all worldly amusements "are at best of a suspicious character. They cannot do us good, they may do us harm; and he judges, as we believe, wisely who decides that the best way is to avoid them." We dissent entirely from this sweeping condemnation. It savors of fanaticism or hypocrisy! and, as we most firmly believe, strikes not only at the happiness, but the virtues of mankind, which have a close connexion with the modes in which they spend their hours of relaxation. It is impossible that the human race, most especially the youthful portion, can exist without them. The proverb, that "all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," homely as it is, is, in our opinion, worth a whole magazine of nonsensical declamation against the innocent sports of life; and we think little of that sour uncompromising bigotry which can detect in the laughter of the young, or the smiles of the aged, an offence either to God or man. This malignant and unnatural warfare against the slightest forms of pleasure is calculated, if successful in its deep designs, to establish among us a species of monkish asceticism, neither favorable to health, strength, morals, nor true piety. No where have the bad passions raged with more violence, or produced more striking catastrophes of wickedness than among little communities abstracted from the ordinary business and pleasures of life; professing a total alienation from both, and denouncing the world, its cares, occupations, and delights, as objects of contempt and danger. Abstraction from mankind does not necessarily carry with it a complete subjection of the passions; nor does he who affects to be, or who really believes himself free from its temptations, always succeed in subduing the passions. Solitude is more often the cause of crimes and errors than of virtue or knowledge; and he who fancies himself wiser or better, for giving up the moderate enjoyment to be met with among his fellow-creatures, will too often find that he has acquired in their stead little more than carping ill nature and hardness of heart towards all who do not choose to follow his example.

That this is the case with a large portion of the leaders in the crusade against the simple charms which Providence has allowed to this life, appears sufficiently evident from the course they are pursuing. Not content with their own incomprehensible ascetic propensities, with the free and generous toleration awarded to them by those who do not feel called upon to imitate their folly, they are perpetually worrying and insulting them with denunciations of the corruptions of their hearts, and the punishment which awaits them hereafter. Uncompromising, proud, and ill-natured, they forget alike the decorums of society, the deference due to the opposite habits and opinions of fallible beings; nay, the very precepts of their own religion, and pour forth reprobation where, even supposing their creed the true one, they ought to feel only compassion. The man who dares to pursue a course in which rational amusements are harmoniously mingled with the duties he owes to his family, to his country, and to his Maker, is held up as an object of heaven's most inveterate vengeance; and the recreations of an hour, according to them, purchased by an eternity of lingering tortures.

We would caution these rigid censors against attempting to enforce their doctrines too far. There is in mankind a most carnal propensity to resist tyranny, whether temporal or spiritual; whether it emanates from kings or priests; whether it comes abroad under the mask of the law or the cloak of piety; whether it attempts to fetter the body or enslave the mind. Religion is a sweet and gentle influence; it is all mercy, charity, conciliation, modesty, forgiveness. The sour, malignant, and persecuting tyranny, which holds no communion, no faith, no exchange of good offices, or of common courtesies, with those whom it chooses to denominate heretics, is not an emanation from the divinity, but an apostate to nature; and avarice, pride, selfishness, and ambition are the weapons with which he attacks those who follow her precepts. The sects who are attempting to put bits in our mouths, and rings in our noses, have sought to interfere with the rights of mankind—to cramp the exercise of their talents, to restrain their ordinary occupations, and to institute a silent yet bitter and effectual persecution against all those who will not submit to their dictation. Let us caution them how they proceed. They are only making hypocrites and unbelievers, for an age of fanaticism is always followed by one of infidelity. It is with religion as with government—if you draw the cords too tight they will snap, and licentiousness will succeed coercion. We who partake in what we consider guiltless methods of adding to our happiness, do not quarrel with camp-meetings and love-feasts, and we have a right to expect a similar indulgence for our dances, our new-year festivals and thanksgivings. Thus much we thought called for by the remarks we have seen in various religious publications, on the subject of amusements, elicited by the work before us.

It is to our taste a very amusing, and in our judgment, a very innocent and excellent book. We cannot for the life of us see the least harm in a description of the sports which mankind in all ages, as well of primitive simplicity as artificial refinement, have practised, without any idea of offending against either morality or religion. There is nothing in it repulsive to decency; nor can we conceive any ground for the denunciations of the ascetics, except that of a general determination to banish all amusements, except camp-meetings, and the like, from the face of the earth. We do not deny that some of the games and sports described in it are such as we neither approve nor practise; but they are merely described, not recommended; they are given as part of the necessary historical details of the work, which without them would be incomplete, and contain nothing at which the most fastidious delicacy need blush. The subject is both curious and interesting. The writer, or rather the compiler, has collected almost all that is preserved of the festivals, games, and amusements of that portion of mankind known to history, from the earliest ages to the present time; and next to the business and occupations of the world, its pleasures and recreations are assuredly the most interesting, as affording illustrations of the character of nations and ages, and in fact of human nature. Mr. Smith has performed his task with great industry, and in a style very pleasant, as well as applicable to the different subjects. But we must content ourselves with this general commendation, wishing as we do to say something particular of the appendix, by Mr. Samuel Woodworth, and having but little space left for that purpose.

This appendix consists of a sketch of American amusements,

&c. with which we have no fault to find, except that it is too short. It is given with such a spirit of hilarity, such an honest feeling of participation in what the writer describes, that we were most pleasantly carried back to the period of wicked boyhood, when, not having the fear of the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine before our eyes, we irreligiously rejoiced during Christmas holidays, and most atrociously luxuriated in new-year cookies, regardless of the infamy awaiting such heinous malefactions. The circumstances of the case, and the necessity of a speedy publication of this work, must of course have cramped Mr. Woodworth, as to time and opportunity to make a collection agreeable to all the different parts of the United States; but, so far as he has attempted it, he has succeeded to a degree which calls forth our fullest approbation. The appendix is quite equal, nay we are compelled to say, superior to the work itself, in style, spirit, and humor. We have only space for one or two extracts, which will fully justify our preference.

"It is justly observed, in a former part of this compilation, that 'the earliest festivals of the Greeks, and indeed of all nations, were kept in the autumn, after gathering in the fruits of the earth, when gratitude prompted them to offer up sacrifices to heaven, and social festivities were the natural consequences of plenty.' In another place our author says, 'The Saxons had the same custom, always setting aside a week, after harvest, for holidays; and our festive 'harvest-home' [in England] is but a continuation of the ancient practice.'"

"In all ages and countries these annual festivities have ever been attended with some religious rites, showing that their origin was gratitude to heaven. This is also the case as regards the New-England festival, popularly denominated 'thanksgiving.' This joyous anniversary (which was doubtless first instituted in the eastern colonies as a substitute for Christmas) takes place late in autumn, after the fruits of the earth are gathered in, and the labors of the husbandman have been rewarded by the fruition of harvest. The first or second Thursday in December is generally appointed for this purpose by the governor of the state, who issues a proclamation to that effect; a printed copy of which is sent to every clergyman in the state. On the first sabbath after its reception, at the conclusion of the sermon, this proclamation is read from the pulpit; and in some parishes, on each succeeding sabbath until the time appointed.

"When the happy day arrives the people assemble in their respective places of worship, dressed in their best attire. Here they listen to an appropriate sermon, and join in prayer, hymns, and anthems expressly adapted to the occasion. These services generally occupy about two hours, and then are over for the day; the remainder of which is devoted to feasting, sports, games, and amusements of various descriptions. The 'thanksgiving dinner,' however, forms a prominent feature of the picture. Every farmer's table now literally 'groans with the weight of the feast.' Flesh and fowl, of his own raising and fattening—fish and game from his own streams and woodlands—vegetables of his own planting—butter, milk, and cheese, the product of his own dairy, are now found in luxuriant profusion upon his hospitable table; while the delicious 'pumpkin pie' leads a host of other dainties in the bountiful dessert. Clear sparkling cider, mead, perry, and spruce beer, all and each the product of the homestead, lend their exhilarating influence; and if ever a set of joyous hearts and smiling faces assembled together in social harmony—if genuine happiness is ever experienced at the festive board, it is on such occasions. Apprentices in the metropolis, who are only permitted to visit their parental and rural homes once or twice in the year, are now sure to be present; and a hoary-headed patriarch often presides at these domestic banquets, where the guests comprise two or three generations of his own descendants. It is a jubilee that draws together members of the same family who have been long separated; and as a ball invariably succeeds the festivities of the day, there is no small excitement among the village lasses."  Again:

"In the city of New-York, in particular, the good old custom of paying passing visits, and reviving friendships on New-year's day, is still kept up. 'It is a practice,' says the writer just quoted, 'hallowed by time and sanctioned by its salutary consequences. It brings long estranged friends to remember and visit each other; it gives life and gaiety to a dreary, inclement season; it is, in short, a social, honest, old-fashioned custom, and as such I honor it.' Public business of every kind is suspended; the courts, banks, custom-house, post-office, all are closed; and fewshopkeepers have the hardihood to open their bow-windows on New-year's day. Debtors are safe from arrest, can boldly meet their creditors, and wish them a happy new-year. Even that mighty, restless engine, the daily press, stands still to-day; and hungry quidnuncs must fast for news, or receive it verbally from the prattling tongues of the fair distributors of cakes and coffee, with whom they exchange the compliments of the season. But though the news-press be silent, some of its subordinate agents are this day in all their glory. The carrier, who has faithfully served his patrons, 'through summer's heat and winter's cold,' now reaps his well-earned reward in a harvest of silver. Each of his subscribers is presented with a printed poetical address, previously prepared for the occasion by some laureat bard, who is thus himself enabled to join in the festivities of the day. No matter what may be the literary merits or demerits of this annual effusion, it is always well received and well paid for. No one criticizes or complains, for all are determined to be happy, and where numbers unite in such a laudable determination, it is not a trifle that can defeat their object. How cold, unfeeling, and bigoted must be that heart that would throw a straw in the way of such innocent enjoyments! and yet, some such there are! The day is short; but a long evening of festivity is to follow. The theatres and the museums are all open; while a grand ball, 'got up expressly for the occasion,' exhibits its fascinations to the lovers of dancing."

Before we conclude this article we take occasion to express an opinion as to the general merits of this modest, unassuming author, and estimable man. Mr. Woodworth is not a fashionable writer, and we believe it has never been found worth any bookseller's while to institute a regular system of puffing in his behalf. Yet his prose productions have the great merit of clearness and simplicity; and his poetry the rare attributes of being perfectly comprehensible, and entirely devoid of that miserable affectation of sickly sentimental sorrow, and base misanthropy, which disgraces so much of the verse of the present day. There is a springing hopefulness, an unconquerable good humor and vivacity, in almost all his effusions, that to us is truly refreshing; we having, as Goldsmith says, "lately wept over all sorts of elegies, until we are heartily tired." Even when he complains of the little rubs and mishaps of life, it is without degenerating into unmanly namby-pamby jeremiads, or losing that wholesome tone of philosophic carelessness, which marks the vigorous mind. When we take into consideration the circumstances under which most of his productions have been ushered into the world, and the indispensable necessity which rendered them almost extempore, as we are given to understand, it is little less than wonderful that his odes, songs, and occasional pieces, possess so much real merit. We could point out many of these which are far superior to the inflated, disjointed, incomprehensible nonsense, that so frequently passes for sublimity in the fashionable dandy poets. But we are compelled to end these remarks on a writer who has never met his just rewards, by instancing the fine song of the "Bucket," as one which will last as long as buckets hang at wells.

The Gladiator. An unpublished tragedy in five acts. Written for Mr. Forrest by Dr. Bird, of Philadelphia.

We have read the manuscript of this tragedy with careful attention, and can therefore speak of its merits confidently, and to the purpose. It is strongly written and well conceived, containing striking scenes, bold characters, and passages of great beauty. The author is evidently one familiar with dramatic literature; most of the dialogue is marked by a Spartan brevity and nerve, and even the inferior parts generally are such as talented players need not hesitate to undertake. We will proceed to prove the truth of our opinion by examining the composition before us, and making several extracts, which will afford the reader an idea of the writer's power.

The scene is mostly laid in Rome, at the time when that city was divided into three parties, of which Pompey, Cæsar, and Crassus were the head. On this subject Plutarch says,

"When the gladiators took up arms and ravaged Italy, their insurrection was commonly called the war of Spartacus. Its origin was this—one Lentulus Batiatus, kept at Capua a number of gladiators, the greatest part of which were Gauls and Thracians; men not reduced to that employment for any crimes they had committed, but forced upon it by the injustice of their master. Two hundred of them, therefore, agreed to make their escape. Though the plot was discovered, three score and eighteen of them, by their extreme vigilance, were beforehand with their master, and sallied out of town, having first seized all the long knives and spits in a cook's shop. On the road they met some waggons carrying a quantity of gladiators' arms to another place; these they seized, and armed themselves with them. Then they retired to a place of strength, and made choice of three leaders. The first was Spartacus, whose extraction was from one of those Thracian hordes called Nomades. This man had not only a dignity of mind, a strength of body, but a discernment and civility superior to his fortune. In short, he was more of a Greek than a barbarian."

This event is the foundation of the tragedy in question, and Spartacus is the hero. Dragged from Thrace to Rome to fight as a gladiator in the arena, he is thus introduced: Bracchius, a Roman lanista, or master of gladiators, challenges any other to produce a slave superior in the fight to Phasarius, a Thracian, long since stolen from his country. Batiatus Lentulus, a Capuan lanista, answers.

Len. I have brought some indifferent good fellows; and one of them, I think, I would wager against your unmatchable.

Brac. Hearst thou that, Phasarius? Get in and practice. [Exit Phas.]

Brac. But he will not take the oath?

Brac. Marry, is he slave or felon?

Len. A slave that I bought of the quæstor, just returned from the army of Thrace; a shepherd, I think they told me, and leader of a horde of his savage countrymen. I bought him on the faith of the fame he brought with him of being the most desperate, unconquerable, and indeed skilful barbarian in the province. Thou hast not forgot Caius Clypeus, the centurion that fought in the shows at the funeral of Sylla?

Brac. He was accounted on that day the second swordsman in Rome.

Len. His bones, with those of two of his followers, are rotting on the banks of the Strymon. The three attacked the valiant savage, my bondman, and, by Jupiter, without other help than fortune and extraordinary prowess, he slew them all.

Brac. Hercules! he has magic weapons! But how was he taken?

Len. Betrayed by his follower, while he slept; and yet he had vengeance on his betrayer, for he dashed his brains out against a rock.

Brac. Excellent! Dash his brains out! He is a Titan! I would give a dozen common slaves to have seen him do it.

Luc. But he will not swear.

Brac. Come, thou knowest not the nature of these fellows. Didst thou speak to him kindly?

Luc. Ay; but I had better have talked softly to a hyena: he did but scowl at me. Faith he will sit by the day, looking at his chains, or the wall; and if one has a word from him, it is commonly a question. "How many leagues he is away from Thrace?"

Brac. Didst thou not tell him of the honors of a gladiator?

Len. Ay; and he asked if cutting throats was the most honorable occupation in Rome?

Brac. By Mars, thou shouldst have scourged him.

Len. I did.

Brac. And how wrought it?

Len. I think the knave had killed me, when I struck him, even with his manacled fist, but that he was felled by the staff of my freedman. I should have hanged him, but was loth to lose so bold a varlet. Wherefore I had him scourged again, and faith he took it as passively as a stone. But it will not make him swear.

Brac. Didst thou vow to the gods to hang him up like a dog, if he were so obstinate.

Len. I had a halter put to his neck; but then he laughed, and thanked his barbarous gods for such indulgence.

Brac. Nay, this is a madman.

Len. I had the fetters taken from his arm, and sent one to attack him with a weapon. But although I laid a sword by him, he would not use it; he struck the assaulter with his clenched hand, and felled him as one would a wall with a battering ram. But then he was angry. Another time he sat still, and let the slave wound him unresisting.

When Spartacus is brought before his masters, chained, he asks:

Spar. Is not this Rome! the great city?

Brac. Ay, and thou shouldst thank the gods they have suffered thee to see it before thou diest.

Spar. I heard of it when I was a boy among the hills, piping to my father's flocks. They said, that spoke of it, it was the queen of cities, the metropolis of the world. My heart grew big within me to hear of its greatness. I thought those men who could make it so were greater than men; they were gods.

Len. And are they not, sirrah?

Spar. How many palaces, that look like the habitations of divinities are here about me. Here are marble mountains, that have been hewn down, and shaped anew, for men to dwell among. Gold and silver and purple, and a million of men thronging the pillared hills.

Brac. And what thinkest thou, now thou hast seen it?
Spar. That, if Romans had not been fiends, Rome had never been great. Whence came this greatness, but from the miseries of subjugated nations? How many myriads of happy people that had not wronged Rome, for they knew not Rome—how many myriads of these were slain, like the beasts of the field, that Rome might fatten upon these hills that cost not the lives of a thousand innocent men; there is no deed of greatness ye can boast, but it was achieved upon the ruin of a nation; there is no joy ye can feel, but its ingredients are blood and tears.

Len. Now marry, villain, thou wert bought not to prate, but to fight.
Spar. I will not fight. I will contend with mine enemy, when there is strife between us; and if that enemy be one of these same fiends, a Roman, I will give him advantage of weapon and place: he shall take a helmet and buckler, while I, with my head bare and my breast naked, and nothing in my hand but my shepherd's staff, will beat him to my feet, and slay him. But I will not slay a man for the diversion of Romans.

Brac. Thou canst boast, barbarian? If thou canst do this, what brought thee to Rome a captive?

Spar. Treachery! I was friendless, sick, famished. My enemies came in numbers. They were like the rats of Egypt, that will not come near the crocodile while he is awake; they attacked me sleeping. Had they found me with a weapon in my hand, gods! I had not now been a thing for Romans to scourge.

Spartacus refuses to take the oath, which prescribes, among other regulations, that the victor in the fight shall not be allowed the privilege of sparing his adversary's life, unless by consent of the people.

In the second act the conspiracy among the desperate Capuan gladiators is conceived. Spartacus, as he enters the arena, muses upon the scene.

Spar. Well, I am here
Among these beasts of Rome, a spectacle.
This is the temple, where they mock the gods
With human butchery. Most grand and glorious
Of structure and device! It should have been a cave,
Some fount and midnight pit, or den of bones,
Where murder best might veil herself from sight.
Women and children, too! to see men die,
And clap their hands at every stab! This is
The boastful excellence of Rome! I thank the gods
There are barbarians.

The part of Spartacus abounds with instances of a spirited declamatory style, admirably fit for dramatic effect. When he is pitted against a Thracian, goaded by the desire of freedom for his wife and child, he consents to the combat, and is recognized by Phasarius, his antagonist, as his brother. The denouement is well managed.

Pha. Hadst thou not a brother?
Cras. Why prate these cut-throats? Come, prepare, prepare.
Spar. A young brave heart, whose steps I taught to dare
The crags and chasms and roaring cataraets
Of his own native hills, till he was freer
Among them than the eagles. What art thou,
That seem'st to know him? I would be angry with thee;
These words make me look on thee as a friend.
Pha. Seem I not like Phasarius?
Spar. What, thou?
A mail'd warrior like a harmless boy?
The Romans slew him.
Pha. They enslaved him. Brother,
Changed as I am, and from a harmless boy
Turn'd to a rough destroyer, still am I
The self-same fool that once thou call'dst brother.

A hasty conversation unfolds to each that the other had organized a rebellion, and instead of turning their strength upon each other, the watchword is given, and the conflict takes place, in which the gladiators are successful. The triumphant Spartacus thus gives vent to his joy:

Spar. Lo! we are victors, conquerors again.
The hot-brain'd boasters, that in mockery thought
To ape the angry Scythian, and subdue us
With whips, instead of warlike instruments,
Lie hush'd and gory; and despite the claim
Of their high honors and nobility,
There is no slave too base to tread upon them.
There lies a consul. I have known that word
Fright men more than the name of gorgeous kings.
Say to barbaric states, a consul comes,
A Roman consul, and their preparation
Of war or welcome speaks a demi-god,
And yet lies he on the opprobrious earth
A palmy consul, by a slave's hand slain,
No nobler than his horse.

In the following scene there is a sustained power, which inspires us with horror, without violating nature:

Spar. [Within] Guard the doors:
Let none go out.
Flor. What voice is that? By heaven,
We are betrayed!
Enter Spartacus, Phasarius, and others.
Spar. Look to the maiden:
Drop thy sword's point or die.
Flor. A thousand times, ere thou, malicious rebel,
Touch this endangered lady.
Spar. Boy—

He disarms Florus.
Know I not this face?
Flor. I think thou shouldst.
Spare thou the lady, rich will be her ransom.
But for myself, I know thy deadly fury
Grants never quarter.
Spar. By the stripes not yet
Fied from mine outraged limbs, thou art the son
Of Lentulus, the scourger!
Pha. Ay, the same.
Let him atone his rascal father's sins.
Scourge him to death.
Flor. Give me a soldier's death:
Let me die by the sword. I never scourged thee.
Spar. Thou! miserable boy!
Flor. And well thou knowest,
Thou fierce and fiendish man, this tongue of mine
Was oft thy intercessor.
Spar. I do know,
One of thy blood did give me to the scourge—
Me, a free son of a free sire, and imaged
After the semblance of the only Master—
Gave me to thongs and whips, as a poor beast,
Till I became one. This I know: know thou,
From that shamed hour when first my body writh'd
Under the merciless lash, I did devote
The scourger and his household to the furies,
To quick and murderous death. And thinkst thou
Thy whining kindness took away a pang?
Thou art the Roman's son, and thou shalt die.
Flor. Let it be so.
Spar. It shall so. Thou seest
Command and dignities have not wiped out

The memory of wrongs: and Roman blood
Running in rivers ever at my feet,
Gluts not the thirst for more! Take him away:
Scourge him to death.

After the victory a dispute arises between Spartacus and his brother respecting Julia, the first being resolved to give her freedom, the other to claim her as his slave.

Phas. I claim the captive.
Spar. Thou shalt have a thousand,
But not these twain.
Phas. I care not for the boy.
The girl is mine—captured by mine own hands—
Therefore mine own.
Flor. Base caittiff!
Spar. Sirrah, begone!
Phas. Deny me her, and, by the fates, thou art
No longer brother of mine. I help'd thee
To this high station; and the troops thou rulest
Are but my lending; for that hour I leave thee,
They leave thee too.
Spar. Come, look me in the face,
And let me see how bad desires have changed thee.
Phas. I claim the captive.
Spar. Set thine eye on her:
Lo, you! she weeps, and she is fatherless.
Thou couldest not harm an orphan? What, I say,
Art thou, whom I have carried in my arms
To mountain-tops, to worship the great God?
Art thou a man, to plot a wrong and sorrow
Against such as have no father left but Him?
Wilt thou now ask her?

The following scene will bear a comparison with nearly the best of the modern dramatists, if not the best:

Jov. Had you been born
A Roman, you had won by this a triumph.
Spar. I thank the gods, I am barbarian;
For I can better teach the grace-begot
And heaven-supported masters of the earth,
How a mere dweller of a desert rock
Can bow their crown'd heads to his chariot-wheels.
Man is heaven's work, and beggar's brats may herit
A soul to mount them up the steep of fortune,
With regal necks to be their stepping-blocks.
But come, what is thy message?
Jov. Julia, niece
Of the prætor, is thy captive.
Spar. Ay.
Jov. For whom
Is offered in exchange thy wife, Senona,
And thy young boy.
Spar. Tell thou the prætor, Roman,
The Thracian wife is ransom'd.
Jov. How is that?
Spar. What, ho! Senona.
Senona appears with a child at the tent door.
Lo! she stands before you,
Ransom'd, and by the steel, from out the camp
Of slaughter'd Gellius.
Jov. This is sorcery.
But name a ransom for the general's niece.
Spar. Have I not now the prætor on the hip?
He would, in his extremity, have made
My wife his buckler of defence; perhaps
Have doom'd her to the scourge. But this is Roman.
Now the barbarian is instructed. Look,
I hold the prætor by the heart; and he Shall feel how tightly grip barbarian fingers.
Jov. Men do not war on women! Name her ransom?
Spar. Men do not war on women! Look you, sir:
One day I climbed upon the ridge top
Of the cloud-piercing Hemus, where, among
The eagles and the thunders, from that height
Look'd upon the world, or far as where,
Wrestling with storms, the gloomy Euxine chafed,
On his recoiling shores; and where dim Adria
In her blue bosom quench'd the fiery sphere.
Between those surges lay a land, might once
Have served for paradise, but Rome had made it
A Tartarus. In my green youth I look'd
From the same frosty peak where now I stood,
And then beheld the glory of those lands
Where peace was tinkling on the shepherd's bell,
And singing with the reapers.
Since that glad day Rome's conquerors had past
With withering armies there, and all was changed.
Peace had departed; howling war was there,
Cheer'd on by Roman hunters. Then methought,
Even as I look'd upon the alter'd scene,
Groans echoed in the valleys, through which ran
Rivers of blood, like smoking Phlegethons;
Fire flash'd from burning villages, and famine
Shriek'd in the empty cornfields. Women and children,
Robb'd of their sires and husbands, left to starve.
These were the dwellers of the land. Say'st thou
Rome wars not then on women?
Jov. This is not to the matter.
Spar. Now, by Jove,
It is. These things do Romans. But the earth
Is sick of conquerors. There is not a man,
Not Roman, but is Rome's extremest foe:
And such am I, sworn from that hour I saw
These sights of horror, while the gods support me,
To wreak on Rome such havoc as Rome wreaks—
Carnage and devastation, woe and ruin.
Why should I ransom, when I swear to slay?
Begone. This is my answer.

Phasarius, having parted from Spartacus in anger, leads a large portion of the troops with him to battle, and is totally routed. Six thousand yielded themselves prisoners of Rome. Phasarius gives his brother this account of what took place there:

I saw a sight last night that turned my brain,
And set my comrade mad. The Roman highway
Is, each side, lined with crosses, on each cross
Is nail'd a gladiator. Well, 'twas night,
When, with a single follower, I did creep
Through the trench'd army to that road, and saw
The execrable multitude uplifted
Upon the horrid engines. Many lived;
Some moan'd and writh'd in stupid agony;
Some howled, and prayed for death, and curs'd the gods;
Some turn'd to lunatics, and laugh'd at horror;
And some with fierce and hellish strength had torn
Their arms free from the beams, and so had died,
Grasping headlong at air. And oh! the yells
That rose upon the gusty sighs of night,
And babbled hideously along the skies,
As they were filled with murder.
Spar. Say no more!
This is too dreadful for man's ear. I swear
For this to make Rome howl.

There is a richness as well as strength in certain passages sprinkled through the piece with great profuseness. For example:

Ah, would to heaven,
I were with her now, and my smiling boy

In Thrace again, beside our mountain cot,
Or in those tales where babbling Hebrus tumbles
Along his golden sands, and dreamt no more
Of sacks and battles.

Another, and finely descriptive of Spartacus after his defeat:

What man is this, unbuckler'd and unhelm'd,
Gored with a thousand deaths, that waves so wildly
A broken weapon?

We have not attempted to enter into a regular analysis of the plot, except where it illustrates the few specimens of the style extracted above. The interest of these is, of course, materially diminished by their separation from the main body of the work. The play will undoubtedly become a popular and permanent stock piece.

We cannot, however, lay aside this manuscript without complimenting the writer, not only on its actual intrinsic merit, both for the closet and the stage, but on the singular propriety with which it is adapted to the style and powers of the tragedian by whose laudable exertions it was elicited. The character of Spartacus is devised with great art. Its lofty tone of declamation, its bold gushes of various passions, are calculated to exhibit those qualities which this fine actor possesses in the highest degree. In a quiet, thoughtful, reading part he would find no opportunity for display, and would probably glide through it without much effect; but, when aroused by a mastering interest, and called upon to express the extremes of overwhelming and discordant feelings, thousands have long since borne testimony to his unrivalled powers. The Gladiator will undoubtedly add to his well-earned fame, and entitle him to the gratitude of all who interest themselves in the dramatic literature of the country. It will be produced, for the first time, on Monday evening next, at the Park theatre.

The Atlantic Souvenir for 1832; being the seventh volume of that annual. Embellished with twelve engravings. 12mo. p. 328. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. 1831.

What a beautiful volume! what a pretty thing for the father to place in the hands of his daughter; the brother to present to his sister; the lover to his mistress, with the name that calls the blood up into his temple, written in the graceful vignette! With how many various endearing appellations will that little blank be filled! How many eyes of light and love shall droop, as they read the characters to be traced between those bending flowers, with a trembling, vague conception that they are beloved! Of how many exquisite confessions will it be the vehicle! What a delicious language may lurk in its lettered pages! Into how many gorgeous mansions will this fragile token find its way, breathing inaudible vows of constancy and affection! How often will it be seized with avidity, examined with pleasure, and, like the friend that gives it, be valued and forgotten, for some new and glittering offspring of the succeeding year! Inquire for this in eighteen hundred and forty. Here and there, perchance, it will be found cherished, as a sacred and mournful relic of some one who has been beloved, and is still remembered; who has been shot in battle, or swallowed into the abysses of the deep; who has perished of an excruciating disease, or fallen off, peradventure, from his good fame and character, and become an outcast, a wanderer over distant lands! But ask hundreds of the giddy votaries of fashion and children of beauty, who now receive this as a memento, and you shall find them immersed in new pleasures, or crossed with unexpected cares. The world will have altered to them, and they to the world. Health shall have departed, loveliness fled, fortune failed, friends betrayed, bosom companions been struck down, and all the azure sky of youth's summer morning been overcast and storm-shaken!

Of the plates we have already noticed three in a previous number. The "Bower of Paphos," painted by J. Martin, engraved by George B. Ellis, is a rich illustration of nature, and full of Eden beauty.

The "Rocky Mountains," is a soft and pretty print, by Hatch and Smilie, the drawing by T. Doughty. The mirror-lake, the circling shores, and the broad hills, heaved up like an ocean, are images on which the eyes dwell with delight.

J. B. Neagle's plate of "Tiger Island," from a painting by C. Stanfield, is of the opposite description. A fierce windy sky, peaks of rugged crags, a vessel and boats tossed on the angry broken billows. There are some really fine touches in this piece.

Many of our readers will recollect having seen a painting by Neagle at one of the exhibitions of the National Academy, representing Patrick Lyon in the original habiliments of the blacksmith. Of this we have here a fine engraving by Kelly, containing many marks of skill.

One of the best in the book is also by Kelly, from Richter's painting of the "Tight Shoe." It is full of expression and humor.

"Who has not felt the wretchedness,
A trifle more, a trifle less,
Of length or breadth a shoe may make,
Which yet no pity can awake?
In vain the suitor cries 'a fit!
It does not sit too close, a bit.
'Tis just the thing—'twill surely do—
Oh! 'tis a most enchanting shoe!"

"Isadore," painted by J. Jackson, engraved by Illman & Pilbrow. A striking figure, and well executed.

The "Dutch Maiden," by Neagle, from a painting by Newton. The costume characteristic.

The two prettiest in the book, however, are "Lord Byron in early youth," and the "Mother's Grave." The first, painted by Sanders, and engraved by Ellis, is charming. The bard's head is splendid, and the noble countenance finely expressive. Poor Byron! The latter is engraved by Neagle, painted by Scheffer. There is not much beauty in the faces. Perhaps this heightens the effect to the contemplative, for feeling and grief are not confined to the beautiful. The group is sweetly affecting, and the attitude of the little girl is eloquent to every heart. If we were disposed to be critical, we should prefer that the elder sister should hide her face instead of the younger. It speaks too much deep and overwhelmed feeling for the elastic spirit of childhood. No subject more mournful could employ the artist.

Among the writers we observe that Mr. Paulding, Mr. Stone, James Mack, Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Embury, and several other occasional contributors to our columns, have furnished articles for the present volume. As a whole, we know of no more appropriate object for a choice present; and, bating the inconsistency of publishing a new-year souvenir almost in midsummer, we have derived from it unmingled pleasure.

Encyclopædia Americana. Volume Eight. 8vo. p. 599. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. 1831.

Among the thousand pleasing but ephemeral forms which gaiety and wit assume to dazzle and delight the literary world, we are doubly gratified when we find ourselves turning slowly and musingly over the leaves of a book, seriously instructive, rich in scientific information, and yet fully adapted to the general reader, like the present. The reputation of this valuable work has augmented with each volume, and if the unanimous opinion of the press, repeatedly uttered from all quarters, be true, which in this instance happens to be the case, it is indeed one of the best of publications. It should be in the possession of every intelligent man, as it is a library in itself, comprising an immense mass of lore upon almost every possible subject, and in the cheapest possible form.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

Among the operas recently performed are the Dienna, Artaxerxes, and Cinderella; in each of which Miss Hughes has appeared to good houses, and in the last instance, to an overflowing and fashionable one. Respecting her Mandane we can venture no opinion, as she was evidently laboring under an indisposition sufficiently serious to mar the usual beauty of her singing. Artaban is not a part favorable to Mr. Thorne's style. Jones, as Arbaces, was always pleasing, and sometimes delightful. Mrs. Sharpe's Artaxerxes was better than usual—for one so valuable in other departments it was an extremely creditable performance. On Monday Miss Hughes took her benefit in Cinderella. A number of circumstances conspired to impart an unusual interest to this representation. The young lady herself is decidedly and deservedly a favorite,—this was her first benefit in America—Cinderella always fills the house—and an evident curiosity prevailed among the lovers of music to compare her with the fair vocalist for whom the opera was got up, and who has rendered it to us familiar and delightful. Miss Hughes did not disappoint our expectation. She ran through the most difficult and superbly brilliant passages of Rossini with a surprising force and skill. We can pay her no greater compliment than to say that she warmly excited the admiration of a public who have so frequently been dazzled with the warblings of Mrs. Austin. The part of Cinderella abounds with conceptions of music inexpressibly sweet and splendid. Its rapid variations remind us of the evolutions of a bird in the air—now "mounting and singing to the gate of heaven"—now floating in circles with graceful cloud-like motion—and again dashing like lightning down the sky. Miss Hughes executed several of these with great clearness and distinctness—pouring forth a volume of warbling voice, and evidently displaying the results of an extremely severe discipline in a proper school, added to no ordinary natural powers. We would especially instance her exquisite solo in the quintette "Midst doubts confusing," and the variations of the concluding song "Now with grief no longer bending," for which she called up all her endeavors, and which was encored. In one or two cases she betrayed a disposition to overload the air with embellishments, and to introduce them into the simple melody. In the ballad "Once a king," the bad effect of this was marked. That air is sweetness itself. It is expressive of modesty, simplicity, artless sorrow, and every low, humble, and subdued feeling; and, like Cinderella herself, derives a striking force from its contrast with the pomp, glitter, and liveliness by which it is surrounded. Miss Hughes pleased in this character, from the display of particular passages. Her decorations are new and numerous; and, after having listened with admiration to Mrs. Austin for fifty nights, the hearers have become quite familiar with the opera, perceive every little deviation from the text, and find in it a kind of charm, not because it is better, but because it is different. The unrivalled excellence of Mrs. Austin consists in the possession of a voice, which, for a perfect bird-like softness, sweetness, and wonderful flexibility, has never been excelled in American theatres. The Signorina could pass higher and lower, and thrill you with more extraordinary and triumphant exhibitions of science and power; but for that inherent quality of tone which composes sweetness—for the silvery softness in which the ear can detect nothing but a consciousness of pleasure; a clearness like that which delights the eye upon a sleeping stream in summer, when there is not a ripple to break its motionless beauty, or stir the images in its transparent depths—this faculty is the gift of nature, and is possessed by Mrs. Austin above any singer we ever heard. Upon this she depends, with a quiet trust in its influence. Its spell is every where through her music. It sinks down into the smallest breath—the lowest tone—and, with a strange distinctness, through the clasp of the chorus you hear it running along as you see the line of a silver river, winding through woods and fields, from your stand on the mountain top. In addition to this, Mrs. Austin discovers a curious facility of execution, as if music escaped from her involuntarily as fragrance from a flower. Miss Hughes excelled her in points. She burst out sometimes like a star from behind a cloud, and added surprise to our admiration. Mrs. Austin never goes behind the cloud. She floats through the whole part with no apparent effort. In the two duets, "Mildly beaming—brightly gleaming," and "Let thine eyes," this distinction forcibly struck us, and Mrs. Austin's style is here the more finished, easy, natural, and soothingly sweet. Mrs. Wallack, as the Fairy, improves. Mr. Jones perseveres pertinaciously in his "most noble contempt" of the authentic writers of our language; and in the last scene still informs the ladies and gentlemen, that "condescension and humanity becomes all ranks." Bad grammar and sweet singing "is" both given to us by Mr. Jones! Is this flourish of rhetoric nightly repeated because the actor differs from us in opinion upon the abstruse principle of English involved? or is it because, being, as he surely is, a delightful vocalist, he deems the mere subordinate faculty of speaking like a gentleman unworthy of his notice? We trust hereafter he "will not be a participator in such a suicide!"

We regret the substitution of the "Hunter's signal horn," in the place of the "Tyrolienne air." The reason mentioned in the bills, that it is the property of the "adapter," has a slender claim to notice, as indeed the same, if admitted by the manager, would have excluded the whole opera; which, in our judgment, was equally the "property of the adapter." If any change must be made, we should prefer "Away, away, to the mountain brow;" though, indeed, the "Hunter's signal horn" was given in a fine spirited style, and also encored.

THE BOWERY THEATRE.

We were gratified with the representation of Town and Country. Mr. Barton (Reuben) was graceful and gentlemanly, but he does not possess the slightest brilliancy, and seldom aims at a point, for which latter he deserves commendation. These same "points" are detestable nuisances, except in the hands of a man of fine genius, and then they are natural, not sought. He seemed to please the audience, and was loudly applauded. Mrs. Russel and Mrs. Wheatly (Mrs. Trot and Hon. Mrs. Glenroy) supported him very creditably.—Mr. Russel did not make Cosey what we expected. He appeared too careless, and impressed us with the idea that he might have succeeded better if he had so wished. Mr. W. Chapman was irresistibly droll and humorous, and is not at all appreciated according to his merits. His Hawbuck convulsed the house with laughter. He is what the English call a "clever comedian." Captain Glenroy was personated by Mr. C. Thorne. This young gentleman is not without a good idea of acting. His conception is quite above mediocrity; but he needs study sadly. His words are not properly shaped. Indeed, we notice that certain persons attached to both theatres suffer divers of their organs of pronunciation to lie idle even in the height of declamation. We hear being, instead of being-given instead of giving—shillin, comin, &c. Mr. G. Jones (Plastic) is gifted with a good person and voice; but his delineations have no depth or force. He passes with utter disregard numerous opportunities to display reflection. He does not seem to enter into the meaning of the character. He speaks it well; but does not act it well. Speech is a small part of the histrionic art. This results from the want of application. The profession of the stage requires a toil as constant and laborious as any other. Its field for the exercise of discrimination, fancy, feeling, and thought is almost infinite. Something else is to be considered besides the words. Now, Miss Mestayer we have never heard spoken of as an actress of talent, yet she gave the last scene of Rosalie Somers with a grace and feeling that clearly evinced the possession of both a mind and heart, as well as a careful examination of the spirit of the play, and of that portion of it represented by herself. Miss Waring sang "Sweet Home" quite prettily.

The afterpiece of Maurice, the Woodcutter, brought out Master Russel. That boy fully confirms us in the opinion, once before expressed in this journal, that a clear-headed and spirited lad of ten or eleven can be easily made to do more than is generally imagined. He played Fritz beautifully. No one in the piece did better. Messrs. Tuthill and Farren are entitled to a passing notice.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1831.

Editor's study.—Fashion is like the clouds—always changing its shape. Is it not strange that what is admirable to-day, shall, in a few months, appear ridiculous? Even our fellow-citizens used to wear hats nearly in the shape of pyramids upside down, and shoes with pointed toes. What would the world have said had a polite lady entered a drawing-room with bishop-sleeves, before that atrocious custom was introduced? The same principle which shapes our dress, also alters our manners and conversation. We are told that it is unfashionable in England, at present, to use the "Sir" in refined society. That respectable monosyllable is addressed to servants only. Fancy a boy who had been flogged at school for saying "Yes" and "No" cut in the high circles for not saying it! Several years ago it would have been an insult for a gentleman to appear in company in a black stock, and now, we learn, that it is in contemplation to abandon the cravat altogether, and let loose upon Bond-street and Broadway, a set of young "Byrons" with open collars! What a potent necromancer is this same fashion, whose sanction makes right wrong, absurdity necessary, virtue contemptible, crime honorable! "I have insulted my friend," says the duelist, "and now I am about to kill him." "But is this just?" "No." "Is it for your happiness?" "No." "Is it not savage—monstrous?" "Yes; but it is the fashion." "Will you take my arm, my fair lady?" "Not for worlds." "Is there any impropriety in it?" "Oh! no." "Do you dislike me?" "No, but—it is not the fashion." And yet after all our complaints, what a fine restraint it is upon men, and how many nice comforts do we owe to its influence. "How I dislike this person; his presence gives me a fever." "But you are kind and civil to him." "I study his convenience and administer to all his little wants. It would be disgraceful to ill-treat any one in my own house. It would not be the fashion."

Among other decrees of this imperative, fickle divinity, is one that the editors shall devote a portion of this journal to a kind of chat upon matters of local interest; mere comments on the prominent occurrences of the past week—which, in this periodical, can scarcely be furnished as news. We have for a long time revolved in our minds, some method of giving this department a proper character and name, and making it a kind of reservoir wherein to pour all our little bits of intelligence, our floating thoughts and opinions, without the formality of an essayist, a critic, an historian, or scarcely an editor. It should be a familiar place of chit-chat, where we can have all the talk to ourselves, and which our enemies must not criticize. To give this a name was our most serious trouble; for the ground has been so thoroughly trodden by predecessors, with whom we do not presume to bring ourselves into competition, that, like the unfortunate gentleman in the old story, we have found it "a very difficult child to baptize." "Our Elbow Chair"—that's Launcelot Lang-Staff. The "Editor's Table"—that's been used before. The "Editor's desk"—a "most lame and impotent" imitation. No it shall be the Editor's Study—whither we shall retire after the copy is made up, and the devils are all at work; and here we will sit and be as egotistical and scandalous as we please: an actor behind the scenes—a general in his tent—Richard, with his beaver off, smelling the sweet and wholesome odor of the new-mown hay. Will you give us leave, dear reader? Will you sit and listen to our "bald disjointed chat?" Will you come into our study, and let us be exclusive, and tell you all our little secrets, and then shake hands as it were in a good humor, and hope soon to meet again? We do religiously believe we shall win more upon each other's friendship in one half hour's communion, thus face to face, than in whole years of dignified round periods and pompous respectful paragraphs. We love dignity in its proper place and time, especially before our enemies. There are two or three professional abusers of our humble efforts—it would do your soul good to see us freeze them with civilities and monosyllables. We believe the very mercury would sink in the glass that hangs quietly on yonder nail, if one or two, to whom we may do the honors hereafter, were to break in upon our merry meetings; but we do like sometimes to unbend; to laugh at trifles; to speak from impulse, and never dream of seeing it in the "Cahawba Democrat," the "American Boston Traveller," or any of the little brown paper periodicals, that snarl at us sometimes like very curs. Some one has observed that there is no conversation productive of a finer mirth, than that in which men of sense get together in their own homes and talk nonsense. We trust the critics will not look upon our little sanctuary. We speak here only to the gay and good-natured, just as if they were actually sitting by our side, like old acquaintances dropped into our "study," to see "how we are getting on."

The present is one of the most agreeable seasons of the year. The temperature of the atmosphere renders moderate exercise delightful; the evenings are cool and pleasant, and the morning air is inhaled with a kind feeling of refreshment and health. The month of August, too, has been this year remarkably fine. For sixteen days the thermometer ranged between seventy-five and eighty degrees of Fahrenheit, which is the most genial and delicious of all temperatures, and would keep the earth clad in everlasting verdure. Refreshing showers fell on thirteen days, nourishing the flowers, and urging them to disclose their sweets; the flaunting and splendid dahlias, which is becoming a general favorite; the shy and beautiful tuberose, with its massive white petals and lavish fragrance; the timid and shrinking mimosa, with many varieties of the aster and others have arrayed our gardens in brilliancy, and borne their glories into September. Only on one day the heat described an elevation of eighty-nine degrees, and the greatest depression was on the twenty-eighth, when it stood at sixty-eight.

At this moment the thermometer before us is at seventy-five, the sky without a cloud, the dust in the streets laid, and every good-humored citizen, as he salutes his neighbor, exclaims with a hearty gladness on the state of the weather. The white hats (no longer premature) are beginning to disappear; and the genteel young men, who lately basked in the sunshine of Broadway in plaid inexpressibles, and without vests, appear clad in wool, with their coats buttoned up to the throat; and the ice-cream gardens and baths begin to look like "banquet-halls deserted." By the way, if the reader will pardon a digression, ice-cream and newspapers are getting unfashionable, since an honorable Tom Shuffleton at the Springs, last summer, drawled out at the dinner-table, "I've a positive horror of ice-cream—I can't bear it at all, because it's so slippery;" and, on being asked concerning the late news from Poland, observed, "I don't know any thing about those sort of things—I never read the newspapers, because they dirty my gloves so!"

We have in our mind divers other good-natured things to say to thee, gentle and indulgent reader; but the printer's devil, who seems born every way to vex and thwart us, has warned us that we are at the end of the page. Now this is provoking. We are not always in the mood. We cannot be merry at a given hour, and hate to have our mirth thus measured by the square; but talking (at least in this instance) only makes matters worse, so good by for the present.

OH! WHERE SHALL I FIND ME A LOVER?

COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR MISS FOOTE, BY WILLIAM BALL, AND SUNG BY HER WITH UNIVERSAL APPLAUSE.

Allegretto.

Oh where shall I find me a lov - er? Thus sigh'd a young maiden, "Heigh-

o! - - - If a lov - a - ble swain you dis - co - ver, Be sure, now, and pray let me know." Well, my dear, we shall see, we shall see what the pi-ty-ing fates prepare, And your song ere long May a mer-ri-er, mer-ri-er bur-then bear. La ra la La ra la la La ra la La ra la la La ra la La ra la La ra la La ra la

La ra la La ra la La ra la ra La ra la ra la.

SECOND VERSE.

"Now here's Carl the young forester coming—
How sweetly he winds his horn!
And his cheeks like the roses blooming,
That circle the brow of the morn."

"Ah, my dear, but I fear
He's poorer than love ought to be,
And so, Oh no, no leafless bower
Like his for me."

THIRD VERSE.

"Old Hans of the vineyard has plenty
Of all that is thriving and fine."
"Yes, but he may choose among twenty—
He shall never be lover of mine."
"Where love meets love,
And fortune lights the youthful way,
Oh these if you please, for me
You need no further stray."

FOURTH VERSE.

"Well, of this you may rest sure, dear,
That if in my travels I find
Any sample so golden and pure, dear,
I'll bear your commission in mind."
(And I'll take what is more,
Should I chance to be such a fortunate elf,
Special care, trust me there,
To keep such a capital prize for myself.)

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

SERENADE FOR MAY.

Come, Julia, love, 'tis morning,
Old winter's passed away;
And gentle spring, returning,
Leads in the blushing May.
The dazzling sun appearing,
Lights up the eastern wood,
And many a wanton cloud its form
Bathes in his radiant flood.
Night's shadows are receding,
Before his heavenly ray;
And the blue mist melts, as doubts of thee
Pass from my soul away.
Oh haste! the crimson beams are now,
O'er meadow, grove, and bower;
And softly hums the golden bee
Round every open flower.

A FINE DISTINCTION.—"Don't let that quack touch your teeth," said I, to a friend, as he turned towards the door of a noted dentist, who advertises to cure the toothache without extracting, or to extract them without pain. "Come with me, and I will show you an operator whom you can trust." "Ay," answered my companion, "but can he trust me?"

MADAME DE GENLIS.—The memoirs of the late illustrious instructress of Philip I. king of the French, are at present re-read with avidity, in consequence of the state of affairs in that nation. They are calculated, in some degree, to displease, from their air of egotism and self-conceit, from her everlasting parade of personal beauties and accomplishments. They are, however, so well written, and so replete with interesting anecdote, so evidently from an intelligent and close observer and a well-bred person, that you cannot fail to be delighted. She died recently at the age of ninety.

THE EFFECT OF CIRCUMSTANCES.—I have often thought that the worst and wildest of men, under proper influences, might have been the most virtuous and delightful. The same wind which uproots the tree and desolates the harvest, when softened into the breath of summer, and lingering among the tremulous strings of the Æolian harp, steals across the senses in the most ravishing melody.

EXTRACT.—She's beautiful, amiable, witty, refined; full of music, poetry, and feeling; but she's married. Talking to such a being is like owning a ticket in a lottery already drawn.

BON-MOT.—Charles D. is a wit by nature. It used to flash out of him in his earliest boyhood, even at school. I recollect his description of the difficulty which he experienced one night, in entering our dormitory in the dark. The beds were ranged in a row, and very close together, and he was feeling for the empty one. "I came along," said he, "and put my hand upon every fellow. There they lay, and each one gave a different note, like the keys of a piano—sharps, flats, and naturals."

CHRISTIANITY.—The real christian can never be unhappy, bating the pressure of immediate bodily anguish, and even through the tortures of the rack a steady belief in God must be a powerful and an enduring support. No earthly prospect, however desolate—no danger, however formidable, can overcome him with terror or despair; for his thoughts are ever dwelling on the something beyond, in the full peace and bliss of which a few brief struggles will place him. He may tread cheerfully the most repulsive and perilous passage, when he has the pledge of a heavenly Father, that he will conduct him to bliss. He embarks on the deep, and his ship may be tempest-tost, yet what cares he when he knows that the howling winds only waft him homewards to everlasting joy. What is there to make him shrink—or weep—or tremble? What grandeur of character springs from this sacred religion? How majestic does its pure disciple appear descending into the shadowy abyss of death! He only is calm and happy when all around are writhing in anguish! What has the recoiling, the shuddering, bewildered, horror-stricken atheist to offer as a substitute for a spell so potent and sublime? What consolation has he, flung carelessly into the world, continually stung with so many kinds of anguish; and so lashed and lashed on to his tomb? With what awful and exquisite grief must he stand, "Where the grave-mound greenly swells and feel that the being he loved has passed away, and is as if he had never been? To him the diseases of life wear the aspect of fiends. They are not the necessary evils which seem to purify him and prepare him for heaven. They are but the tortures of an accidental and monstrous state of abandonment and confusion—a dark dream, for the joys of which he has no foundation; for its wretchedness no reward; whose images are a delusion, whose hereafter is a blank.

HASCHBASCH, THE PEARL DIVER.

BY J. K. PAULDING.

HASCHBASCH was held by general consent the best diver in all the gulf of Ormuz. He would plunge deeper, stay longer, and come up drier than any half-horse-half-alligator in the whole western hemisphere. But, somehow or other, he was always unsuccessful; if he brought up both hands full of oysters, ten to one they did not contain a pearl; so that at last he got to be a by-word among his fellows, who used to call an oyster without a pearl "one of Haschbasch's oysters."

One day, after frequent disappointments in diving, he, in a fit of despair, threw an oyster, which he knew was too plump and healthy to have any pearls in it, so violently against a rock hard by, that he broke the shell, and was not only astonished but alarmed to see a volume of smoke ascending from the fragments. As it gradually cleared away he beheld a little squab genius, with an oyster-knife in his hand, and so fat that he might well pass for the personification of a veritable blue-pointer.

Haschbasch contemplated the droll figure till he recovered from his terror, and fell to laughing with all his might. At length he exclaimed,

"Who art thou, and whence didst thou come?"

"I am the Genius of Oysters," replied the strange little man, "and I came from the bottom of the sea. How daredst thou break my palace in this rude manner?"

Haschbasch apologized very respectfully, and explained the cause of his violence, at the same time appealing to his compassion for pardon.

"You look so round and jolly," said he, "I am sure you must be good-natured. I never heard of such a person that was otherwise."

"Well," said the placable Genius, "I will not be an exception. I forgive thee; nay, I will reward thee; for, between ourselves, I was a prisoner when you released me. I was shut up by a tyrannical necromancer of an alderman, for eating oysters in a month that had no r in it. I owe you a good turn—there, dive just where I throw this."

So saying he flung a piece of chip into the sea, and Haschbasch obeyed his commands. The queer Genius swallowed the contents of the broken oyster at one mouthful, and, waddling down to the wave, disappeared in its blue bosom.

In a few minutes Haschbasch came up with both hands full of oysters, each of which, on being opened, was found to contain a pearl as big as a pigeon's egg.

At that moment the Genius emerged from the waters, and after puffing like a porpoise, exclaimed, "Go to Ispahan;" and again vanished, having only come up to take a mouthful of air.

Haschbasch concealed his prize from every eye, and shut his lips on the subject as close as an oyster. He took leave of little Flim-flam, the black-eyed daughter of the collector of the schah's tribute, who, if he had dreamed of the large pearls, would have had his head off in less than no time, and promising soon to return, departed for the renowned city of Ispahan, where Schah Hussein, who called himself the "king of kings," then reigned, if not in the affections, at least in the fears of his people.

Haschbasch, after considering a day or two concerning the best manner of disposing of his treasure on his arrival at Ispahan, at length determined upon going to the fountain-head at once. We know not where he got his experience, but he had somehow found out that it was always best to deal with principals in matters of business.

Accordingly one day when the great "king of kings" was amusing his people with the royal farce of "pride in the garb of humility," and listening very condescendingly to petitions he forgot the next moment, Haschbasch threw himself on his face, licked a reasonable quantity of dust, and in tones and words of genuine eastern humility, begged an audience of the vice-regent of Allah, the master of the universe, and the example of the angels.

Schah Hussein was tickled at these new and illustrious titles, which he thought were peculiarly applicable to him, above all his predecessors, not excepting the great Rustian himself, who is celebrated in the 'Epic of Ferdousi,' containing twenty thousand bad verses. He ordered Haschbasch to wait the conclusion of the farce, and then attend him at the palace.

The diver crawled after him to his royal residence, and being admitted on all fours, most laudably petitioned for a private interview, on a matter of the utmost consequence. He did not forget to conclude by calling the schah, as before, "vice-regent of Allah, master of the universe, and example of the angels." The schah was melted into compliance, and beckoned him to follow to his private apartment.

When there Haschbasch prostrated himself three hundred and sixty-five times, the vice-regent counting all the while on his fingers.

"Well, slave," cried the schah, "what would thy insolent presumption have? Take notice, if thy business is not of sufficient moment to excuse thy bold request, thou art as dead as the man who offended me yesterday by sneezing in the midst of a speech I was making to the representative of the Giaours, who came to offer me tribute."

Haschbasch thought he had got himself into a pretty predicament, and trembled so that he could scarcely find the pearl as big as a pigeon's egg, which he had brought with him. The schah began to be alarmed, lest he should be fumbling for a dagger to despatch him; and was just on the point of calling for help, when he was struck almost dumb by the sight of the magnificent bauble.

"Allah!" cried he, snatching it out of the hands of the shivering diver, "Allah! can I believe my eyes! Is it not the ghost, the shadow, the counterfeit of a real pearl? If it be, slave, tremble! for thy life shall pay the forfeit of my disappointment. Hast thou any more like this?"

Haschbasch assured him there was not such another in the world, and that it was genuine.

The schah, on comparing it with some which he wore about him, became satisfied. He debated in his own mind whether to purchase it at any price, or make short work of it by cutting off Haschbasch's head, and becoming his heir, according to the laws and customs of Persia, that is to say, the will of the "king of kings."

Justice, however, prevailed. He recollected the charming titles Haschbasch had bestowed upon him, and that he had thus enabled him to triumph over his barbarian neighbor, the Giaour of Russia, who had just drubbed him soundly, and possessed himself of two or three of his finest provinces.

"He has not such a pearl in all his diadem!" exclaimed he mentally. "What is thy price for this treasure? Quick—tell me this instant, or—"

"Example of the angels!" cried Haschbasch, "a mere trifle—nothing but to make me governor of the city, with the title of prince, and appoint a deputy to do the drudgery, while I pocket the honors and the money."

"Thou art the most reasonable of slaves," cried the schah in a transport; "I would have given thee the city, and all the inhabitants for slaves, rather than have missed this opportunity to eclipse the barbarian Giaour. Give me the pearl, and take thy wish."

The bargain was struck, and Haschbasch departed, governor of Ispahan and a prince. The next day he took possession of his post, and appeared in a turban as large as a small balloon. The people neither missed their old governor, who had met the destiny of the bow-string, nor wondered at their new. They were used to such matters.

Haschbasch was a tolerable ruler, as times go. He made a number of wise regulations, which he forgot to see put into execution; and issued a vast quantity of proclamations, to which nobody paid the least attention. However, he boasted of the reformation he had brought about, and smoked a golden pipe, eighteen feet long, with entire satisfaction. His deputy was a capital fellow; according to contract, he did all his excellency's work for him, but he did not give him all the money. He thought he had a right to a trifle of sly bribery and extortion, on his own proper account—and what deputy can blame him?

Haschbasch for a while was as happy as a little king; nay, much happier than a little king, in these degenerate days. Nobody troubled him with protocols and non-intervention. He had his dancing-girls, his story-tellers, his poets, and his parasites, who swore by Allah he was fit to be schah of Persia. He ate hugely of the richest viands; he drank, under the rose, wine dearer than Chateaux Margaux, and he sung odes of Hafiz, till he could neither see nor hear, and in time he waxed as fat as the Genius of Oysters.

But alas! that mortal man cannot enjoy all these things without paying more for them than they are worth! Haschbasch began to be sleepy all day, and wakeful all night. His deputy took upon him all the duties of his principal, and Haschbasch could not eat and drink and sing odes and admire the dancing-girls for ever. He sometimes longed for a dive, by way of variety, even though he should bring up nothing but oysters without any pearls.

One hot, luxurious, debilitating day, he sat in a listless, tedious, laborious sort of apathy, in a cool gallery that overlooked the street. He yawned once, twice, thrice, and at length exclaimed audibly, though almost unconsciously to himself,

"O, Allah! if I only had something to do!"

"O, Mahomet! if I only had nothing to do!" answered a voice in the street, directly under the gallery.

He looked down and beheld a diminutive hunchback of a fellow, about four feet high, and as crooked as a ram's horn, bending under two heavy buckets.

"Who art thou?" cried Haschbasch, rubbing his eyes.

"Buz-buz, the water-carrier," answered the other.

"What wouldst thou?"

"I should like to be a governor. You said, just now, you wanted something to do, and I want nothing to do. Let us exchange, and we shall each have our wish."

"Thou art a merry slave. I cannot give thee my office, but I will make thee my jester. Thou shalt make me laugh, and I will make a man of thee. Come hither."

"You must add a cubit to my stature before you can do that; but, however, I accept your offer, for if you only knew how lazy I am you would pity me."

Buz-buz proved a most invaluable auxiliary in assisting Haschbasch to kill time. His spirits were inexhaustible; and if not always witty, he supplied its absence by impudence, which sometimes does just as well. At length Haschbasch willed him to give some account of himself.

"I was born crooked as you see," said he, "which was a great happiness; for I never knew what it was to be strait, and therefore escaped the curse of being miserable by comparison. I was apprenticed to a water-carrier, who made me carry twice as much as other people, because, as he wisely said, there was no danger of spoiling my shape; and I was just on the point of trying to better my fortune, by making the most of my figure in a matrimonial speculation, when your highness had the good fortune to take me into your service. Such is my history, now tell me yours. I bet my old buckets against your turban you have been a diver in your time?"

"Why so?" said Haschbasch, somewhat startled.

"Why because thou art always bobbing thy head, as if thou wast going to plunge into the water."

"Thou art a prophet," said the governor, and related his story, substituting a single pearl for the handful he had acquired through the favor of the Genius of Oysters.

"O Prophet!" exclaimed Buz-buz, "what is the difference betwixt a pearl-diver and a water-carrier, that thou shouldst make a governor of the one and a jester of the other! Destiny, destiny, thou art more blind than a bat—she at least sees in the dark."

Haschbasch laughed at this sally, but he soon had cause to repent of the disclosure of his early life. Buz-buz was continually joking about his former profession, and though he always did it when they were alone together, it was not relished. Haschbasch loved to hear others made game of, but to be made game himself was quite a different affair.

On one occasion the great mufti of Ispahan, a sort of Mahometan archbishop, came to visit Haschbasch in state, to negotiate a marriage between the governor and his niece, who was a first-rate beauty, and very fond of hearing the odes of Hafiz. There was any quantity of ceremony between them, and the matter was finally settled.

"You bowed to the great mufti just as if you were going to take a dive for pearls," said Buz-buz, when he was gone, laughing ready to kill himself. But he soon laughed on the wrong side of his mouth. The governor became wroth at length, at being so frequently reminded of his profession, and turned his jester neck and heels into the street.

"Never mind," quoth Buz-buz, as he took up his old buckets, "never mind; from the capital jester to a dull governor I am become a poor water-carrier once more; who knows but from a stupid governor thou mayest become a half-starved pearl-diver again."

"Off with his head!" cried Haschbasch, like King Dick in the tragedy. But the carrier disappeared in a twinkling, and he never laid eyes on him again.

The marriage of Haschbasch and the niece of the great mufti took place shortly afterwards; and, for a few days, he was the happiest of all governors, except the governor of one of the "old thirteen." But his wife, whose name was Fatima, was a perfect Mrs. Bluebeard for curiosity. She ransacked every hole and corner of the house, to see what was in it; and nothing baffled her but a small box of gold, so massy she could not break it open, and so fastened that she could not come at the secret.

The next day, the next, and the next, she was observed to be low-spirited, and her low spirits increased every passing hour. Haschbasch sometimes found her in tears, which he kissed away; and though this act of kindness ought to have stopped the tears of any reasonable woman, those of Fatima only flowed the faster. Haschbasch conjured her to tell him the cause of her sorrows; but she shook her head mournfully, and sobbed out,

"You-ou-ou—do-n-n-t—lo-v-e—me—ech!" and her heart seemed almost already to break.

The governor swore by the sacred camel of Mahomet, and the white beard of her uncle the mufti, which was not half so white as her fair neck, that he loved her better than his office. But even this did not satisfy her, and, in less than a week, she took to her bed.

Poor Haschbasch was almost distracted. He went to her, and kneeling at her bed-side—or, to be orientally orthodox and particular—at the side of her couch, swore by the prophet, that there was nothing on the face of the earth he would not do to convince her of his affection.

"Tell me, tell me," said Fatima, in a weak and plaintive voice, "what is contained in the little gold box you keep so carefully closed from your devoted wife?"

"Beard of the prophet!" exclaimed the husband, "how didst thou come to know of that box?"

"By accident, lord of my soul," said Fatima; "but thou hast sworn, and here I promise to be a happy and obedient slave to thee if thou wilt open it in my presence."

Haschbasch dared not break his oath. Turning all the attendants out of the room, he proceeded to the secret deposit, brought with him the box, and opened the unseen spring. His wife shrieked, clasped her hands, and almost fainted at the sight of a dozen pearls as large as pigeon's eggs. She was never tired of handling and admiring them; and the governor was at length obliged to force them from her, which occasioned a paroxysm of her old disorder.

Her illness increased every hour until Haschbasch became again alarmed, and was wrought upon to make her the same rash promise, and with the same rash sanction he had done before.

The lady took him at his word, and demanded her choice of the beautiful pearls. Haschbasch trembled and obeyed; but, ere he did so, he related the history of the bargain with the schah, to whom he had sold a similar pearl, under a solemn assurance that it was the only one of its kind in the universe.

"My office, nay, my head, will pay the forfeit of the discovery of this falsehood. Take thy choice; but, before thou dost so, promise to me, on thy duty as a wife, thy faith as a true believer, thou wilt never wear this bauble, nor disclose to any living being that it is in thy possession."

Fatima complied, the pearl became her own, and her health was restored, as if by miracle. The old mufti ascribed it to his prayers, and a vow to get up a grand pilgrimage to Mecca, if his niece recovered. Nothing could equal the childish delight of the governor's lady, in the possession of a pearl as large and as perfect as that of the great schah himself. She looked at it ten hours every day, and it seemed as if she would never be tired of admiring it. The thought, however, at last struck her on a sudden, that there was little pleasure in its possession so long as nobody knew of it. She might as well not have it at all.

From that moment she began to be unhappy. One day the dearest friend she had in the world called to see her, wearing a beautiful amethyst her husband had just presented her.

"If I could only show her my pearl as large as a pigeon's egg, and as white as the beard of the mufti, how blue she would look," thought Fatima.

The temptation was irresistible. After exacting a solemn pledge of secrecy, she exhibited the inestimable treasure to her friend, who almost fainted at the sight.

"She will tell some of her acquaintances," thought Fatima, "who will tell it to others, and it will soon be known, I hope. A fig for the schah, and the terrors of the governor."

But her friend was faithful to her word, and poor Fatima was sorely disappointed. A grand festival was now at hand, and she determined, at all risks, to exhibit her pearl to the eyes of all but the schah, who would thus, in all probability, remain ignorant of the deception practised by Haschbasch. On that unlucky day the governor was somewhat indisposed, and did not attend the ceremony, at which the schah himself officiated. Fatima, thus freed from the controlling eye of her husband, dressed herself in all the splendors of eastern vanity, and placed the beautiful pearl in the centre of a turban, glittering with gold and precious stones.

Great was the envy and admiration excited by the beautiful pearl, and millions of questions were asked of Fatima concerning its origin and history; but she kept the secret, and her imprudence might possibly have passed without any serious consequences, had not the whispers of admiration reached the ears of the schah, who demanded to see the wonderful bauble. Fatima advanced, trembling like an aspen leaf, and the schah turned pale with rage at its sight. He snatched it from her turban, and compared it with his own. It was equally large and equally beautiful, and the passion of the schah persuaded him it was actually superior in both.

"Slave!" cried, he most ungallantly, "slave, whence came this pearl?"

"My husband gave it me," answered she, sinking at his feet.

"And where is the slave, the traitor? why is he not here?"

"He is gone to fulfill a vow at the mosque, without the city, for the recovery of his health," said the poor wife, resolved to make one effort for the safety of the governor.

"Follow, and drag him hither alive, to answer for deceiving the vicerent of Allah," exclaimed the schah, as he thought on the loss of his triumph over the Giaour of Russia. He clutched the unlucky pearl of Fatima in his grasp, resolved it should never fall into the hands of mortal man or woman again.

The unhappy Fatima was permitted to go home, which she did as fast as possible. In agitated haste she met her husband, bidding him fly for his life without further explanation, for not a moment was to be lost. Disguising themselves they mounted a pair of swift horses, and taking an opposite direction from the mosque, whither the guards of the sultan had gone in search of Haschbasch, fled towards Ormuz like chaff before the wind. Fatima, in the midst of her troubles, did not forget to secure the gold box and the beautiful pearls.

Favored by their disguise and a series of lucky accidents, they arrived in safety at the gulf of Ormuz, among the old friends and associates of the diver.

"Welcome, Haschbasch," exclaimed they.

"And welcome poverty," cried Haschbasch, as he entered his native cottage, now somewhat out of repair; "I will be a diver for pearls again."

"A diver for fiddlesticks!" cried Fatima. "Look here!" and she produced the golden box, containing the pearls as big as pigeon's eggs.

"Accursed baubles!" cried he, snatching it out of her hand, and fleeing towards the shores of the gulf so swiftly that Fatima, who was a Mahometan beauty, and somewhat lusty, could not follow. He arrived at the spot where he had seen the Genius, and opening the box, one by one threw the pearls against the same rock where he had broken the oyster, so violently, that they were all dashed to pieces.

He had no sooner finished the last than the same smoke he had formerly seen rose in the same spot, and as it slowly dissipated he again recognized the little fat Genius of Oysters, as jolly and round as ever; for, be it remembered, it was now the month of October, and his old enemy the necromantic alderman could not prevent his eating his fill according to law.

"You see I am better lodged than I was the last time we met; but what is the matter, and what brings you here?" said the Genius.

Haschbasch told the whole story, and concluded by reproaching the Genius for sending him to Ispahan with such a fatal gift.

"I have scarcely tasted a moment's happiness," said he, "since I possessed these accursed pearls."

"I can only give the means of happiness," answered the Genius, "not happiness itself; that depends upon yourself. Go and be a diver again, and if thou art content with thy lot, thou mayest be happy." So saying he disappeared for ever in the blue waters, and Haschbasch returned home.

Fatima scolded him for destroying the pearls, but she was a good-natured soul, and soon forgave, and loved him better than when he was a governor and a prince. His old sweetheart claimed the promise of Haschbasch on his return. He took her to himself as a second helpmate, and Fatima and little Flim-flam lived together in perfect harmony. What a peace-making religion is that of Mahomet!

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

CAPTAIN THOMPSON, OR STAGE-COACH COMPANIONS.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

I WAS unfortunate enough, one bright July morning in my senior year, to receive an expressive note from my tutor, which rendered a journey of some hundred and fifty miles quite necessary. I was in the coach in less than an hour, with a travelling cap pulled over a very long face, partly to avoid recognition by my classmates, as we whirled by the colleges, and partly with an indefinite feeling that a pretty woman, who sat in the opposite corner of the coach, would observe a tear that was coquetting very capriciously with my eyelids. The rumbling echo of the wheels from the broad front of East Rock, roused me from a very bitter fit of reflection, and recollecting that there were now two miles between me and certain official gentlemen, I raised my cap, and took a long breath and a look out of the window. The lady on the back seat had a child on her lap. We three were the only passengers.

It is surprising how "it's all in your eye," whether beautiful objects seem beautiful in this world. I do not think there is a sweeter gem of scenery in New-England than the spot upon which my eye fell at that moment—the little hamlet of Whitneyville at the foot of East Rock. I had rambled all over its wild neighborhood, and threaded for hundreds of truant days its deep passes—I knew, and loved as a romantic collegier will love, every striking tree and sheltered moss-knoll from its base to its summit—I had stood on the romantic bridge many a moonlight hour thinking of you, dear—(ehem!) and star-gazing in the black mirror of the tarn below—and now, as I hope to be recalled, I thought it the most exquisitely dismal spot I ever looked upon—the trees ugly and distorted, the "fine old trap-rock" (the professor's epithets were as good as an apotheosis to it) desolate and naked, and the pretty buildings below (the only factory that ever adorned a stream) absolutely insulting with their peaceful picturesqueness.

"What a desolate place!" said I, in a soliloquizing tone, as the coach rolled out from the covered bridge, (a new one, by the way, that was not half as pretty as the old one,) and toiled slowly up the steep hill beyond.

"Sir!" said the lady. She did not know how a sudden start for home in the middle of the term, affects the moral sensorium. I should have called Dian a hag.

"I mean, madam—I beg pardon;" and then I went into a long rhodomontade to explain away my apparent want of taste, and the lady told me her son's name was John, and that he was named after his father, who was Captain Thompson, of the brig Dolly, that had just arrived at Boston after a three years' voyage, &c. &c. &c. ending in a request that I would assist her with my knowledge of localities when we arrived at the end of our journey.

In ten miles I was on very sociable terms with Mrs. Thompson. In ten more, by dint of gingerbread and good humor, Master John was persuaded into my lap, and in ten more—but travellers have a reputation for a long bow, and I shall not be believed. The day was divine, and the season was June; and if it had not been for an occasional sight of the mail-bag under my feet, which I presumed contained a simple explanation of my journey, I could have contrived to forget the imminent peril in which I stood of losing my graduate's sheepskin and my father's blessing. The coach, however, rolled on, and would have rolled on just as it did, probably, if I had been ten times as miserable, (I know nothing more provoking than the indifference of such vehicles to one's feelings,) and by and by, what with now and then a very sweet smile from Mrs. Thompson, and a disastrous discomfiture of my sham shirt-bosom by Master John, I think I may flatter myself that I was tolerably resigned to circumstances.

Have I described Mrs. Thompson? She was not as delicate as Seadrift, nor as bluff as Moll Marlinspike. Her cheeks were red, and her lips to match, and she had "two eyes with lids to them," according to the inventory in the play—but when the lids were up the eyes were blue—and very soft, and gentle, and dangerous eyes they were—and if it had not been for a very thin, spirited nostril, and an expression like a cocked pistol about her pretty chin, I should have thought she was made for a Niobe. Her name was Julia (I asked her as it grew twilight, the second day) and that name always sounded to me, (as L. E. L. would say, calling for her cœur de Mouselline) like a gushing tear! If she was not sentimental, there is no truth in symptoms. At any rate I was tender to her upon suspicion. The chain of circumstantial evidence would have borne me out, I think.

Travelling after twilight, I have always remarked, makes one very affectionate. The forty miles between Worcester and Boston on the mail route (they used to pass it before the "reform" between sunset and midnight) should be sacred to sentiment. If there were "tongues in trees," or if the crooked fences could tell straight stories, a pedestrian tour over that part of the highway would be highly interesting. I can answer for its effect upon myself and Mrs. Thompson.

We were aroused from a deep metaphysical discussion of elective sympathies, by the rattling of the wheels on the pavement; and at the same moment the city clocks struck twelve. The streets were all deserted, and the lamp-posts and watchmen performed their duties in dismal silence. Captain Thompson (so said Mrs. T.) was at the Marlborough hotel; and singularly forgetful as his lady had seemed to be of his existence for the previous six hours, she grew very amiably anxious about him as the coach rattled on to Washington-street. A crack of the whip brought us up to the door after a turn or two, and the half-dressed bar-keeper peered out with his flaring candle, and gave us the gratuitous information that the house was full.

"Is Captain Thompson here?" said my companion in an eager voice from the coach window.

The sleepy mixer of liquors wet his thumb and finger, and snuffed two huge coffins from the wick of the candle, then sheltering it with his hand, he walked towards the lady with his head protruded inquisitively, and looked at her a minute in perfect silence.

"Is Captain Thompson here?" thundered I, enforcing the question with a smart slap on the shoulder, for I thought he was not fully awake.

"Be sure!" said the bar-keeper. But still he stood holding the candle to the lady's face, not at all disturbed either by the emphasis of my question or the pathos of Master John, who was crying lustily to get out. The driver by this time had got off the big trunk, and the little trunk, and the bandbox, and the bag, and the two baskets, and stood beside the heap, very impatient of the delay.

"What the d—l do you mean?" said I, getting into a passion. "If Captain Thompson is here, take your candle away from the lady's face, and go up and tell him his wife and child have arrived."

"Wife and child!" echoed the fellow, backing slowly into the house, with an incredulous grin crawling slowly over his dull face—"wife and child!" And he coolly drew his slipshod feet over the threshold, and bolted the door. The driver looked at me, and I looked at Mrs. Thompson.

"You are sure!"—I saw a tear in her eye, and left the sentence unfinished. I could not doubt it.

"The bar-keeper must be drunk," said the driver, opportunely; and believing in my soul that the driver was right, I thumped away once more at the door. In a few minutes the master of the house answered the summons from a chamber window.

"Is Captain Thompson here?" said I.

"Yes sir."

"Will you be kind enough to tell him his wife and child are at the door?"

"Wife and child!" said Boniface, repeating my words very slowly; "I have always understood that Captain Thompson was a bachelor."

Mrs. Thompson leaned back in the coach, and sobbed audibly.

"It is of no consequence what you have always understood, sir—will you convey that message to Captain Thompson, or not?"

He withdrew his head, and came down presently to the door.

"I have no objection to showing you Captain Thompson's room, sir," said he, "and you may carry your own message; but I assure you he'll be very likely to pitch you over the banisters for your intelligence."

I took the candle and mounted after him three flights of stairs. He stopped at the landing, and pointing to a door at the extremity of the entry, renewed his caution. I proceeded, however, and rapped boldly on the pannel. A gruff "come in!" was the immediate answer; and opening the door, I walked up to the bed, and touched my hat as courteously as I knew how.

"Have I the honor of addressing Captain Thompson?"

As I asked the question, I raised the candle, and got a fair look at the premises. On a bachelor's bed, narrow and well tucked up, lay a man of the heaviest frame, whiskered to the eyes, and with a fist, as it lay doubled on the coverlid, like the end of the club of Hercules. A fiery lock of hair, redder than his face, (I feel as if I was using an hyperbole) straggled out from a black silk handkerchief twisted tightly round his head, and his nose, and mouth, and chin, masses of solid purple, might have been, for delicacy of outline, hewn with a broad axe from a mahogany log. He looked at me just about as long as I have been writing this description before he answered my question.

"What do you want?" he bolted, at last, as if the words were forced out of his mouth with a catapult.

"I am sorry to disturb you, sir, but—but—I took a backward position as I approached the crisis of my sentence, and stood prepared to run) Mrs. Thompson and little John are at the door—and and—"

A loud laugh from the landlord in the entry cut off the sequel of my explanation, and completed my dismay. I looked at the captain's fist, and stole a glance over my shoulder to see if the door was open, and then the thought of Mrs. Thompson in tears shamed my courage back again, and I recovered my first position. The captain raised himself slowly upon his elbow, and lowering his shaggy eyebrows till they met his whiskers, fixed his eyes upon me and prepared to speak. If he had levelled two pistols at me I should have been less frightened.

"I'll tell you what, Mr. Milk-and-water," said he, in a voice as deliberate and decided as the fall of a sledge hammer, (I was a slender student in those days, and paler than usual, of course,) "I'll tell you what—if you are not out of this room in two minutes with your 'Mrs. Thompson and little John,' I'll slam you through that window—if I don't, — me!"

The threat was definite. I doubted neither his inclination nor his power to keep it. My heart was grieved for Mrs. Thompson; but if I was thrown down to her from a fourth-story window, I reflected that I should probably be in no situation to express my sympathy. It was philosophy to retreat. I bade the captain good night in my gentlest tone; and as I turned away with some alacrity, he grasped a glass of brandy and water that stood on the lightstand, and muttered "Mrs. Thompson and little John" between his teeth, drank it at a gulp. As I passed through the door, the tumbler whizzed past my head like a shot, and shivered to atoms on the entry wall.

I found "Mrs. Thompson and little John" in a very moving state of unhappiness. They were decidedly on my hands—that was clear. If it had been at any other hour, I would have taken them home till the mystery could be cleared up; but to arrive from college unexpectedly at midnight with a woman and a child—I thought it highly improbable that my motives would be appreciated.

"I say, sir," said the driver, as I stood pondering the case, "hadn't you better take her to the stage-house and leave the matter till morning?"

It was sensible advice, and I got in and comforted Mrs. Thompson as we drove to Hanover-street.

The first person that appeared on the step of the tavern door was another Captain Thompson, a stout, handsome fellow, who took "Mrs. Thompson and little John" into his arms at one clasp, and kissed them, as one might be supposed to do after a three years' voyage.

I heard, in the course of a day or two, that a rough old sea-captain at the Marlborough, who had been there, off and on, for thirty years, and had always sworn himself a bachelor, had been awakened at midnight by the arrival of a wife and child whom he had deserted in some foreign port, and had gone to sea very suddenly. The last part of the communication was a great relief to my mind.

CONVERSATION.

BY THE SAME.

"Some have certain common places wherein they are good, but want variety; which kind of poverty is for the most part tedious, and, when once perceived, ridiculous. The honorablest part of talk is to give the occasion; and again to moderate and pass to somewhat else, for then a man ends the dance."—Dacon.

Coming across this passage in my reading the other day, I fell to musing upon conversation; and having turned over in my mind the most entertaining characters I had known, I philosophized upon the entertainment I found in their society. It was an amusing analysis, and, I fear, has disturbed a very blessed ignorance; for, in this good-natured world, the semblances of sense and spirit pass with very little question, and many a one is reckoned a pleasant fellow, whose wit lies rather in the merry humor of his friends than in his own facetiousness.

There are many kinds of conversational talent. One man tells a good story, another is skilful at an argument, another has a brilliant vein of persiflage; and another, as Sir Fopling says, "has an agreeable voice for a chamber;" and these require as different powers and cultivation as poetry, music, and painting, and are possessed together as rarely. A talent for amusing a circle, either by narration or wit, is not desirable, however its possessor may be admired. If vanity would suffer it to be confined to the narrow circle of friendship, or if fashion created a Utopia, it would have its true value; but in the present unequal state of society, it is the part of gentlemanliness to be amused, and he who is on the invited list for his entertaining qualities, might, for the dignity of his situation, as well have been a player. The case is altered of course where age or superior rank entitles a guest to exclusive attention. The lead which a distinguished individual is always expected to take in society, obliges him rather to discourse than converse; and here, as in most other comparative situations, the name is half the battle.

An ordinary remark comes inflated from lips that are supposed oracular, and with a moderate degree of general information and a little tact of manner, the man on whom honor is thrust because fortune is blind, often astonishes the world with his wisdom. It takes real wit, and a great deal of it, and manner and tact, and knowledge, and a great deal of all of them, to draw upon a young, undistinguished man a reputation for this vein of talent. The good humor of wit, at least, requires such a genial atmosphere to burn brilliantly, that the doubt and suspicion with which it is received when not expected, chill it of half its lustre; so that, what with the difficulty of winning, and its questionable value when won, a reputation as an amusing person would seem somewhat an impolitic ambition. In familiar circles, however, there are a few things more delightful and desirable than entertaining talent. Humor is its main requisite, but it combines a thousand others. Quick observation, knowledge of the world, graphic imagination, confidence, good nature, and that indefinable quality, tact—all that makes an accomplished, and, what is of more excellence, a kind man, go to its composition. With such requisites, what is the wonder if the talent is rare, or that it is idolized like a cynosure when found? Rosalie's model of an agreeable man, (of what has Shakespeare not given us a model?) is one of the best I remember.

"A merrier man,
Within the limit of becoming mirth,
I never spent an hour's talk withal:
His eye begets occasion for his wit;
For every object that the one doth catch,
The other turns to a mirth-moving jest:
Which his fair tongue, (conceit's expositor,)
Delivers in such apt and gracious words,
That aged ears play truant at his tales,
And younger hearings are quite ravished,
So sweet and voluble is his discourse."

The bagatelle conversation of polished society is to a certain degree a necessary accomplishment. It is the current, and, with an indifferent acquaintance, the only proper language, and therefore it must, at some time or other, be practised by every one who mingles with the world. Yet I know of nothing which, in its excellence at least, is so uncommon. Anybody can trifle, to mask spirit and wit and information under the semblance of folly—to be the "soul of whim, and the spirit of variety," and yet, by the skill and brilliancy with which the changes are run through, to make folly seem fairer than wisdom, is a task for genius. It requires a deep undercurrent of information and accomplishment, a graceful and alert fancy, and a degree of self-possession and boldness approaching to impudence. In the mixed character which is found in the skirts of all society in this country, a knowledge of circumstances, and a keen insight into human nature, are also necessary, for in the exaggeration and satire which mingle so largely in spirited bagatelle, there is much at which nursery innocence and grown-up unsophistication stare and take offence; but with a well-bred companion, as society goes, the abandon of this kind of conversation, satirical and extravagant and even grotesque, as it sometimes is, is always safe, always amusing.

On a first introduction, conversation is of course very limited. Respectfulness, as deep as can be expressed by manner and language, and a studious confinement to third person topics, are points of universal policy. Nothing so wins upon favor as respect, and no familiarity is more offensive than egotism or personality in a new acquaintance. At the same time, this, like every other rule, is a la discretion, and, with a spirited woman or a very talented one, a well executed coup de manege at first sight is often brilliantly successful. It is hazardous, however, and would not be tolerated except in a very authentic person, and by a tolerably vain woman—for the apology lies in her supposed superiority to common etiquette or the pardonable forgetfulness of admiration.

In the ordinary tete-a-tete intercourse of society the outline alone is defined by etiquette. Its rules are easily learned, but, beyond these, every man is his own text-book. With the great mass of people, indeed, of both sexes, as long as the forms of propriety are observed, it makes little difference what conversation is, and hence the fact that there is a manual of current nonsense in society used by general understanding between those who are indifferent to each other. Everybody knows and practices it, and its safe course of topics, (the weather, the lights, the music, dress, cnnui, and oysters) is of infinite convenience, when, from circumstances, or the character of your companion, there is no object in pleasing. But with the rare spirits of society, the intellectual elite, the witty, and lovely, (for if beauty has not bewitched us out of judgment, wit and loveliness do come often together,) with these, conversation, compared with the hum-drum intercourse to which we have alluded, is as the lark's flight to the owl's—Ariel's spiriting to the dull gambols of Caliban. It is the excellence of intercourse with the gifted, that the higher the sphere of conversation, the more liberal its freedom. It is the only society in which the fetters of etiquette may be loosely worn. Yet even here, such is the jealousy of human nature, it is not politic to be forgetful. It is a pretty dream to believe wit and beauty what they seem; to abandon all to impulse without a fear of offence or a guard against suspicion and envy. But grievous as it is to believe, there is no safety in frankness—no security against offending your friend by the exposure of any quality which brings you into competition with himself. A safe rule is it to take it for granted that no allusion to yourself can have any possible interest. Sweet as egotism is, it is the food of mistrust and jealousy, and it is only in the most confiding intimacy that its unction may be laid freely to the soul. If the world does you injustice, the woman you love may listen patiently to your defence, or if she has mistaken a trait in your character, the evidence it gives of your affection may excuse an earnest justification. There are critical moments in acquaintance, too, when to talk guardedly of ourselves has a politic show of confidence; but leave out these, and there is neither time nor circumstance in all the wide ranges of society, when the c'est moi is not as vile a phrase to the listener as "the beautified Ophelia" to the ears of old Polonius.

What a perfectly natural thought was Sir Philip Sidney's Arca-dia! Who can breathe the artificial atmosphere of polished society without a sensation of closeness and restraint—an irrepressible desire to escape into some region where the eye is never repelled nor the tongue fettered. We can conceive of the refreshment it gave to the "Mirror of Chivalry" to retreat from the stiff formality and hollow ceremony of the court, to revel in the fairy land of his own sweet creation. It is an affected philosophy which haunts in hermitages and professes a contempt for the world; but it is a dull heart, still, which amid its folly and heartlessness, has no yearning for solitude. The maxims we have embodied above are the received policy of life, and where is the uninitiated mind that, with all their practical necessity, does not shrink from their constraint and affectation? The curse of luxury is, that simplicity and truth walk with the lowly, and there can be no nature in the bosom that does not miss, sometimes, these handmaids to happiness. There are hours, it is true, when the most extravagant mirth is not beyond our enjoyment, but who has not felt its re-action in the very midst, and wished, that, with a fairy suddenness his guests might disappear, leaving him, like the Roman host after supper, to the silent company of the

SKETCHES OF EMINENT AMERICANS.

MR. WEBSTER.

MR. WEBSTER'S appearance is very striking. He is a man of large frame, a little inclined of late years to corpulency, and about the middle height; though, from his deliberate movements, and the peculiarly elevated position of his head, he appears much taller. His features are large and powerfully cast. His forehead is of great amplitude, and pressed down heavily over the eye; and the eye itself, deeply set and dark, is thrown into strong shadow by the prominence and lowering blackness of his eyebrows. The lower part of his face is massive, and expressive mainly of energy, but capable of a protean facility of play, which anticipates articulation as if the shadow of his thought came through. Without being thin, his features have a sculptured clearness of muscle; and the lines of intellectual labor are so deeply and strikingly drawn, as to leave no room for the epicurism indicated by the fulness of his person. His face, altogether, is a remarkable one. When we know what he is, and see him in the exercise of his honorable and professional duties, we feel that it embodies our finest conceptions of greatness; but had we met him first in a solitary place, and caught a glimpse of his dark countenance by a flash of lightning, we should doubt, we are inclined to believe, whether we had seen a demi-god or a devil.

Mr. Webster is a natural orator. He would have been as eloquent as he is if Greece had left no model. The first object of the rhetorician, to fix attention, is anticipated when he rises, and he holds his audience at will by the same spell—the natural impressiveness of power. His most ordinary sentences fall from him with a cast of strength. He commences with a deliberate simplicity, expressing himself in language of fine nerve and clearness, and having about him that confident and calm self-possession which a conviction of right is alone supposed to inspire. The exordium in his more dignified speeches is a model of Theophrastus' elegance—flowing and full without ornament. His voice during its delivery, and in the early part of all his efforts, is very impressive. It is an instrument of all compass, and when not impassioned, there is a depth and fulness in its tones, which give to its most familiar cadences a truth-like and imposing earnestness. Of his gestures he is as sparing as of his figures. He stands firm and erect, and disposes of his hands with the quiet carelessness of ordinary conversation, often with very little regard to rhetorical proprieties. His whole appearance at such a moment, is less that of an orator than of a man absorbed in the declaration of an honest opinion, and careless of every thing but to impress what he believes to be the truth upon his hearers.

As the interest of his theme deepens, all his faculties expand or take a new character. His large black eye dilates and kindles, something like color plays beneath his clear dark skin, his voice ranges through all its powerful notes, sometimes, indeed, rising too high for melody; and his gestures, frequent and sometimes violent, are accompanied with a forward fling of his body, which is more emphatic than graceful. His language gradually assumes a more graphic character, but loses none of its nerve and clearness, and has even when most figurative, rather the solidity of sculpture than the grace of flowers. Whatever the strain of his thought, (and the mocking-bird is not more various in his music than he in the changes of eloquence,) his features and action body it forth with the utmost fulness and meaning. His recrimination, his retort, his scorn, are hurled upon their object with a deadly skill and unsparingness almost fiendish; and his courtesy, where the occasion is of sufficient importance, (as in the late splendid contest with Mr. Wirt,) has a bland and fascinating witchery, which has been found irresistible even by his enemies. It would be difficult to say, in the words of an old writer, "whether his smile is more angelical, or his sneer more diabolical."

Mr. Webster, to reverse Coleridge's remark upon Southey, does not so much possess, as he is possessed by his genius. He is an ambitious man, doubtless—because ambition is inseparable from greatness. The stamp of his genius, however, and its high-minded workings, are visible in all that he does.

PENCILINGS BY THE WAY.

NEW-YORK CITY.—"It is not by money, or money's worth, that man lives and has his being. Is not God's universe within our head, whether a fool's skull-cap or a king's diadem be without?" So says German Richter, who, it is clear, never lived in the city of my present writing.

The one broad and long picture stamped upon the face of every street, creature, and countenance in this large city is—gain! Nature designed New-York for the greatest commercial emporium in the world, and it fulfills its destinies. Its situation is one of those wonderful accidents, if such it may be called without profanity, which startle and delight the observer of natural wonders. It is a nucleus of access. It seems to me, whenever I approach it by any of its avenues, that the original discoverer must have held his breath while he contemplated it as the site of a future city. There is the sound, sweeping up to it with its majestic channel, from the sea, and giving a protected passage for its shore navigation to the east—the ocean itself swelling in from another quarter to the very feet of its "merchant princes"—the Hudson opening two hundred miles into the heart of the most magnificent and productive state in the Union, threading valleys of such beauty as the world flocks to see, and washing the bases of noble mountains, and the feet of other cities, populous and prosperous—and, to the south, channels for its smaller navigation running parallel with the sea, and yet protected from its violence—and the city itself, rising by a gentle ascent from the bay on one side, and sinking as gently to the river on the other, leading off its refuse waters by natural drains, and washing its streets with every shower—what could the hand of nature have done more? Add to this the enterprise of the people which has so seconded nature—beginning their canals where she stopped her rivers, and opening waters three hundred miles to her inland seas—and you have a picture of facility and prosperity, which, for the brief period it has existed, is unequalled in the history of the world.

All this, of course, gives a character to the society, and every man feels its influence, whatever be his pursuits. There are here none of the professed idlers, such as you may find in Boston or Philadelphia. The gentleman, according to the dictionary, "one who has no visible employment for his support," is an uncommon, if not an unpopular character. The beaux have each a "vocation." The same wit that bewilders the belles at night, is exercised with hammer in hand at the morning auction. You will find the unexceptionable exquisite who shaved your wheel on Monday afternoon with his superb four-in-hand, ready to shave your note with equal adroitness at his broker's box in Wall-street, at Tuesday noon. The man who gives you a dinner that would satisfy an emperor to-day, is the model of "cent-per-cent" to-morrow—a slave to slate and pencil from daylight till three, and the prince of gay hospitalities from that hour till morning. And all these incongruities harmonize perfectly. They are gentlemen of the first water, with one exception—they have no ennui. Business takes its place. Their pleasures are, of course, more delightful from the relief, and I think, on the whole, it makes a very pretty philosophy for happiness. I am willing, at any rate, that in our republican country the necessity of our nature for occupation should be consistent, as it is here, with the most fastidious claim to the title of "gentleman."

My mind is hardly made up about the New-York society. I hear it every where said that it is superficial and showy—that the ladies are accomplished, but not educated, and the young men more tractable to tailors than tutors. I have heard that the mothers were bad housekeepers, and sickly from constant dissipation, and that the daughters were no more notable, and almost as dyspeptic. It is my misfortune that I have not as yet fallen in with the part of society answering to this description. My female acquaintances, so far, are as intelligent as the women of other cities, and in all the visible departments of house-keeping I can detect no particular neglect. I am inclined to think I have fallen upon an unfashionable vein of society. On running over my visiting list, it strikes me that I number an unusual proportion of what are called "solid" and "sensible" people; and when to this are added the grace and manner which are conceded to belong to them all, the case is made out that by so much at least they are superior to their plainer sisters of the east. The Boston ladies, with some few brilliant exceptions, want "style"—that indescribable air of good-breeding which would show their station in life through all disguises. It is not essential to salvation, I know, and may therefore be called by many a style; but it is desirable, and where it can be attained, as it unquestionably is in New-York and Philadelphia, without a sacrifice of more weighty excellences, it is certainly just as well to give it a little attention. This is an ungracious thing to say, but the women of the east have a reputation which will bear an offset, and as it may open the eyes of the rising circles to see a very common opinion expressed in print, why, let it pass! I care not how soon it becomes an injustice.

I was agreeably disappointed in one thing—the literary society. New-York has no reputation for this. And it is partly because business is so much more salient a point in its main impression, and partly because the literary men are not organized as in other cities, into a particular circle. There are fine scholars here, however, and very fine private libraries. I have been in more than one merchant's study, and found all my choice old friends, and many that I had supposed scarcely heard of, upon their shelves; and I have stumbled every day upon some self-cultivated and unsuspected scholar, with whom a book was a topic to be mentioned in a suppressed tone, but still a topic well understood and well talked upon. There seems a tacit feeling that such subjects are a kind of offence against the prevailing customs of conversation—a sort of intellectual treason. And, like all half-subdued opinions, perhaps they are cultivated with proportionately greater zeal in secret. To my taste these unprofessed scholars, too, are infinitely more agreeable. There is an ambition of the lucus a non lucendo about all men—a desire to shine in that for which they are not famous—which drives a notoriously literary man away from the only ground on which he would show to advantage. I like to see every man ride his real bona fide hobby. An author, if you let him have his own way, will talk of any thing but books; whereas the subject he avoids is the very one on which you are anxious to engage him. If he had no reputation, (I have frequently thought in such cases) how delightful he would be. And there you have the reason why I record here that I have found more real, authentic, literary conversation among the merchants of New-York than I ever encounter in the widely celebrated literary circles of Philadelphia and Boston.

THE STAGE.

"The stage that threads each labyrinth of the soul,
Wakes laughter's peal, and bids the tear-drop roll;
That hoots at folly, mocks proud fashion's slaves,
And brands with shame the world's vile drove of knaves."

Much has been said and written respecting the drama. By some it is represented as a dangerous engine in the hands of the unprincipled, used only to inflame and multiply the passions, and to excite in youth that inordinate love of pleasure which it is the great duty of religion to subdue. We acknowledge, with regret, that the stage is often disgraced by impurities, and that scenes from which, in the comparatively holier atmosphere of the domestic circle, a person of the most ordinary delicacy must shrink, receive in the theatre the smiles of beauty and the sanction of wisdom. In every society, however enlightened, there will be a class whose tastes are coarse and vulgar; whose limited capacities exclude them from refined and intellectual enjoyments; who delight to ridicule and deface feelings and sensibility; and who relish, as a triumph of their own party over the aristocracy of modesty and virtue, every broad display of degraded wit and obscene genius. To solicit the acclamation of groundlings like these, talent often stoops, and the "many-headed monster of the pit" too frequently swallows down, with indiscriminate voracity, the morsel of voluptuousness, sweetened with music and poetry, and the undisguised disgusting dash of ribaldry, from which good taste and common delicacy recoil. We all sometimes attend theatrical representations in the company of females. I am no friend to the affected and squeamish morality which would put a man of sense and experience out of countenance at any thing which he may see or hear any where; but, in my imagination, the character of woman stands so pure and high, and the attributes which make her superior and fascinating are so perpetually present to my mind, that when any one avails himself of his mere brute strength to trample down her young tastes, to taint her thoughts, to introduce low and vile images among the gentle visions which play in her fancy, I deem him a traitor to nature, a kind of moral murderer. We have assigned the severest of penalties to him who destroys God's image, as embodied in the outward form of man. But it is a more hideous crime to kill those precious spiritual attributes which dignify and elevate human nature, to give an unnecessary shock to modesty, to inflict a wanton pang upon virtue. Yet in the theatre, where the best will sometimes be attracted with the wife, the sister, or the daughter, it is often the case that a gross double entendre, from which the bashful girl has no escape, is given with all the weight of a hacknied player, who delights to be the instrument of exciting even the miserable acclamations with which the low and the base, from every part of the house, recognize their kindred wit. This is an abuse which all must acknowledge; and it is probably the best objection which the enemies to theatrical entertainments have against them; but this will, we trust, be remedied. In tracing the progress of the stage during the several preceding ages, we find that in the reign of Elizabeth the most obscene allusions and voluptuous scenes were freely represented, and that the virgin queen herself patronized with her presence exhibitions which would now strike the most ordinary occupant of the gallery with surprise, if not with indignation. It is evident, therefore, that the natural course of civilization is effecting a reform in this particular; and that, in conformity to the improving spirit of the times, while the relics of gothic ages are gradually falling away from our customs, opinions, institutions, and laws, the good taste of the community will enlist the fascinations of the drama more exclusively in the cause of modesty and truth.

We have also heard it urged against this species of amusement, that it attracts the young and the giddy from the duties of business and sober reflection; that, contrasted with its brilliant pictures, the maxims and practical facts of real life appear dim and tedious, and that multitudes resort there to engage in extravagant expense and profligate pleasure. To this we answer, that human beings will ever seek relaxation during their hours of leisure. If there had never been a theatre they who squander time and money within its walls would have probably directed their wandering inclinations into some more dangerous channel. Only persons naturally mean will extract evil out of that which is the source of good to others. In the bosom of such the germs of vice will lurk, whatever be the circumstances by which they are surrounded. History presents many instances of gloomy victims of false morality, who deem they propitiate the favor of heaven by smothering all the pleasant impulses with which it has enriched their bosoms. It is certain to us, that however these may clothe themselves in saintly robes, and distort their feelings and affections into the deformity of monkish superstition; whatever may be their affectation of superior morality, their humble and artificial garb of humanity covers a heart where exist thoughts and passions common to humanity, which still take root and flourish with a luxuriance ranker and darker, because smothered and concealed. We are not advocating licentiousness nor ridiculing an attempt of virtue to act with temperance and honor. But we are no bigot; we are no believer in the efficacy of outward forms and garments; we place no value on the purity which arises from the seclusion of a hermit in his cell. The virtue which we admire is an active principle. It meets the vicissitudes of the world, and overcomes them; and in regard to youth, although we are aware of the necessity of application, and that strong excitements are pernicious to the character, as they are unfavorable to the tranquil duties of the student, yet we would not frown upon rational enjoyment, as inconsistent with strength of mind and purity of heart. Application should not be too strict. The fine glowing fancies of youth should not always be fettered down. If the mind is forever kept in chains what is the wonder that it should be puny and timid; that it should bend tamely to slavish prejudices and absurd doctrines; that it should be destitute of the vigor, the confidence, the freedom, and the courage which distinguish others of more independent habits. We may often see where the man has been injured by an over-wrought anxiety to make a scholar, as the child of the proud and wealthy is often caressed into effeminacy and disease, while the neglected orphan, thrust out early upon an ungentle world, gathers strength and hardy resolution from its storms and its reverses.

As for me, I confess I have found the theatre a fairy land. In my earlier boyhood it teemed with rapturous associations; and even now, when I enter the gorgeous temple I put off the mantle of daily cares; I break loose from the bondage of narrow and wearying adventures; and, like some bird uncaged, I trim the plumage of my spirit for a long and a soaring flight. I remember when the dazzling scene first burst upon my sight. It was a glorious unearthly vision. I had no leisure to reason. I was all feeling, expectation, wonder, rapture. Even when more accustomed to it, its interest was shared by the lowest supernumerary. Nexsen, Banker, Oliff, the box-keeper, the lamp-lighter, all were elevated to an imaginary importance; all moved in the glowing light which the institution to which they were attached reflected, even as the morn gives a tinge of radiance to the obscure clouds which form only the drapery of her temple. I have looked after the ghost of Hamlet in the street, as if indeed he locked in his bosom

"The eternal blazonry which must not be
To ears of flesh and blood."

I once caught myself in actual astonishment at beholding the pale merchant of Venice and the ferocious Shylock, betraying a striking similarity of opinion respecting two glasses of whiskey punch, and I thought in the words of the poet of all poets:

"Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder?"

When, after an evening so strangely beguiled, the plot drew to a conclusion—when the tyrants were all slain, the lovers married, and the personages of the drama formed themselves into a grand group, which the envious green curtain snatched from my reluctant eyes, how my fancy would dwell upon its splendors! Its caverns, forests, cities, rivers, and mountains—its lovers, knights, armies, heroes, and kings came up again and again, and revolved in my imagination in a confusion so gorgeous and magnificent that I wondered how any human being, with a dollar in his pocket, could hesitate to spend it here. And then to peep behind the scenes in the daytime. To see the strange sun-light streaming down among its magic shadows. To stand in silent reverie where the midnight assassin, the lofty patriot, the dark witch, the bloody tyrant had been. To stalk over the lonely plains which had once trembled with the tread of armies, or echoed with the tones of faithful love. It was as if, after years of oblivion, my spirit should revisit the earth, and find its thrones empty, its kingdoms desolate, its temples cast aside, its skyey cliffs overturned, its foaming rivers, its thronging multitudes passed away, the useless objects of man's ambition crumbling together in neglected ruin, and all the complicated machinery of life and nature run down and broken to pieces.

But the rich mists of an uncorrected fancy have vanished, and with them a thousand thoughts as artless, hopes as brilliant, and affections as unrestrained. Experience has put aside the veil which softened the harsh features of life, and gave its delusions the air of reality. The mimic winds and harmless thunders of the stage no more whiten my cheek with silent awe. Its flashing treasures have been divested of their spells. But my admiration for the drama yet remains. I admire it for the generous sentiments which it breathes upon all subjects, for the models of high character it continually sets up before the people, for the intellectual pleasures it affords, for its displays of innocent mirth, of stately and commanding passion, of domestic affections. I admire it for its forcible delineations of all that is high, untrammelled, and beautiful in human nature. It is full of bold, free, noble opinions. It holds up the vicious to a scorn which may be easily and justly transferred to similar objects in real society—it counteracts the malignant encroachments of bigotry, slavery, and superstition—it opposes avarice, cowardice, and a tame submission to insult, and champions fearlessly the natural rights and dignity of man. Whatever may be the pernicious consequences ascribed to it, these are redeeming attributes, and I would no more abandon its benevolent and liberal influences upon society to escape its partial and accidental evils, than I would condemn the arrangement by which nature refreshes the fields with showers, because a passing cloud sometimes overshadows the air.

SEDLEY.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Ladies' Magazine and Literary Gazette. Edited by Mrs. Sarah Hale. Vol. IV. No. IX. for September. Boston: Marsh, Capen & Lyon. Three dollars per annum. 1831.

IT is surprising that this excellent periodical is not subscribed for by every lady. It is edited by one of their own sex, and in a spirited and able manner. Most of the contents are original, and well calculated to please and instruct the innocent and the refined. We are unacquainted with any magazine which we would so safely and cheerfully place in the hands of a well-bred female. It is entirely free from quackery, and, with undoubted actual merit, is most modest in its pretensions. There is a vein of intelligence, chasteness, taste, and good sense running through its pages, which should strongly recommend it to general attention. To prove the truth of our assertions in favor of the work, we copy the first article in this number.

"THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON."

"The character of woman becomes distinguished much oftener by the reflection of her great and good qualities, in the conduct of those men with whom she is particularly connected or associated, than by the exhibition of any extraordinary achievements in her own person. In the parental relations, particularly, the talents of the female are the transmitted inheritance of her sons; and this seems a wise dispensation of Providence, by which the endowments of the sexes are equalized, and both alike made to participate in the glories of their common nature. Certain it is, that far the greatest number of eminent men have owed their superiority and success to the genius, example, and care of their mothers. These reflections need not make women proud; but they should make mothers emulous to train their children to be useful and good; for by laying such a foundation of excellence in early life, the richest hopes for maturity may be rationally entertained.

"The mother of our illustrious Washington furnishes an example of female excellence, and its reward, which is unequalled; and yet the model has been hitherto little known. This neglect has not arisen from any indifference of the American people to the virtues of their patriots; but simply that at the time of the revolution, the public history of the events were paramount to any private relations; and the novel, rapid, and successful experiment of our national character has left little opportunity for domestic and individual history. But a different sentiment is beginning to prevail; the public mind is well nigh wearied with the monotony of Fourth-of-July orations; and it is time to turn from the great and brilliant theatre of action, and the well-known and glorious performers, to examine the movements behind the scenes, and the humble and unheeded, but effective assistants that then prepared the astonishing exhibition.

"For the succeeding sketch we are indebted to George W. P. Custis, Esq. (grandson of Mrs. Washington, the wife of General Washington) of Virginia.

"The mother of Washington was descended from the very respectable family of Ball, who settled as English colonists, on the banks of the Potomac. Bred in those domestic and independent habits which graced the Virginia matrons in the old days of Virginia, this lady, by the death of her husband, became involved in the cares of a young family, at a period when those cares seem more especially to claim the aid and control of the stronger sex. It was left for this eminent woman by a method the most rare—by an education and discipline the most peculiar and imposing, to form in the youth-time of her son, those great and essential qualities which gave lustre to the glories of his after life. If the school savored the more of the Spartan than the Persian character, it was a fitter school to form a hero, destined to be the ornament of the age in which he flourished, and a standard of excellence for ages yet to come.

"It was remarked by the ancients, that the mother always gave the tone to the character of the child; and we may be permitted to say, that since the days of old renown, a mother has not lived better fitted to give the tone and character of real greatness to her child, than she whose remarkable life and actions this reminiscence will endeavor to illustrate.

"At the time of his father's death George Washington was only twelve years of age. He has been heard to say, that he knew little of his father except the remembrance of his person, and of his parental fondness. To his mother's forming care he himself ascribed the origin of his fortunes and his fame.

"The home of Mrs. Washington, of which she was always mistress, was a pattern of order. There the levity and indulgence common to youth was tempered by a deference and well regulated restraint, which, while it neither suppressed nor condemned any rational enjoyment usual in the spring-time of life, prescribed those enjoyments within the bounds of moderation and propriety. Thus the chief was taught the duty of obedience which prepared him to command. Still the mother held in reserve an authority which never departed from her, not when her son had become the most illustrious of men. It seemed to say—'I am your mother—the being who gave you life—the guide who directed your steps when they needed a guardian; my maternal affection drew forth your love; my authority constrained your spirit; whatever may be your success or your renown, next to your God, your reverence is due to me.' Nor did the chief dissent from these truths; but to the last moments of his venerable parent, yielded to her will the most dutiful and implicit obedience, and felt for her person and character the highest respect, and the most enthusiastic attachment. The late Laurence Washington, Esq. of Chotank, one of the associates of the juvenile years of the chief, and remembered by him in his will, thus describes the home of the mother:

"I was often there with George, his playmate, schoolmate, and young man's companion. Of the mother I was ten times more afraid than I ever was of my own parents; she awed me in the midst of her kindness, for she was indeed truly kind. And even now, when time has whitened my locks, and I am the grand-parent of a second generation, I could not behold that majestic woman without feelings it is impossible to describe. Whoever has seen that awe-inspiring air and manner so characteristic in the father of his country, will remember the matron as she appeared when the presiding genius of her well-ordered household, commanding and being obeyed.

"Such were the domestic influences under which the mind of Washington was formed; and that he not only profited by, but fully appreciated their excellence and the character of his mother, his behavior towards her at all times testified. Upon his appointment to the command in chief of the American armies, previously to his joining the forces at Cambridge, he removed his mother from her country residence to the village of Fredericksburg, a situation remote from danger, and contiguous to her friends and relatives.

"It was there the matron remained during nearly the whole of the trying period of the revolution. Directly in the way of the news, as it passed from north to south; one courier would bring intelligence of success to our arms, another, 'swiftly coursing at his heels,' the saddening reverse of disaster and defeat. While thus ebb and flowed the fortunes of our cause, the mother, trusting to the wisdom and protection of Divine Providence, preserved the even tenor of her life, affording an example to those matrons whose sons were alike engaged in the arduous contest; and showing that unavailing anxieties, however belonging to nature, were unworthy of mothers whose sons were combating for the inestimable rights of man, and the freedom and happiness of the world.

"When the comforting and glorious intelligence arrived of the passage of the Delaware, (December, '76,) an event which restored our hopes from the very brink of despair, a number of her friends waited upon the mother, with congratulations. She received them with calmness; observed that it was most pleasurable news, and that George appeared to have deserved well of his country for such signal services. And continued, in reply to the gratulating patriots, (most of whom held letters in their hands, from which they read extracts,) 'But, my good sirs, here is too much flattery—he will not forget himself; though he is the subject of so much praise.'

"Here let me remark upon the absurdity of an idea which, from some strange cause or other, has been suggested, though certainly never believed, that the mother was disposed to favor the royal cause. Such a surmise has not the slightest foundation in truth. Like many others, whose days of enthusiasm were in the wane, the lady doubted the prospects of success in the beginning of the war; and long during its continuance feared that our means would be found inadequate to a successful contest with so formidable a power as Britain; and our soldiers, brave, but undisciplined, and ill provided, be unequal to cope with the veteran and well appointed troops of the king. Doubts like these were by no means confined to a female; but were both entertained and expressed by the staunchest of patriots, and most determined of men. But when the mother, who had been removed to the county of Frederick, on the invasion of Virginia, in 1681, was informed, by express, of the surrender of Cornwallis, she raised her hands to heaven, and exclaimed, 'Thank God, war will now be ended; and peace, independence, and happiness bless our country.'

"During the war, and indeed during her useful life, up to the advanced age of eighty-two, until within three years of her death, (when an afflictive disease prevented exertion,) the mother set a most valuable example, in the management of her domestic concerns, carrying her own keys, bustling in her household affairs, providing for her family, and living and moving in all the pride of independence. She was not actuated by that ambition for show which pervades lesser minds; and the peculiar plainness and dignity of her manners became in no wise altered, when the sun of glory arose upon her house. There are some of the aged inhabitants of Fredericksburg, who well remember the matron, as seated in an old-fashioned open chaise, she was in the habit of visiting, almost daily, her little farm in the vicinity of the town. When there she would ride about her fields, giving her orders, and seeing that they were obeyed.

"Her great industry, with the well-regulated economy of all her concerns, enabled the matron to dispense considerable charities to the poor, although her own circumstances were always far from rich. All manner of domestic economies, so useful in those times of privation and trouble, met her zealous attention; while every thing about her household bore marks of her care and management, and very many things the impress of her own hands. In a very humble dwelling, and suffering under an excruciating disease, (cancer of the breast,) thus lived this mother of the first of men, preserving unchanged, her peculiar nobleness and independence of character.

"She was continually visited and solaced by her children, and numerous grand-children, particularly her daughter, Mrs. Lewis. To the repeated and earnest solicitations of this lady, that she would remove to her house and pass the remainder of her days, to the pressing entreaties of her son, that she would make Mount Vernon the home of her age, the matron replied, 'I thank you for your affectionate and dutiful offers, but my wants are few in this world, and I feel perfectly competent to take care of myself.' Her son-in-law, Col. Fielding Lewis, proposed to relieve her of the direction of her affairs: she observed—'Do you, Fielding, keep my books in order, for your eye-sight is better than mine; but leave the executive management to me.'

"One weakness alone attached to this lofty-minded and intrepid woman; and that proceeded from a most affecting cause. She was afraid of lightning. In early life she had a female friend killed by her side, while sitting at table—the knife and fork in the hands of the unfortunate girl, were melted by the electric fluid. The matron never recovered from the fright and shock occasioned by this distressing accident. On the approach of a thunder cloud she would retire to her chamber, and not leave it again till the storm had passed away.

"She was always pious, but in her latter days her devotions were performed in private. She was in the habit of repairing every day to a secluded spot, formed by rocks and trees near her dwelling, where, abstracted from the world and worldly things, she communed with her Creator, in humiliation and prayer.

"After an absence of nearly seven years it was at length, on the return of the combined armies from Yorktown, permitted to the mother again to see and embrace her illustrious son. So soon as he had dismounted, in the midst of a numerous and brilliant suite, he sent to apprise her of his arrival, and to know when it would be her pleasure to receive him. And now mark the force of early education and habits, and the superiority of the Spartan over the Persian school, in this interview of the great Washington with his admirable parent and instructor. No pageantry of war proclaimed his coming, no trumpets sounded, no banners waved. Alone and on foot, the marshal of France, the general-in-chief of the combined armies of France and America, the deliverer of his country, the hero of the age, repaired to pay his humble duty to her whom he venerated as the author of his being, the founder of his fortune and his fame. For full well he knew that the matron would not be moved by all the pride that glory ever gave, nor by all the 'pomp and circumstance' of power.

"The lady was alone, her aged hands employed in the works of domestic industry, when the good news was announced, and it was further told that the victor chief was in waiting at the threshold. She welcomed him with a warm embrace, and by the well remembered and endearing name of his childhood; inquiring as to his health, she remarked the lines which mighty cares and many trials had made on his manly countenance, spoke much of old times and old friends, but of his glory—not one word!

"Meantime, in the village of Fredericksburg all was joy and revelry; the town was crowded with the officers of the French and American armies, and with gentlemen from all the country around, who hastened to welcome the conquerors of Cornwallis. The citizens made arrangements for a splendid ball, to which the mother of Washington was specially invited. She observed, that although her dancing days were pretty well over, she should feel happy in contributing to the general festivity, and consented to attend.

"The foreign officers were anxious to see the mother of their chief. They had heard indistinct rumors respecting her remarkable life and character, but forming their judgments from European examples, they were prepared to expect in the mother that glare and show which would have been attached to the parents of the great in the old world. How were they surprised when the matron, leaning on the arm of her son, entered the room! She was arrayed in the very plain, yet becoming garb worn by the Virginia lady of the olden time. Her address, always dignified and imposing, was courteous, though reserved. She received the complimentary attentions, which were profusely paid her, without evincing the slightest elevation, and at an early hour, wishing the company much enjoyment of their pleasures, observed that it was time for old people to be at home, retired.

"The foreign officers were amazed to behold one whom so many causes contributed to elevate, persevering the even tenor of her life, while such a blaze of glory shone upon her name and offspring. The European world furnished no examples of such magnanimity.—Names of ancient lore were heard to escape from their lips, and they observed, that 'if such were the matrons of America, it was not wonderful the sons were illustrious.'

"It was on this festive occasion that General Washington danced a minuet with Mrs. Willis. It closed his dancing days. The minuet was much in vogue at that period, and was peculiarly calculated for the display of the splendid figure of the chief, and his natural grace and elegance of air and manner. The gallant Frenchmen who were present, of which fine people it may be said that dancing forms one of the elements of their existence, so much admired the American performance, as to admit that a Parisian education could not have improved it. As the evening advanced, the commander-in-chief, yielding to the gaiety of the scene, went down some dozen couple, in the contra-dance, with great spirit and satisfaction.

"The Marquis de Lafayette repaired to Fredericksburg, previous to his departure for Europe, in the fall of 1784, to pay his parting respects to the mother, and to ask her blessing.

"Conducted by one of her grandsons, he approached the house, when the young gentleman observed, 'There, sir, is my grandmother.' Lafayette beheld, working in the garden, clad in domestic made clothes, and her gray head covered by a plain straw hat, the mother of 'his hero'! The lady saluted him kindly, observing—'Ah, marquis! you see an old woman—but come, I can make you welcome to my poor dwelling, without the parade of changing my dress.'

"Much as Lafayette had seen and heard of the matron before, at this interesting interview he was charmed and struck with wonder. When he considered her great age, the transcendent elevation of her son, who, surpassing all rivals in the race of glory, 'bore the palm alone,' and at the same time discovered no change in her plain, yet dignified life and manners, he became assured that the Roman matron could flourish in the modern day.

"The marquis spoke of the happy effects of the revolution, and the goodly prospect which opened upon independent America, stated his speedy departure for his native land, paid the tribute of his heart, his love and admiration of her illustrious son, and concluded by asking her blessing. She blessed him—and to the encomiums which he had lavished upon his hero and paternal chief, the matron replied in these words: 'I am not surprised at what George has done, for he was always a very good boy.'

"Immediately after the organization of the present government, the chief magistrate repaired to Fredericksburg, to pay his humble duty to his mother, preparatory to his departure for New-York. An affecting scene ensued. The son, feelingly remarked the ravages which a torturing disease had made upon the aged frame of his mother, and thus addressed her:

"The people, madam, have been pleased, with the most flattering unanimity, to elect me to the chief-magistracy of these United States, but before I can assume the functions of my office, I have come to bid you an affectionate farewell. So soon as the public business, which must necessarily be encountered in arranging a new government, can be disposed of, I shall hasten to Virginia, and—

"Here the matron interrupted him: 'You will see me no more. My great age, and the disease which is fast approaching my vitals, warn me that I shall not be long of this world. I trust in God, I am somewhat prepared for a better. But go, George, fulfill the high destinies which heaven appears to assign you; go, my son, and may that heaven's and your mother's blessing be with you always.'

"The president was deeply affected. His head rested upon the shoulder of his parent, whose aged arm feebly, yet fondly, encircled his neck. That brow, on which fame had wreathed the purest laurel virtue ever gave to created man, relaxed from its lofty bearing. That look, which could have awed a Roman senate in its Fabrician day, was bent in filial tenderness upon the time-worn features of the venerable matron.

"The great man wept. A thousand recollections crowded upon his mind, as memory, retracing scenes long past, carried him back to the paternal mansion, and the days of his youth, and there the centre of attraction was his mother, whose care, instructions, and discipline had prepared him to reach the topmost height of laudable ambition—yet how were his glories forgotten while he gazed upon her whom, wasted by time and malady, he must soon part with to meet no more.

"The matron's predictions were true. The disease which so long had preyed upon her frame completed its triumph, and she expired at the age of eighty-five, rejoicing in the consciousness of a life well spent, and confiding in the promises of immortality to the humble believer.

"In her person, Mrs. Washington was of the middle size, and finely formed; her features pleasing, yet strongly marked. It is not the happiness of the writer to remember her, having only seen her with infant eyes. The sister of the chief he perfectly well remembers. She was a most majestic woman, and so strikingly like the brother, that it was a matter of frolic to throw a cloak around her and place a military hat upon her head, and such was the perfect resemblance, that, had she appeared on her brother's steed, battalions would have presented arms, and senators risen to do homage to the chief.

"In her latter days, the mother often spoke of her own good boy, of the merits of his early life, of his love and dutifulness to herself; but of the deliverer of his country, the chief magistrate of the great republic, she never spoke. Call you this insensibility? or want of ambition? Oh, no! her ambition had been gratified to overflowing. She had taught him to be good; that he became great when the opportunity presented, was a consequence, not a cause.

"Thus lived and died this distinguished woman. Had she been a Roman dame, statues would have been erected to her memory in the capital, and we should have read in classic pages the story of her virtues.

"When another century shall have elapsed, and the nations of the earth, as well as our descendants, shall have learned the true value of liberty, the name of our hero will gather a glory it has never yet been invested with; and then will youth and age, maid and matron, aged and bearded men, with pilgrim step, repair to the now neglected grave of the mother of Washington."

The present number is enriched with numerous original contributions, both in prose and verse, from intelligent correspondents, added to several excellent effusions from the editor herself. It is embellished with a colored frontispiece, which represents the costume of two female figures, and also with a piece of sacred music, "Bright shines the moon," arranged for the piano-forte. This one, like all its predecessors, is a neat specimen of typography. The failure of the Ladies' Magazine would be a reproach to the fair portion of the community.

The History of France. By Eyre Evans Crowe. Three vols. 12mo. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. 1831.

This forms a continuation of the Cabinet of History, conducted by the Rev. Dionysius Lardner. Could we but persuade our young friends to give these volumes a careful perusal, we should feel assured of their grateful acknowledgments of profit and pleasure. If we had room we should seize this opportunity to remark upon the avidity with which the careless devour light books of fiction, while solid and instructive works of history like the present are suffered to lie neglected upon the shelves. We can safely recommend the history of France as an useful, trust-worthy, and excellent production.

Hints to a Fashionable Lady. By a Physician. One vol. 18mo. p. 242. New-York: Charles S. Francis. 1831.

A variety of interesting topics is discussed in this little book in an easy, and occasionally, elegant style. If the author cannot advance strong claims to originality in the substance of his prescriptions, he has nevertheless arranged them in an attractive form, and illustrated several important principles connected with the health, by gleanings from his own experience. It would be well for all persons entrusted with the guardianship of young children, and all sedentary and complaining people infected with the hypochondria, to read over his ideas and take the hint.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THEATRICAL attractions are crowding upon us so rapidly that we find some difficulty in noticing each as it deserves. Mr. Sinclair appeared on Saturday last in the opera of the Cabinet. Public expectation was much excited to hear the melody of the vocalist whom report ranked next to the celebrated Braham. After divers bursts of applause bestowed, by mistake, upon several faces which presently turned out to be only old acquaintances, the real, actual Mr. Sinclair appears, with a somewhat hasty manner. It is no joke, after all, to come three thousand miles into a new country, and make your bow, and show what you can do, before the sea of upturned wondering countenances of a strange people. The repeated exclamations at length subside into a dead calm, as if a spell had suddenly transformed the breathing multitude into statues. If the good reader will pardon our egotism we must do ourselves the justice to say that at such a moment we have a sympathetic thrill running through our whole frame for the principal person in this crisis, and how one can sing with that sensation of breathlessness—which in us would palsify the body, chill the soul, and deform the voice into a feeble and tremulous expression of horror at our rashness—verily passes our comprehension. We have had such dreams after a hearty supper, peradventure, and even from them fate protect us. The rather imposing figure of the stranger advances to the stage-lights—his foot is thrown back, his elbows raised, his chin elevated—he is making the final effort, like a bird about to fly. You hold your breath, and listen erectis auribus, as a hare leaning to catch the first murmur of the distant hunters, faintly swelling on the breeze. You prepare yourselves to hear a volume of voice, broad, deep, sweet, and rich, that shall let you feel the boards tremble under your feet—inspire you with passionate energy, or soothe you with a secret pleasure. Nothing of the kind came from the gentleman who had awakened in us such extravagant anticipations. He is different entirely from what we expected. Without any brilliancy as an actor, with a style of pronunciation sometimes bad, although always distinct, and a tenor voice, the first impression of which is far less agreeable than the manly round tones of Jones, we confess his first two songs struck us with a disappointment—and we write it here not meaning to say the gentleman is not an admirable vocalist, but rather to warn others against a too hasty decision upon that which, when a little more familiar, they will discover causes both surprise and admiration. His voice is flexible and of a kind which in a room must be delightful, with less power than durability, and deficient in depth. He no sooner sets out in a song, than he glides into a false, extremely sweet and skilfully managed, and sometimes clear as the ringing of silver. Science he undoubtedly has, and can execute any thing this side of human possibility in the way of a flourish; but indeed we cannot compliment the taste which leads to such a profuse prodigality of embellishments. They wander away so far from the air as to break the associations in the mind of the hearer. We really thought he shook one song to death. The "Bonny breast-knot" was given finely, and sung thrice with enthusiastic applause.

On Monday, although the city was deluged with a flood of rain, the house was filled in every avenue at an early hour, to witness the new tragedy of the Gladiator, produced by Mr. Forrest. We have already spoken at length of this production, and have been only confirmed in our opinion by the representation. Its success was marked, and sanctioned with several hearty peals at the termination. The actors generally did well. Several scenes of Mr. Forrest were truly touching and impressive. The audience were attentive and gratified; and not a solitary sign of disapprobation met our notice. The entertainment of the evening was heightened by a chaste and well-written prologue, and a witty epilogue.

THE COMEDY OF THE LION OF THE WEST.

Since the performance of this play at the Park theatre, it has undergone very material alterations, and received important additions. It will soon be presented to the public of New-York in its new dress. The following is an outline of the plot.

Lexington, an officer in the British army, is desperately wounded at the battle of Lundy's Lane, near the Falls of Niagara, and the following morning is found on the field covered with blood, and apparently dying, by Mr. Peter Bonnybrown, a plain warm-hearted New-England bachelor, at that time serving in the army of the United States. He removes the cloak from the breast of the wounded officer, on which, unconscious of the surrounding horrors, a female infant is quietly reposing. Bonnybrown conveys the infant to a place of security, and during many years of commercial prosperity, rears and educates Fredonia as his own. She is addressed by many suitors, the most conspicuous and pertinacious of whom is a fortune hunter, known as Lord Luminary, who, in conjunction with Satellite, another adventurer, has been incessant in his endeavors to gain her affections and fortune. Fredonia has now nearly reached her eighteenth birth-day, and departs from the seminary of which she has been a distinguished inmate, to visit her guardian, and enjoy with him the festivities which her entrance into the state of womanhood has given rise to.

At this period the play commences. Mr. Bonnybrown, and a dignified relative, who, on all occasions, styles herself "Miss Albina Towertop, late of Towertop Manor House, Hop Hill Park, Kent, England," receives a letter, which announces the speedy arrival of Mr. B.'s nephew, Nimrod Wildfire, from "Old Kentuck." The exploits of this humorous, unpolished, generous son of the west, contribute largely to the general interest of the comedy, and his sayings and doings aid materially in the development of the plot. Deacon Dogwood, an innkeeper, formerly an itinerant vender of yankee wares, has ejected from his house a gay, high-minded, and humorous young gentleman, Trueman Casual, who had recently experienced sudden and total reverses of fortune. Defending himself against the sheriff's officers who pursue him, nearly overpowered, he is relieved by the opportune arrival of Nimrod Wildfire, who, in the prosecutor, Dogwood, discovers an old acquaintance and swindler in horse flesh. A promise of restitution on the one part, and silence on the other, effects Casual's liberation from the clutches of Dogwood. Fredonia now arrives at the landing-place at some distance from her guardian's country seat—here she is met by Satellite, who, by the contrivance of Luminary, presents himself as Bonnybrown's footman, and conducts her to a carriage in waiting, which has been procured by Luminary for the purpose of conveying Fredonia to a remote dwelling, with the hope of extorting her consent to their immediate union. This scheme is frustrated by Casual, who stumbles on the adventure, relieves the young lady from her perilous situation, and bears her triumphantly to her guardian's residence, where he is welcomed by the family as the preserver of their ward. Casual and Fredonia have before met in society, and, as in duty bound, now become deeply enamored. Bonnybrown, indignant at the villany of Lord Luminary, prompts Wildfire to redress Fredonia's wrong, which office he undertakes with great alacrity, as "he had'n't found a fight for ten days, and he felt mighty wolffy about the head and shoulders."

Luminary endeavors to ruin the reputation of Casual, and covertly dislodge him from the place he has gained in the affections of Fredonia, Miss Towertop, and Mr. Bonnybrown. He engages one Coquinard, a Canadian barber-surgeon, to sustain the character of a French nobleman, M. Le Comte Rousillon, who is to present himself as the friend of Mr. B.'s Havre correspondent, and to become the professed admirer of Fredonia. Luminary now forges the certificate of the neighboring magistrate, which sets forth that the bearer (a creature hired for the purpose) is the victim of the arts of Casual, and concludes with cautioning the world against him, as a nameless adventurer, and utterly worthless. The pretended Count Rousillon is introduced to the family in due form. The encounter of Wildfire and Luminary terminates in a challenge from the former, and the festivities of the night are interrupted by the arrival of Luminary's female coadjutor, bearing the forged testimonial. All are in consternation—Casual astonished and overpowered, hastens to discover his traducer, and to avenge his wrongs.

The events of the night, however, do not prevent Nimrod, who is "primed for any thing, from a possum hunt to a nigger funeral," from showing off the extraordinary ball-room accomplishments of a backwoodsman, in a manner that defies all gravity.

In the last act, in a scene of uncommon power and interest, Bonnybrown informs Fredonia of the circumstances of her infant days, describes the terrific conflict of Lundy's Lane, and laments the too probable fate of her father.

A quarrel now takes place between Coquinard and Groundling, his associate, this is broken in upon by Wildfire, who, in the presence of all the family, compels him to the disclosure of the whole plot. Tidings are now brought of Casual's sudden departure with arms, and the parties hasten to prevent the expected duel. It is too late—Lord Luminary and Casual have met—the former has fled—the latter is slightly wounded. The report of fire-arms has drawn to the scene an English traveller, whose coach was passing at the time. It is lieutenant, now Major Lexington, the father of Fredonia, who has returned, after long foreign service, in search of his child. A highly wrought scene between Major Lexington and Casual, ends in the conviction, in the mind of the former, that Fredonia is his daughter—her arrival with the others confirms it—and Fredonia is restored by Bonnybrown to that breast, from which he had humanely taken her on the bloody field of Lundy's Lane.

The confession of Dogwood now solves the mystery of Casual's birth,—my Lord Luminary and his associates are duly provided for, and the group is made perfectly happy by the arrival of Nimrod Wildfire, Esq. and his amiable (intended) lady "Miss Patty Snag of Salt Licks"—and, to use the words of the delighted Kentuckian, "there's no back out in her breed, for she can lick her weight in wild cats, and she shot a bear at nine years old."

Casual, Bonnybrown, Luminary, Satellite, Scum, Dogwood, Miss Towertop, and Fredonia, are additions by Mr. Stone, and the Kentuckian remains as originally drawn by the author for Mr. Hackett.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

PARISIAN FASHIONS.

"White dresses are more than ever in favor. A dress of one color is now a rarity. Printed muslins have usually a white ground, with a very small colored pattern. Hats have undergone but little change as to form. Feathers are universally worn both in hats and bonnets.

"The coiffures à la chinoise have two little curls, one on each temple. Many ladies wear their hair in light frizzed curls on the forehead; others wear it à l'Anglaise, that is to say, in long cork-screw curls; and a few still adhere to large bows in front. Perhaps the most becoming mode of dressing the hair en negligé, is a large plait, in the form of a crown, placed rather high, the ends of the hair being curled in ringlets, and dropping from the centre of the crown towards the right side. The front hair in full curls on each temple. Some pelerines are made round behind, and with ends in front, descending a few inches below the waist-band. Over this is worn a second pelerine, with a collar fastened by two worked ends, about the width of a ribbon. These have a very pretty effect when made of embroidered tulle, in imitation of lace. Aprons of plain batiste or jaconet are worked round the edge in colored worsted, and the pockets are trimmed in a corresponding way. We have also observed several white dresses with colored borders above them. Sandaled slippers are much more general than boots. Dove-colored prunella is the favorite material for boots. Open worked stocking of Scotch thread are worn by the most fashionable women." Court Journal.

DRAMATIC INGENUITY.

"Nothing," says a late English publication, "comes amiss to the French writers of vaudeville. They dramatize every thing under the sun—good, bad, or indifferent. The cholera has received that honor. Then came another, called 'La Grippe,' (the influenza.) What next? Monsters and monstrosities of all sorts have been exhausted. Pity they have no New London Bridge—no Reform Bill—at Paris. These would have supplied the theatres with novelties for a month. There is no living individual of eminence, who has not been made the subject of a piece; Rossini, Paganini, Lafayette, and Chordruc-Duclos have been of the number." Ibid.

THE POLISH LANCERS.

"The Poles, in general, are much smaller men than the Russians, but equally well-dressed. The lancers attract particular attention; the ease with which they manage the lance, and their graceful seat on horseback, have never been equalled by the lancers of any European power; they are mounted on excellent active horses from White Russia. The chasseurs à cheval have a very neat and plain uniform; the carbines are slung in their belt."

A PERSIAN FABLE.

In the centre of a garden stood a luxuriant Acacia. Fresh and clustering buds hung from the yielding branches and loaded the air with spicy fragrance. Many birds built their downy nests amongst its blossoms, and its leaves seemed to vibrate with their melody. It had won the love of many flowers of the garden. The rose blush ed a deeper hue when the breeze wafted its perfume to it—and the pale lily grew paler as it nightly gazed upon it with tearful eye. The jessamine and passion flower were most fortunate, for they had twined themselves around its branches. The jessamine mingled with its flowers and fragrance, and the passion flower, as it clung to its embrace, closed its blue eyes at night and slept. But of all the flowers that loved the Acacia, none loved more fervently than the sensitive plant. It sprang up under its shade, and drank in the dews of heaven poured from the cups of its blossoms; it had been shaded by it from the rude wind and the scorching sun. The blue heavens and the emerald stars it had once worshiped, were now only gazed upon through the delicate net-work of its foliage—like music mingling with a dream.

One evening the dew-drops clustered so thickly upon the Acacia blossoms, that it weighed down a branch until it touched the sensitive plant. Though thrilling with rapture, it instinctively shrank from the touch. "Poor little plant," said the Acacia, "art thou so sensitive and yet so cold? How canst thou, blooming as thou dost among all that is fair and beautiful, avoid all and love none? Perhaps thou art happier—for when thou hast once loved thou wilt lose thy joyous freshness. Good night." The sensitive plant did not answer, for dewy tears fell thick and fast upon the ground. At night it drooped, instead of folding its leaves and dreaming of the Acacia as it was wont when darkness hid it from view. In the morning the gardener, finding it less fresh than usual, and thinking it in too shady a spot, dug it up and transplanted it. It proved its grave, for it died before another evening breathed upon it.

SUMMER FLOWERS.—By Mrs. H. Muzz.

These summer flowers—these summer flowers!

How beautiful—how brief!

For genial suns and gentle showers

Alone keep fresh the verdant bowers,

And paint the growing leaf:

And feelings caught from pleasure's glow,

And nursed in youthful hours,

Can they abide the touch of wo,

When age comes darkly on?—ah, no,

They fade like summer flowers.

Give me the plants whose hardier bloom

Still deck the fading year,

And shed their hues and rich perfume

Round failing nature's night of gloom,

And grace her wintry bier.

Be mine affections that survive

Beyond joy's fleeting hours;

Midst dying hopes still freshly live

And to the last their radiance give—

The heart's pure deathless flowers!

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1831.

Editor's Study.—Midnight! deep, hushed, beautiful midnight—and silence—absolute silence in the sky and over the earth—upon the deserted street—and in the closed temple. Is not this a dream? and why should it not be? What more will it be to-morrow? Slumber shall seal our eye-lids, and a few fantastic images roll in fragments through our imagination, and the flashing stars will sink down behind the river, and morning will come, and we shall go on in the old routine, and when we look back upon this quiet and lovely hour, and feel this now lonely pavement trembling with the thunder of wheels, thronged with the crowds of money hunters, how shall we recall this dim moonlight—this deathly calm—as other than a dream? And may not all life be thus reasoned upon? What is it all but a dream? He with whom yesterday we roved and forgot care; whom to-day finds on the ocean bound for foreign climes—what is he but a dream? She to whose side we stole a few hours ago—whose mere presence was a joy that has departed—what is she but the veriest vision, as separate from the dull reality of our existence as yonder distant star, that will flash on just so brilliantly when we are gone from the earth? And he who once loved us, but now moulders in the dust with this very light upon his tomb, what is he but a faint vision? a something conceived in the mind. What matters it whether waking or sleeping, since to us now he is nothing? When you read this hereafter, dear reader, by sun-light, in the flush of hope and enjoyment, you will frown. But this comes of writing at night. It is as natural for us to be sentimental at such an hour, as it is for those shining clouds to wreath themselves into each other's bosom and float away down the blue tide of heaven. And this is night! To one who had never before witnessed this aspect of nature, what a sublime and magnificent wonder it would be? It impresses us more than elquence or music. It comes fraught with deep and swelling thoughts. The world appears less, and our single being more. This is the time for the atheist and the scoffer to repent—examine his cold creed—to think of his coarse jest, and not in the crowd, where the brain is teeming with false images and excitements, and the heart full of vain pride and intoxicating passions. And who besides ourselves are waking now? The pale student over his book, forgets his untouched pillow and toils with the hope of fame. And all the treasure of knowledge and thought he has been heaping up for years, death will perchance to-morrow wash away with a single wave. And the watchman is pacing his round beneath the window, and misery fills the eyes of some with tears instead of slumber, and the sweet girl with her irrepressible mirth and winning beauty, whom perchance you have gazed on with a thrill in the haunts of fashion, struck down from the bright flock of joyful creatures, by the fatal arrow of disease, is tossing on her downy couch as if stretched on fire, and would give her beauty and her fortune to inhale one free breath. And the epicure, who has wasted his life to pamper his palate and seek pleasure in refined combinations never dreamed of by nature, is writhing with the gout, and envying the poor farmer who sleeps now the more sweetly for his poverty and toil. And the mother wakes and sobs as she thinks of her buried child; and the wife whose husband is on the deep; and the reveler drains the bowl in some secret cave of vice and ribaldry; and the watcher on the deck of the war ship beguiles his hour with thoughts of home; and the culprit immured within the dark prison walls, whose hand is red with human blood, and who to-morrow shall be dragged with a thousand eyes bent on him, fiercely and scoffingly, to hear the calm voice of judgment read—the doom of death. And at the window of these the pleasant star-light steals in like a careless spirit upon whom the wicked and the wretched have no claim; and the dimly breaking morn shall streak the east with its brilliant blazonry, and the perfumed breeze will blow upon their hot foreheads like a mockery—and so the world goes on and the night ends.

What a change both in physical nature and the aspect of society is wrought by a few short months at this period! The elegant run-aways who have been bearing the blaze of fashion into the quiet recesses of the country, have abandoned the Springs, Trenton falls, and Niagara. She who lately startled the echoes of distant forests with laughter, or held her breath as the magnificent view from the mountain top burst on her wondering sight—she who looked down into the lucid depths of Lake George, or in the flying chariot glided like a sea-bird over the marble beach of Rockaway; has now floated with the tide that sets in upon this central ocean, and is here a different being. The youth who pressed her hand in the dance at Saratoga, passes her without a glance in the gay Broadway. The very summer zephyr that kissed her forehead among the highlands, could it enter the radiant night-world that goes on within the lofty theatre, would not recognize the jewelled brow that beams from the boxes like the evening star.

How beautiful are the gradations of the seasons, from the brilliancy of summer, mellowing into the wealth of autumn, till the sun turns away his face like a cooling friend, and leaves the dying forests and fading fields to darken gradually into wintry nakedness and desolation. We remember to have been once strangely chilled with this mournful passing away of bright things. We had stolen to a lovely rural spot, always charming, but when gazed on by one who had just escaped from the bondage of business, and the artificial world of a city life, positively bewildering and delicious. Everything was there that a painter would crowd into Eden; and we were one of a party which might have added new rapture even to that blissful retreat. The forest was nearly dark beneath the masses of verdant foliage; the orchard boughs were bent down with their luscious burthens of crimson and gold; and the imprisoned essences of life and beauty were bursting out in new and more gorgeous forms from the hedges and the gardens; and decking the white fences with tresses of vines, blossoms and flowers of dyes as superb and glowing as if the rainbow had been broken into a thousand fragments, and scattered along the scene. A sudden illness confined us to our bed for a long period, we scarcely knew how long, and when at length returning health enabled us to venture abroad, one cloudy morning, we remember with what a frozen sense of desolation the marred, naked, dimmed prospect struck our eyes. All the bright trees were stripped, the blooming young flowers were gone, the wind sighed through empty branches, and across a dull expanse of land, whirling and rustling over the dried brittle leaves, and scattering them sometimes on the stream. It seemed as if a curse had fallen upon the spot, and so scathed it—as if, instead of roaming in the interior of the garden of paradise, we had been transported from its bowers into the bleak, dreary, dismal, real world. We never felt more forcibly the exquisite beauty of Milton's descriptions. We hope all our young friends have read them; if not, we pray they will put the Pelhams, the Young Dukes, the Thaddeuses of Warsaw, and even the Moores, the Byrons, (must we add, the Sir Walter Scotts,) away, and take up John Milton incontinently. Do not be dismayed with a few pompous lines, or a chapter of hard names; but, in the first place read over Addison's elegant criticisms on "Paradise Lost," published in the Spectator. He will lead you in among its splendors, as a gentle friend would guide you through an ancient city, and point out its monuments, its palaces, and all its hidden wonders. It is with a most dissatisfied feeling that we hear a young intelligent girl say she has never read Milton. We always wish to be in a pleasant, still room with her alone, and all care off our minds, and so display to her the sublime creations of that blind poet's fancy. We regret that with such a magnificent temple of mind ever by her side—so decorated with all the gorgeousness of rich imagination—so teeming with exalted ethereal influences—so blazing with unsurpassable pictures of life and nature, we regret that she should voluntarily exclude herself from such an exhibition—and passing carelessly by the gates, waste her precious faculties and ever-flying hours upon unworthy objects. We would not that the glowing girl should dim the lustre of her eyes in midnight studies, or turn from the graceful duties and pleasures of domestic life and social intercourse to become pedantic and learned; but no being with a mind and a soul, can enter into the spirit of such a poem without feeling nobler and happier. It dignifies the character with lofty meditations—it breaks away the webs which prejudice, passion, interest, and the common-place circumstances of society are for ever weaving around the heart.

We welcome Mrs. Sigourney among our contributors, and are pleased to present our readers with the following fine stanzas from her pen. She informs us that they were written two or three years since, but that the copy in circulation is full of inaccuracies, which, in the annexed, are corrected.

THE SAILOR'S FUNERAL.

The ship's bell toll'd!—and slowly o'er the deck
Came forth the summon'd crew. Bold, hardy men
Far from their native skies, stood silent there
With melancholy brow. From a low cloud
That o'er the horizon hover'd, came the threat
Of distant, mutter'd thunder. Broken waves
Heaved up their sharp white helmets o'er the expanse
Of ocean, which in brooding stillness lay
Like some vindictive king, who meditates
On hoarded wrongs, or wakes the wrathful war.
The ship's bell toll'd!—And lo! a youthful form
Which oft had boldly dared the slippery shrouds
At midnight's watch, was as a burden laid Down at his comrades' feet. Mournful they gazed Upon his sunken cheek, and some there were
Who in that bitter hour remember'd well
The parting blessing of his hoary sire,
And the big tears that o'er his mother's cheek
Went coursing down, when his beloved voice
Breathed its farewell. But one who nearest stood
To that pale, shrouded corse, remembered more;
Of a white cottage with its shaven lawn,
And blossom'd hedge, and of a fair-hair'd girl
Who, at her lattice veil'd with woodbine, watch'd
His last, far step, and then turn'd back to weep.
And close that comrade in his faithful breast
Hid a bright chestnut lock, which the dead youth
Had sever'd with a cold and trembling hand
In life's extremity, and bade him bear,
With broken words of love's last eloquence,
To his blest Mary. Now that chosen friend
Bow'd low his sun-bronzed face, and like a child,
Sob'd in deep sorrow.

But there came a tone,
Clear as the breaking moon o'er stormy seas,
"I am the resurrection." Every heart
Suppress'd its grief, and every eye was raised.
There stood the chaplain—his uncover'd brow
Unmark'd by earthly passion, while his voice,
Rich as the balm from plants of Paradise,
Poured the Eternal's message o'er the souls
Of dying men. It was a holy hour!
There lay the wreck of youthful beauty—here
Bent mourning manhood, while supporting faith
Cast her strong anchor 'neath the troubled wave.
There was a plunge!—The riven sea complained!
Death from her briny bosom took his own.
The awful fountains of the deep lift up
Their subterranean portals, and he went Down to the floor of ocean, mid the beds
Of brave and beautiful ones. Yet to my soul
In all the funeral pomp, the guise of wo,
The monumental grandeur, with which earth
Indulgeth her dead sons, was naught so sad,
Sublime, or sorrowful as the mute sea
Opening her mouth to whelm that sailor youth.

Another correspondent has sent us a poetic sketch written on the Catskill mountains by James Ayton. It originally appeared in the Philadelphia Gazette. Our fair friend thinks "the last thirteen lines very pretty."

The viewless spirit of the mountain wind
Is breathing o'er my brow! 'tis rosy morn—
And never did more glorious visions burst
Upon the glad enraptured sight of one,
Who bends to worship nature, than this scene
Now spread before me from the fashioning hand
Of high Omnipotence!

Far, far below me, o'er the sleeping vale,
The surging mists in silvery volumes roll;
The mighty river, like a meadow stream
Quietly lapses by its emerald shore—
And still beyond, skirting the uplifted sky
With gorgeous dyes, the fiery-tressed god,
Uprising, bright, rejoices on his way!
List to the hymns of praise, which like sweet gales
Come up from glassy river, bower, and glade,
Forever audible to the poet's ear!

And thou, most beautiful of lovely things,
Dear gentle maid, who standest by my side,
Like a sweet blossom on the mountain's crest!
Thou too, with thy pure dreams are raising now
A holy hymn, of thankfulness and praise.
I read it on thy fair and thoughtful brow;
In the calm lustre of that mild blue eye.
Come beautiful—beloved! together down
This sinuous pathway, musing, let us tread;
And voluble discourse, with grateful hearts,
Of Him, who made for us this pleasant earth,
With all its fair variety of form,
Cloud-piercing mounts, green slopes, and silent glens.

Haschbasch, the Pearl Diver.—This story, which the reader will find on the first page, is one of the most pleasant, racy, and characteristic productions we have seen for many a day. While it exhibits a ludicrous picture of the empty arrogance of eastern despotism, combined with that silly love of finery, which, in all countries will be found a distinguishing feature in the character of ignorant, unrefined females, it also conveys an important moral, by the example afforded of the futility of wealth and station in conferring happiness on the possessor. We take this opportunity to express our thanks to the author for the exclusive preference he has shown in making this journal the channel through which the free-will offerings of his leisure hours are given to the public.

OH! NAME HIM NOT.

A BALLAD.—THE WORDS BY N. G.—THE MUSIC COMPOSED FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR BY T. COMER.

Oh! name him not—oh! name him not! I can not bear to hear— Let other lips—his praises—speak,-- At least when I--am near. But if to thee so dear the-- theme, Speak on, and quite dis-pel my dream. But if to thee so dear the theme,-- Speak on, and quite dis-pel-- my dream.

SECOND VERSE.

Yet still that dream has been to me
So sweet and yet so sad,
A mingled woe so strangely wove,
Such sunshine and such shade—
That, waking or asleep, I find
Its threads about my memory twined.

THIRD VERSE.

Then name him not—he could not love
Those traits so dear to me;
Flattered and vain, he would but prove Himself unworthy thee.
Thy pure and gentle loveliness
Was formed a kindred heart to bless.

MISCELLANY.

NUGÆ.

"Magnas nugas dicere magno conatu."—Terent.

AMONG the prettiest prettinesses I have ever deemed worthy a place among my manuscripts, is this idea of Pinkney's. He says to Italy,

"Thou art a dimple on the face of earth."

I am a great admirer of times and seasons, and have never been able to settle it to my own satisfaction, whether morning or evening, twilight or midnight, noonday or daybreak is the happiest hour to me. That it depends upon the mood in which these seasons severally find me is very true; and it is just as true, too, that while enjoying each, I think the present ever the loveliest; and what conclusion, therefore, is more obvious than that they are all, as they change, alike redolent of the same spirit of beauty and delight, and all fraught with the same power to bless and make happy? Many a song, and many a chapter to them all and several, have I copied and copied till they are familiar to me as "household words," and the penciled lines, and turned down leaves in many a volume mark the diverse, and yet united tributes which authors have paid to each. Thus of morning, Shakspeare says:

But look! the morn, in russet mantle clad,
Walks o'er the dew of yon high eastern hill.—Hamlet.

And still more beautifully, once more:

See how the morning opes her golden gates,
And takes her farewell of the glorious sun!
How well resembles it the prime of youth,
Trim'd like a younker, prancing to his love.—Hen. VI.

And thus of the earliest dawn he says:

When dying clouds contend with growing light;
What time the shepherd, blowing of his nails,
Can call it neither perfect day nor night!—Henry VI.

And at daybreak

The silent hours steal on,
And flaky darkness breaks within the east.—Rich. III.

And how beautiful are these verses from Cymbeline:

Hark! hark! the lark at heaven's gate sings,
And Phoebus 'gins to rise:
His steeds to water at those springs,
On chaliced flowers that lies.

And winking mary-buds begin
To ope their golden eyes,
With every thing, that pretty bin—
My lady sweet, arise!—Shakspeare.

But who does not know that the breath of the morning is the gentlest, sweetest, and most invigorating of all the breezes that fan the brow? Who needs to be told that the hour of the matin-song of birds is the time to enjoy the loveliest music in the world, and to see the gayest sights? The warbling of a thousand harmonies, and the flashing of a thousand glancing colors, and the scaling and soaring away of many a thousand of tiny feathery forms amid the clear blue heavens.

His genial rays the sun renews;
The scene is bright with glittering dews;

The blushing flowers more beautiful bloom,
And breathe more rich their sweet perfume.—Frisbie.
The laughing hours have chased away the night,
Plucking the stars out from her diadem:
And now, the blue-eyed morn with modest grace,
Looks through her half-drawn curtains in the east,
Blushing in smiles, and glad as infancy!

The mountain tops
Have lit their beacons—and the vales below
Send up a welcoming. Nature hath
The very soul of music in her looks—
The sunshine and the shade of poetry!—Davies.

And now went forth the morn
Such as in highest heaven arrayed in gold
Empyrean: From before the vanished night
Shot through with orient beams.—Milton.

I have many more, but cannot stop to copy them, or stay your readers to read them—and so, adieu! When we meet again we'll may-be talk of night or noon; by which time may I hope your patience will have become recruited.

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

THE FANCY BALL.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

"Thou art spotless as the snow, lady mine, lady mine!
Ere the noon upon it glow, lady mine!
But the noon must have its ray,
And the snow-wreaths melt away,
And hearts—why should not they?
Why not thine!"

"What shall be my character, coz?" said Gerald Grey, lifting up his eyes from a book of costumes he had been turning over for some time, and addressing a dark-eyed Cleopatra-looking girl, who sat on the opposite side of the round table; "shall it be turk or christian, jew or gentleman, Richard or Saladin, peasant or peer, king or cobbler, sailor or saint, Peter the Great or Peter the Hermit? Shall I wear kilt or trowsers? shall I wear turban or helmet? shall I carry a sword or a show-box? shall I go en attendant to yourself and be the envy of the rooms, or play Shadow to Silence in the corner there, and be overlooked by the whole world?"

The lady last alluded to sat apart from the circle, netting a silk purse with the persevering industry which apologizes so prettily for abstraction when one wishes to dream in company. She was a fair, delicate girl, with a blue eye shaded heavily with dark lashes, and a mouth of exquisite refinement. Her figure was slenderer, and her whole air in strong contrast with the imposing and queenly beauty of her sister.

"Tell me, Cecile," continued the young man, moving his chair up to the side of the silent girl, and lowering his tone to a half-audible murmur, which we have not the effrontery to ascribe to more than a cousinly regard, "may I take a character, my dear cousin, which will give me an apology to be near you?"

The answer was probably an unexpected one, for he rose with a flushed cheek, and, bidding a confused adieu, left the room.

Gerald Grey (a pretty name for a hero—is it not, lady?) had intruded on one of those veriest eras in these times of illumination, a domestic evening. The round table stood in the centre of the room; the suspended lamp shed a soft, well-tempered light on the fair faces beneath, and the Lehigh coal—we cannot conceive of a more expressive eulogy—burned! I should love dearly to tell you, now, after the manner of story-tellers of distinction, how the "mother had the remains of beauty in her noble countenance," and how tall, and how charitable to the poor, and what sweet singers the daughters were; and I should like, if I thought you would not know it was a fib, to tell you how the gentleman sitting there with his cravat tied so transcendently, happened to come by as they were both drowning in some river, and gallantly got them out of the water and in love, and what colored eyes he had, and how there was a secret mystery about his birth, and a mark on his left arm, and how beautifully he had taught Whimsicula, their aunt Tabitha's lap-dog, to stand on his hind legs and ask for muffins, thereby winning forever and ever the heart of that immortal spinster, who hated every body else, and was as rich as the bank. It goes to my heart to tell a story right on like a newspaper. The days of romance are gone, however, and the poetry that used to be trolled to the tinkle of a guitar under my lady's window, is now written with a slate and pencil, and the teller of a tale is positively expected to be intelligible and preserve some faint resemblance to nature. Without ghost, and in good grammar, therefore, I am compelled to state simply that Gerald Grey was an intimate visitor in the family; that, by the intermarriage of some relatives of indefinite removal, he had a sufficient right to the precious appellation of "cousin;" that he had never seen the fair sisters till some few months before, when he returned from a long foreign residence, and that, being handsome and talented, and above all, remarkably well skilled in the manège des amants, and the mysteries of etiquet and Dr. Kitchiner, he had made himself especially agreeable to every member of the circle.

It was predicted by those who can see such things before they happen, that Mr. Gerald Grey would fall directly in love with Miss Helen — (excuse the surname, dear reader! a lady never has one in a story,) and the same good observers were confirmed in their opinion by the infallible test of appearances. It could not be denied that Helen was a magnificent creature. Her figure was large and full, without excess, and her motion had that indolent and floating grace with which women pass in dreams, and which is so particularly indescribable. She was a noble-hearted and sincere girl, without either genius or susceptibility; but she smiled like a goddess, and had that beautiful gift of modest, lady-like self-possession which becomes a woman so infinitely. She was the most fascinating creature in the world. Everybody was in love with her but our hero. He waited on her constantly, and interrupted everybody else's attentions to her, and seemed to all eyes to live only for her favor; but it was because she was the most admired woman in society, and because he had known enough of fashion to know that the safest and most distinguishing thing a man can do, is to get himself reported the lover of the finest woman he knows. There was a perfect understanding between them; and as "falling in love" was an accident to which no belle is liable, there was no possible danger in the intimacy, and a great deal of positive convenience. She could call upon him for all those little services which it is such a condescension to allow, and which, of course, one hates to have indifferent people do. She could give him her fan to hold without the danger of receiving back a red-hot sonnet in its folds; and she could faint away in his arms without troubling herself to be elegant in the disposition of her person; and then he decoyed away all her dull admirers, and she had a standing engagement to dance with him, to avoid stupid partners; and she could call him when she was tired of talking, to stand by and be agreeable while she was silent. He called her carriage, and tied her slipper, and fanned her fan, and told her all the scandal, and was her dictionary to all the strange people, and her interpreter to all the foreign lions, and her confidential secretary in all etiquetrical correspondence. He was the most delightful of cousins. She was sure he would never fall in love with her; and as for herself, the tenderest thought she had was to wish, sometimes, in the rainy mornings, when she wanted to be amused, that he was her brother.

Had Gerald seen less of the world, he would, to the best of our knowledge, have done just what everybody expected him to do. To those who know too little of women and to those who know too much, a belle is irresistible. The unsettled taste of the one is bewildered by the same splendor that is necessary to the morbid taste of the other. But he had been in love with a hundred such women as Helen. They are universal. He had met them in every country he had seen, and had paid so often the general tribute, that he knew its value. He remembered enough of his metaphysics, too, to be aware that admiration leaves a perpetual thirst, and though he had the highest respect for Helen, and believed that she had all the proper feelings of a woman, he knew that the incense of fashion had unstrung, as it must ever, the delicate fibres of affection which constitute susceptibility, and that the quiet pulse of matrimony must be the veriest languor to a mind of such habitual excitement. He admired and respected the glorious creature—but he did not love her.

He did love Cecile. Not at first, and not all at once, as people do in story-books. He began with talking to her about poetry; and from that (for she was, like enthusiastic girls, a superb visionary) to discouraging of influences, and dreams, and wild theories of the stars; and then, by the most natural gradation possible, they came to the philosophy of feeling; and then—and then—it is difficult to say what then! He lent her his books, with the passages all marked, and sent her his portfolio of drawings, and his scrap-books, and his foreign album, and even, (a desperate, unprincipled thing is love!) showed her a package, tied with a blue ribbon, and marked "to be burned in case of my death," containing all the billets-doux and watch-papers and bad poetry that had been sent to him in his thousand by-gone flirtations. And then there was such delicate flattery in his gifts of flowers! He was the pest of the flower-pots for miles round. In the barrenest of seasons the heads of the sisters were decked with the freshest and most fragrant, bought and begged and stolen from hot-houses and old maids, and his sister's plant-closet, and always presented with a distinctive appropriateness worthy of a prime minister of Flora. Without looking at the label, Helen knew the large, magnificent bunch, with red and crimson and yellow cups, was for her, and the other—a simple white camellia perhaps, or a lily of the valley half hid in its own leaf, or a rose-bud, or a lemon blossom—Agnes put in her bosom by instinct, without looking once, (till she got to her chamber) at the French note which lay perdue among the stems, like a Love among the roses.

Gerald had seen a great deal of women. He had been (we fear it must be confessed) a desperate flirt. He had sworn fidelity to eyes of every color, and characters of every cast. He had been on the brink of fifty engagements, and mercy knows how many pretty tombstones with half-blown roses on them should come out of his pocket-money. But in all his experience he had never found so pure-hearted and lovely a being as his fair-haired and gentle cousin. She was a very spirit in comparison with other girls. Her thoughts were all beautiful and pure; and with her thin, graceful figure, and the almost perfect transparency of color in her lip and cheek, what is the wonder if her lover sometimes thought her an angel? I have known lovers as extravagant upon lighter evidence.

It goes to my heart to say a word against a hero; but it would not be becoming in a veracious historian to hold up false models of perfection. It discourages posterity. With many good and some indifferent qualities, then, Gerald had one fault—a morbid sensitiveness upon matters of feeling, which gave him much unnecessary trouble.

To be sure, it was an excellence overgrown. Nothing half so much increases the value of life as a sensibility to its moral delicacies. If well governed, it is an invaluable gift in a lover, being, as it is, the basis of all refinements, and the only thing that can preserve the freshness and first beauty of an affection. But in our hero's wandering and many-colored attachments, his sensibility had become diseased from over exercise; and a chance word, that would not have occasioned a thought to him once, was now matter for serious uneasiness. Philosopher as he was upon most subjects, he never gave himself time to reason upon feeling, and followed his first impulses with the headlong precipitation of a boy. Even in his comparatively brief acquaintance with Cecile, this quality had been the cause of much misunderstanding. Like all men of this temperament, he was fervent to romance in his attachments; and every word he uttered to the woman he loved, was breathed into her ear with the delicacy and earnest tenderness of a first avowal. At home and abroad his slight but flattering assiduities were ever unremitted. His high breeding and extreme tact enabled him to do this without attracting notice, and it was his unreasonableness that he expected from Cecile the same constant evidences of affection. He was by education a man of universal self-command and accomplishment. Without any apparent effort or absence of mind, he never lost sight of the woman he admired in company. He was gay and general in his attentions, and was too well bred to engross her beyond the most impalpable limit of propriety; but, in the midst of a conversation, in which his apparent interest was flattering in the most delicate manner the person to whom it was addressed, his careless but rapid glances caught every smile upon the face he loved, and laid up for his dreams every grace of gesture and motion. He possessed, too, that kind of ventriloquism which men of gallantry always acquire, and by which, in the midst of a crowd, and without the appearance of a whisper, the voice is thrown into the ear for which it is intended, and is entirely inaudible to every other! He could thus talk of the subject nearest his heart in the gayest company, and, with his habitual command of countenance, could make a declaration in a dance, without betraying to the most scrutinizing eye more than the superficial interest of a flirtation. He thus made every party the scene of a tit-bit and advanced his suit in situations where most men would not trust themselves with a look. With these facilities, and the consciousness of security, every look for Cecile had a meaning in it; and he expected as constant a reciprocation, without once reflecting that the power was confined to himself, and that a young and timid girl could not possibly possess that subtle faculty of exclusiveness which is attained only by the most liberal and elevated intercourse with society. Of course he was liable to be checked and hurt by any or all of the thousand barriers that surround a woman under the present scrupulous regime of society; and a look of indifference, where its opposite would have excited comment, or a careless word, where earnestness would have been deemed strange and unmaidenly, were things that broke him of his rest, and shook his trust in her fidelity.

On the evening to which we have alluded, he had called to make arrangements for attending his cousins to a fancy ball, to be given by one of the most fashionable families in the city. The rose-colored note, with its emphatic N. B. "Mrs. A. would be happy to see her friends in fancy dresses," stuck in the joint of the bronze standish, and around it upon the table lay the heaps of prints and books of costumes it had conjured up, in endless confusion. It was a type of the whole city. The world was in an uproar about it—those who had invitations harassing the milliners into impossible promises, and those who had not, predicting it would be a stupid affair, and wondering how people could encourage amusements of such immoral tendency. The theatres made splendid speculations on their tarnished wardrobes. The beaux walked the streets with the pearl-powder puckered all out of their foreheads with the intensity of their invention. The ladies forgot their languor, and pattered their little feet along the pave from shop to shop, regardless of every precept of Callisthenes; and the men-servants, who should have been putting the chateau margot into the coolers for their masters' dinner, were running between their mistresses and the milliner, with unuttered curses upon bandboxes legible in their very honest faces. Nothing else was talked of. The first question was, "Do you go to Mrs. A's?" and the second, "What is your character?" And then the pretty mystery the ladies made of their costumes, and the complimentary guesses that they were to be "sylphs" or "sultanas," and the telling the secret as a particular favor, and the promises to go in a character to correspond!—Oh! it was a sweet excitement—quite equal to an invasion! It was worth while, if it were only to remind one that the world revolved on its axis.

If you have not forgotten the beginning of my story, lady, you will remember that the characters of our fair friends, (for the ball of course,) were not yet settled. Cecile had left it to Helen, and Helen, as she did all other matters of taste, had left it to Gerald, and Gerald had gone off angry, and given the whole matter, in his heart, to the — ("oh no! we never mention him!")

It was ten o'clock the next morning, and Gerald, having finished his breakfast, sat gazing into his empty coffee-cup, as if the departed Mocha had left an oracle in its dregs. Though it grows in the dominions of the prophet, however, coffee is innocent of the supernatural, and our hero saw only what he would have seen just as well in a tin dipper—the face of the lady Cecile, as distinctly as if it had been enamelled in the porcelain. There were also some two or three red-hot words in the back-ground, which our familiar could not decipher, but which he shrewdly guessed were the combustibles that had fired him so like a rocket the preceding evening. Poor Gerald! if he only would not expect so much from human nature!

Well! he had settled it all in his mind—Cecile did not love him, or she never would have answered him in so cold a tone when he spoke to her so tenderly—and he began to balance his spoon on the edge of the cup, to decide by the preponderance of either extremity whether to shoot himself or to make love to Helen. Before it was decided, a note came from Helen, beginning "My dear coz," and ending with "Yours ever," informing him that she had fixed upon the character of "Mary, Queen of Scots," for herself, and "Catherine Seyton," for Cecile, and he might choose between devoting himself to her as "Earl Douglas," or to Cecile, as "Roland Grème." Gerald sat a moment, and a smile, a very unusual smile, passed over his face. He crumpled the pretty Italian note all up in his hand, and rose to ring the bell, with his head set proudly back like an improvisatore. Alfonsé saw that something more than usual was the matter with his master, and, like a discreet valet, brought him what coat he pleased, without troubling him with questions, and then brushed his hat, and opened the door for him to go out, wondering in his simple French heart what that desperate look about his lip could possibly mean.

The evening came at last, and Gerald, who had not been to the house since he left it so abruptly, stopped at the door for his cousins. They were waiting for him, and aunt Tabitha and papa had a settled wager on his choice of the two characters. Cecile, too, had a silent, but evident interest in the question, and she colored to the temples when the bell rang, and was as pale as death, the moment after, when the door opened, and the servant announced "Earl Douglas." They all drew up, expecting that he would make his entrée in character, with unusual dignity. Au contraire. He danced into the room in the most violent spirits, made two apologies in a breath, tossed Whimsiculo up to the ceiling, kissed aunt Tabitha, shook hands with papa, and, making a gay bow to Helen, turned and met the fixed look of Cecile, and stood, with a quivering lip, as motionless as if he was frozen to the floor. Fortunately, Whimsiculo's revolutions in mid air had thrown him into convulsions, and before the confusion was over he had recovered his composure, unobserved, and it was time to go.

Cecile sat back silent in the corner of the carriage, and Helen wondered what there could be in pulling a glove off and on, to absorb the whole attention of a man who had kissed the perfumed fingers of half the women in Europe. She had just come to the conclusion that he was studying his character, when they stopped at some distance from Mrs. A.'s in the rear of a line of a hundred carriages. Gerald bore the delay very uneasily. They advanced step by step, and, as they drew nearer, they observed that a crowd was gathered about the door, attracted by the novelty of the spectacle. As one grotesque figure after another passed through them to the steps they expressed their surprise or approbation with the boisterous freedom of "independent voters;" and, as Gerald alighted, in his impatience to reconnoitre the passage, a shout of laughter rose from the crowd, and there was every indication of a scuffle. It occurred to him instantly that the populace might be forcing their way in; and pushing up the steps he seized a sailor who was insisting on admission, and, with a single effort, pitched him to the bottom. He was about helping another to the same level, when the tarpaulin hat fell off, and the elegant Brutus head of Mr. Adolphus O'Lavender presented itself.

"I say, Grey!" said an affected voice from the crowd below, "very shabby of you to treat a friend this way! If you don't come to my assistance, I shall be annihilated instantly, upon my honor!"

Another boisterous laugh from the "sovereign people" announced their amusement at the mistake; and Gerald, apologizing to his two friends, requested their assistance in getting Queen Mary and her Maid of Honor safely from the carriage.

The rooms were already full when they entered. They were announced in character, and after being presented to the lady of the house mingled with the motley multitude. For the first hour or two it was a mere spectacle of grotesque. The guests promenaded the rooms with all the gravity of well-bred people in the nineteenth century, a little increased by the awkwardness of their hasty and ill-adjusted gear. The Spanish cavalier fingered frequently his uncertain moustache, as his lip became irritated, and found the grace of a short cloak a matter of acrypha. The Mussulman lost his slipper, and the Shepherd's crook was in the way, and the scroll of the Sybil was crushed by the box of the Pedler. Every one felt made of glass, and every one was crowded. The tinsel and the gauds that a touch would break and tarnish, were ruffled by countless shoulders; and the faces of the "simple," who came "undressed," were the only ones brightened by enjoyment.

By the time supper was announced the company felt more at home in their stiff costumes, and the prospect for pleasure looked brighter. The rooms were splendidly lighted, and the gay and gaudy figures moving round the tables made a splendid show of the picturesque. The stiffness of etiquette melted, as it always does, in wine; and the guests began to support, or what is better, travestie their characters. The "Queen of Night" laid down her leaden sceptre, and drank champagne with "Sir Peter Teazle." The "Jew" was detected with a ham-sandwich. "Queen Mary" and "Doctor Syntax" grew intimate over blanc-mange; and the "Lady of Lochleven," tired of her keys, committed them to "Figaro the Barber." A "Flower Girl" flirted with an "Earl" in the corner, and a "Swiss Peasant" lisped an opinion upon ices, and his holiness "the Pope" giggled with "Lady Racket" over the tender couplets of the confectionary. The "Novice" looked out mischievously from her white veil, and flirted by turns with admirers from every country under the sun. The "Monk" laid back his cowl from a head of the most approved perfume and curl, and swore on his veracity that "Anne Page" was divine. The "Turk" talked faster than any christian, and the "French Marquis" was a model of gravity, and "King Lear" stood with his white wig askew, and forgot in pickled oysters the ingratitude of his daughters.

I wish I could tell the whole story as gaily. It is a thousand pities the world goes so by contrast—that a merry tale must have sad passages, and a bright picture be shaded, and a minor key be necessary to music. If I had my own way, now, I would marry Gerald and Cecile outright. Something should turn up to explain the whole matter, and they should be reconciled and go to church in a coach drawn by six horses; and I would describe the bride's dress, and the bridegroom's, and the ten bridesmaids, and the rebuses at the wedding visit, and the serenade under the bride's window, and wind off with the epithalamium found under the bride's plate the next morning at breakfast, and some suitable remarks tending to encourage true lovers and promote matrimony. There are two unfortunate reasons, however, why this cannot be such a model of a story. In the first place, because it is not true, and that is not the way the gods chose it should happen; and in the second place, because, if it had happened so, I should not have dared to tell it, it being well ascertained that it is a mortal offence to the upper benches of boarding-schools to permit lovers to be happy before the end of the last chapter.

It was getting late as Gerald turned from the circle formed round the waltzers, and passing his hand over his eyes to recover from his dizziness, threw himself upon a sofa. The other end was occupied by a lady, but he was busy with his own thoughts, and did not perceive immediately that it was Cecile. He rose at the discovery, and seating himself at her side, asked some indifferent question, and became instantly absorbed in watching a pastille lamp, that was sending up the odor of its burnt spices in a pale thin smoke, from a small altar of alabaster. There is no knowing how long so deep a reverie might have lasted, had not the music suddenly changed to a particular waltz which was played under Cecile's pillow every night of her sweet life by the divinest little French musical box, presented to her, (as the note she read every time she wound it up expressed it), "by her very affectionate cousin, Gerald Grey." It is surprising how a very little circumstance will overturn a very magnanimous resolution. Gerald had come to the ball with a desperate vow in his heart, to be as excessively civil to Cecile as if love was a mere matter of poetry. He had locked the door upon Alfonsé, to that worthy person's mingled grief and indignation, before his toilet was half completed; and after practising a cold look before the glass for an hour, had really wrought himself up to the hallucination that he was capable of such a precious piece of martyrdom. Well—the waltz went on, and as the second bar stole out from Bennett's eloquent cremona, the fascination of the pastille lamp began to waver. The eye of our hero wandered about the pedestal of the altar, and from that to the square toe of his pump, and then, with a sudden calmness, he twirled his glove once round his forefinger and looked up:—

"Cecile!"

But Cecile was proud, (there is no pride, lady, like that of a timid girl,) and it was not a mere word that was to allay the fever of her indignant heart, or remove from her beautiful lip the calm scorn that concealed every trace of emotion. Not that she cared for atonement; but she felt that her sincere affection had been trifled with, carelessly, and without reason, and she could not forgive him till he was sensible of it. His petulant and hasty departure on his last evening visit had first surprised her. She was low-spirited and sick that night, and she had answered him she knew not what, except that it was not meant unkindly. It was evident, from his manner and his unusually long absence, that he was offended; but she believed him generous, though hasty; and after the request he had made to attend her particularly at the ball, and the time he had since had for reflection, she was sure he would not fail to embrace the opportunity, offered him by the choice of characters, for a reconciliation. His appearance as Helen's attendant in the costume of the Earl had disappointed her, but still she was rather pained than offended; and it was not till he added to all this a frivolous indifference, and a well-bred neglect little short of insult, that her indignation was roused, and she permitted herself to feel resentment.

She did not start when she heard her name, but drawing up her graceful neck, and bending her head slightly, the least in the world, towards him, she waited with a coolness that looked mightily like earnest, for him to proceed. For once in his life, Gerald was embarrassed. There was something in the look of the hitherto gentle and timid girl for which he was not prepared, and between the contending feelings of love and pride, and a vague fear that after all he might be wrong, he bit his lip till the blood came, and was silent. An intimate acquaintance now approached, and asked Cecile to waltz. Gerald started.

"You will not waltz now, Cecile?"

She hesitated a moment, and the refusal trembled on her lip, but her pride rallied instantly, and giving her hand to her partner with a deliberate grace, she left him.

It was now Gerald's turn to be heroic. He called for a repetition of Cecile's favorite waltz, and dashed across the room to a beautiful widow who was surrounded with claimants for her hand, and insisted so violently that she was engaged to waltz next with him, that she was persuaded, in spite of her memory, and the positive asseveration of nine veracious beaux to the contrary. He had learned to waltz abroad, and was always remarkable for his elegance, but he never danced so gracefully as now. His whole soul seemed to be in his motion, and as the gay lady entered into it with as much spirit as himself, they soon attracted the undivided attention of the company, and were left alone upon the floor. His partner was a woman of splendid figure, admirably adapted for display, and it was really a beautiful show as they floated about in the graceful and voluptuous circles of the waltz.

What a short-sighted villain for a demi-god was Comus, to wish that there was a window in men's bosoms! How then would it have been possible for Gerald Grey to be so beautifully dramatic, as to conceal the very bitterness of his heart under a mask of gaiety? and then, besides, would not the fashionable world have lost the report of a new engagement, a circumstance as necessary to the happiness of the next morning as the punctuality of the ever-to-be paid Manuel to his appointed hour. There was not a lady in the room who looked on Gerald's bright face as he rose and fell to the graceful impulse of the music, who would not have staked "honor bright and shining" on his being past recovery in love with the "six thousand a year" that was now getting dizzy on his arm, and looking up into his eyes from her half drooped and shadowy lashes like a creature in a dream—the expression was so exultingly happy! Never was there a more complacent smile than his on the face of a human being. It was, indeed, far too happy for the leader of the elite; and if he had not looked particularly miserable, and cut his bosom friend the next day in Broadway, his decision upon the next "tie" would have had no more weight than a congress member's.

The music stopped, and Gerald led away his partner to her place, and leaning over to her ear, talked to her with an air of utter devotion, till her score of admirers gathered again around her. When her attention was no longer exclusively his, his object was accomplished, and, strolling off with an air of carelessness, he went in search of Helen.

She was sitting on a chaise longue, playing with an ice, and speaking occasionally to one and another of a crowd of fashionable men gathered in a circle around. She made room for Gerald beside her, and he sat down and listened with the proper resignation to compliments upon his brilliant display in the waltz, and the usual agreeable pleasantries upon his favor with the belle widow.

"Helen," said he, as she laid the least divisible fraction of ice upon her exquisite lip, "I think I have heard you say that a ball is the place of all others for an offer."

"Positively, Gerald! and the widow no doubt accepted you?" added the gay girl, with her musical laugh, and a mischievous glance at his face, as if she had anticipated a confession.

"But do you really think it the best place?" he asked again, so earnestly that she suspected for a moment that it was true.

"Far—far—my dear Cœlebs! for if the offer is an agreeable one, a monosyllable is enough, and if it is not, one can get away, you know, and there is no chance for Despair to be pathetic and blow out his brains and frighten one. No place like it, Gerald!" and she played "c'est l'amour" with her spoon upon the glass, and patted her foot as if it was a subject of the least interest in the world to her.

"It is a pretty cameo!" said Gerald, taking up the ungloved hand, as it fell after giving her glass to a gentleman; and under pretence of examining it more minutely, he leaned forward, and pressing the white fingers with a nervous violence, said something in a low earnest tone which engrossed her whole attention instantly.

"But Cecile!"—said she, at last, as she stopped, with the blood glowing in his temples, and his lips set firmly together—

"No—Helen—no! I have loved Cecile—and that sincerely. I could again—worship her if you will—for she is all that is fair and noble. But she is fickle—very fickle—and too young to love—and does not—nay, do not interrupt me—I know she does not, love me! I dare not commit my happiness to her. She would become weary of me in a day—I am sure she would—and I have struggled against my affection for her—and it is yours—all and for ever, Helen—if you will have it!"

Helen sunk back on her seat, and pressed her hand upon her eyes. A thunderbolt could not have astonished her more. Gerald rose and stood before her a moment, to screen her from observation, and then, whispering a caution in her ear to conceal her agitation, he left her.

I fear I must advance a new theory of love. I do not see how I can get my hero out of difficulty on the old one. It is manifestly against every established principle of romance for a gentleman to love one lady and make love to another; and I fear if I attempt to account for it on a natural principle, notwithstanding the enlightened spirit of the age, I shall be shut up like Galileo "for a profane person." Like other martyrs, however, I will keep my eye on the reward; and, as I doubt not to be enrolled among the illuminati, in after ages, with Copernicus and Captain Symmes, I state my belief in defiance of death and the inquisition, that, under certain influences not laid down in philosophy, a man may love one lady and make love to another. It has been too long the fashion among song-singers and tale-tellers to represent the hero, through all difficulties, and under all misunderstandings, faithful and true. Human nature, as they show it, must be either stone or angelic. The lover is slighted, (or thinks so, which is the same thing in love as well as law,) and they permit him to feel no resentment. He is convinced that he is not loved, and, though no jury would go out upon the evidence, and he is barbarously misused by his mistress, he pines on, in the teeth of depravity and the doctors. She may neglect him, and abuse him, curl her hair even with his sonnets, and she is still the adorable Blousabella; nay, she may marry and forget him, and he is no theme for poetry if he does not live a bachelor, and and leave his money to her children! Now however this might be done in the days of Barbara Allen and Chevalier Bayard, such principles in our time are manifestly false and pernicious. The age has altered essentially. The sometime fashion of love has gone out. Constancy is a worm-eaten tradition, "laid up in lavender," with high heels and petticoats of brocade. The "lions" of the nineteenth century would never fall at the feet of Una; and Penelope, if she did not incontinently cut Ulysses, would be the most neglected of "wall-flowers." Flirtation is the chief end of woman, and "tit-for-tat" the motto of lovers' quarrels. A rejected beau compasses heaven and earth to marry for spite somebody richer or prettier, and humility and heroism are (alas!) but country cousins in the fashionable family of the Virtues.

Gerald had no doubt in his own mind that he loved Cecile far better than Helen. He knew perfectly well that if he was sure of winning and retaining her affection, there would be no comparison between that and his present chance for happiness. But he was not hero enough to forswear all good because he could not secure the greatest, and his first thought after his supposed discovery of Cecile's indifference—one that did more credit to the common sense than the romance of his character—was to see how much of the wreck of his hopes could be saved, and what next to the possession of his first object was attainable. He knew that Helen would never marry "for love" merely; that her affections would follow her duty, if the object were worthy, and that respect and the indulgent assidues of good breeding would come fully up to her expectations of matrimonial felicity. He did not dream, therefore, that he was acting ungenerously by his gay cousin; and as there was not another woman in the world, except Cecile, whom he would have preferred, and her extreme dignity and knowledge of the elegant refinements of life were qualities not to be impaired by time, he was certain that his affection for her, however doubtful at first, would increase daily. He did not more than half suspect that, with all his philosophy, his principal reason for addressing her was to be Cecile's brother. In all his reveries upon the subject Cecile's image as an inmate under his roof had been the prominent feature. The development of her beautiful mind had been a study of exceeding interest to him, and his imagination dwelt more than he was aware on the delightful confidence she would have in him as her sister's husband, and the privileges it would bring of familiar and daily intercourse. Instead of dreaming of domestic tetes-à-tetes with Helen, he was imagining Cecile in all the varieties of her new relation. He fancied her sitting by him in the twilight, and riding with him in the summer days, and speculating with him by the winter's fire on the fine topics of knowledge. It is, doubtless, one of the most delightful relations in the world, and all its possible circumstances came up successively in his mind till he believed it was better, after all, as it was, and that the happiness of both would be more certainly secured by the result. A slight feeling of pride, too, mingled with these anticipations. He felt that he had not been fully appreciated by Cecile, and he looked forward to a fuller development of his character with something very like exultation. He believed that the occasional indifference upon which he had relied for testimony arose from weariness of his society; but he remembered that he had seldom seen her alone, and that the conversation had always been of that forced and negative character which the presence of others renders necessary. This difficulty would now be removed, and, as the whole course of his education had tended to accomplish him in those minute delicacies of manner and feeling which are so invaluable at the fireside, it was perhaps an allowable vanity in him to calculate on an increase of respect and affection with a more intimate acquaintance. It was altogether a very tolerable picture, and though every thought of Helen vanished from his mind in the presence of Cecile, he was, at other times, passably content, and contrived to bear his loss without regarding the evil spirit who waits on disappointed lovers with pistols and laudanum.

The morning after the ball Gerald received a note from Helen, sealed without any of her usual quaint and expressive devices, and containing two pages written in a close, plain, matter-of-fact looking character. I should be delighted to tell you all about it, lady, but you must be aware that it would fall under the observation of other eyes than yours, and as it involves a new theory of love, and I know not how it will be received by the world, I am bound by an imperative policy to defer it. If, however, you are anxious to know whether Helen accepted him or not, or if you are interested that he should, after all, marry Cecile, the slightest token from your fair hand intimating your wishes will be gallantly attended to.

An epigram is like an olive—a thing for which a taste must be acquired. There is a fine relish about a good one to a discriminating lover of such things. The following excellent couplet was made upon Lord Dalhousie, when he ordered the Plains of Abraham to be ploughed and sown:

Some care for honor, others care for groats,
Here Wolfe reaped glory and Dalhousie oats.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

STRANGE GROUNDS OF DIVORCE.—The Bulgarian marries very young, the wives being from twelve to thirteen years of age. In the villages the Bulgarian couple pass their lives very amicably together; but in the larger towns, such as Adrianople, they divorce on the slightest pretence; and I must be excused for saying that it is by the ladies that these divorces are generally desired. They very often take place six weeks after marriage. A short time before we came to Adrianople, a very pretty young woman had offered her services to Mrs. Duveluz. She said that she had just been married to a man who had promised her a ferigee, (a sort of loose cloak,) but, added she, "he is a poor wretch, and cannot perform his promise; so I shall get divorced, as I can gain nothing by remaining longer with him."—Major Keppel's Journey across the Balkan.

A BOLD EXPERIMENT.—The missionaries had for several years endeavored to produce a change of religion in the island (Otaheite) by explaining to the natives the fallacy of their belief, and assuring them that the threats of their deities were absurd; Hettotte at length determined to put their assertions to the test, by a breach of one of the strictest laws of his religion, and resolved either to die under the experiment, or to embrace the new faith. A custom prevailed of offering pigs to the deity, which were brought to the moral and placed upon whittas, or fautas, for the purpose. From that moment they were considered sacred, and if afterwards any human being, the priests excepted, dared to commit so great a sacrilege as to partake of the offering, it was supposed that the offended god would punish the crime with instant death. Hettotte thought a breach of this law would be a fair criterion of the power of the deity, and accordingly stole some of the consecrated meat, and retired with it to a solitary part of the wood, to eat it, and perhaps to die. Having partaken of the food he expected at each mouthful to experience the vengeance he had provoked, and he waited a considerable time in the wood in awful suspense; until, finding himself rather refreshed than otherwise, by his meal, he quitted the retreat, and went quietly home. For several days he kept his secret, but finding no bad effects from his transgression, he disclosed it to every one, renounced his religion, and embraced christianity.—Beechey's voyage to the Pacific.

SOLOMON AND QUEEN SHEBA.—The power of Solomon having spread his wisdom to the utmost parts of the known world, Queen Sheba, attracted by the splendor of his reputation, visited the poetical king at his own court. There, one day, to exercise the sagacity of the monarch, Sheba presented herself at the foot of the throne; in each of her hands she held a wreath, one composed of natural flowers, the other of artificial. The florist, whoever he was, had so exquisitely imitated the real natives of the garden, that at the distance it was held by the queen, for the king's inspection, it was deemed impossible for him to answer the question she put him, which wreath was the production of nature and which of art? The sagacity of Solomon seemed perplexed. The honor of the monarch's reputation for divine sagacity seemed diminished, and the whole Jewish court looked solemn and melancholy. At length an expedient presented itself to the king, and it must be confessed, worthy of the natural philosopher. Observing a cluster of bees hovering about a window, he had it opened; the bees rushed into the court, and immediately alighted on one of the wreaths, whilst not a single one fixed on the other. The baffled Sheba had one more reason to be astonished at the wisdom of Solomon.

[We have read of another test to which the queen put the wise man's discernment. She selected the most effeminate looking boys she could find, and intermingling them in female dresses with the same number of girls, asked him, as he sat at a distance, "which was which." Solomon ordered balls to be put into the hands of the young multitude, and that every individual should throw them at some object, one by one. The different manner in which this action was performed enabled him to pronounce on the sex.]

GENERAL LAFAYETTE.—The departure of General Lafayette for America, is thus noticed in a Paris paper in the year 1777: "Paris, April 4.—One of the richest of our young nobility, the Marquis de Lafayette, a relation of the Duke de Noailles, between nineteen and twenty years of age, has at his own expense hired a frigate, and provided everything necessary for a voyage to America, with two officers of his acquaintance. He set out last week, having told his lady and family that he was going to Italy. He is to serve as a major general in the American army. On the other hand, the Count de Bulkely, an Irish gentleman, who is a major general in the French service, is going, with the leave of his majesty, to offer himself to the king of Great Britain to serve against the Americans."—British Magazine.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.—Of all the moral advantages of the new system of education, (Lancastrian) perhaps the greatest arises from the mildness of the punishments which it imposes. Its punishments appeal to the rational, not to the animal nature of man; and are calculated to influence the principles of the mind, rather than to impose torture on his body. Every blow inflicted for the correction of a bad action, excites ten bad feelings; and it is somewhat absurd to attempt to purify the stream by corrupting the source. A boy may be flogged for a fault, and the fault may be corrected; but it is corrected not in consequence of the flogging, but in spite of it. No virtuous principle was ever instilled into the human mind by stripes: their only effect is to irritate and harden, to make slaves, and train up tyrants.—Westminster Review.

STRIKING REFLECTIONS, ENDING WITH A BEAUTIFUL IMAGE.—Some things, it is true, are more prominent, and lead to more serious consequences than others, so as to excite a greater share of attention and applause. Public characters, authors, warriors, statesmen, &c. nearly monopolize public consideration in this way, and we are apt to judge of their merit by the noise they make in the world. Yet none of these classes would be willing to make the rule absolute; for a favorite player gains as much applause as any of them. A poet stands a poor chance either of popularity with the vulgar, or influence with the great, against a fashionable opera-dancer or singer. Reputation or notoriety is not the stamp of merit. Certain professions, like certain situations, bring it into greater notice, but have perhaps no more to do with it than birth or fortune. Opportunity sometimes indeed "throws a cruel sunshine on a fool." I have known several celebrated men, and some of them have been persons of the weakest capacity, yet accident had lifted them into general notice, and probably will hand their memories down to posterity. There are names written in her immortal scroll, at which Fame blushes!—Hazlitt's Characteristics.

JOHN ABELL, a gentleman of the chapel royal in the reign of Charles the second, was celebrated for a fine counter-tenor voice, and for his skill in playing the lute. The king wished to send him to the carnival at Venice, to show the Italians that there were good voices in England. This event, however, did not take place. In 1688 he was discharged from his situation, on account of his adherence to the Romish communion. He went abroad, and greatly distinguished himself by singing in public in several of the towns of Germany. He amassed great sums, but, as he lived profusely, he was often reduced to the necessity of travelling with his lute on his back, and often suffered many hardships. In his rambles he got as far as Poland. On his arrival at Warsaw, the king sent for him. Abell at first refused to attend the summons, but was prevailed upon to make his appearance at last. On his arrival at the palace he was seated on a chair, and drawn up to a great height from the floor of a spacious hall. Soon afterwards the king and his attendants appeared in a gallery opposite to him, and at the same time a number of bears were let loose below! The king gave him the choice whether he would sing or be let down among the bears. Abell wisely chose the former, and he declared afterwards that he never sang so well in his life as he did in his cage.—Musical Biography.

PLAIN PSALM-SINGING originated with Calvin. His separation from the church of Rome was founded on opposition to its discipline as well as its tenets, and in particular he laid the musical part of the service under great restraints. The whole of the music adopted by him consisted of that plain metrical psalmody which is now in general use among the reformed churches, and in the parochial churches of England. This seems to have been the origin of the practice of psalmody. Calvin employed a musician, Guillaume Franc, to set the psalms to easy tunes of one part only; and in this work the composer succeeded so well, that the people became almost infatuated with the love of psalm-singing. Even in the field of battle this has been made an incentive to courage. In the frequent insurrections of the reformers against their persecutors a psalm, sung by four or five hundred of their party, answered all the purpose of warlike music.—London Harmonicon.

THE WEALTH OF SIBERIA.—After telling us that blocks of native gold, of ten to twenty pounds weight, have been found in the gold mines, Mr. Dobell says, "Siberia produces a great variety of precious stones. The principal ones are the yellow and white topaz, amethysts, crystals of various sorts, aquamarines of different colors, hyacinths, sapphires, emeralds, a species of the ruby, garnets, &c.; also onyx, jasper, agate, porphyry, and marble, in great abundance. There are also silver mines in Perm. The adamant or loadstone, of strong attractive powers, is common there. Asbestos also is found in such quantities, that gloves are made of it at Ecatherineburg, as curiosities to sell to travellers. When soiled they are cleaned by putting them into a red-hot fire, the most intense heat only serving to whiten, without in any degree consuming, this extraordinary fossil. We may say with truth, there is scarcely a mineral or a fossil in nature that is not found in Siberia."—Dobell's Travels in Siberia.

CHINESE ABSURDITIES.—When the Hong merchants of China are summoned before the collector of customs, they present themselves on their knees, knocking their foreheads six, nine, or twelve times against the ground, before they are noticed and permitted to change their posture. And when they rise, they dare not lift their eyes higher than the level of the fifth button on the mandarin's breast! It is an unpardonable affront (or only atoned for by some strokes of the bamboo) should they chance to look him in the face. It would appear that the old proverb, "A cat may look at a king," has no parallel in China! Any one called before a judge to give his evidence or otherwise, is always obliged to knock his head at least three times to the ground, and is not suffered to speak, except in answer to the interrogatories which are put to him. Two men with bamboos stand near to punish him who infringes this rule. When they wish to swear a witness, a live cock and a knife are presented to him, and he is obliged to cut off the cock's head, at the moment of taking the oath. The cutting off the cock's head is considered in the same light as kissing the bible with us.—Ibid.

ORIGIN OF THE WORD VALET.—Varlet, valletton, squire, and damoiseau, are frequently used synonymously [in the thirteenth century] although the last title belongs more particularly to the following century. They were not merely servants, in the modern acceptation of the word, being also aspirants to the profession of knight or man-at-arms. The valet, therefore, degenerate as he is, may be proud of his ancestral dignity. In a house account of Philip le Bel [end of the thirteenth century] the three children of the king are called Varlets (La Roque de la Nobl.); and in Villehardouin the son of the emperor of the east is termed Varlet of Constantinople.

THE LATE AMIABLE RULER OF THE POLES.—When the Grand Duke Constantine was travelling in Germany, he on one occasion, weary of the slow progress he made, ordered the post-boy repeatedly to drive faster, but to no purpose; he then threatened to shoot him if he did not quicken his pace; the postillion persisted in joggling on at his own rate, which so provoked the grand duke, that he drew a pistol, and shot him dead upon the spot.—Lumsden's Journey.

LIFE OF A GENTLEMAN.—He gets up leisurely, breakfasts comfortably, reads the paper regularly, dresses fashionably, lounges fastidiously, eats a tart gravely, talks insipidly, dines considerably, drinks superfluously, kills time indifferently, sups elegantly, goes to bed stupidly, and lives uselessly.—French paper.

THE DUTCHMAN'S FIRESIDE.—The London Courier makes the following mention of Mr. Paulding's new novel: "Before we reviewed this work, we had seen some extracts in the New-York MIRROR from the American edition, which appears to have been sent to press before our own. What we then read gave us a high opinion of the book, which has been confirmed by a perusal of the whole. Those who have perused with interest the former publications of this author, will be much pleased with the present work."

SKETCH OF A SCHOOLFELLOW.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

He sat by me at school. His face is now Vividly in my mind, as if he went From me but yesterday—its pleasant smile, And the rich, joyous laughter of his eye, And the free play of his unhaughty lip, So redolent of his heart! He was not fair, Nor singular, nor over-fond of books, And never melancholy when alone. He was the heartiest in the ring, the last Home from the summer wanderings, and the first Over the threshold when the school was done. All of us loved him. We shall speak his name In the far years to come, and think of him When we have lost life's simplest passages, And pray for him—forgetting he is dead— Life was in him so passing beautiful!

His childhood had been wasted in the close And airless city. He had never thought That the blue sky was ample, or the stars Many in heaven, or the chainless wind Of a medicinal freshness. He had learn'd Perilous tricks of manhood, and his hand Was ready, and his confidence in himself Bold as a quarrelor's. Then he came away To the unshelter'd hills, and brought an eye New as a babe's to nature, and an ear As ignorant of its music. He was sad. The broad hill-sides seem'd desolate, and the woods Gloomy and dim, and the perpetual sound Of wind and waters and unquiet leaves Like the monotony of a dirge. He pined For the familiar things until his heart Sick'n'd for home!—and so he stole away To the most silent places, and lay down To weep upon the mosses of the slopes, And follow'd listlessly the silver streams Till he found out the unsunn'd shadowings, And the green openings to the sky, and grew Fond of them all insensibly. He found Sweet company in the brooks, and loved to sit And bathe his fingers wantonly, and feel The wind upon his forehead; and the leaves Took a beguiling whisper to his ear, And the bird-voices music, and the blast Swept like an instrument the sounding trees. His heart went back to its simplicity As the stirr'd waters in the night grow pure— Sadness and silence and the dim-lit woods Won on his love so well—and he forgot His pride, and his assumingness, and lost The mimicry of the man, and so unlearn'd His very character, till he became As diffident as a girl.

'Tis very strange How nature sometimes wins upon a child, Th' experience of the world is not on him, And poetry has not upon his brain Left a mock thirst for solitude, nor love Writ on his forehead the effeminate shame Which hideth from men's eyes. He has a full, Shadowless heart, and it is always toned More merrily than the chastened voice of winds And waters—yet he often, in his mirth, Stops by the running brooks, and suddenly Loiters, he knows not why, and at the sight Of the spread meadows and the lifted hills Feels an unquiet pleasure, and forgets To listen for his fellows. He will grow Fond of the early star, and lie awake Gazing with many thoughts upon the moon, And lose himself in the deep chamber'd sky With his untaught philosophies. It breeds Sadness in older hearts, but not in his; And he goes merrier to his play, and shouts Louder the joyous call—but it will sink Into his memory like his mother's prayer, For after years to brood on.

Cheerful thoughts Rose to the home-sick boy as he became Wakeful to beauty in the summer's change, And he came oftener to our noisy play, Cheering us on with his delightful shout Over the hills, and giving interest With his keen spirit to the boyish game. We loved him for his carelessness of himself, And his perpetual mirth; and though he stole Sometimes away into the woods alone, And wandered unaccompanied when the night Was beautiful, he was our idol still; And we have not forgotten him, though time Has blotted many a pleasant memory Of boyhood out, and we are wearing old With th' unplayfulness of this grown-up world.

CURIOSITY.

I hate that low vice—curiosity; But if there's any thing in which I shine, 'Tis in arranging all my friends' affairs, Not having of my own domestic cares.—Don Juan.

I was one morning sipping my coffee, in the village of B., and cogitating on the supreme merits of Mocha over every other beverage, when a loud, and somewhat shrill treble, apparently from the lungs of a person not in a consumption, interrupted my meditations. I arose and opened the door. A round, inquisitive female visage peered through the aperture, and shortly after the neck, shoulders, and the whole body corporate attached to the aforesaid physiognomy entered the room. I soon recognised in the alert eye and compact face of the stranger, the countenance of a lady to whom I had sometime before had the small pleasure of an introduction.

"Ah, Mr. McPherson," said she, "good morning. Caught you at breakfast, eh!—just sipping your first cup, I suppose. You old bachelors have your devotions, I perceive, as well as other people—but pray don't let me interrupt you—don't, I beseech you—was passing, and thought I would just step in upon you."

"Won't you keep me company, madam?" said I.

"No, no, I thank you, can't stop but a moment. Lord! what a pretty card-rack you have got here—I'll just look at it."

Miss Aurelia Giggie was a young lady, and had been a young lady for the last twenty years at least: she had reached that "certain age" that Byron calls "a most uncertain age," and which, unless one has access to the "family chronicle," or to the recollections of the "oldest inhabitant," is apt to remain uncertain. She was heir to a respectable fortune, and a tolerably respectable face; and yet she was unmarried. Whether her power of loquacity acted as a barrier to the connubial state, or whether it was that overpowering spirit of curiosity she possessed to an extraordinary extent, that frightened away her lovers, I know not. Her own reasons, to say the least of them, were reasonable reasons. She had refused a dozen "good matches," for no other cause in the world, than that they did not suit her. She was the chronicle of the village—the walking bulletin—the herald of strange events. Nothing transpired that she did not know of, and, as if she was blessed with omniscience, seemed to have knowledge of coincident facts, from actual observation, so immediate was her information, and so positive was she of the truth of it. She was as curious as a Yankee girl, fresh from the Green Mountains, and was never satisfied in her morning visits unless she had made some new discovery, or ascertained that no secret in that family was undeveloped to her. Nor was she so selfish as to wish to gain all this information without a certain quid pro quo—on the contrary, she amused you with anecdote, while at the same time she was putting you to the torture by her persevering curiosity to know every thing, and her anxiety to regulate every thing relating to your personal or domestic economy. Her whole life was thus devoted to her neighbors. She was certainly the most disinterested individual I ever knew; her mornings were occupied in visiting her acquaintances, and arranging their family affairs for them in a way as kind as it was unexpected.

"Do you know," said she, "that I think this rack is too large? and I do not like the shape—you should have one in the form of a harp; and now I think of it, I shall send to New-York to-morrow, and you shall have one of the proper fashion."

"Thank you, Miss Giggie."

"Miss B. is to be married soon, they say. Dear me, how the girls go off—to Capt. S. You know him, I believe."

"I have seen him," said I, "but—"

"They say he is of a good family, in the north. How old may he be?"

"I don't know—thirty, perhaps."

"Thirty! bless me! so old! Why, what a fool the girl is! What a beautiful set of china that is—it is china, is it not?"

"I believe it is."

"You did not buy that yourself, did you?"

"No, it was a present."

"From some lady, I dare say."

"Yes."

"Do I know her?"

"I presume not."

"Who was it, pray? Was it Miss S.? She was once a great friend of yours."

"No."

"Who was it then?"

"My mother."

"Indeed, ah!"

She was satisfied, and bade me good morning. There had been a couple of friends of mine in town the day before, who had called and left a card. Miss Aurelia knew this—had seen the strangers stop at my house, and leave the door without coming in. She had been in agony the whole day to find out who they were—of course she was unsuccessful, as they staid but one hour, and knew no one but myself in the village. I was indebted, therefore, for this visit to her curiosity to find out who they were—she saw the card, and her object was accomplished—but happening to observe something on my table she had never seen before, she was doubly satisfied in her visit, by ascertaining how it came into my possession. I walked out, just after she left, with the intention of calling upon some families, when I saw the penny post going out of the garden gate—the door was open, and I walked into the hall without ringing, and perhaps without much noise. Casting my eyes into the front parlor as I passed, I beheld, standing at a small work table with her back towards me, my late visitor, Miss Giggie. From the situation of the mirror, that stood just in front of her, I could perceive that she was busily engaged in turning and twisting a sealed letter with a great deal of hurry and impatience. I felt that my situation was certainly not a very honorable one; but considering the occupation of the person on whom my observation was fixed, I thought it no great matter to place myself against the wainscot, and observe more particularly her operations. After a great deal of prying about the edges of the inclosure, and after turning it over and examining the superscription a number of times, she looked warily around the room, to be sure that no one was observing her, and then, with a pan-knife that was lying on the escrutoire beside her, very carefully split the wafer, opened the letter, and began to peruse the contents. I left her in this praiseworthy occupation, and walked into the back room, where I was soon joined by the hostess.

"I saw Williams in the yard; I wonder if he brought me any letters?" said she; a servant came in and answered the question, and at the same moment Miss Giggie entered the room.

"My dear Miss D.," said she, "how well you do look; re'ely this warm weather seems to agree with you young people. I have been looking at the pictures in the other room—you have a fine collection, Miss D., but re'ely, if I might presume to offer a word of advice as to their arrangement on the walls, I should say that if that large painting of the Saracen was a leetle nearer the light, the delicacy of the coloring would be more perfectly apparent—but I am detaining you—I saw your maid with some letters in her hand just now."

"Yes," said Miss D., "and here they are." She took the letters from the stand and was glancing over the directions, "Bless me!" she cried, "that post must outspeed the wind—here is a letter post-marked 'Boston,' that has traveled over one hundred miles with such velocity that the seal has not had time to dry," and glanced at Miss Giggie.

"Indeed!" said this personage, while the natural bronze of her face assumed a still browner hue; "indeed! but now I remember reading an account of one of the mails being dropped in the water, while crossing the Potomac—perhaps your letter came in the bag."

This is a true picture, and if it shall meet the eye of the individual for whom it is meant, perhaps it may be the means of arresting that dishonorable curiosity, and that tell-tale prattle which has already created ill feelings and unjust suspicions in the midst of the happiest and worthiest community it was ever my good fortune to meet with. Although these habits of impertinent curiosity are not of so black a kind as to bring the offenders under the jurisdiction of a court of justice, yet they may render them disagreeable companions, and go far to interrupt the peace and happiness of the social circles. Just in proportion as modesty and ingenuousness are attractive and graceful qualities in woman, this petty, mean, prying spirit is contemptible and disgusting. It outweighs all accomplishments, and neutralizes a thousand virtues. However susceptible a man may be to female charms, one such degrading exhibition of weakness would entirely freeze his heart; at least I am certain it would mine; and if I were a young, likely fellow, and was even engaged to marry the girl of my choice, I am afraid my passion could not outlive such a sight. I have heard somewhere of a gentleman who broke off a match which promised very profitable, as well as agreeable results to all parties, because on suddenly opening the parlor door he caught the bride on her knees with her ear to the key-hole. For my part I am naturally prone to confidence in all the world. I cannot look a lady or gentleman in the face and deliberately believe them capable of exploring other people's drawers, stealing an examination of letters or papers, or striving to overhear private conversations. I conceive it to be fully equivalent to stealing. Indeed I rather prefer that such an officious meddler should take money from my pocket than acquire possession of the contents of many of my papers. Yet I conceive the crime, for it perfectly merits the appellation, to be so totally incompatible with the feelings and characters of a lady or gentleman, that I frequently leave my books and desk exposed, and scarcely admit in my most secret thoughts that any of my acquaintances could take advantage of a generous confidence in their integrity, and disgrace themselves by this moral petty larceny.

As I have commenced this essay with the recital of a misdemeanor in a female, I cannot do better than end it with one of an opposite description, which may counterbalance the other. A wild young fellow married a lovely girl, and having been long addicted to habits of dissipation, even the sincere attachment which he entertained towards his wife could not entirely disentangle him from its snares. His occasionally irregular hours would have given any but one of so pure and sweet a disposition every reason to suspect that she did not hold that place in his affection which was her right; but this reflection scarcely ever intruded upon her spirits. The husband was far from being cruel, and really loved her, but his disposition was weak and his companions eloquent, and he seemed rather to grow worse than better in his habits. It happened once that he was called out of town, and in his haste left behind him a letter, in which, to please an unprincipled friend, he had spoken of his wife in terms of carelessness, if not of derision, and dilated freely upon his general course of life. Imagine the anxiety and suspense of the startled profligate when he found himself borne by a rapid steamboat upon a journey which must necessarily be of several days duration, and remembering distinctly that the fatal letter was left exposed and unsealed upon his wife's table. He recollected also with a pang, that he had wantonly, in answer to her inquiries, boasted that it contained a profound secret, which he would not have revealed for the world. He paced the deck in an agony of disappointment and shame. He pictured her opening the letter, turning pale with horror and indignation—perhaps fainting with anguish—alarmed the servants—flying to her father—renouncing him forever. As soon as possible he returned, but with a sinking heart, to his dwelling, bracing himself up to meet the fury of an enraged and wretched woman. He opened the door softly. She was bending over her table, busily writing. A placid smile sealed her mouth with a perfect beauty, and spread over her glowing features the mild expression of peace and joy; and even as she wrote, the fragment of a sweet ballad fell from her lips in a low music that flows only from a heart entirely at rest. The husband stole noiselessly around, and read as her pen traced her gentle thoughts.

"Your letter is lying by me. The very, very letter containing the 'profound secret.' Now could I not punish you for your carelessness; but, my dearest Charles, how could I look you in the face on your return after having basely violated your trust in my integrity, and meanly sought to gratify a silly curiosity at the expense of honesty, delicacy, and confidence. No. The letter is unopened, and lest you should feel uneasy, I inclose it to you, with the sincere love of your affectionate wife," &c.

"She is an angel!" muttered the conscience-stricken husband.

She started up with a cry of pleasure—and as Charles met the light of her clear, unshrinking eyes, he was humbled that he should have suspected her, and deeply struck with repentance at his own conduct. He thenceforth severed all ties that drew him abroad; and if the pure and happy being whose influence had thus allured him to the path of right had perused all his subsequent letters, she would have found nothing concerning herself save bursts of the sincerest admiration and the warmest love.

ORIGINAL CRITICAL NOTICES.

MILTON'S PROSE WORKS.

THE name of Milton is repeated with pride by every English scholar; but we are afraid his name is more familiar to our lips than his writings to our studies; that he is more talked of than known, and rather our boast than admiration. Paradise Lost may fill a conspicuous place in our libraries, but Marmion and Childe Harold are oftener found on our tables and in our hands. These are like youthful friends, our daily companions; the former a reverend ancient, whose tedious wisdom and forbidding gravity we avoid, while we cannot help respecting.

If such, however, is the fate of Milton's poetry, with all its rich beauty and unequalled sublimity, all its wealth of fancy, luxuriance of imagery, and ravishing delights of melody, it is not to be wondered at that his prose works have fallen into still deeper neglect. The frivolous taste of the present age, and the unsubstantial stuff which is its daily aliment, give us a disrelish for the simple and solid fare which nourished the minds of our ancestors. It is too much indeed to expect that those whose utmost literary exertion is to lounge over a fashionable duodecimo, will be content to pore for hours over huge musty folios; or will quit the gay trifling of Pelham or Vivian Grey, to unsphere the grave, solemn spirit of the mighty dead. In this point of view the great quantity not less than the inferiority of the literature of the present age, is a crying evil. How can a person engaged, perhaps, in business, bent on forwarding his views in life, and pressing onwards in the eager race of the world, with but a few occasional moments to snatch from more imperious duties and devote to reading, keep up, as the phrase is, with the literature of the day, and yet turn aside to the severe thought and attention which the study of the ponderous worthies of the old school requires? If he would be able to play his part in society, and take a share in conversation, he must idle away all his time on the ephemeral nothings which are the talk of the moment. There is no such inducement for him to undertake a long tedious pilgrimage through page after page of close reasoning and formidable-looking antiquity. He may enjoy the reputation of a polite scholar, and a man of extensive reading, yet be all his life ignorant of the glowing, burning imagination of Jeremy Taylor, of the shrewd wit of South, the rich quaintness of Fuller, the fulness of Barrow, the weight of Hooker, the nerve of Milton, and the majesty of Bacon.

It is hardly to be expected, indeed, that the prose works of Milton should enjoy even the partial popularity of his poetry. They are inferior in interest as well as in merit. No man can be expected to read with great attention a long dissertation on church government and discipline, even though sanctioned by the greatest name which our literature can boast of. Milton's prose style, too, is not one calculated to enchain the wandering attention, or fix the careless lounge over his pages. Always strong and generally stately, it still often seems forced and labored. We say seems, for when we view it more closely, we find that its texture is not clumsy or confused, but merely rich and massive. Yet as the heavy cloth of gold is more cumbrous than the flimsy tissue, so is Milton's style, pregnant with thought and loaded with matter as it is, harsh and unpleasant. He was deeply imbued with the spirit of antiquity, and with the genius of that majestic language, the tongue of the conquerors of the world, which he wrote with Ciceronian fluency and dignity; and his English sentences, long, sounding, and intricate, are formed in the same mould with his Latin ones. The very strength of his style and depth of his thoughts make it often an effort to go along with him. We must not merely glance at but grapple with these long and involved sentences; we must fairly break the locks and fetters in which their sense is bound and chained up. His is not the sparkling but shallow stream which we fathom at a glance, but deep pools of thought and wells of reflection, into which the eye must gaze long and earnestly before it can penetrate their depths or discern their hidden treasures.

The subjects of his works, we have said, offer little interest to the general reader; yet, in one point of view, they are peculiarly worthy of attention. Theological writings may, for the most part, be safely left for the perusal of those champions of the church militant who are always girt for the fight, and for ever wielding the weapons of controversy. But at the time when Milton wrote, religious feeling played a prominent part in the great drama of which England was the theatre. Religious went hand in hand with political persecution, and freedom of faith was vindicated in the same fields where the martyrs of liberty bled for freedom of opinion. A tyrannical government called in an oppressive church establishment to its aid, and the contest was carried on as well by the weapons of argument as of force. The controversy between episcopacy and independence is synonymous and identical with that between king and people, between prerogative and right. In this point of view Milton's "Argument against Prelacy" is part of the history of the age; so also is that noble strain "Areopagitica, or a Defence of the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing;" and the still more majestic "Defence of the People of England." The cause he espoused, the cause of truth and justice, needed no champion; but it was not unworthy of the author of Paradise Lost to explain in the eyes of the world the principles for which Vane fought and Hampden bled and Sidney suffered. As a political writer Milton appears in a very different light from that in which he is seen as a poet. He plunged into the very thick of the contest which heaved and swelled like a sea around him, and shared all the fierce excitement which called forth Cromwell's military skill, and Pym's prudence, and Harrison's headlong zeal. He stood forward to defend at once that liberty which was his birthright as a man, and that more glorious liberty where-with Christ had set him free, against the oppression of tyranny and the intolerance of bigotry, and warred alike unsparingly and unceasingly on the king and the archbishop. In his poetry there are no traces of the eventful scenes among which he moved, nor of the stormy passions that raged around him. All is peace and quiet: he leaves the world and its tumults and quarrels behind, to soar into the calm expanse of heaven. He is then like those higher spirits who, in his own verses,

"Apart sat on a hill retired
In thought more elevate, and reasoned high
Of Providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate."

What a contrast between the Iconoclast and Paradise Lost! What a change from the angry, though just invective and fairly warlike tone of the Argument against Prelacy to the delicate, fanciful beauty of Comus; to the calm contemplative mind which breathes the sweetness of its own nature and the music of its own thoughts through the melody of Il Penseroso, or in the Christmas Hymn ascends, as on an angel's wing, to the feet of the Savior's throne! And in his poetry Milton appears in his true and congenial character. The exigencies of the times in which he lived, which allowed no man to be the mere theoretic friend of liberty, or an idle well-wisher of truth, called him out into the arena of controversy. His time and talents were cheerfully devoted to uphold the sentiments and party to which his opinions attached him. He left "quivering the young-eyed cherubim," to address a guilty king and an aroused people; to uphold, proclaim, and enforce those great principles for and against which the kingdom was then divided against itself. But when the contest was over and the battle fought, he returned to his obscure retirement and quiet studies, and sought once more the society of his former friends and kindred spirits, of Plato and Homer, David and Isaiah. A modern poet has said,

"His soul was as a star, and dwelt apart," but it did not always, like the distant lights of heaven, look coldly down on the world and its changes. We may rather compare the course of his mind, always tending upward into the unseen glories of immensity, but often prevented and summoned back to the earth, to that of the lark, which another of our old worthies describes as "reaching to heaven and striving to get above the clouds, but beaten back by the low sighings of an eastern wind, and forced to lie down and pant, and wait till the storm was over;" but which, when the face of heaven was clear and smiling, "did rise and sing as though it had learned music and motion from an angel as he passed some time through the air about his ministries here below."

That this was the natural bent of his spirit, and these his congenial studies; that his mind, albeit it might

"In the various bustle of resort
Be all too ruffled and sometimes impaired,"

was always pluming its pinions for the high flight it finally took, he himself has told us in a passage whose majestic eloquence and dignified modesty will be our excuse for extracting it at length. In one of his earliest works, the book on church government, he apologizes for having undertaken so arduous a task at so tender an age. He says he was almost forced into it against his inclinations, which tended elsewhere. "From my youth up," he continues, "I began to hope that I might perhaps leave something so written to after-times as they should not willingly let it die. Time serves not now, and I might perhaps seem too profuse to give any certain account of what the mind at home hath liberty to propose to herself, though of highest hope and hardest attempting; whether that epic form whereof the two poems of Homer and those other two of Virgil and Tasso are a diffuse, and the book of Job a brief model, or whether those dramatic constitutions wherein Sophocles and Euripides reign shall be found more doctrinal and exemplary to a nation. The scripture also offers us a divine pastoral drama in the Song of Solomon, and the apocalypse of St. John is the majestic image of a high and stately tragedy, shutting up and intermingling her solemn scenes and acts with a sevenfold chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphonies. Or if occasion shall lead to imitate those magnificent odes and hymns wherein Pindarus and Callimachus are in most things worthy. These abilities are of power, beside the office of a pulpit, to imbreed and cherish in a great people the seeds of virtue and public civility, to allay the perturbations of the mind, and set the affections in right tune, to celebrate in glorious and lofty hymns the throne and equipage of God's almightiness, and what he works and what he suffers to be wrought with high providence in his church—to sing victorious agonies of martyrs and saints, the deeds and triumphs of just and pious nations, doing valiantly through faith against the enemies of Christ, to deplore the general relaxes of kingdoms and states from justice and God's true worship. Lastly, whatever in religion is holy or sublime, in virtue amiable or grave, whatsoever hath passion or admiration in all the changes of that which is called fortune from without, or the wily subtleties and refluxes of man's thoughts from within—all these things with a solid and treatable smoothness to paint out and describe. Neither do I think it shame to covenant with any knowing reader, that for some few years yet I may go on trust with him towards the payment of what I am now indebted, as being a work not to be raised from the heat of youth or the vapors of wine, like that which flows at waste from the pen of some vulgar amorous or the trencher fury of a rhyming parasite, nor to be obtained by the invocation of Dame Memory and her siren daughters, but by devout prayer to that Eternal Spirit who can enrich with all utterance and knowledge, and sends out his Seraphim with the hallowed fire of his altar to touch and purify the lips of whom he pleases. I trust hereby to make it manifest with what small willingness I endure to interrupt the pursuit of no less hopes than these, and leave a calm and pleasing solitariness, fed with cheerful and confident thoughts, to embark in a troubled sea of noises and hoarse disputes. But were it the meanest under-service, if God by his secretary Conscience enjoin it, it were sad for me if I should draw back."

The great characteristics of Milton's mind were strong love, diligent search, and fearless assertion of truth. Freedom of thought was the foundation of his religious creed and political opinions. The decrees of councils and fathers, the dogmas of divines, the dictations of arbitrary power, he rejected with disdain. He owned no laws but those of justice and natural right, no text-book but the Bible. His aim was always to set before his countrymen "the very visible shape and image of virtue, whereby she is not only seen in the regular gestures and motions of her heavenly paces as she walks, but also makes the harmony of her voice audible to mortal ears." Such being the end and scope of his writings, they have not only the literary merit that delights, but the moral grandeur that improves and elevates. So pure, so lofty were all Milton's thoughts and affections, that they rose, as it were instinctively, far

"Above the smoke and stir of this dim spot Which men call earth,"

to seek their proper resting place, and we rise from his majestic lessons of virtue and piety with higher ideas of the scope of the human mind and the dignity of human nature. They call up in every generous and uncorrupted breast more exalted, if not stronger emotions than any mere poetry can do. Byron is read a dozen times where Milton is once; but who, even of Byron's warmest admirers, would compare his most fascinating strains with Milton's heavenly harpings? And how different the thoughts which they awaken, and the sympathies to which they appeal! How contemptible, how deficient in moral beauty do the greatest efforts of the modern poet appear by the side of the mighty ancient! How different too, Milton's retirement, and Byron's exile on the continent, passed, the one in peaceful studies, honest thoughts, and pleasant recollections—the other in a round of heartless, daring, unblushing dissipation; the fragrance of Milton's virtues rising to heaven "like a stream of rich distilled perfume," the corruption of Byron's heart breathing itself in foul and noxious exhalations. No man of sense would ever put their poetry on an equality; but compare their prose writings, contrast the records of himself and his life Milton has left behind, with the memorials of Byron which the injudicious attachment of his friends has given to the world. Compare the noble patience and resignation, the dignity and heavenly calmness of the poor blind schoolmaster, with the weak, querulous complainings, the moody disappointed jealousy, the utter want and shameless defiance of principle of the spoiled child of rank and fashion. While Byron's muse panders to all the wild passions and lawless appetites of our nature, Milton's seeks to teach us "what religious, what glorious and magnificent use might be made of poetry, both in divine and human things." While Byron's object seems to have been to degrade every better feeling and impulse of our nature, and reduce all to the level of his own cold, selfish, sneering scepticism, Milton inculcates "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report." While Byron's employment in the difficulties, unpopularity, and odium which his ill conduct brought him to, is only to declare

"I have not loved the world, nor the world me,"

Milton tells us,

"Yet I argue not
Against heaven's holy will, nor bate a jot
Of heart or hope, but still bear up and steer
Right onward."

The truth is, we are apt to be dazzled by the dangerous eloquence of a Rousseau, or the brilliant profligacy of a Byron into extenuation at least, of their errors. It is not till we see men like Milton or Pascal, as far superior to them as day to night, instead of thinking genius a license for misconduct, devoting their transcendent powers, in all cheerfulness and humility, to the enforcement of truth, the support of virtue, the inculcation of piety, that we clearly discern their deficiencies and their guilt. Let Rousseau complain of the hard-hearted world, which would not bear with all the whims of his sickly sentimentality, and let Byron tell us of aversion richly earned by his own excesses, and of unhappiness the natural result of a reproving conscience—these complaints should excite our pity indeed, but pity not unminged with both censure and contempt. How different the spectacle, and how different the feeling it excites, when we see Pascal, after sounding all the heights and depths of human science, at an age when Byron was a schoolboy and Rousseau an unformed peasant, counting triumphs to which neither of them in their best days could even aspire, but as vanity, and turning aside to study and illustrate the still higher truths of revelation, undisturbed by painful and wasting disease, untroubled by the approach of death, or when we see Milton sacrificing his eyesight to write, not a strain of seducing sophistry or heartless atheistical raving, but a manly defence of a great and memorable act of justice. The one is a mournful example of the aberration of the human intellect—the other the picture of a mind and heart alike good and great, in their highest elevation and most spotless purity. Such is the character which give majesty to Milton's prose writings as well as to his poetry, and which, apart from their strong thought, stately diction, and vigorous eloquence, entitles them to a high rank among the classics of our language.

MYTHOLOGY.

THE MONTH OF OCTOBER IN NEW-YORK.

BY S. WOODWORTH.

THIS month, like September, derives its name from its number counting the eighth from March; but is the tenth month of the modern year. The Saxons called it wine month, because it was the season for pressing their grape to make wine.

From among the remarkable events which have happened in October, we select the following: The unfortunate Major Andre was executed on the second, 1780; the battle of Germantown was fought on the fourth, 1777; Harrison's victory over the combined English and Indian forces under General Proctor, and the celebrated Tecumseh, was obtained on the fifth, 1813; the American forts, Montgomery and Clinton, were taken by the British on the sixth, 1777; the battle of King's Mountain took place on the seventh, 1780; the Polish Count Pulaski, while fighting for American freedom, was slain in an attack on Savannah on the ninth, 1779; the Poles were defeated by the Russians, and Kosciuszko taken prisoner on the tenth, 1794; the United States frigate Boston, Captain George Little, captured the French frigate Berceau on the twelfth, 1800; the battle of Queenstown was fought on the thirteenth, 1812; General Burgoyne surrendered his army to the Americans on the seventeenth, 1781; the battle of Trafalgar and death of Lord Nelson took place on the twenty-first, 1805; the British frigate Macedonian was captured by the American frigate United States, commanded by Commodore Decatur on the twenty-fifth, 1812; the revolutionary battle of White Plains was fought on the twenty-eighth, 1776.

The ninth of October is called St. Deny's; the tenth St. Symphorien's; the eighteenth, St. Luke's; the twenty-fifth, St. Crispin's; and the twenty-eighth, St. Simon's and St. Jude's.

Of the two first of the above-named saints, we know nothing; but history informs us that St. Luke, the evangelist, was a physician, of Antioch, in Syria; converted to the christian faith by Paul, of whom he afterwards became the faithful associate. Besides his gospel, which is composed in very pure language, he wrote the acts of the Apostles. He lived, according to Jerome, to his eighty-third year.

St. Crispin was a celebrated patron of the cordwainers, commonly called shoe-makers, but we doubt if his saintship ever foresaw the numerous, various, and queer fashions which have since succeeded each other in the shape, &c. of this very necessary appendage to personal costume. In the year 1565, during the reign of Edward IV. it was proclaimed throughout England that the toes, or rather beaks or peaks, of shoes or boots, should not exceed two inches, "on pain of cursing by the clergy," and forfeiting twenty shillings; one noble of which was to be paid to the king, one noble to the cordwainers of London, and the other noble to the chamber of London. Previous to this edict, for nearly two hundred years, the peaks of shoes and boots were of such length that they were actually tied up to the knees with chains of silver, gilt, or at least with silk lace! Shoes of the modern fashion, (we do not mean the present square toes) were first worn in England in 1633. About the year 1794, pantaloons were generally substituted for the former inexpressibles throughout England and America, and worn with boots; so that the use of buckles, which had been almost universally worn, was done away. This fashion took its rise in France, during the early stage of the revolution; hence the term of sans culottes. In 1817 the prince regent of England recommended the use of buckles, strings having been worn for many years in place of them.

St. Simon, surnamed Zelotes, was an apostle who preached the gospel in Egypt, Lybia, and Mauritania, and finally suffered martyrdom in Persia. St. Jude, who was also an apostle, and the author of an epistle in the New Testament, preached in Lybia, Mesopotamia, Syria, Idumæa, and Arabia, and is supposed to have suffered martyrdom in Berytus, in the year eighty.

On the twenty-third of this month the sun enters the sign scorpion, the reptile—

"Which Tellus did on purpose breed
To let Orion see
Though he did in power exceed,
There stronger was than he."

This Orion was a celebrated giant of antiquity, who destroyed the wild beasts of Chios, and presumptuously boasted that there was no animal on earth which he could not conquer. To punish his vanity, Tellus, or the earth, produced a scorpion, of whose bite he died. After death, he was placed in the heavens as a constellation, which still bears his name. It is composed of seventeen stars in the form of a man holding a sword, which has given occasion for the poets often to speak of Orion's sword. The scorpion which caused his death was placed in the zodiac, as one of the twelve signs. The constellation of Orion is thus mentioned in the book of Job, chapter xxxviii. verse 31: "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion?" When it is considered that the book of Job is of much greater antiquity than the poems of Homer, it seems still more difficult to determine the precise period in which the science of astronomy took its rise. The twelve signs of the zodiac, the other constellations, and some of the planets, have retained their present names probably for more than four thousand years!

October in New-York is an important and interesting month. Business of every description, which began to revive in September, now reaches its semi-annual climax, which it generally retains until the middle of November. Western merchants and country traders are now obtaining their winter supplies of goods; while the exuberant bounties of nature are pouring into the city by a thousand different channels. The markets abound with flesh, fowl, fish, game, vegetables, and autumn fruits of every possible variety, and in the most cheering profusion. The weather is cool, pleasant, mild, temperate, and healthful. Musketeers, those merciless blood-suckers, who, during the dog-days, hovered round the couch of defenceless innocence, precluding their cannibal banquet with songs of infernal triumph, are now awaiting the penalty of their ruthless transgressions from the white-haired Jack Frost, the fatal influence of whose breath they already begin to feel every morning and evening. Five-act tragedies can now be tolerated; parades and fairs are laid aside for the season, and all who are wise and prudent begin to think about fine flannel, dry feet, and Lackawana coal.

THE FINE ARTS.

ENGRAVINGS.

WE are nearly smothered up this week under heaps of really brilliant engravings, showered down upon us by our industrious friend Peabody. In the first place, here are two numbers of a work published in London, entitled "Views of the East; comprising India, Canton, and the shores of the Red sea, &c. &c. from original sketches by Captain Elliott, R. N.; with historical and descriptive illustrations." The numbers are in the imperial octavo form, and each contains three large, and sometimes highly-finished plates. Some are really exquisite. Among others is a lovely picture of Shere Shah, at Sasseram, one of the emperors of Hindostan, of whom there is given an interesting account:

"Sasseram is a town in the district of Shahabad, lying about twenty miles north of the Sone river, which empties itself into the Ganges, above the city of Patna. The new road between Calcutta and Benares passes through Sasseram; so that many travellers proceeding to the upper parts of India, have the opportunity of seeing the beautiful mausoleum of Shere Shah, without going out of their way. This monument stands in the centre of a tank or artificial piece of water, about a mile in circumference, and the isolated situation of the building gives it a peculiarly picturesque appearance. The remains of a bridge from the shore to the island may still be seen, as represented in the print.

"The name of Shere occupies a conspicuous place in the history of Hindostan. He was originally called Ferid, and was the son of Hussein, of the tribe of the Soors, Afghans of Roh, a mountainous country on the confines of India and Persia. This tract, in its fertile valleys, contained many separate tribes. One of the sons of the Ghorian family, whose name was Mahomet Soor, having left his native country, placed himself among the Afghans of Roh, and became the father of the tribe of Soor, which was esteemed the noblest among them.

"Ibrahim, the grandfather of Shere, appears to have gone to seek his fortune at Delhi, at a period of trouble peculiarly favorable to an adventurer. Hussein, the son of Ibrahim, was taken into the service of Jemmal, the Suba of Jionpoor, a chief of high renown, who favored him so much as to give him the districts of Sasseram and Tanda, in Jagier, (as it is called,) for which he was to maintain five hundred horse. In the course of a few years Hussein gave up the charge of his estate to Ferid (Shere) his eldest son, remaining himself at Jionpoor.

"The historian of Shere gives the following anecdote of him at this time. Ferid, when he took leave of his father, said, 'That the stability of government depended on justice, and that it would be his greatest care not to violate it, either by oppressing the weak, or permitting the strong to infringe the laws with impunity.' How he became possessed of this sentiment it is somewhat difficult to conceive, his education having been received in a country, the history of which furnishes so many examples of oppression, and breach of trust; nor does it appear that Shere by any means adhered to his own principle, either in obtaining or maintaining that high station of dignity and power, at which in the course of time he was destined to arrive. In some disputes with his brothers, concerning his Jagier at Sasseram, Ferid joined Par Chan, who had subdued Behar, and assumed the royal dignity, under the name of Mahmood. In a hunting party with this monarch, Ferid killed a large tiger with a blow of his sabre, and was honored with the title of Shere Chan, (Shere, signifying Lion.)

"In a visit to the Mogul camp, in the days of the Emperor Baber, Shere seems first to have conceived the idea of dispossessing the foreigners, as he called the Moguls, of the empire of Hindostan. To follow Shere through the whole of the course by which he at length dethroned, and sent as an exile to Persia the gallant and unfortunate Humaïoon, the son of Baber, would occupy more space than can be allowed in noticing the subject of this plate. After fifteen years of a military life, checked by all the hazards and vicissitudes that mark the progress of one who achieves an empire by war and stratagem, Shere mounted the Musnud as emperor of Hindostan, upon which he was permitted to sit only for the space of five years.

"The death of Shere somewhat resembles that of a warlike and restless prince of an European country. At the siege of Callinger, one of the strongest hill-forts of Hindostan, he was mortally wounded by the bursting of a shell, causing a quantity of gunpowder to blow up in a battery in which he stood, as he was about to assault the place. The words that recount his death are thus given in Dow's translation of Ferishta's history:—'In this dreadful condition the king began to breathe in great agonies; he, however, encouraged the continuance of the attack, and gave orders, till in the evening news was brought him of the reduction of the place. He then cried out, thanks to Almighty God, and expired.'

"The historian goes on to state, 'The character of Shere is almost equally divided between virtue and vice. Public justice prevailed in the kingdom, while private acts of treachery dishonored the hands of the king. He seemed to have made breach of faith a royal property, which he would by no means permit his subjects to share with him. Had he been born to the throne he might have been just, as he was valiant and politic in war; had he confined his mind to his estate, he might have merited the character of a virtuous chief; but his great soul made him look up to empire, and he cared not by what steps he was to ascend.

"Shere left many monuments of his magnificence behind him. From Bengal and Sannargaum to that branch of the Indus called Nilah, which is about three thousand of our miles, he built caravanserais at every stage, and dug a well at the end of every two miles. Besides, he raised many magnificent mosques, for the worship of God on the highways, wherein he appointed readers of the koran, and priests. He ordered that at every stage all travellers, without distinction of country or religion, should be entertained according to their quality, at the public expense. He planted rows of fruit-trees along the roads, to preserve the travellers from the scorching heat of the sun, as well as to gratify their taste. Horse-posts were placed at proper distances, for forwarding quick intelligence to government, and for the advantage of trade and correspondence. This establishment was new in India. Such was the public security during his reign, that travellers and merchants, throwing down their goods, went without fear to sleep on the highway.

"He divided his time into four equal parts: one he appropriated to the distribution of public justice; one to the regulations of his army; one to worship, (an example worthy the imitation of those immersed in public business;) and the remainder to rest and recreation. He was buried at Sasseram, his original estate, in a magnificent sepulchre, which he had built in the middle of a great reservoir of water."

"At the time that the compiler of these notes visited Sasseram, there was no European resident there. But a rich native, of the name of Khan Kubberdeen, rather contrary to the native custom, appeared to make it his business to attend to and supply the wants of every European that passed that way. He was as civil and courteous in his manners as he was kind and hospitable in his disposition."

In addition to these we have a head of Bulwer, by Dick, and twenty-eight numbers of the "National Portrait Gallery of Illustrations and Eminent Personages, particularly of the nineteenth century; with Memoirs, by William Jerdan, Esq. London. 1831." Some of these are specimens of most superior workmanship. There is an unusually fine head of West, and also of Sir Humphry Davy and Sir Walter Scott. From the account of the latter we extract a few observations:

"To give any thing like a detailed account of his various productions, is impossible within our limits. His works are a library of themselves. Among his contributions to the periodicals of the day was a noble tribute to the memory of Lord Byron. This article, which appeared in Blackwood, was as beautiful in style as it was in feeling, written in the generous spirit of a great mind doing justice to an equal—but envy, like cunning, is the vice of petty natures. Of the secrecy observed about the writer of works so popular, we can only observe, that, at least, an author may be permitted to say, 'I will do what I please with my own'; besides, Sir Walter was much too acute not to know the attraction of mystery. The confession at last was anything but voluntary; it was the inevitable consequence of poor Constable's failure.

"If we look at the quantity which Scott has written, it would seem incredible; but when we also look at the quality, and remember the vast mass of material that he must have accumulated, it adds wonder to applause. People are very apt to talk of the luxury of literary pursuits—the pleasures of an author. The pleasure of literature is like the pleasure of any other business to the professional writer; and those who talk of literary ease know nothing of the mere manual exertion of writing, the absolute bodily fatigue, to say nothing of the wear and tear of mind, whose powers are in continual requisition. Hardly earned are both the honors and profits of literature; and well does Sir Walter Scott deserve his share of both. Equally appreciated at home and abroad, never has author received more tokens of universal admiration. His works are translated into most known languages; and Mrs. Charles Gore mentions, in her Hungarian Tales, that in one of the inns the head of 'Valter Skote' is hung up as a sign. Abbotsford, the place in which he has taken so much pleasure, is, as Halleck beautifully says of Robert Burns' grave, one of the "Shrines to no code or creed confined,

The Delphian vales, the Palestines,
The Meccas of the mind."

"The rank of baronet, with which our author has been honored, is the first instance of such a distinction being conferred on literary merit. His conversational powers are very great; perhaps his style of telling a story is unrivalled in its dramatic effect. His memory is very extraordinary, and dwells to this day with delight on its early tales of legendary lore. We heard a little anecdote of him, with which we cannot do better than conclude:

"Walking with Wordsworth last summer, he was detailing his many literary plans. 'Why, you are laying down work for a life,' said his companion. 'No, no, not for a life,' rejoined Sir Walter, 'but for twenty years; I have twenty years' mind and health in me yet.' May these words be prophetic!"

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

WE have given Mr. Sinclair a full and patient attention through the range of operas selected for his opening engagement, and it now becomes our duty to express our unbiassed opinion of his musical qualifications. With a charming voice, nature appears to have freely bestowed upon him certain of the requisites necessary to form a good singer, but he does not possess taste, méthode, or feeling. His style has a dash of homeliness in it, with which we confess ourselves somewhat surprised. The falsetto, that we have spoken highly of, is a component part of his voice, notwithstanding the art with which he sometimes avails himself of it; it is at others much abused, and the mode of using it mistaken. Instead of an union between the real and feigned voice, he separates them with a marked distinctness when brought to bear in any song, producing an effect resembling alternate male and female voices. In addition to this anti-Italian and Swiss-like mode of vocalizing, he has a barbarous way of mispronouncing the king's English, not arising from a Scotch patois, for that we are prepared to pardon and even to praise in Scotch music, but a disagreeable lengthening, and shortening, and changing of certain vowels peculiar to no nation nor province within our knowledge. Take, for example, "My love is like the red, red rose." Mr. Sinclair gives it,

"Oh, my love is like the red, red rose."

In "No more by sorrow chased, my heart
Shall yield, shall yield to fell despair!"

his version of the second line is
"Shall-d yield, shall-d yield to fell despair."

John Anderson is "John Andersen." Never—never. And even "Pray Goody," his reputed chef d'œuvre, and of the extraordinary merit of which the audience had been so effectually informed that they absolutely applauded it before he commenced, was given, we must say, in the style of a decent ordinary singer, (we have heard it much better,) and the word "moderate" was spoken "moderit." This old ballad, the subject of which is said to be by Rousseau, was, we understand, Mr. Sinclair's original stepping-stone to the favor of the British public, in an unwonted run of the burletta of Midas, which stamped his fame as a vocalist. He then went to Italy, and injured his style of singing simple ballads without acquiring the brilliancy of the Italian school—at least so said the British critics in accounting for his comparative failure on his return. Nevertheless, as the singer of a certain class of Scotch ballads, where pathos is not requisite, we listen to him with pleasure; but in those which, when well sung, moisten the eyes of the fair, and even make the critics resort to their snuff-boxes, Mr. Philipps, with half his voice, very far exceeded him. In "John Anderson, my jo," this coldness was clearly visible, although otherwise prettily sung. In "All the blue bonnets are over the border," where he could not conveniently have recourse to his falsetto, but was forced to rely on power and energy, he fell as far short of Horn, Pearman, and Jones, as he would exceed them in the "Mountain Maid." We were struck with the beauty of a few words sung by him in Francis Osbaldistone, yet his "Tho' I leave you now in sorrow," we have heard far surpassed by an amateur. The truth is, Mr. Sinclair will sing you ten songs, and seven or eight of them will be quite ordinary, and the rest rather unusually well done. The public are gradually possessing themselves of taste upon musical matters, and in spite of their being industriously persuaded that they ought to and must "swear truth out of England," that Mr. Sinclair is a very great creature, are too old to suffer any delusion to a great extent. They already begin to recover from the shock of his first appearance, and to applaud with more judgment and discrimination than before. Indeed we could not help fearing, after having witnessed Mr. Sinclair's début, that the words of his favorite song were not altogether inapplicable to the most vociferous portion of his hearers:

"Remember when the judgment's weak the prejudice is strong."

We are constrained to add, that the operas have been got up in a most slovenly manner—half the music omitted in some, with extremely deficient orchestral parts in others, and the choruses generally weak. No opera, such as the Cabinet, Rob Roy, Guy Mannering, the Slave, and so forth, should be played without a prima donna; and the casting Mrs. Sharpe in that situation, to sing bravuras, and such difficult pieces as the "Bird Duet" in the Cabinet, is a sacrifice of that lady, versatile and clever as she undoubtedly is in second singing parts, to either a singular carelessness on the part of the manager, or an inexcusable spirit of economy which the liberality of the community renders ungrateful, and their knowledge of music absurd. Mrs. Sharpe possesses an increasing reputation in a different sphere. This arrangement also is a serious injury to the star who makes his début. It is one of the disadvantages which the "star system" inflicts upon the town, and if persevered in, will bring discredit on the management. For we take the liberty to suggest, that our fellow-citizens will not submit with a good grace to have our chief theatre again debased to the rank of that of a country town, where stars act operas without assistance from the company, and introduce, as our friend C. has it, "Nid, nid noddin," as an accompaniment to the death of some murdered friend.

Although desirous of not occupying too much room by our theatrical articles, we cannot conclude this one without a few words in reference to the Gladiator. This tragedy has been several times repeated to full houses, whose gratification has been clearly evinced and indeed enthusiastically. Upon the subject, we believe among the press there has been but one dissentient voice, whose objections amount to nothing more than an assertion that it is not perfect. Addison observes in the Spectator, that "a perfect tragedy is the noblest production of human nature, and is capable of giving the mind one of the most delightful and most improving entertainments." To expect perfection from a youthful writer, and attack him fiercely because he has not reached it, is not the way to develop the literary talent of the country. The hand of encouragement should rather be extended to assist him up the steep. We esteem the Gladiator rather remarkable for the power and beauty of the language, and the highly dramatic incident of the plot. The meeting of the brothers in the arena—their quarrel in the camp—the encounter between Spartacus and the son of his scourger—the return of Pharsarius after the crucifixion of the army—and his death after the massacre of Senona, may be cited as among the features of this play which give it a powerful dramatic interest. There is some truth in the observation that this interest diminishes towards the termination, but not that there is none after the two first acts. The acting of this piece on the second night was a triumph over every opposition, and it was deservedly regarded with deep attention, broken by frequent bursts of applause. We conclude this article with the prologue, which we present with pleasure.

PROLOGUE TO THE GLADIATOR.

To the old days of splendor and renown,
When kings were bondmen of Italia's crown,
Back to the ancient volumes, treasure-stored—
Exhaustless mines of lore—the muse hath soared;
She wakes dead heroes from their sleep of years,
And spreads the page that tells of crimes and tears.
Upstarting from the long forgotten past,
Arise the gorgeous halls and temples vast;
The regal city bids her gates unfold,
All beautiful, as when the Tiber roll'd
Majestic past the 'pillar'd-hills,' and bore
Earth's gather'd tributes proudly to her shore.
Eternal city! fallen though deified!
Thy ruins glass them in the yellow tide;
The crumbling monument, the tottering wall,
And shatter'd column, speak thy glory's fall.
Thought-wing'd, the bard may muse beneath thy domes—
The bandit's lair is in the Cæsars' homes.
Image of all the mind conceives of power,
Proud Rome! a stain is on thy brightest hour;
True glory glids no triumph in the war
That binds the festering limb beneath the conqueror's car!

A holiday in Rome! the sacrifice
Of blood, a joyous sight to Roman eyes;
The Prætor sports begin—the red stream flows—
And death looks ghastly on ignoble foes;
A mightier arm is mingling in the fray,
Dashing with tempest force the glaives away;
He strikes! wreaths for the victor in the game—
A blow achieves a gladiator's fame;
No warrior from the fields where meet the brave,
The arena trembles at a Thracian slave.

That arm is bared again, unchain'd and free,
Hark to the awelling voice, for liberty!
He strikes for freedom! vengeance-nerfed, the blow
Scathes like the lightning-stroke the shrinking foe;
Capua's hills send back the battle-call,
To shake the pillars of the capitol.
Sheathless the sword, yet vain the patriot's might,
For brutal force hath won the final fight;
Thy star hath set, thou of the trampled race—
The Roman's foot is on the neck of Thrace.

A cry for freedom! every heart is stirr'd,
When peals from earth to heaven that glorious word;
It rises now, from glory's ancient home,
To shame the vassal fears of Christendom;
Chains for the brave? Back to your land of snows—
Not Rome at Thrace, you strike at Polish foes;
A nation's voice—it rings along the sea—
Death to the tyrant, Poland shall be free!

Yet hold—the poet's herald, I should say
A word to ask your favor for the play;
An idle task—the theme alone will be
A passport here, amid the favor'd free;
A native bard essays the pen to-night—
A native actor shows how heroes fight;
To you, confidingly, their hopes they trust—
Then smooth the critic brow, be lenient but be just!

THE BOWERY THEATRE.

A young lady, Miss Clifton, is now playing at the Bowery, to whom every encouragement should be extended. She sustained the character of Belvidera on Monday evening, with spirit; and, considering her youth, her success is surprising, for well filled houses begin already to assemble when she appears. Her figure calls to mind the description of Mrs. Siddons, and her countenance sometimes displays an expression truly commanding and beautiful. She possesses the materials of a good actress; and a voice flexible and sweet. One or two of her attitudes were splendid, particularly when the bell tolls for the execution of Jaffier's friends. A more imposing picture than that which she then presented we have seldom beheld. In her language, however, she requires a severe course of study, as her principal fault consists in occasional stiffness of enunciation, and a want of forcible accent. When practice shall have enabled her to acquire more grace and strength in her readings, it is probable she will reach a high rank in a department of the drama in which, at present, there is an ample opening.

Messrs. Hamblin and Barton as Jaffier and Pierre, entered fully into the conception of their parts, and were loudly applauded.

The living statues as exhibited by Mr. Frimbley, were finely displayed, and afforded an entertainment as interesting as it was novel.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1831.

Editor's study.—We are told that a society of literary gentlemen have established a public debating society, and we should be pleased to be instrumental in furthering their views, although as yet unacquainted with them definitely.

Nearly all men have peculiar thoughts and feelings which would be interesting if expressed in clear language. The power of doing this may be easily acquired by any young person of ordinary intelligence, and the most beneficial consequences would reward parents and teachers for bestowing more care upon that generally neglected but highly important branch of education. Perhaps there is no accomplishment which a gentleman is more frequently called upon to exercise, or a deficiency in which is more embarrassing and apparent. It relates not only to those occasions where unpremeditated discourses are expected before public meetings or assemblies of any kind, but it embellishes and enlivens private circles by the charms of conversation; and who will regret the extra study and attention which assure him a facility of expressing without hesitation precisely that which is passing in his mind? From an ignorance of this simple and mechanical acquirement, individuals of solid sense and extensive experience are often forced to withhold from the company with whom they may be, opinions calculated to diffuse both pleasure and instruction; or if they undertake to mingle in the conversation, their struggles to bring forth an idea too ponderous for their management, are subjects of pain as well to others as themselves. Even if they have no ambition to shine either as orators or talkers, they will be amply compensated for their exertions by finding the task of epistolary correspondence, so necessary and often so burdensome to the most sensible persons, effected with pleasure and despatch. As gentlemen at least of two of the learned professions, are always liable to be called upon to speak before assemblies upon intimate questions, when they can have had no possible opportunity of any preparation, these remarks are more particularly applicable to them. The nature of their occupations also affords them many facilities for cultivating with more than ordinary diligence and perseverance an attainment of so much importance to their success. Very young men in the commencement of their professional studies would find themselves materially improved in the ready use of words by never perusing a serious work without the aid of the pen. "Studium sine calamo est somnum." If they read with care, (and this method will soon induce the most attentive habit) many reflections will continually occur—admiration or disapprobation, and the reasons of both. Let them as they arise reduce them to writing. This they will soon find easy, delightful, and sometimes nearly indispensable.

An objection may be made respecting the extra time such a practice would consume, but more real and durable profit will be derived from the perusal in such a manner of one volume, than of five in the usual mode. In this way the reader's memory will be strengthened—he will avoid the pernicious custom of skimming carelessly over a subject, than which nothing sooner incapacitates him for severe study, besides being in itself utterly useless. An adherence to this practice from the age of sixteen to twenty-five, if it did not constitute one a writer, a speaker, and an observer, would at least widen the range of his ideas and add much to his grace and fluency of expression. It would not contribute merely to the acquisition of language; it would instruct the student in a method of grasping the subject under consideration. He gains confidence in himself, by which he is enabled to conceive at a glance a plan of his intended discourse, and this he can pursue without the awkward necessity of pausing for a word till the idea escapes. Whoever has attended many public assemblies, must have remarked what abominable nonsense is uttered by otherwise respectable persons. It is less intolerable when propounded to a very ordinary and illiterate auditory, unaccustomed to reflect themselves upon the aggregate and remote consequences of their actions, and destitute of time and means to avail themselves frequently of the reflections of others thus dressed up in a certain style of language, and delivered with a vehemence of gesture; but it is unpardonable in a gentleman pretending to good breeding, who rises in a circle of society composed of persons at least his equals if not his superiors in vigor of intellect and acuteness of observation—to hammer upon some threadbare and worn out subject, without adding any facts to those already known, or even presenting the old ones in a new light or position.

There is nothing more distressingly awkward than the dilemma of a bewildered extemporaneous orator who blunders and stumbles along among the most common-place ideas, without the skill to pick them up and give them to his auditory. You will see such a personage laboring under the necessity of saying something although he has nothing to say. Laying hold of whatever fragment of a sentiment happens to be flitting through his memory—sometimes like a boat in a rocky stream sailing along smoothly over a cant phrase, then thrown back and nearly upset by an unexpected difficulty, dragging in bombastic words that have no appropriate meaning, and tugging through with a kind of piteous desperation. Now he rests on a drink of water—then he breathes under the disguise of a cough, "your learned orator when he is out will spit;" and all this for the want of a little practice in one of the most necessary branches in genteel education. If debating societies will protect us from these evils, the public at large are quite interested in affording them every encouragement.

We have before us a new and enlarged number of the Evening Journal, edited by S. H. Jenks, Esq. Its ample columns are filled with well written matter, and we are pleased to see the steady improvement visible in its pages under the care and talented direction of its present conductor. It now stands fairly on an equality with the best in the city, and displays a gentlemanly and scholarlike good sense and moderation, which has effectually recommended it to the public.

In the course of the past week we have received a number of new publications, of which we have only room to mention their titles: an elegantly printed octavo work, in two volumes, called the "Remains of the Rev. Edmund D. Griffin;" "Autobiography of Sir Walter Scott;" "Coleridge's Study of the Greek Classic Poets;" "Philip Augustus," by the author of Richelieu; and Bourne's complete score of Cinderella, the first entire opera ever published in America.

MISCELLANY.

CHIT-CHAT.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

Some men of talent and merit are only pleased with the society of their inferiors, where they find it easiest to shine. This is to calculate very foolishly; since, in striving with a man of ability, we sharpen our own powers—but always degenerate in exercising ourselves with fools.

MOUTH AND EYES.—The mind appears to me to discover itself most in the mouth and eyes; with this difference, that the mouth seems the more expressive of the temper, and the eyes of the understanding.

INJURIES FROM FRIENDS.—Those who have their joys, have also their griefs in proportion; and none can extremely exalt or depress friends, but friends. The harsh things which come from the rest of the world, are received and repulsed with that spirit which every honest man bears about him, for his own vindication; but unkindness in words or actions among friends, affects us the first instant in the inmost recesses of our souls. Indifferent people, if I may so say, can wound us only in the heterogeneous parts, maim us in our legs or arms, but the friend can make no pass but at the heart itself. On the other side, the most impotent assistance, the mere well-wishes of a friend, give a man constancy and courage against the most prevailing force of all his enemies. It is here only he enjoys and suffers to the quick.

Men are sometimes accused of pride, merely because their accusers would be proud themselves, if they were in their places.

There are none can baffle men of sense but fools; on whom they can make no impression.

People frequently use this expression,—"I am inclined to think so and so;" not considering that they are then speaking the most literal of all truths.

THE THING ESSENTIAL.—The ingratitude of mankind is sometimes alleged as an excuse for neglecting good offices; but it is the business of a man to perform his own part, not to answer for the returns which others may, or may not, be disposed to make.

MYSTERIOUS NUMBERS.—All those mysterious things we observe in numbers, come to nothing upon this very ground; because number in itself is nothing, has not to do with nature, but is merely of human imposition, a mere sound: for example, when I cry "one o'clock, two o'clock, three o'clock," that is but one division of time; the time itself goes on, and it had been all one in nature if those hours had been called nine, ten and eleven. So when they say the seventh son is fortunate, it means nothing; for if you count from the seventh backwards, then the first is the seventh: why is not he likewise fortunate?

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

THE WIFE'S APPEAL.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

He sat and read. A book with golden clasps,
Printed in Florence, lettered as with jet
Set upon pearl, lay raised upon a frame
Before him. 'Twas a volume of old time;
And in it were fine mysteries of the stars
Solved with a cunning wisdom, and strange thoughts,
Half prophecy, half poetry, and dreams
Clearer than truth, and speculations wild
That touched the secrets of your very soul,
They were so based on nature. With a face
Glowing with thought, he pored upon the book.
The cushions of an Indian loom lay soft
Beneath his limbs, and, as he turned the page,
The sunlight, streaming through the curtain's fold,
Fell on his jewelled fingers tinted with rose,
And the rich woods of the quaint furniture
Lay deepening their veined colors in the sun,
And the stained marbles on their pedestals
Stood like a silent company.—Voltaire,
With an infernal sneer upon his lips,
And Socrates, with godlike human love
Stamped on his countenance, and orators
Of times gone by that made them, and old bards,
And Medicean Venus, half divine.
Around the room were shelves of dainty lore,
And rich old pictures hung upon the walls
Where the slant light fell on them, and cased gems,
Medallions, rare mosaics, and antiques
From Herculaneum the niches filled.
And on a table of enamel, wrought
With a lost art in Italy, there lay
Prints of fair women, and engravings queer,
And a new poem, and a costly toy,
And in their midst a massive lamp of bronze
Burning sweet spices constantly. Asleep
Upon the carpet couched a graceful hound
Of a rare breed; and as his master gave
A murmur of delight at some sweet line,
He raised his slender head, and kept his eye
Upon him till the pleasant smile had passed
From his mild lips, and then he slept again.
The light beyond the crimson folds grew dusk,
And the clear letters of the pleasant book
Mingled and blurred, and the lithe hound rose up,
And with his earnest eye upon the door,
Listened attentively. It came as wont—
The fall of a light foot upon the stair—
And the fond animal sprang out to meet
His mistress, and caress the ungloved hand
He seemed to know was beautiful. She stooped
Gracefully down and touched his silken ears
As she passed in—then, with a tenderness,
Half playful and half serious, she knelt
Upon the ottoman, and pressed her lips
Upon her husband's forehead.

She rose and put the curtain folds aside
From the high window, and looked out upon
The shining stars in silence. "Look they not Like paradises to thine eye?" he said—
But as he spoke a tear fell through the light,
And starting from his seat, he folded her
Close to his heart, and with unsteady voice
Asked if she was not happy? A faint smile
Broke through her tears; and pushing off the hair
From his fine forehead, she held back his head
With her white hand, and gazing on his face,
Gave to her heart free utterance:—

Happy?—yes, dearest—blest
Beyond the limit of my wildest dream—
Too bright, indeed, my blessings ever seem;
There lives not in my breast
One of hope's promises by love unkept,
And yet—forgive me, Ernest—I have wept.

How shall I speak of sadness,
And seem not thankful to my God and thee?
How can the lightest wish but seem to be
The very whim of madness?
Yet, oh, there is a boon thy love beside—
And I will ask it of thee—in my pride!

List, while my boldness lingers!
If thou hadst won yon twinkling star to hear thee—
If thou couldst bid the rainbow's curve bend near thee—
If thou couldst charm thy fingers
To weave for thee the sunset's tent of gold—
Wouldst in thine own heart treasure it untold?
If thou hadst Ariel's gift,
To course the veined metals of the earth—
If thou couldst wind a fountain to its birth—
If thou couldst know the drift

Of the lost cloud that sailed into the sky—
Wouldst keep it for thine own unanswered eye?

It is thy life and mine!—
Thou in thyself, and I in thee, misprison
Gifts like a circle of bright stars unrisen—
For thou, whose mind should shine
Eminent as a planet's light, art here—
Moved with the starting of a woman's tear!

I have told o'er thy powers
In secret, as a miser tells his gold.
I know thy spirit calm, and true, and bold—
I've watched thy lightest hours,
And seen thee, in the wildest flush of youth,
Touched with the instinct ravishment of truth.

Thou hast the secret struggle
To read that hidden book, the human heart—
Thou hast the ready writer's practised art—
Thou hast the thought to range
The broadest circles intellect hath ran—
And thou art God's best work—an honest man!

And yet—thou slumberest here
Like a caged bird that never knew its pinions,
And others track in glory the dominions
Where thou hast not thy peer—
Setting their weaker eyes unto the sun,
And plucking honor that thou shouldst have won.

Oh, if thou lov'dst me ever,
Ernest, my husband! If th' idolatry
That lets go heaven to fling its all on thee—
If to dismiss thee never
In dream or prayer, have given me aught to claim—
Heed me—oh, heed me! and awake to fame!

Her lips
Closed with an earnest sweetness, and she sat
Gazing into his eyes as if her look
Searched their dark orbs for answer. The warm blood
Into his temples mounted, and across
His countenance the flush of passionate thoughts
Passed with irresolute quickness. He rose up
And paced the dim room rapidly awhile,
Calming his troubled mind, and then he came
And laid his hand upon her forehead white,
And in a voice of heavenly tenderness
Answered her:

Before I knew thee, Mary,
Ambition was my angel. I did hear
Forever its witching voices in mine ear—
My days were visionary,
My nights were like the slumbers of the mad,
And every dream swept o'er me glory-clad.

I read the burning letters
Of warlike pomp, on history's page, alone—
I counted nothing the struck widow's moan—
I heard no clank of fetters—
I only felt the trumpet's stirring blast,
And lean-eyed famine stalked unchallenged past.

I heard, with veins of lightning,
The utterance of the statesman's word of power—
Binding and loosing nations in an hour—
But while my eye was brightening,
A masked detraction breathed upon his fame,
And a cursed serpent slithered his written name.

The poet rapt mine ears
With the transporting music that he sung.
With fibres from his life his lyre he strung,
And bathed the world in tears—
And then he turned away to muse apart,
And scorn stole after him and broke his heart!

Yet here and there I saw
One who did set the world at calm defiance,
And press right onward with a bold reliance;
And he did seem to awe
The very shadows pressing on his breast,
And, with a strong heart, held himself at rest.

And then I looked again,
And he had shut the door upon the crowd,
And on his face he lay and groaned aloud—
Wrestling with hidden pain;
And in her chamber sat his wife in tears,
And his sweet babes grew sad with whispered fears.

And so I turned sick-hearted
From the bright cup away, and in my sadness
Searched mine own bosom for some spring of gladness;
And lo! a fountain started,
Whose waters ev'n in death flow calm and fast,
And my wild fever-thirst was slaked at last.

And then I love thee, Mary,
And felt how love may into fury pour,
Like light into a fountain running o'er;
And I did hope to vary
My life but with surprises sweet as this—
A dream, but for thy waking, filled with bliss.

Yet now I feel my spirit
Bitterly stirred, and—nay, lift up thy brow!
It is thine own voice echoing to thee now,
And thou didst pray to hear it—
I must unto my work and my stern hours!
Take from my room thy harp, and books, and flowers!

* * * * * A year—
And in his room again he sat alone.
His frame had lost its fullness in that time;
His handsome features had grown sharp and thin,
And from his lips the constant smile had faded.
Wild fires had burned the languor from his eye:
The lids look fevered, and the brows were bent
With an habitual frown. He was much changed.
His chin was resting on his clenched hand,
And with his foot he beat upon the floor
Unconsciously the time of a sad tune.
Thoughts of the past preyed on him bitterly.
He had won power and held it. He had walked
Steadily upward in the eye of fame,
And kept his truth unsullied—but his home
Had been invaded by even venom'd tongues;
His wife—his spotless wife—had been assailed
By slander, and his child had grown afraid
To come to him—his manners were so stern.
He could not speak beside his own hearth freely.
His friends were half estranged, and vulgar men
Presumed upon their services and grew
Familiar with him. He'd small time to sleep,
And none to pray; and, with his heart in fetters,
He bore deep insults silently, and bowed
Respectfully to men who knew he loathed them!
And when his heart was eloquent with truth,
And love of country and an honest zeal
Burned for expression, he could find no words
They would not misinterpret with their lies.
What were his many honors to him now?
The good half doubted, falsehood was so strong—
His home was hateful with its cautious fears—
His wife lay trembling on his very breast
Frighted with calumny!—And this is FAME.

AN INKLING OF AN ADVENTURE.

BY THE SAME.

I SAT, tossing pebbles into Lake George, on a fine summer morning in June, two or three years ago. The ripples just feathered with the wind and no more. A swan with his wings spread would have rounded the point of Isle Diamond in half an hour—a standard mile. It was in other respects as lovely a morning as the "lark at heaven's gate" ever heralded.

"What a fairy boat!" She shot suddenly out from a small cove above me—a white, slender, aerial thing, with a deep green band through her waist, her sails snowy and all set, and a pink streamer from either mast running away in long curves from the wind, and flaunting most gracefully. At her helm sat a lady; and as I caught a glimpse of a dark eye under her bonnet, she leaned forward just so far as to show an exquisite figure in relief, and putting down the tiller, ran right for the point where I was sitting. A minute more, and the sharp bow grated on the pebbles, and the shadow of the little topmast passed over my feet. I rose and looked around for the object of their visit. I was on the bank alone—no one within sight—what could they mean by running down upon me so pointedly? Before I had time to wonder twice, a young man, of sixteen apparently, who had been hid from view by the mainsail, leaped ashore, and raised his hat with a very courteous "Good morning."

"You seem to be alone, sir! will you honor us with your company up the lake?"

"Certainly, sir—with all my heart—but—but—" and, as I hesitated, I looked inquisitively at an elderly gentleman who had risen from the windward seat in the stern, and stood looking at us with a smile.

"My son's invitation is rather abrupt, sir," said he, bowing in answer to my look, "but I beg you will accept it notwithstanding. We are losing the morning breeze—will you step on board?"

A single leap and my foot was on the taffrel.

"Stop!" said the lady, springing up from the tiller, and motioning me back with her hand—(her voice was enough to set you dreaming the rest of your life)—"one condition—as I ran the shallop down for you without permission of these two gentlemen, (who by the way have the honor to stand for my father and brother,) I claim the right to make it. Do you agree?"

She nodded to us all—and I bowed my assent.

"We are bound to some of these lovely islands—as far up as the wind will take us—to idle away the day. You, sir, (addressing me) are to have the honor of my society and special protection as commander of the boat, till I set you on this bank again at sunset—promising, however, before these gentlemen, that you will ask us no personal questions whatever during the voyage, and make no inquiries of our name and whereabouts after you have left us. This sacrifice of curiosity I consider necessary to my maidenly delicacy—otherwise compromised perhaps by this whimsical assault upon a stranger."

I had been left at the hotel that morning by a large party, who, after coming down the lake in the steamboat—thirty miles through the rain, and all the time passed in the cabin—were content to rise at daylight and take coach for the Springs, without waiting even an hour or two to see the most beautiful sheet of water in the world by sunshine. I had been hurried from Niagara, and dragged past the Thousand Isles, and deprived of all but a mere glimpse of Montmorenci—but to leave Lake George in such a grocer's hurry—without touching one of its green islands, or looking once into its strangely transparent depths by a clear sky—it was the drop too much! I was missing when the coach drove up, and they went without me. There was no other visitor at the lonely hotel, and when the wheels were out of hearing, I felt for the first time in a month the luxury of solitude.

The sails filled, and away we shot from the shore, the beautiful shallop stealing through the water as if, like the boat of the Witch of Atlas, some fairy influence

"had lit
A living spirit within all its frame,
Breathing the soul of swiftness into it."

I sat between the fair skipper and her father, in a dream of bewilderment. Their manner put me perfectly at ease, and the conversation went on as swimmingly as the keel, every topic heightened and freshened inexpressibly by the mystery of the acquaintance. There was no danger of a betrayal even of name, for they called each other by the familiar appellation, and "Constance," and "Arthur," and "Papa," soon became as used to my ears as if I had known them intimately from my boyhood.

I think I am "in" for a description. I don't very well see how I can let you off without it. If I were to report the gay conversation around the tiller, it would not be at all the same thing as the sweet toned bagatelle of a voice like a disguised enchanter's, and as I forget every thing I said myself, and only remember here and there an observation of Mr. Arthur and his venerable father, there would be a precious probability that two-thirds of the dialogue would be clear fancy—a quality I wish particularly to avoid in this narration. A description of the lake will save me from the dilemma. You shall have it

Imprimis—it is the most beautiful lake in America—and, sequitur, the most beautiful spot in the world. Its thirty miles of length are more like a river than a lake—a river with mountain banks, its bosom studded with small green islands covered with the most lavish verdure and foliage, and its waters as clear and transparent almost as the atmosphere. You may see the long heavy pickerel moving drowsily about on the bottom at a depth of thirty feet, and the shoals of smaller fish scudding across your bow, and count the rocks and white crystals with which the lake abounds, as distinctly as if the element were not water, but air. Then the wooded shores are so near and so bold, and the islands are so many and so buried in leaves, that as your boat runs through the narrow channels, it seems to you as if you were floating among clouds, the shadows in the water of rock and tree and outline are such faultless resemblances. Like Wordsworth's swan, every gem of an island and as you put out from the little pier at Caldwell (the place of the hotel at the south end of the lake) and pull away with a couple of smart oars for the north, islet after islet, not much larger than a parlor ottoman, steals out to your view, and so you may voyage on, hours and hours, spattering at every dip almost, some fairy shore, till your mind absolutely becomes surfeited with beauty. And with these general features I leave the rest to your imagination.

"Floats double, isle and shadow;"

The breeze died away in the middle of the forenoon, and left us with our sails flapping against the mast, opposite a small island, fringed with beeches, and carpeted with short rich grass and moss—the prettiest floor for fairy feet in the world. At the bidding of our fair helmsman, I took an oar with Arthur, and three or four fair pulls brought us alongside, and covered the boat with the overhanging branches. The shade was deep and cool, and we spread the contents of a certain ambiguous looking hamper upon the cloth, and setting bottles of claret and champagne down by a rock in the water, prepared to pic-nic in the most rural insouciance. Oh those three or four or five hours—I don't know how long—they flew like hours in paradise! I was happier than I could expect to be again. And that superb creature—perfectly frank and half gay, half thoughtful—now running to the shore-edge for a flower, now noting some exquisite effect of light or shadow—laughing, moralizing, quoting poetry, and glancing at sentiment—every thing unstudied and every thing in taste—she was enough to ruin a whole academy of cynics.

We dined at the primitive hour of twelve, and spent the afternoon in reading and lounging, and at eight, just as the moon was rising, we embarked, and on a perfectly glassy surface, rowed slowly back to Caldwell, our lovely skipper grown a little penseroso, and mingling passages of songs with low-toned, beautiful conversation, more interesting and bewitching with every change of her humor.

We touched the pier. They looked at me with a smile. I was about breaking my promise, but she put her finger on her lip, and with a heart almost sick with regret, I shook hands hastily with them all, and sprang on shore.

"Push off," said she, in a tone of gaiety.

I looked at her as the gay word sounded harshly in my hear, and with something in her eye which I have the vanity to believe would have been a tear in a moment, she met my look, and smiled half sadly, and with a kiss of her white hand, turned away to the sway of the shallop.

I have never heard of them since. The landlord remarked that they were boarding privately at a farm-house a mile back in the country, and that is all I know of them. They were people of the first cultivation and the highest tone of breeding and courtesy I have ever met. I hope some day to see them. But after travelling through all the northern and middle cities since, and going much into society, but seeing no trace of them, I almost despair. I have recorded our delightful rencontre in the hope it may reach their eye. If it should, and they will send but a card to me, through the associate editor of this polite periodical, it will be the happiest hour I have known since I saw them, in which I pack my valise for a journey.

It is my lot in life—every thing comes to me fragmented and imperfect. I have encountered hundreds of these mere inklings of romance. Every stage-coach, steam-boat, canal—every hotel in a strange city gives me some beginning to an adventure. There is no denouement. I am a sort of travelling Tantalus. I shall die some day of sheer wonder!

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

COWARDICE.

"A plague of all cowards," I say, and a vengeance, too! Marry and amen! Give me a cup of sack, boy.—Ere I lead this life long I'll sew nether stocks, and mend them, and foot them too. A plague of all cowards!—Is there no virtue extant?"—Faust.

WHAT a life is the coward's! He is all agitation. He should have been born a woman. Then his trembling would have been so graceful in the eyes of the beau—so many whiskered lips would murmur, "do not be under the slightest apprehension, my dear, I will take care of you." What a mistake in nature to put the soul of a girl in a body six feet high!—to let the heart of a hare beat in the ample chest of a lion—to give a pair of great flashing eyes to express, instead of exciting terror—and a voice like the lower tones of Mr. Cioffi's trombone to breathe out feelings that should have been played piano on the one-keyed flute! Thou capricious, laughter-loving nature, what fantastic freaks hast thou invented in the composition of thy creature man!

As the world goes, there is no feeling nobler and more necessary than courage. What a dark world of anxiety and misery it shuts out from the soul! With what a strange beauty it invests even the bad in the hour of danger!

"So spake the griely terror, and in shape
So speaking and so threatening, grew ten fold
More dreadful and deform. On th' other side,
Incensed with indignation, Satan stood
Untrifled, and like a comet burn'd,
That fires the length of Orpheus huge
In the arctic sky, and from his horrid hair
Shakes pestilence and war."

Yet I have sometimes thought it was only a combination of nerve and good sense, to conceal cowardice. He who has not felt fear, said Frederick the Great, never snuffed a candle with his fingers. To fear calamity or pain cannot be base. The most sensitive must feel all influences more suddenly and deeply. The courage of many is sheer stupidity and bluntness of perception; while the cowardice of others may be vivacious of imagination and love of life. A pleasure-seeking and effeminate person will very naturally recoil from whatever threatens his peace and safety; but in certain situations these are the fiercest and most dangerous enemies. There is no devil like your coward goaded to desperation. I have heard of a German student in a duel so perfectly outrageous from the excess of fear, that he rushed upon his antagonist, a more experienced swordsman, to the imminent peril of his life, struck down his weapon, and sliced him through as one would a watermelon. Be wary when the deer stands at bay.

But whatever may be the constituents of either courage or cowardice, it is certain that while one passes through life with a composed peace of mind, another is perpetually intruded upon with misgivings and visions of anguish. In addition to the actual periods of risk which come to all, these victims of fright frequently think they find peril when in reality it does not exist. The unfortunate Mr. Fitzgerald is one of this sort. A more chicken-hearted creature never swagged about under the mask of masculine attire. His fancy is always filled with horrid accidents. He enters the steam-boat with a presentiment that the boiler will burst in a few moments; and in a stage he eyes every steep declivity with a forlorn conviction that his time has come. In walking through the forest, he looks upon himself as a poisoned man if a strange leaf touches his hand, and flies the old logs and grape-vines for alligators and sea-serpents. He once mistook the shrill whistle of a quail for the signal of banditti; and in meeting a woodcutter with his axe, in a lonely glen, he was about to exclaim, "Take my money, but spare my life," when the intruder turned away by a side path. I was last summer walking with him in the city, when I felt him drawing me away with an expression of fright. A large, good-natured dog, with his tongue lapping from his jaws, trotted directly towards him.

"He's mad," said Fitzgerald: "he runs in a straight line." And then he followed his example, and also ran in a straight line, though in the opposite direction, which made me conclude he was quite as mad as the dog.

We were once fellow-passengers in a packet ship from New Orleans, and were overtaken off Cape Hatteras by a hurricane. It was night; and, to say the truth, the tempest howled terrifically. Many of the sails, which we were compelled to raise to keep from shore, were torn into stripes. Apprehensions were entertained that the vessel would spring leak or go to pieces on the shoals. The waves ran like mountains and broke over the deck, and the whole ocean presented a scene of tremendous fury, at once sublime and appalling. The ladies in the cabin were shrieking in despair, and uttering the names of husbands and parents, whom they never expected to see again, in accents of the most agonizing fear; and the captain's voice, hoarse with exertion, could scarcely be heard amid the din and discord of the elements. It is one of the greatest weaknesses of a complete coward to bully and brag when danger is far off; and Fitzgerald had worn that mask bravely during the first week of blue sky and gentle breezes. I could not but observe the change. A dim lamp was flaring in the cabin, and the few passengers were collected around the table and clinging to it. Most of them were pale and silent. One would occasionally venture a brief remark or a jest, that fell dead from the lips that spoke it. Some people would joke in the jaws of the grave. Poor Fitzgerald did not happen to be among the number. When the morning broke, we went up the gangway and looked abroad. He had no sooner lifted his head into the air than his hat darted towards the sky like an arrow. The captain was following through the trumpet. The billows had swept the decks. The drenched sailors were holding on to the ropes for their lives. The deck was almost as perpendicular as a wall. Should I live a thousand years I shall never lose the impression of his face as he stood by my side in the dim morning light: his starting eyeballs, rolling around upon the really awful scene, as the vessel went rushing, rocking, and thundering through the water: his hair was streaming in the wind: his features had the whiteness of marble: his very lips were bloodless and ashy; and, as a willow some seventy or eighty feet in height, tumbling like an overturned mountain towards our stern, lifted the ship as if it would actually hurl it into the air, and then swept from our bows, leaving a chasm that seemed gaping to overwhelm us, he uttered a convulsive sound as if some hand had forced a dagger into his very heart, and clasp his white hands together, shrunk back into the cabin, the most abject, prostrated wretch eyes ever looked on. I crawled out upon deck, and clinging to a rope, addressed a good-humored sailor who was holding on a piece of the shrouds without any sign of anxiety.

"Good morning, sir," said he; "pretty stiff breeze: we go now finely: one can take some comfort in such a ship as this."

"Comfort!" echoed I; "I don't know what you call comfort." (I was wet to the skin, and had not slept all night.)

"Why," said the man, laughing, "I was in a brig last month that went down under our feet, after we had been pumping her for twenty-four hours."

"How did you escape?"

"A schooner hove in sight, and we got to her in the long boat."

"And how did you feel, when you found you were going down, without the hope of help?"

"Why, when we knew that the old thing must go—what must, you know, must—so I made up my mind to it, and felt easy."

"Easy!" echoed I again as I crept back into the cabin; "and this is the way a plain, uninformed, ignorant man can meet the ghastly apparition that frights the king on his throne and the philosopher amid his books."

I am inclined to think that cowardice may be overcome by active life and some familiarity with danger; and certainly recommend the young to begin early to train themselves in the school of reflection, to meet the perils which environ all the inhabitants of this earth. They should be accustomed to calculate upon the certainty of being, in the course of their pilgrimage, often thrown into painful and critical situations. They cannot escape from them always; and, at some time or other, must give up the existence which is only bestowed for a brief period. No one ought to live unprepared to die. It should be one of the earliest lessons of the father to his son: not taught by thrusting him into scenes of horror, but by gentle admonitions; not by bringing him suddenly to the bed of the dying, but by musing with him sometimes in the receptacles of the dead, when the pleasant grass and trees are there, and he can touch his soul with tenderness and meditation, subdued melancholy and calm resignation; you may rely on it he will be better for it when he goes forth into the world. Passion will not so easily intoxicate, danger alarm, nor pleasure corrupt him. He who plunges headlong into the vortexes of society, conscious of no other influences beyond those connected with this limited sphere, is a wretched gamster, who stakes his all on a throw, and who, if he wins to-day, may be irreparably ruined to-morrow. In triumph he possesses no restraint, and when trouble and peril surround him he is without support. But he who is correctly disciplined to reserve something in his own bosom from the demands of ordinary life, who moves through the adventures of the day with the full knowledge that they are passing and often vain, however he may participate in their joys, is not prostrated by their calamities. Experience also affords a secret consolation in the thought that half the threats of fortune, like her promises, are never accomplished. I remember many moralists who have blamed that slandered goddess for visionary prospects of human bliss, but I cannot call to mind one who has praised her for dissipating many of the storms that hang over the wanderer's path and strike his soul with terror. Cæsar has a fine sentiment on the subject of cowardice:

"What can be avoided
Whose end is purposed by the mighty gods?
Cowards die many times before their deaths;
The valiant never taste of death but once.
Of all the wonders that I yet have heard,
It seems to me most strange that men should fear,
Seeing that death, a necessary end,
Will come when it will come."

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—Will you permit me to solicit a corner in your journal, for a few words on the numerous splendid engravings with which the late arrivals have inundated the city. The windows of the print-shops and bookstores tempt the most phlegmatic passenger to pause, with the display of plates exquisitely finished, and apparently of great value. I trust this will result in the prevalence of a correct taste upon this subject, and that it will give a spur to our own engravers, of whom there are many at present appealing to the public notice. I have seen a head of Bulwer, taken by Dick, and published by Peabody, which is worthy of greater praise than, with due respect to your zealous superintendence of the fine arts, you have yet thought fit to bestow upon it. Mr. Dick is an artist of skill and industry, and I am disposed to find fault with you for not having said more upon his merit. The head of Bulwer is taken from an English plate, published, I think, in the London Monthly Magazine. It is admirably well done, bearing a close resemblance to the original, and is a pledge that this artist can, if he pleases, supply us with pictures from his own burin, without the necessity of our sending across the Atlantic. Pray may I also inquire why you have passed so slightly over the "Views of New-York," for which one of you gentlemen furnished descriptions? If the author of these same letter-press illustrations is too modest to speak of them in his journal, he should not overlook the productions of the engraver in equal silence. For myself, I deem the work very creditable to all concerned, and beg you will insert this in the Mirror, and thereby oblige one of many regular readers. J. L.

Mr. J. L. is rather impertinent in his familiarity, but as his intention seems good, we give place to his remarks.—Eds.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

MR. FORREST took the Gladiator for his benefit on Monday evening. The popularity of the performer and the piece combined, drew a crowded auditory. We really think Dr. Bird has done wonders for so young a writer, and that Mr. Forrest is entitled to our gratitude for his energetic and manly efforts in seeking out and rewarding talent. It may be said, he works for his own interest; but we shall be gratified to find others adopting his example. Mr. Sinclair has closed a very successful engagement. Mr. Kean will produce the new tragedy of Waldemar in a few weeks. Miss Clifton is making friends at the Bowery, and attractions, at both establishments, are multiplying upon our attention.

As we have no other particular observations to offer concerning the entertainments of the past week, we shall occupy the room devoted to this department with a few general remarks. The task of furnishing regular notices of the drama is somewhat difficult and laborious. Many, from disinclination or absence from the city, are unaccustomed to attend theatrical representations, and, we suppose, peruse our animadversions with reluctance, or do not peruse them at all. It is a matter of little importance to them whether Mr. Sinclair shakes six times or sixty at the end of a Scotch ballad; or whether that gentleman or Mr. Richings astound the audience with the most complicated circumlocutions. There must be hundreds, perhaps thousands, of good sensible folks who would not wade through a paragraph to know what impression we might receive from the divine Paganini himself; and, we sorely distrust, that numbers away from the scene of action, look upon Cinderella and rumors of Cinderella as the poor Frenchman did upon his unrelenting persecutor, when, for the fiftieth time, he broke his sleep with the interrogation, "Is there a Mr. Thompson lodges here?" To those we sometimes feel as if an apology were due, and we offer it with the conviction that the force of it will be acknowledged. Whatever clashing of opinions may exist upon the question whether the drama exercises a beneficial influence upon society, it is very certain that the institution is now too firmly seated to be overthrown. It has descended to us, in some shape or other, from almost the earliest dawn of civilization among the ancients, and will probably remain, through future ages, amid the wrecks of a thousand manners, customs, and governments. Whatever has a tendency then to check its abuses, to refine its character, and render it subservient to purposes of moral good, cannot be improper. And there are numerous reasons why the public press should watch the career of a creature of such gigantic strength, so capable of being useful, and so easily perverted and debased. It is reasonable therefore that a journal like this should sometimes take a deliberate survey of its character and actions, and we should esteem ourselves truly fortunate in being able to purge away any of its occasional impurities, or make its real merits more widely known. Besides this serious aim, the consciousness of which, we confess, has often shed around our labors an agreeable air of importance, there are innumerable petty inconsistencies, which need only be fairly set up in their proper light to be corrected both by audience and players.

Notwithstanding all the cant of criticism, how many a piece of absurdity is applauded in an actor of celebrity, and how many a pretty burst of nature and display of skill, is suffered to pass entirely unnoticed in one who does not come to us heralded by a brilliant reputation. How many mistake what is new for what is beautiful, and overlook the most perfect exhibition of art because its very perfection prevents the art from being seen. Theatrical audiences have much to answer for in this respect. There is often a world of acclamation wasted on the worst parts of the play; on those which require the least talent in the actor; as, for example, in the scene in Richard the Third, when the Duke of Buckingham, after the "bloody and devouring boar" has suffered his true character to break forth in these celebrated words, "Begone, thou troublest me. I'm not the vein," delivers that well known speech, in the termination of which he wishes the world "to see this tyrant tumbling from his throne." The representative of the disappointed duke always at this crisis braces himself up into a genuine theatrical attitude, clenches his fist, lets all his voice out, and invariably makes his exit in a little clap of thunder. We are not censuring the actor, but the audience, for being seduced into that applause by noise and rant, which they too often withhold from a becoming expression, a classical attitude, or a graceful reading. For our part we think it time for the public to put themselves a little upon their dignity, and exert their reason in detecting the best passages of a piece, and the genuine excellencies of the performer on which to bestow their plaudits. Indeed, we scarcely remember to have heard any speech noticed by the house for its intrinsic eloquence. The most finished sentence in the Sketch Book would flow silently along, unless pointed with some vile pun, made conspicuous by a mock-heroic, hacknied sentiment, or appealing directly to the pit with a local allusion. During the period of the Greek mania, a poet, who luckily happened to combine true genius with good sense and knowledge of the world, was requested to compose a prologue. It was written throughout with a chaste yet fervid beauty, such as literary men would admire in the closet; but it would have been a complete failure on the stage, had not the author ingeniously managed to round it off with an unexpected apostrophe to the Greeks, which so electrified the audience that we thought they never would have done shouting. We are justly exposed to the same remarks respecting music. Let the singer exercise his lungs, legs, and arms lustily—come up to the stage lights, and treat the admirers of this divine art to a full measure of shakes, quavers, and the like, and although the melody will be actually ruined thereby, he will move some to tears, and nearly all to acclamation. An actor of real talent has another dangerous rival in our favor. Showy scenery and new dresses, which may be admired without any learning or effort of thought, come in for a large portion of praise; and a speech, which has cost perhaps some hours labor, is eclipsed by a handsome moon, an old bridge in the back ground, or a sky, which, from the admiration it excites, one would imagine altogether better than that hung over us by nature. A grocer's sign, in the farce, will set the house in a roar, when Falstaff's wit has failed. An executioner with his sleeves tucked up, the supernumeraries hitting each other over the head with wooden javelins, make the house tremble to the foundation; while the impressive gleamings of Richard's conscience in the tent, and the fine philosophy of Hamlet over the skull of "poor Yorick," are listened to with a sort of patient resignation. We remember a performer of much grace and intelligence who gained more credit for shaking his left leg in the dying-scene of a tragedy than for any of his preceding admirable delineations of passion. As long as the lovers of the drama suffer themselves to be so deceived, the stage will continue to be a bad school of elocution, and it will be censure against a public speaker to say that his manner is "theatrical."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

AN HONEST FACE.—One day when the Caliph Omar was sitting in council with the companions of the Prophet, and great men of his time, two young men, appeared before him, leading a third, whose beauty attracted general attention. Omar gave them a sign to approach, and one of the two, who held the third, spoke to the following effect:—

"We are two brothers, whose happiness it was to have a father, who, for his virtues, was esteemed by the whole tribe. He was in the habit of walking in his garden to enjoy the air, and this young man killed him there. We have apprehended him, and brought him hither for the purpose of receiving from you the right of retaliation."—"Answer to this," said Omar to the young man, who stood before him with the greatest calmness, retaining a placid and guiltless countenance; and he proceeded with great natural eloquence to defend himself thus:—

"They are right: yet hear me, commander of the faithful. I belong to a Bedouin family, who wander about the desert. One of our young and finest camels approached the wall of the city, to crop the tender branches of a tree that hung over it; an old man appeared above the wall and rolled down a huge stone, which crushed my young camel,—he sunk down beside me dead. In my rage I seized the stone, and flung it back towards the wall, where it struck the old man who had killed my camel. The blow was mortal, I sought to save myself by flight, but these two young persons apprehended, and have brought me before you."—"Thou hast confessed thy crime," said Omar, "the punishment of retaliation awaits thee."—"I am ready to endure it," replied the young man, "but I have a younger brother, whom our father on his death-bed particularly recommended to my care. The property, which by inheritance, falls to him, lies buried in a spot known to none but myself. If you cause me to be put to death before I have delivered it to him, you will hereafter, O commander of the faithful, have to answer for the loss of his inheritance before God. Grant me but three days to do this business." When Omar had reflected for a moment, he said: "But who will be responsible for your return?" The young man pointed to Abizar, one of the members of the council, who, with no other security than the confidence which the physiognomy of the young man inspired him with, consented to become his guarantee.

The third day was almost at an end, and the Bedouin came not yet. The two brothers began to demand with a loud voice the blood of the man who had taken upon himself to answer for the murderer's return. The companions of the prophet opposed it: but the severe Omar pronounced sentence, that the life of Abizar should be taken if the young man returned not before the setting of the sun. At that very moment he re-appeared, breathless with haste, and in profuse perspiration. "I have," said he, "put my brother's money in safety, pardon me if the excessive heat has retarded me more than I expected." "Commander of the faithful," said Abizar, "I have been security for this youth without having known anything of him, and inspired with confidence in him solely through his honest countenance—behold him here! Let us no more say there is neither truth nor honor upon earth."

All were astonished at the upright conduct of the youth, and the two brothers, who were equally affected, withdrew their accusation, and declared they pardoned him. Severe as Omar was, he accepted their pardon with great pleasure, and congratulated himself that there was so much truth and honor under his government, and among the Bedouins.—New Arabian Nights.

SIDDONIANA.—When Mrs. Siddons visited Dr. Johnson, he paid her two or three very elegant compliments. When she retired, he said to Dr. Glover, "Sir, she is a prodigiously fine woman." "Yes," replied Dr. Glover, "but don't you think she is much finer on the stage, when she is adorned by art?" "Sir," said Dr. Johnson, "on the stage art does not adorn her; nature adorns her there, and art glorifies her."

"Mrs. Siddons," said Lord Byron, "was the beau ideal of acting; Miss O'Neil I would not go to see for fear of weakening the impression made by the queen of tragedians. When I read Lady Macbeth's part, I have Mrs. Siddons before me; and imagination even supplies her voice, whose tones were superhuman, and power over the heart supernatural."

Sir Joshua Reynolds never marked his name on his pictures, except in the instance of Mrs. Siddons's portrait as the Tragic Muse, when he wrote his name upon the hem of her garment. When Mrs. Siddons first saw the picture in its finished state, she went near to examine the pattern of this, which appeared to be a curious classic embroidery, such being, at that time, much in fashion, and she then perceived it contained his name; when making the remark to Sir Joshua, who was present, he very politely said, "I could not lose the honor this opportunity offered to me for my name going down to posterity on the hem of your garment."

"At Calais," says Kelly, in his Reminiscences, "we went to Dessein's, made an excellent dinner, and passed the night there. We took our route the next morning for Lisle, and got to dinner at St. Omer. At the hotel where we dined the landlady told us that Madame la grand actrice Anglaise Siddons had just dined, and quitted the house not a quarter of an hour before our arrival. I asked the landlady what she thought of Mrs. Siddons? She said she 'thought her a fine woman, and thought she made it her study to appear like a Frenchwoman; but,' added the landlady, 'she has yet much to learn before she arrives at the dignity and grace of one.' After this speech I could find nothing palatable in her house."

Mrs. Siddons was less taciturn in private society than is generally imagined by those who had frequent opportunities of seeing her. She sung many simple ballads with infinite taste; and, when in very limited society, she introduced a peculiarly dry humor into those amusing trifles. On one occasion, at the house of her late brother, Mr. John Kemble, the writer of this remembers Mrs. Siddons singing Sheridan's ballad of "Billy Taylor," with irresistible drollery.—Blackwood's Magazine.

THE EFFECTS OF HABIT.—The path leading down this ravine is, in many places, so precipitous, that we were constantly in danger of slipping and rolling into the depths below, which the assistance of the natives alone prevented. While we were thus borrowing help from others, and grasping every tuft of grass and bough that offered its friendly support, we were overtaken by a group of chubby little children, trudging unconcernedly on, munching a water-melon, and balancing on their heads calabashes of water, which they had brought from the opposite side of the island. They smiled at our helplessness as they passed, and we felt their innocent reproof; but we were still unpractised in such feats, while they from being trained to them, had acquired a footing and a firmness which habit alone can produce.—Beechey's Voyage to the Pacific.

SUSCEPTIBILITY.—There is now living in Spalding, England, an old widow lady, upwards of eighty years, who declares she has not shed a tear these fifty years, during which time she has buried three loving husbands.—London Times.

LOVE AND EMPIRE.—Lord Whitworth, ambassador to the czar of Russia, had had a personal intimacy with the Czarina Catherine, (the first Catherine, wife of Peter the Great,) at a time when her favors were not purchased nor rewarded at so extravagant a rate as that of a diadem. When he had accommodated the rupture between the court of England and the czar, he was invited to a ball at court, and taken out to dance by the czarina. As they began the minuet, she squeezed him by the hand, and said in a whisper, "Have you forgot little Kate?"—Walter Scott.

AN HONEST MAN.—Grose, who was acquainted with Oldys the biographer, says that he was a man of great good nature, honor, and integrity, particularly in his character of a historian. "Nothing," adds he, "I firmly believe, would ever have biased him to insert any fact in his writings he did not believe, or to suppress any he did. Of this delicacy he gave an instance, at a time when he was in great distress. After his publication of the life of Sir Walter Raleigh, some booksellers, thinking his name would sell a piece they were publishing, offered him a considerable sum to father it, which he rejected with the greatest indignation."—Literary Gazette.

SINGULAR MODE OF CATCHING DUCKS.—The Karaikees catch a great many ducks with nets, which they let fall over the precipices and cliffs along the sea-coast, where those ducks sit in the cavities of the rocks. As the net falling down frightens them, they fly against it and are caught in the meshes, sometimes twenty at a time.

TALENT FOR WRITING WORSE AND WORSE.—A gentleman returning from the representation of the "Modern Prophets," or from some other of D'Urfey's bad plays, the first night it was acted, said to Dryden, "Was there ever such stuff?" "Sir," replied Dryden, "you don't know my friend Tom so well as I do: I'll answer for him he shall write worse yet."—Half's Collections.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

THE REVERIES OF A BACHELOR.

FROM AN OLD COMMON-PLACE BOOK.

"I don't choose to say much upon this head,
I'm a plain man and in a single station;
But, oh! ye lords of ladies intellectual,
Inform us truly, have they not ben-pecked you all."

August 4th.—I never saw a woman—that is, I have seen very few women whom I should not tremble to marry—while they who have fastened on my thoughts and softened me into an odd mixture of friendship and admiration, that might be mistaken for love, are innumerable. They have some quality of sweetness; something to dazzle or to soothe; but are deficient in that general combination of virtues and graces, necessary to make them "wife-like." What a misery it must be to be tacked to a companion of whom you get tired, whom it is your duty to love. What comparisons must flash in upon a cooled husband. Preserve me, ye gods!

August 5th.—Last night was calm as Eden. I had been strolling around the city. Eat a cream at Contoit's alone. There were several parties around me; some graceful girls, and one or two children. How perfectly merry they seemed. I stole a glance under a large bonnet, as the face was lifted in the act of speaking. The moonlight was soft yet distinct, like that of a frosted lamp. The features were animated; more, they were perfectly radiant with soul and mind. Her look was one of those that painters, except the rarest masters, never catch. There is a kind of female voice which I cannot hear without yearning to know the speaker. Those tones are among the deadliest of woman's snares. Good eyes, a pretty foot, and such a voice, and Monsieur Bachelor falls into a reverie. The gentleman by her side addressed her by her first name. I remember nothing more fraught with pleasant and endearing associations than this familiar form of speech. There is something pompous and ludicrous to me in all high-sounding titles, and I often smile in directing a letter to "his excellency," or "the general," or my "honorable" correspondents; but Julia, Maria, Fanny, Amelia, how they flow from the lips! What a history of social intercourse, in all the by-paths of life, they betray to the lonely stranger, who listens and envies and says nothing. I was disguising these observations under an air of avidity towards my ice, when the objects of them (who I found were of one family, the children being the offspring of the young couple) arose, the lady leaning confidently on her husband's arm, and each retaining the hand of a child, and retired. I whistled the end of an old ballad, which I presently recognized as the air of "My heart, my heart is breaking for the love of Alice Gray." I thrust my hands into my pocket, called for a glass of brandy and water, and wandered away through the crowd towards this den—my room. Every thing here is in confusion and has a vile odor of cigar smoke. There is an inch of unbroken ashes lying on the candlestick; the maid has put the pitcher on my London "Spectator;" and four pair of boots and my new coat are lying in the corner. The wretch! After all a bachelor is a neglected, worthless sort of a creature. Dear, dear Mary, I wish—I wish she had staid longer in this city. I wonder what dolt she will fling herself away upon? I wonder if she ever thinks of me (where the d—l's my night-cap)? I shall never forget the tone of mirth with which she told me, "Farewell, I shall never see you again!" followed by the instantaneous tremor of her voice, the quivering of that perfect lip, the sudden turning away of her face; and then the captain's shout, "all aboard." What perfect hypocrites women sometimes are on certain subjects. I fear I said too much or too little to Mary. We young fellows sometimes—it's a pity but—heigho! An enormous gape, that threatened to turn me the wrong side out, cut me short, and I fell asleep.

August 6th.—Morning. Raining in a deluge. Let me see. Take up B.'s note to-day. See Murray about Liment's affair. Book-binder, 304 Barrow.

It is astonishing what different moods men are exposed to. We are complete fac similes of the weather. Rainy, cloudy, cold, warm, clear, and sunshiny. Spring hopes, winter dreariness; blooming like summer, mellow like autumn. Can it be possible, that it was I who scribbled the nonsense on the last page? I whining about sweet faces, and domestic bliss, and all that? I who have seen Charles Bryon shoot out of his house like a cannon ball discharged by a fiery expression of his wife; and poor Sam Haight begging me to discount a note of five hundred dollars, to pay for Julia's jewels. I who profess independence, and love my friends. I entrapped by a smooth face and a soft hand, a silvery voice and neat foot, to swear off from the club and turn virtuous; to go home at ten and leave off smoking; and to give up the superb luxury of falling in love with all the glorious creations with which nature has crowded the earth, as the stars come out in heaven; and this for one—a single pair of inquiring eyes—with a right to reproach me for floating about with the delicious tides of life at my and their sovereign pleasure? Why I deemed myself more manly, more worldly, more wise. A married man is a victim. He is bound down with a thousand Lilliputian chains. He is burthened with the necessity of thinking for two, perhaps for twenty. He multiplies his responsibilities, his cares, his fears. If unhappy in his connexion, he sneaks through life like a dog with a tin canister tied to his tail. If happy, he resembles one who has built him a beautiful ship, loaded her with all the affections of his soul, and sent her abroad upon an ocean swept continually with fearful hurricanes.

Night. One of the pleasantest adventures I ever met. The day has been varied with heavy showers and dark sultry calms. I was walking in Broadway before a young girl, whose face (I never pass a female face without criticizing it) was of unusual beauty; an immense black cloud suddenly floated over the city, and a few large drops fell heavily. She stopped, and appeared embarrassed. She was without an umbrella—mine was large and new. I proffered it; she accepted it, with a smile that took away my breath. I accompanied her to the door; it bore the name of my old school-mate and friend, Leigh Ackerman, and this was his wife. I was thunderstruck. What! Ackerman? Leigh Ackerman? Married? and to such a creature! Her graceful invitation was twice repeated before I replied, and then I stumbled into the room like a man in a dream.

My old friend met me with a warm welcome, and after a brief but lively visit, I accepted an invitation to repeat the call often. The husband shook me heartily by the hand, the lady thrilled me with one of the kindest, dearest of looks, and I was soon wandering through the streets in a reverie which I broke by running my nose against a pump handle. A fair illustration of the difference between the dreams and the realities of life.

August 12th.—Have seen this fair enchantress frequently since. How perfectly beautiful she is. What a life and fire shoot from her large black eyes. She has the look of a gazelle, and sometimes comes over her features an expression of sadness, a drooping of the long lashes over their orbs of light, a compression of the lips, and a half stifled sigh, as if she were not happy. I see it all. Leigh Ackerman is not the being for her, and she has found it out. He is cold and practical. He is a princely fellow in appearance; but one who knows him may say with the fox to the mask, in the fable, "What a pity," &c. How utterly wasted her fine qualities must be on him. As I was looking down on her glowing face this evening, the thought came across my mind, if fate had made her mine! and as our eyes met, the same thought seemed felt by her.

"I had not wandered wild and wide,
With such a creature for my guide,
Both heaven and man might now approve me,
If she had lived, and lived to love me."

What a fool or villain am I. A fool if I am thus wasting my soul on one who cares not for me; a villain if any thing I have said or done has awakened in her bosom a forbidden wish, a vain regret. I have found the husband is not attached to her. He scarcely ever returns home before midnight. She sees no company. And I—she—that is, my treacherous rebellious feet bear me to her door, sometimes against my reason. Why did I not meet her before? The clock strikes twelve. What is she doing now? Sitting pale, melancholy, alone, by a dim light, and the tones of this very bell strikes on her chilled solitary heart like a death-knell, and the startling knock of an intoxicated husband breaks her reverie, wherein her soul wandered back to the pleasantest hopes of her childhood, and then returned to brood among their present desolation. If she were my wife, would it be thus? What a joy to render all the multiplied adventures of life subservient to the gratification of such a being! To ride with her through lovely scenes, to read to her the creations of genius, the intensely wrought stories of Scott, the superb passages of Shakspeare, the melting witcheries of Moore, the classic richness of Pope, the clear exquisite simplicity and wit of Addison, the delicious pathos and irresistible humor of Washington Irving. What a picture rises up in my fancy. How perfectly happy, how vivid? She, with a perfect content overspreading her features, employed at her sewing; the replenished fire glowing in the grate; the wintry wind whistling around the windows; the tortoise cat asleep on the rug, and the tempered light of the lamp making our neatly furnished room as cheerful as our own hearts were amid the commotions of life. I am writing now the loosest reveries that can float through my mind. "Shadows, my lord." It is a happiness to sit and dream thus; yet it is a crime. Is it good or evil to write in this careless disjointed style? Answer, thou prying mortal, whose'er thou art; whose eye, perchance, will detect these midnight thoughts, when I am mouldering, mouldered, gone, and forgotten among human beings. What a night is this! The soft and spotted moon is setting in silence, and a few ragged clouds are lapsing through the heavens. Thou eternal arch of unutterable splendor! imagination, that courses over all things earthly with an almost omnipotent power, tires out and sinks down, baffled in soaring into thy blue expanse. Light, which outspeeds imagination with its wonderful swiftness, even light in its miraculous journey through thee, dies away into nothing, crossing but a speck in thy sphere, comparatively smaller than the point of an insect's sting. How many have looked on thee as I do now, lost in thy infinity? Cesar, from his armies, has marked these very stars; and Tarquin, when he stole through the streets of Rome, cursed thy light; Richard the lion-hearted glanced up at thee from the plains of Palestine; and Mary of Scotland, from her prison case-mement, perchance loved yonder very steady planet, and saw it through her slowly rolling tears; immortal Will Shakspeare stole away from the midnight riot, and fixed his flashing eyes upon thee while he muttered over those inspired sentences which were to be familiar to so many million million lips. And who will be gazing on thee when a hundred years shall have dragged themselves away with their victims; when all, all who now live and hope, who strut in pride, or stalk in woe, shall be but as the fantastic images of a half-forgotten dream; who will then be gazing up at you from this thronged city? Vain yearning, to grasp the locked-up secrets of nature. What an insect is man!

HEALTH AND EXERCISE.

He taught them love of toil; toil which does keep Obstruction from the mind, and quench the blood;
Ease but belongs to us like sleep, and sleep
Like opium is our medicine, not our food.

ORIGINAL CRITICAL NOTICES.

PHILIP MASSINGER.

ALTHOUGH this author ranked next to Shakspeare, the American public, until recently, have been almost unacquainted with his writings. While the effusions of novelists, essayists, poets, &c. are sprinkled often too profusely with the borrowed wealth of the prince of dramatists, the rarity with which they exhibit the pithy gems of Massinger betrays their ignorance of his ample treasury. Yet every man of leisure would find pleasure, and every literary man profit in seeking them with care.

Of the life of Massinger, like that of Shakspeare, little is known. He was born at Salisbury, in the year 1584, and died March seventeenth, 1650, aged fifty-six. "The memorial of his mortality," says Gifford, "is given with a pathetic brevity which accords but too well with the obscure and humble passages of his life. March twentieth, 1639-40, buried Philip Massinger, a stranger." It is acknowledged, however, that his family and connections were good, and his literary acquirements are said to have been multifarious and extensive. He was entered at the university of Oxford, where he remained four years, after which, at the age of twenty-two, he set out for London, and, probably, driven by his necessities, dedicated himself to the service of the stage.

"The theatre, when Massinger first took up his abode in the metropolis, must have presented attractions of all others the most calculated to excite the interest, and inspire the imagination of a young man of sensibility, taste, and education, like our poet. No art ever attained a more rapid maturity than the dramatic art in England. The people had, indeed, been long accustomed to a species of exhibition, called 'Miracles or Mysteries,' founded on sacred subjects, and performed by the ministers of religion themselves, on the holy festivals, in or near the churches, and designed to instruct the ignorant in the leading facts of sacred history." From the occasional introduction of allegorical characters, such as Faith, Death, Hope, or Sin, into these religious dramas, representations of another kind, called 'Moralities,' had by degrees arisen, of which the plots were more artificial, regular, and connected, and which were entirely formed of such personifications: but the first rough draught of a regular tragedy and comedy—Lord Sackville's Gorboduc, and Still's Gammer Gurton's Needle—were not produced till within the latter half of the sixteenth century, and little more than twenty years before the stage acquired its highest splendor in the productions of Shakspeare.

"About the end of the sixteenth century, the attention of the public began to be more generally directed to the drama; and it throve most admirably beneath the cheering beams of popular favor. The theatrical performances which in the early part of Elizabeth's reign had been exhibited on temporary stages erected in such halls or apartments as the actors could procure, or, more generally, in the yards of the larger inns, while the spectators surveyed them from the surrounding windows and galleries, began to find more convenient and permanent habitations. About the year 1569, a regular play-house, under the appropriate name of 'The Theatre,' was erected. It is supposed to have stood somewhere in Blackfriars; and, three years after the commencement of this establishment, the queen, yielding to her own inclination for such amusements, and disregarding the remonstrance of the Puritans, granted license and authority to the servants of the earl of Leicester (for the recreation of her loving subjects, as for her own solace and pleasure when she should think good to see them) to exercise their occupation throughout the whole realm of England. From this time the number of theatres increased with the increasing demands of the people. Various noblemen had their respective companies of performers, who were associated as their servants, and acted under their protection; and when Massinger left Oxford, and commenced dramatic author, there were no less than seven principal theatres open in the metropolis.

"With respect to the interior arrangements, there were very few points of difference between our modern theatres and those of the days of Massinger. The price of admission, indeed, was considerably cheaper: to the boxes the entrance was a shilling; to the pit and galleries only sixpence. Sixpence also was the price paid for stools upon the stage; and these seats, as we learn from Decker's Gull's Hornbook, were particularly affected by the wits and critics of the time. The conduct of the audience was less restrained by the sense of public decorum, and smoking tobacco, playing at cards, eating and drinking, were generally prevalent among them. The hours of performance were also earlier; the play commencing at one o'clock. During the representation a flag was unfurled at the top of the theatre; and the stage according to the universal practice of the age, was strewn with rushes; but, in all other respects, the theatre of Elizabeth and James's days seem to have borne a perfect resemblance to our own. They had their pit, where the inferior class of spectators, the groundlings, vented their clamorous censure or approbation; they had their boxes—rooms, as they were called—to which the right of exclusive admission was engaged by the night, for the more affluent portion of the audience; and there were again the galleries, or scaffoldings above the boxes, for those who were content to purchase less commodious situations at a cheaper rate. On the stage in the same manner, the appointments appear to have been nearly of the same description as at present. The curtain divided the audience from the actors, which, at the third sounding, not indeed of the bell, but of the trumpet, was drawn for the commencement of the performance."

Only splendid talents could have prevented our poet, young, poor, and friendless, from being totally eclipsed by the host of geniuses that then thronged the arena to fame. Shakspeare, Jonson, Beaumont, Fletcher, Shirley were dazzling the world with their wonderful displays of intellect and imagination. Among such a galaxy, his rays streamed forth with a brilliancy surpassed only by the lustre of that radiant star,

"Of whose true-fixed, and resting quality
There is no fellow in the firmament."

He produced two or three plays every year, until the number amounted to thirty-seven, of which sixteen, with the fragment of another, are alone extant. "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," is highly dramatic, and is familiar to most of our readers. The annual income of this great man has been estimated at fifty pounds, which, without forgetting the additional value of money at that time, must have formed but an inadequate means of support. As a picture of the melancholy mingling up of life's disagreeable realities with the sweet splendid visions among which genius delights to wander, we extract the following letters:

"To our most loving friend, Mr. Philip Hinchlow, esquire, these.

"MR. HINCHLOW.—You understand our unfortunate extremity, and I do not think you so void of christianity but that you would throw so much money into the Thames as we request now of you, rather than endanger so many innocent lives. You know there is xl. more, at least, to be received of you for the play. We desire you to lend us vt. of that, which shall be allowed to you; without which, we cannot be payed, nor I play any more till this be dispatched. It will lose you xxl. ere the end of the next weeke, besides the hindrance of the next new play. Pray, sir, consider our cases with humanity, and now give us cause to acknowledge you our true friend in time of need. We have entreated Mr. Davison to deliver this note, as well to witness your love as our promises, and alwayes acknowledgement to be ever your most thankful and loving friends, NAT. FIELD."

*Indulgences were granted to those who attended the representation of them.
†Gorboduc appeared in 1562; Gammer Gurton, in 1566.

"The money shall be abated out of the money remains for the play of Mr. Fletcher and ours."
ROB. DABORNE.

"I have ever found you a true loving friend to me, and in so small a suite, it being honest, I hope you will not fail us."
PHILIP MASSINGER.

Indorsed.

"Received by me, Robert Davison, of Mr. Hinchlow, for the use of Mr. Daborne, Mr. Feeld, Mr. Massinger, the sum of vi.
ROB. DAVISON."

Massinger is represented as a man of singular modesty, gentleness, candor, and affability, beloved sincerely by all who had any knowledge of his character and talents. We have flung together these few facts respecting his career, that the reader unacquainted with his compositions, of whom there are a vast number, may form some idea of the author of the few brief passages given below. We are not disposed to follow him through all the intricacies of his plots, which, without a reverence to the judgment of superior critics, who have advocated a different opinion, are frequently not without certain glaring improbabilities, although they often become strongly interesting. But we propose to give merely a few specimens of the fine beauty of the expressions which are scattered through his pages. It is for these, more than any other peculiarity that we delight in the old dramatists. Their plays are made to read as well as to see; and, apart from all the aid of light, scenery, and dresses, and the contagious excitement which acts upon a man who alone is cool and philosophic, and renders him in a crowd susceptible to enthusiasm and passion, there are to be found in Massinger and his contemporaries, truths flashing as diamonds, and set in superb language. When there is neither a superfluity nor a deficiency of words, the idea is displayed in bold relief, like carved work on a temple. We deem the distinction between the ancient and modern writers to be connected with this depth and force of expression, of which we find so many perfect illustrations in Shakspeare and Massinger. Our writers are rich, elegant, melodious, full of delightful conceits, and ingenious refinements; their thoughts come to the reader arrayed in dainty apparel, and blazing with a superfluity of embellishments. But our author and his kindred spirits give their conceptions in a homely garment, and with few preliminary flourishes. You read along with them till suddenly there stands boldly up before you a thought, perfect in itself, and perfectly seen, like a statue, so sparingly draped as to display the full proportions of its limbs; and when its features are once beheld, they cling in the memory like reality. You lay down the page and pass to the ordinary duties of life, forgetting the companion of your closet till some person or occurrence in the transactions around you calls up the recollection of what you at first deem your own actual experience, but which, at length, you trace to the quiet page which beguiled you in your leisure hour. Let us instance a few of these from our old poet. In the "Virgin-Martyr," Antoninus exclaims:

Anton.—Oh, I am lost for ever! lost, Macrinus!
The anchor of the wretched, hope, forsakes me,
And with one blast of fortune all my light
Of happiness is put out.

Several noble passages occur in the following dialogue between Dorothea, Macrinus, and Angelo, from the same play.

Dor. My trusty Angelo, with that curious eye
Of thine, which ever waits upon my business,
I prithee watch those my still-negligent servants,
That they perform my will, in what's enjoined them
To the good of others. Be careful, my dear boy.

Ang. Yes, my sweetest mistress. [Exit.]
Dor. Now, sir, you may go on.

Mac. I then must study
A new arithmetic, to sum up the virtues
Which Antoninus gracefully become.
There is in him so much man, so much goodness,
So much of honor and of all things else,
Which make our being excellent, that from his store
He can enough lend others; yet, much taken from him,
The want shall be as little, as when seas
Lend from their bounty, to fill up the pooriness
Of needy rivers.

Dor. Sir, he is more indebted
To you for praise, than you to him that owes it.
Mac. If queens, viewing his presents paid to the whiteness
Of your chaste hand alone, should be ambitious
But to be parted in their numerous shares;
This be counts nothing: could you see main armies
Make battles in the quarrel of his valor,
That 'tis the best, the truest; this were nothing:
The greatness of his state, his father's voice,
And arm, aving Caesars, he ne'er boasts of!
The sunbeams which the emperor throws upon him
Shine there but as in water, and gild him
Not with one spot of pride; no, dearest beauty,
All these, heaped up together in one scale,
Cannot weigh down the love he bears to you,
Being put into the other.

Dor. Could gold buy you
To speak thus for a friend, you, sir, are worthy
Of more than I will number: and this your language
Hath power to win upon another woman,
Top of whose heart the feathers of this world
Are gaily stuck; but all which first you named,
And now this last, his love, to me are nothing.

Mac. You make me a sad messenger—but himself.
Enter ANTONINUS.
Being come in person, shall, I hope, hear from you
Music more pleasing.

Anton. Has your ear, Macrinus,
Heard none, then?

Mac. None I like.
Anton. But can there be
In such a noble casket, wherein lie
Beauty and chastity in their full perfections,
A rocky heart, killing with cruelty
A life that's prostrated beneath your feet?

Dor. I am guilty of a shame I yet ne'er knew,
Thus to hold parley with you; pray sir, pardon. [Going.]

Anton. Good sweetness, you now have it, and shall go:
Be but so merciful, before your wounding me
With such a mortal weapon as farewell,
To let me murmur to your virgin ear,
What I was loath to lay on any tongue
But this mine own.

Dor. If one immodest accent
Fly out, I hate you everlastingly.

And again, what a fine illustration of a dying martyr's spirit.

Artemia. Are you so brave, sir?
Set forward to his triumph, and let those two
Go cursing along with him.

Dorothea. No, but pitying,
For my part, I that you love ten times more
By torturing me, that I dare your tortures:
Through all the army of my sins, I have even
Labor'd to break, and cope with death to the face;
The visage of a hangman frights not me;
The sight of whips, racks, gibbets, axes, fires,
Are scaffoldings by which my soul climbs up
To an eternal habitation.

Theophilus. Caesar's imperial daughter, hear me speak:
Let not this christian thing in this her pageantry
Of pride, deriding both our gods and Caesar,
Build to herself a kingdom in her death,
Going laughing from us: no; her bitterest torment
Shall be to feel her constancy beaten down;
The bravery of her resolution lie
Batter'd, by argument, into such pieces,
That she again in penitence shall creep
To kiss the pavements of our paynim gods.

Artemia. How to be done?
Theophilus. I'll send my daughters to her,
And they shall turn her rocky faith to wax;
Else split at me, let me be made your slave,
And meet no Roman's but a villain's grave.
Artemia. Thy prisoner let her be, then; and Sapritius,
Your son and that, be yours: death shall be sent
To him that suffers them, by voice or letters,
To greet each other. Rattle her estate;
Christians to beggary brought grow desperate.

Dorothea. Still on the bread of poverty let me feed.
Angelo. O! my admired mistress, quench not out
The holy fire within you, though temptations
Shower down upon you: Clasp thine armor on,
Fight well, and thou shalt see, after these wars,
Thy head wear sunbeams, and thy feet touch stars. [Exeunt.]

Theophilus sends his daughters, who, instead of converting Dorothea to paganism, are themselves induced by her arguments to adopt the true religion. Before their father's face, they spit at the image of Jove. Theophilus exclaims aghast at their action,

Theophilus. I am blasted:
And, as my feet were rooted here, I find
I have no motion; I would I had no sight, too!
Or if my eyes can serve to any use,
Give me, thou injured power, a sea of tears,
To expiate this madness in my daughters:
For, being themselves, they would have trembled at
So blasphemous a deed in any other:
For my sake, hold awhile thy dreadful thunder,
And give me patience to demand a reason
For this accursed act.

A description of a beautiful boy:

A thousand blessings danced upon his eyes,
A smooth-faced glorious thing.

Antoninus mourning for the approaching death of his mistress.

Antoninus. Then with her dies
The abstract of all sweetness that's in woman!
Set me down, friend, that, ere the iron hand
Of death close up mine eyes, they may at once
Take my last leave both of this light and her:
For, she being gone, the glorious sun himself
To me's Cimmerian darkness.

Theophilus at length himself repents, and thus reveals his conversion to the emperor, Dioclesian, after the execution of Dorothea:

Dioclesian. For I profess he is not Caesar's friend,
That sheds a tear for any torture that
A christian suffers. Welcome, my best servant,
My careful, zealous provost! thou hast told
To satisfy my will, though in extremes:
I love thee for't; thou art firm rock, no chattering.
Prithee deliver, and for my sake do it,
Without excess of bitterness, or scoffs,
Before my brother and these kings, how took
The christian her death?

Theophilus. And such a presence,
Though every private head in this large room
Were circled round with an imperial crown,
Her story will deserve, it is so full
Of excellence and wonder.

Dioclesian. Ha! how is this?

Theophilus. O! mark it, therefore, and with that attention,
As you would hear an embassy from heaven
By a winged legate; for the truth deliver'd,
Both how, and what, this blessed virgin suffer'd
And Dorothea but hereafter named,
You will rise up with reverence, and no more,
As things unworthy of your thoughts, remember
What the christian'd Spartan ladies were
Which lying Greece so boasts of. Your own matrons,
Your Roman dames, whose figures you yet keep
As holy relics in her history
Will find a second urn: Gracchus' Cornelia,
Faullian that in death desired to follow
Her husband Seneca, nor Brutus' Portia,
That swallowed burning coals to overtake him,
Though all their several worths were given to one,
With this is to be mention'd.

Macrinus. Is he mad?

Dioclesian. Why, they did die, Theophilus, and boldly,
This did no more.

Theophilus. They out of desperation,
Or for vain glory of an after-name,
Parted with life: this had not murtherous sons,
As the rash Gracchi were; nor was this saint
A dotting mother, as Cornelia was.
This lost no husband, in whose overthrow
Her wealth and honor sunk; no fear of want
Did make her being tedious; but, aiming
At an immortal crown, and in His cause
Who only can bestow it; who sent down
Legions of ministering angels to bear up
Her spotless soul to heaven, who entertain'd it
With choice celestial music, equal to
The motion of the spheres; she, uncompe'll'd,
Changed this life for a better. My lord Sapritius,
You were present at her death; did you e'er hear
Such ravishing sounds?

Sapritius. Yet you said then 't was witchcraft,
And devilish illusions.

Theophilus. I then heard it
With sinful ears, and belch'd out blasphemous words
Against his deity, which then I knew not,
Nor did believe in him.

Dioclesian. Why, dost thou now?

Or dar'st thou, in our hearing—

Theophilus. Were my voice
As loud as is His thunder, to be heard
Through all the world, all potentates on earth
Ready to burst with rage, should they but hear it;
Though hell, to aid their malice, lent her furies,
Yet I would speak, and speak again, and boldly:
I am a christian; and the powers you worship,
But dreams of fools and madmen.

Macrinus. Lay hands on him.

Dioclesian. Thou twice a child! for dotting age so makes thee.
Thou couldst not else, thy pilgrimage of life
Being almost pass'd through, in this last moment
Destroy what'er thou hast done good or great—

Thy youth did promise much; and, grown a man,
Thou mad'st it good, and with increase of years,
Thy actions still better'd; as the sun,
Thou didst rise gloriously, kept'st a constant course
In all thy journey; and now, in the evening,
When thou shouldst pass with honor to thy rest,
Wilt thou fall like a meteor?

This is a kind of writing which bears many readings. We are sorely tempted to prolong the article with a few of the massive ornaments of intellect and fancy which decorate the "Grand Duke of Florence," but our extracts have already extended too far. We shall be amply satisfied if even one among our growing literati be induced by our brief observations to snatch a few hours from some fashionable authors for the study of "William Massinger, the stranger."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Introductions to the Study of the Greek Classic Poets; designed principally for the use of young persons at school and college. By Henry Nelson Coleridge, Esq. M.A. late fellow of King's college, Cambridge. Part I.—Containing, 1st. General Introduction. 2d. Homer. One vol. 12mo. p. 239. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. 1831.

THESE sketches are not by the celebrated poet Coleridge, but they will not disappoint the expectations of those who take them up with that impression. They are elegantly written comments upon the works of the leading poet of the world, equally calculated to please the classical and instruct the unlearned. Our author well observes of the wonderful genius of Homer, that he "Always seems to write in good spirits, and he rarely fails to put his readers in good spirits also. To do this is a prerogative of genius in all times; but it is especially so of the genius of primitive or heroic poetry. In Homer head and heart speak and are spoken to together. Morbid peculiarities of thought or temper have no place in him. He is as wide and general as the air we breathe and the earth upon which we tread, and his vivacious spirit animates, like a Proteus, a thousand different forms of intellectual production—the life-preserving principle in them all. He is as the mighty strength of his own deep-flowing ocean—

"Whence all the rivers, all the seas have birth,
And every fountain, every well on earth."

The true lover of poetry, although not versed in the dead languages, will find himself irresistibly led on to a perusal of the translations, which the finest scholars of our own have left of their great idol, and the "study of the classic poets" will probably be the means of diffusing a knowledge at least of the English versions among many. It contains several displays of fine composition. Read the following enthusiastic eulogy of the ancient tongues, as an example:

"I think all the great masters of the ancient literatures had this one natural advantage over all who, in modern times, have attempted to tread in their footsteps in the struggle for immortality. The Greek and the Roman caught, each from his mother's lips, a language which gave them heroic mastery in the contest, without any labor of their own. We may even now hear them challenging posterity in charmed accents, and daunting our rivalry with armor of celestial temper.

"I am not one who has grown old in literary retirement, devoted to classical studies with an exclusiveness which might lead to an overweening estimate of these two noble languages. Few, I will not say evil, were the days allowed to me for such pursuits; and I was constrained, still young and an unripe scholar, to forego them for the duties of an active and laborious profession. They are now amusements only, however, delightful and improving. Far am I from assuming to understand all their riches, all their beauty, or all their power; yet I can profoundly feel their immeasurable superiority to all we call modern; and I would fain think that there are many even among my young readers who can now, or will hereafter, sympathize with the expression of my ardent admiration.

"Greek—the shrine of the genius of the old world; as universal as our race, as individual as our ourselves; of infinite flexibility, of indefatigable strength, with the complication and the distinctness of nature herself; to which nothing was vulgar, from which nothing was excluded; speaking to the ear like Italian, speaking to the mind like English; with words like pictures, with words like the gossamer film of the summer; at once the variety and picturesqueness of Homer, the gloom and the intensity of Æschylus; not compressed to the by Thucydides, not fathomed to the bottom by Plato, not sounding, closest with all its thunders, nor lit up with all its ardors even under the Promethean touch of Demosthenes! And Latin—the voice of empire and of war, of law and of the state; inferior to its half-parent and rival in the embodying of passion, and in the distinguishing of thought, but equal to it in sustaining the measured march of history, and superior to it in the indignant declamation of moral satire; stamped with the mark of an imperial and despotizing republic; rigid in its construction, parsimonious in its synonyms; reluctantly yielding to the flowery yoke of Horace, although opening glimpses of Greek-like splendor in the occasional inspirations of Lucretius; proved, indeed, to the uttermost by Cicero, and by him found wanting; yet majestic in its bareness, impressive in its conciseness; the true language of history, instinct with the spirit of nations, and not with the passions of individuals; breathing the maxims of the world, and not the tenets of the schools; one and uniform in its air and spirit, whether touched by the stern and haughty Sallust, by the open and discursive Livy, by the reserved and thoughtful Tacitus.

"These inestimable advantages, which no modern skill can wholly counterpoise, are known and felt by the scholar alone. He has not failed, in the sweet and silent studies of his youth, to drink deep at those sacred fountains of all that is just and beautiful in human language. The thoughts and the words of the master-spirits of Greece and Rome are inseparably blended in his memory; a sense of their marvellous harmonies, their exquisite fitness, their consummate polish, has sunken for ever in his heart, and thence throws out light and fragrant upon the gloom and the annoyances of his maturer years. No avocations of professional labor will make him abandon their wholesome study; in the midst of a thousand cares he will find an hour to recur to his boyish lessons—to re-peruse them in the pleasurable consciousness of old associations and in the clearness of mainly judgment, and to apply them to himself and to the world with superior profit. The more extended his sphere of learning in the literature of modern Europe, the more deeply, though the more wisely, will be reverence that of classical antiquity: and in declining age, when the appetite for magazines and reviews, and the ten-times repeated trash of the day, has failed, he will retire, as it were, within a circle of schoolfellow friends, and end his studies, as he began them, with his Homer, his Horace, and his Shakspeare.

"But after all, the characteristic merit of the poetry of the Iliad, is the important and interesting subject for consideration; and as to this, there is a vagueness in the general language of scholars which may perhaps be traced to the influence of the showy treatise of Longinus. From that has come the indiscriminate and often absurd use of the terms Sublime and Sublimity, by which a really appropriate criticism is almost rendered impossible. Where things are different, names should be different also. Poetical Sublimity seems specifically to consist in an expression of the vast, the obscure or the terrible: of this the Apocalypse, the fearful vision of Eliphaz the Temanite, and the 18th Psalm, v. 7—17, are grand examples in each kind. But every splendid burst of the imagination is not sublime in this sense; it may be noble or pathetic; it may be beautiful, or it may be simply delightful. Unless we thus distinguish, we shall find ourselves calling by the same name things unlike or even opposite to each other, and a vivid apprehension of the character of works of the intellect will be impracticable. There are indeed very few long poems in which sublimity is so predominant as to be characteristic; and it may be added, with great truth, that the most sublime productions of the human genius are not the most pleasing; for nothing will permanently captivate the heart of man which is above the sphere of his affections, and beyond the reach of his senses, and no poet was ever universally loved, who did not oft, Antæus-like, renew his flagging strength by gentle restings on the bosom of his mother earth. Homer and Shakspeare, compared with Milton, are illustrations of this truth. Homer was universally popular wherever Greek was spoken; Shakspeare is so now wherever English is known. Zoilus was a monster and a by-word, and no one would think it worth while to reason with an Englishman who should profess not to like Shakspeare. But out of the admirers of the Paradise Lost, what is the proportion of those who receive pleasure from it, or have even read that divine poem through? The truth is, that there are not many passages in the Iliad which can be properly called sublime: the grandest of those few beyond comparison is the description of the universal horror and tumult attending on the Battle of the Gods; whilst the real characteristics of the poem are truth, good sense, rapidity and variety, bodied forth into shape by a vivid imagination, and borne on the musical wings of an inimitable versification. It is the rare union and the harmonious operation of those inestimable qualities which make one of the longest poems known the most delightful and the most instructive; for who that has read the Iliad in youth, in manhood, or in old age, will deny it to be the Muses' purest and sweetest stream—one while foaming in fury, and at another sleeping in sunshine, and again running a steady and a cheerful course—here gliding between bare and even banks, there over-arched by forest trees, or islanded with flowers which lie, like the water-lilies, on the bosom of the current? Where has an earthly muse ever spoken such words of fire, or when has verse ever rolled on in such unbroken and resistless power as in those two wonderful rhapsodies in which Hector bursts through the gates of the Greek fortifications, and at last fights his way to the stern of Ajax' ship? Where is there a pathos so deep and tender as in the interview between Hector and Andromache, or in the lamentations of Andromache and Helen over the corpse of the departed hero? Where is there a picture so vivid and real as that of Achilles struggling in the surges of Scamander, or a pause of such profound calm as while we listen to the speeches by night in the tent of Pelides, or gaze, one by one, on the marvels of his Vulcanian shield."

Remains of the Rev. Edmund D. Griffin, compiled by Francis Griffin: with a biographical memoir of the deceased, by the Rev. John McVicker, D. D. Professor of Moral Philosophy, etc. in Columbia College. 2 vols. 8vo. pp. 456, 466. New-York: G. & C. H. Carvill; T. & J. Swords; E. Bliss; and O. Halstead. 1831.

This will prove a book of no ordinary attraction to the man of taste. It contains rich specimens of the diversified labors of a mind early imbued with the love of letters. A very cursory perusal of any one of the parts of which the work is composed will satisfy the reader that the prevailing cast of the author's mind was strictly classical, and that however much he may have delighted to disport through the fields of general literature, his choicest hours were spent in rifling the sweets of the ancient classics.

The Remains consist of "fugitive poems," "a tour through Italy and Switzerland," "extracts of a tour through France, England, and Scotland," "extracts from lectures on Roman, Italian, and English literature," and three dissertations on theological subjects.

Of the fugitive poems "The Fall of Greece," written at the age of sixteen, is a fair specimen. It is given in Latin of great classical purity, and polished versification. As an example of the onomatopæia, or of the sound corresponding with the sense, the verse

"Per Marathonæ sonat trux sanguineumque flagellum," will bear a comparison with some of the boasted specimens of the ancient poets.

The following apostrophe to Greece, from the same poem, rendered into English at page 103, is conceived in the spirit of poetry:

"Nature herself admired thy pencil's art,
That charmed the fancy while it touched the heart,
Apelles taught the canvas how to move,
The canvas taught Apelles how to love,
Thy chisel, too, could form and beauty give
To the dull rock, and made it breathe and live."

And again:

"Ah Greece! thy splendor all has passed away
Like the bright glow that lights the parting day;
Or as a brilliant star that glides the skies,
Then heading earthward shoots, and fades and dies."

His "Lines on leaving Italy," show that the seeds of fancy richly sown, with cultivation, might have secured to him no inconsiderable niche in the temple of Parnassus. The second stanza possesses the true poetic feeling and imagery:

"Would that thou wert more strong, at least less fair, Parent of fruits, alas! no more of men!"

Where springs the olive e'en from mountains bare,
The yellow harvest loads the scarce tilled plain,
Spontaneous shoots the vine in rich festoon
From tree to tree depending, and the flowers
Wreath with their chaplets, sweet though fading soon
E'en fallen columns and decaying towers.

It would, however, be injustice to the deceased to rest his fame upon the overflowings of an exuberant fancy done into verse. He dallied with the muse, listened to her fascinations, and for the moment partook of her inspiration; but it passed away, and left open to his ambition the less hazardous, but not less enduring monument of literary distinction. It is in the rich stores of classical knowledge, in the refinements of taste, in the calm and voluptuous feeling called forth in the contemplation of the works of nature and art, in graphic description, in the sublimity of mountain scenery, in the enthusiasm conceived in the Florentine gallery, in the absorbing raptures of the Vatican, mingled and relieved by reflection sometimes moral, sometimes literary, always pure and elevated, that we are to seek for proofs of the literary claims of this excellent young man.

For what purpose Mr. Griffin commenced his travels, his letters do not inform us. It is, however, manifest, from the course he pursued, his object was to perfect a taste already more than half formed, upon the finest models of antiquity, and that the instruction might be enduring, to commit to paper the lessons as he received them, possibly without a view to their ultimate publication.

The tour through Italy occupies a large space, consisting chiefly of descriptions of mountain and rural scenery, and of the exquisite productions of art in architecture, sculpture, and painting. Mr. Griffin dates the commencement of his travels from Lyons in January 1829; whence he crosses the Alps by Mount Cenis; visits Genoa, Florence, Rome, Naples, Venice, and Milan; re-crosses the Alps by the way of the Simplon and Chamouni, passes through Switzerland into France, and thence to England. Of this tour the principal points have stood prominent among travellers from time immemorial, a difficulty with which modern tourists who observe, to write, have to contend. The mountain scenery, the rural landscape, the remains of art—all have been anticipated—and yet such is the creative power of genius, so potently does she wave her wand when roused by the actual touch of objects embalmed in the pages of the poets, and hallowed by classical recollections, that the descriptions burst upon us with all the charms of novelty. It is the same Italy, but it is Italy viewed with a classic eye, presenting all the freshness and attraction of the Æneid. It is the same Rome, but it is Rome in its ruins, restored to its classical magnificence, and presented to the imagination, grand in its fall. Every object is not described, but every thing that is, wears the stamp of originality. Unlike Daru, Eustace, Forsyth, Craven, Simond, cum multis aliis, who had preoccupied the same route, our author always selects what he knew to be interesting, and what at times he felt to be inspiring. Of these he disposes with a conception so vivid, a coloring so rich, there is such a glow of feeling, so much of the heart about his style and manner, that we venture to predict his tour through Italy will be a favorite with the man of taste, and relished by every reader.

At the threshold of his tour, Mr. Griffin encounters the Alps by the way of Mount Cenis, where we meet with sketches of Alpine scenery well adapted to prepare the mind of the reader for scenes differing somewhat from those that await the footsteps of the every day tourist.

"I had previously observed," says he, "that the sun shone out upon the mountains in the rear, and when I reached the bridge which crossed the Arque, just at the turning point, I perceived that the same burst of sunshine lighted up the heights beyond; while in my immediate vicinity the deep blue tints of which I have before spoken, shrouded the sides of the tremendous eminences which frowned above me. Standing thus in gloom, I looked with absorbing admiration on the double illuminated vista which opened on either hand. At first I had no eye except for the general grandeur of the scene, but by degrees details pressed themselves on my attention; the windings of the valley, the varied surface of the heights, the brawling of the stream, the ruined towers perched like eagles' nests upon the summits of inaccessible and isolated crags, the trees sparkling with ice, the apparently fantastic distribution of the lights and shades, all too upon a scale of grandeur extensive as the boundaries of vision, left nothing further to be desired or imagined."

His disappointment on arriving at the summit of the Alps, where he expected to enjoy a view of Italy with a luxury of feeling resembling Hannibal's, will be readily felt by the classical reader.

The description of the scenery, as viewed from the bridge of the Po, the fluvium rex Eridanus of the poet is peculiarly happy.

"Starting at six o'clock, we soon arrived at the bridge of the Po, and I looked of course for the mountains. My hope of seeing them was but small, as day had only just begun to break. However, far in the horizon, opposed to the coming sun, I perceived a faint red which served to mark their outline. While the rest of the world was still buried in night, they were privileged to catch the beams of day. By and by their color warmed into a rich roseate hue, which contrasted beautifully with the violet tint of the mist that lay in darkness at their feet. As morning advanced, a red hot glow succeeded, and the vast amphitheatre of Piedmont was in its whole western section lighted up with an ineffable and overwhelming radiance. Meantime the eastern horizon was not unworthy of attention. The golden hues of an Italian sky formed a magnificent background, against which were relieved the towers of the Superga, and the picturesque outline of the neighboring hills. Scarcely had I time to contemplate this part of the scene and turn towards the mountains, before their aspect was again changed. The mist had fallen like a curtain at their feet, and the precarious tints of dawn had ripened into a twilight gray. The mountains themselves in their whole vast extent now seemed a wall of fire. I am using no figure of rhetoric, and wish to be understood literally. Iron in the furnace could not have glowed with an intenser red than did those stupendous masses in the rays of the morning. Never did I witness a scene of such transcendent and overwhelming magnificence. A wall of fire, seeming almost as extensive as half the circumference of earth, its battlements and pyramids and towers shooting upwards into heaven, as if preparing to inflame those elevated regions, and above, and still beyond, new spires catching the same fiery radiance, the bases of the mountains clothed in vapor, the valley pervaded with the gray mist of twilight, the distant town relieved against the brilliant back ground, the majestic river, the rich eastern sky, composed a landscape which brought the tears into my eyes, and closing my lips in silence, precluded even the ordinary expressions of delight."

With equal felicity the narrative is relieved as often as scenes from nature of sufficient interest are presented. Those which in the hands of less gifted travellers become tame and tiresome by reason of their generality and sameness, coming from him, are always interesting. He seizes with ardor, groups with judgment, defines with boldness, and fills in the outlines with such a susceptibility to the charms of the scene, that he can hardly fail to delight.

Among the most spirited scenes will be found the view from the site of the ancient Roman capital, from the Colosseum by moonlight, and those beheld from different points, with great variety of light, shade, and distance, in the vicinity of Naples.

His sensible and chaste observations on the top of Vesuvius, a hacknied subject, strike us the more that most travellers, awed and confounded by the grandeur of the scene, are apt to break out here into swollen and unmeaning description.

"Arrived at the top," he observes, "you are indeed rewarded for all your fatigue. Directly beneath your feet yawns a horrid gulf, three or four hundred feet in depth, and upwards of a mile in circumference, occupying the whole summit of the mountain, except a narrow border, generally not more than four feet wide. The sides of the gulf in many places precipitous, and steep in all. Below is seen the surface of the crater, in part black with cooled lava, and covered in part with liquid fire, and sending forth smoke and flame from every crevice. In the midst arises a low cone, formed of ejected matter, upon whose summit open the very jaws of the subterranean abyss of fire. From thence issue clouds rolling upon clouds of sulphurous smoke, mingling from time to time with flashing flames, and at every burst of the volcano pierced by a thousand fragments of shivered rocks. The loud breathing of the fire is borne across the crater, seeming the fierce pantings of some chained monster; the sharp sound of the crackling flames pierces the ear, as if, assuming another form, sound had become material; while the tremendous roar of explosions succeeding each other at every instant fills the organs, and almost confounds the soul. Forcibly abstracting my attention from this fearful gulf, and turning once more towards a world which I almost seemed to have left forever behind me, a scene burst upon my view which I could not deem less than elysian. Far in the west the setting sun yet shed a parting smile upon the landscape, communicating a still softer, still more tranquil beauty. That golden atmosphere, those purple mountains, richer far in hue than northern climes can furnish or their inhabitants imagine, those glorious islands, those lofty promontories, that ample bay, that beautiful city, those long lines of villages, I never shall forget as they appeared at sunset from the summit of Vesuvius."

Of his conception of the grand in nature, and his powers of description rising in sublimity with his subject, his passage over Mount Blanc affords numerous examples; one of which, as he approaches Chamouni, we cannot refrain from introducing.

"It is in vain that I endeavor to convey in language the splendor of that scene, which yet memory and imagination will preserve to me, I trust, forever. Upon a level with my eye through an opening in the mountains, which exhibited, behind, the pure blue sky festooned by fleecy roseate clouds, the retiring sun poured his rays onward, mingling their flood with a diverging cone of mist, converting it into a semblance of celestial glory. Opposite, upon the mountains, long stripes of radiance traversed the snow, the ice, the dark-brown rocks, various according to the surface upon which they fell, yet in all alike deep, rich, and glowing. Here and there a summit raised above the clouds, caught the roseate tint, and shone like a rich jewel on the breast of heaven. Once, and once only, the patriarch of the Alps doffed his bonnet for a moment, as if in salutation to the departing God of day. His hoary head partook of the bright suffusion which surrounded it, a crown indeed of glory and supremacy."

But much as we appreciate his powers in portraying the beauties and sublimities of nature, we think he ranks still higher when he encounters the wonders of art. It is here we witness that patient examination, that intensity of thought, that tact for selecting and grouping in which the picturesque consists, that graphic delineation which stamps an identity on every object as distinct from every other, and that purity and richness of expression, to which the mere bird of passage, commonly designated a tourist, can have no pretensions.

It is surprising with what zest he dwells upon the exquisite specimens of art that fell in his way. He feasts his eye with all the ecstasy of an artist. With what amazement he contemplates the magnificent remains of Roman architecture! How he hangs with rapture over a picture, and is absolutely entranced in the presence of a statue! These emotions he breathes into his descriptions, imparting to them life and beauty. Criticism, which for the most part is but a harsh and disgusting operation, falls from his pen in colors as soft and fascinating as the picture he contemplates; and where we expected a dry detail, or a tiresome sameness, we are animated, delighted, transported. It is impossible, we should think, for any one of even ordinary pretensions to taste to accompany him to the Florentine gallery, the Vatican, or the classic ground in the vicinity of Naples, the prolific scene of the episode of the sixth book of the Æneid, and not experience a voluptuousness of feeling, which the potent spell of genius can alone excite; while he seems to content himself with the humble character of a guide to his reader into the repositories of the arts, he waves the wand of the enchanter, and conjures up, in quick succession, sculpture after sculpture, painting after painting, with a fidelity of description so exquisite that you seem to feel the statue breathe, and to converse with the picture.

It is in the Vatican, however, amid the magnificent ruins of Rome, where the remains of art have been congregated from every spot on earth sacred to classical reflection; and where the productions of the pencil and chisel, comparatively of modern date, have acquired unrivalled perfection, that our author evinces an undeniable claim to literary eminence. And what a sublime moral spectacle does he here present! A young man of fortune, in the heyday of youth, learned, beautiful, and accomplished, in the very vortex of fashionable life, is found voluntarily secluding himself, and breathlessly in pursuit of the novel, the grand, the beautiful; tracing with ecstasy the groundwork of early classical associations; abstracted by day, entranced by night, in the painful search after the remnants of antiquity, of the sites of villas long since swept from existence, of amphitheatres, temples, and palaces, of which scarce a vestige remains; and examining, with a devouring enthusiasm, the divine works of Praxiteles, Cleomines, Canova, Titian, Michael Angelo, and Raphael!

In the progress of his work, after a studious investigation of the most distinguished sites and remains of ancient Rome, he approaches and enters the Vatican with an expression of diffidence and pensive feeling, at once the test and the inseparable companion of genius. This is followed by a vigorous description of St. Peter's and the Sistine Chapel, and immediately we are introduced to the frescoes of Michael Angelo, one of which the "Universal Judgment," is thus graphically described:

"In the centre of the group, attended by the shrinking mother of mercy, seated on one side, a little in the rear, stands the Judge of all the earth. In form colossal, in limbs herculean, in expression and in attitude terribly sublime; he has pronounced the condemning sentence, 'depart from me, ye cursed!' One hand is lifted above his head, the palm outward; the other is opposite to his breast, in the same repellant manner. In the energy of avenging justice he has made one step forward, and his limbs still rest in that expressive attitude. A frown is seated on his brow, from which even the spectator is glad to veil his eyes. What then must be the horror of that wretched crew against whom it is directed; and who are plunging downward headlong on the left, with angels hurling thunderbolts in their rear! They fall in every variety of posture, and cling together in the miserable sympathy of a common torment. One terrible group I shall never forget. It is that of a man descending, in a sitting posture; one fellow-sufferer embracing his body, another his knees, and a third hanging by his feet. He himself covering one eye with his hand, expresses in his cowering head, his shrinking muscles, his swollen eyes, his crouching form, that precise state of mind described in scripture when the wicked, driven by remorse and fear, shall call upon the rocks and mountains to cover them from the wrath of the Omnipotent. On the right hand of the Saviour, in this second region of the picture, is seen the ascension of the just; some mounting boldly and swiftly upward; some, of feeble powers, assisted by the angels; and others, of still smaller pretensions, impeded by the fiends who claim them as their property, and endeavor to drag them from the grasp of their celestial guardians. Here a single figure, with uplifted hands and eyes, hails with holy transport the glory that awaits him; and there a delightful group, composed of a whole family, ascends in harmony and participated joy. The other side of the third region of the picture exhibits the flames of hell, and devils assembled on the brink. The principal group, however, is the boat of the infernal ferryman, which has just touched the shore. In one end stands the gigantic fiend, brandishing his oar, and driving out his victims. As they rush affrighted from its terrible sweep, they find a band of devils waiting eagerly at the other end to receive them. They shrink backward in double terror, but the relentless fiends drag them by force over the boat's side, and plunge with them from sight. This is a scene of strenuous action, of terrible emotion, in which the genius of the painter seemed to revel. The hideous deformity, the monstrous shapes, the apish faces of his devils, deformed as they are with hellish malice, or distorted with horrid fiendish glee, while they border on the ludicrous, are yet in unison with the other features of the piece, and contribute to its overpowering sublimity."

Passing over the almost numberless sculptures and paintings that people this vast world of art, we select the glowing sketch of the "Transfiguration," by Raphael: observing that it often happens to our author, as to Timanthes in the picture of Iphigenia, who, the passion being exhausted, painted Agamemnon covering up his head in his garment, thus kindling and leaving to the imagination the excess of emotion which colors were unable to express.

"To Raphael the difficulties of the subject seem to have proved only an excitement. He shows us the platform of the mount; he places here the three chosen disciples, James hiding his face against the very earth, Peter not knowing what he says or does, with countenance turned upward, but eyes closed per force, and John falling backward from his knees, and veiling with one hand his downward countenance from the intolerable glory. Above, in majesty divine, with garments white as snow, surrounded by a light from heaven, their master floats in air, as if it were, indeed, his element, calm, self-supported, motionless, with eyes upraised towards his native seat, the bosom of his Father and his God. Never was the divinity of our Lord so exhibited in his mortal flesh as on the mount of the transfiguration; never was it so bodied forth to the eyes of all men as by the pencil of Raphael. The prophets, who on each side suspended in mid air, regard him with adoring love, are worthy companions of his glory. Below the mount is represented another action, which, however different, was yet contemporaneous with this. The evangelist St. Mark informs us that, during the absence of our Lord, a youth possessed of a dumb and deaf spirit was brought to the disciples, and that they could not heal him. This is the history represented in the lower part of the picture, with a force and truth never to be surpassed. On one side is placed the unhappy demoniac, attended by his family and fiends; he, appealing to the mercy of the disciples by his distorted swollen eyes, his convulsed countenance, his stiffened limbs; and they, by the strongest expressions of features and of gestures, expressions stronger than words themselves, the ordinary currents of human thought. Between him and the disciples kneels a female figure, her back towards the spectator, her profile, however, fully exhibited by the direction of her head as she looks on the apostles, who points with both her hands to the poor sufferer, expressing in her attitudes, her look, the contraction of her form and face, the utmost earnestness of agonized entreaty. The nine disciples exhibit, on the other hand, surprise, compassion, and embarrassment, that they are not themselves capable of healing him. Some of them point upward to the mountain, whither their master has ascended, and seem to promise relief on his return. In this picture are indeed assembled the most sublime conceptions of the supernatural, with the most affecting and forcible delineations of the natural: the Lord in glory, the disciples in perplexity, the demoniac in convulsions, his friends in agonized entreaty. This is not all: the composition is most significant, the design is perfect, the invention original, the relief magical, the coloring harmonious, the expression varied, but always true to nature and to the imagination. Everything, in fact, is appropriate to the greatest picture of the greatest master of the art; of one who, uniting many excellencies, carried, notwithstanding, the greater part of them to their highest degree of perfection."

As a specimen of the author's descriptive powers in sculpture, we add the "Laocoon," by Polydorus:

"The third cabinet contains the well-known group of the Laocoon. With his right hand raised high in air, grasping with tremendous force one of his serpent enemies, and with the left holding by the throat the other monster, who has already fixed his fangs in the side of his victim, the priest of Apollo and of Neptune offers a sublime spectacle of effort and of suffering. The convulsive exertion of every muscle is apparent throughout his whole frame, even in its extremities. The very foot takes part in the mortal struggle. The anguish of physical pain is no less visible in the swollen veins, the contracted bowels, the heaving chest, and the flesh actually shrinking from the serpents' bite. To observe, however, all the elements of agony combined, look at the expressive head, stretched backward in the strong and universal effort which pervades his frame, it expresses in its knit brow, its sunken cheek, and its despairing mouth, the extremity of pain, the convulsive effort to escape, the deprecating anguish which wrings the father's heart for his sons, enveloped with him in the serpent's folds, and crying out for aid to him, their natural protector. The effect would be too horrible had not the sculptor subdued and softened and elevated the traits of the father's countenance with a lofty resolution, a sublime endurance, a supernatural dignity, which divert the attention in some measure from his sufferings. The poet has made him bellow like a bull brought to the sacrifice. The sculptor has consulted better the true principles of the sublime, in his own art at least; and though the mouth is open, it is not open wide enough to cry aloud. The younger of his sons, whose life's blood the serpent is now drinking, has cast himself back, one arm thrown up into the air, stiffened even to the fingers; and his face half fainting, half convulsive. The other son, involved in the voluminous folds, but not otherwise personally suffering, has the harder lot of beholding the agony of his brother and his father. He looks on distracted between his fears for himself and his yearnings of pity for them."

Not the least interesting portion of the tour consists of the visit to Herculaneum and Pompeii. Of the ruins and excavations of both a picture is here presented, possessing much originality, but we regret our limits will not permit us to indulge in further extracts.

We could dwell much longer upon the beauties of the tour through Italy; it presents so well a mind wedded to literature, bending its energies to increase its treasures. In how short a space does this ardent spirit traverse a land of boundless classical incident, the magna parens frugum virumque, and exhaust its vast repositories!

Characteristic as these scenes are of the pure and contemplative spirit that wrote them, they are not less distinguishable by the reflections with which they are thickly interspersed. These are introduced with a certain scholarlike freshness, certain exquisite tints, derived from an intimate acquaintance with the ancient classics, which cannot but fascinate the intelligent reader. Such are the reflections upon Rousseau, with an imagination susceptible almost to insanity, and an eloquence soaring almost to inspiration. Such the happy allusion to Hannibal at Lake Trasymenus, the theatre of his glory. In the same spirit he notices the site of the ancient forum, Pompey's pillar, and Cæsar's assassination; and dwells upon the villas of Cicero, and the ruins of Pompeii; and in such a spirit does he indulge at Cumæ, when, hurried on by the force of his classical associations, he offers himself, a hazardous experiment, the companion of Æneas to make a second descent, distributes the cake to Cerberus, lops off the golden bough, converses with Anchises, witnesses the disdain of Dido, is petrified with the horrors of the damned, and shares in the joys of the well-imagined scenes of Elysium.

Before taking leave of Italy, some may object to a too great profusion of painting and sculpture, while others may possibly think that the rapturous emotions he manifests in the presence of the fine arts, and the classical allusions with which his descriptions are profusely intermixed, are not strictly in keeping with the sacred character of the tourist. But, however the first objection might apply to a mere catalogue of busts and pictures, accompanied with common-place remarks, it can have no application to a judicious selection of the best pieces by the first masters, described in a style chaste and spirited. Indeed nothing can so well establish the author's reputation as a man of taste, and a critical acquaintance with the technical language of the arts themselves, as the fact of his never resorting to generality or sameness. The description of each piece forms a perfect sketch, as distinct from every other as the painting or sculpture of which he treats. To the other objection we oppose the character and purpose of the tour. It was intended as an excursion into the realms of taste, and is prosecuted in the spirit of a man of letters. He expatiates freely in the contemplation of beauties, for which it appears he had a peculiar relish, and indulges in the enlightened criticism of one who, although a clergyman, did not believe that the powers of taste graciously implanted in the human mind should be suffered to languish, the victims of cynical austerity.

After Mr. Griffin's departure from Italy, if we except his passage across the Alps, by the way of the Simplon, and his sublime description of Alpine scenery, we perceive nothing very remarkable. His observations on the scenery of Great Britain, its manners, wealth, population, and literature, are still interesting, but tame and spiritless, compared with similar topics on the continent. Of his extracts here, the best are the visit to Windsor, the scenery of Cumberland, the interview with Southey, and the literary party at Murray's.

Of his lectures delivered in Columbia college, shortly after his return to his native country, it would be unfeeling to speak with critical severity. They furnish a specimen of literary labor almost incredible. What must have been the industry of the man, and maturity of the mind, that with the notice of a few weeks could compose sufficient matter to keep pace with a class of ambitious young men, skilled to cope in criticism on every topic within the range of ancient and modern literature? Yet this he accomplished, and so well that it has been judged, and not without reason, the publicity of these labors must contribute to his literary reputation. The plan has nothing novel to recommend it, unless it be the prominence given to the literature of modern Italy. The lectures can hardly be regarded in any other light, than as strongly marked, and vigorous outlines, hastily sketched, and to be filled up in the interval of literary leisure. So far as the plan has been developed, it is confined almost exclusively to poetic literature. The subjects are treated in a manner evincing all the vigor, but without the high polish of his Italian sketches. We cannot but remark, in conclusion, that the department for which he was chosen was one peculiarly adapted to his taste and acquisitions, where he had just time to unfold enough to satisfy the world of the vast stores of literary knowledge he had acquired, how well he was qualified to fill the station to which he appeared destined, and the loss the public has sustained in his premature death.

Philip Augustus; or the Brothers in arms. By the author of "Richelieu," "Darnley," "de l'Orme." 2 vols. 12mo. pp. 256, 243. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

This romance forms the ninth and tenth numbers of the Library of Select Novels. The author has been termed a successful imitator of Scott. If he is not an imitator, he certainly belongs to the same school, and has been an attentive admirer. Philip Augustus brings before us the same gorgeous scenes of chivalry—knights, kings, and ladies as pass across the stage in Ivanhoe. The descriptions are clear and elegant. The dialogue easy, natural, and sometimes pointed, and a kind of subdued feeling runs through his better scenes, which betrays both modesty and benevolence in the writer.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1831.

The Boston American Traveller.—We mentioned some time since a quarrelsome print, called the Boston American Traveller, which cherishes a rankling malice against us, worthy of a rattlesnake, from the mere fact of our having refused the conductor's request to exchange, which we did in consequence of his continual plagiarisms from this journal. A friend told us, the other day, that he had been induced to stop taking this profligate libeller in consequence of its coarse and disgusting abuse of the Mirror. We notice this with extreme reluctance. The public can feel little interest in our private broils, or rather our private annoyances from obscure and querulous scribblers, who, from their profession, are better acquainted with the use of calumny and ribaldry than ourselves. But positive untruths should be contradicted, however contemptible may be their manufacturers. We really regret to see any personal hatred showing its cloven foot in the columns of a public press. Does the Boston Traveller think the public blind and deaf, that he thus openly and unblushingly makes vulgar invective a vehicle for the dissemination of glaring falsehoods? If he has any assertion to offer concerning this periodical, in the fair spirit of criticism, we will listen to him with civility; and, if possible, improve by his suggestions; but such scurrility as his, is like stones flung up in the air, which fall on the heads of those who send them. The only way he injures us is by biasing the minds of a few of our intelligent countrymen in that quarter of the world, so fortunate as to be enlightened by the Boston Traveller itself, and who may never have read the Mirror. In this way even the unprincipled assertions of the meanest paper are not without some effect, and thus, to gratify a petty vengeance, for an unintentional affront, this man shamelessly, occupying the station of a guardian of the public morals and a supporter of the religion of gentleness and truth, unjustly wounds our interest among those who are unwary enough to trust him, and perhaps keeps from us some dozen or two subscribers at the expense of truth and his own reputation. Such persons, who break away from the bounds of justice, courtesy, and moderation, are like wild beasts. They prowl over the literary garden with a kind of savage desperation, tearing indiscriminately whatever they lay hold of. The worst of it is, there is no way of caging or muzzling them, as their power to hurt is by no means equal to their inclinations. When you meet one of these roarers, good reader, just observe how he goes on, and pity the fate of your poor editor, who sometimes has two or three such voracious monsters at him at once. You need not be frightened, however, as they are insignificant creatures, more worthy of contempt than anger.

Opera.—We have received a communication upon this subject signed "Violoncello," which want of room compels us to omit till next week.

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED GRAND WALTZ, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

MISCELLANY.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

DEFECTION.

I'll sit me down and weep;
All things have cast me from them but the earth:
The evening comes, and every little flower
Droops now as well as I.—Beaumont.

The vexation and sickness, the sweetness of life, the flattery of hope, and the commendation of friends, make men depend upon physicians, with all their defects.—Bacon.

MERIT AND DEMERIT.—Actions are said to have merit or demerit, according to the nature and degree of the moral quality they bear. Actions that express good-will to mankind in the highest degree, have the highest merit. Actions that proceed from malice, and give examples of mischiefs done without inducement or provocation, are of the highest demerit. We express our sense of demerit in the different degrees of crimes, offences, and faults. A crime is an injury done from malice, jealousy, revenge, avarice, or some other passion that sets mankind at variance. An offence is a wrong done in the gratification of some passion in its own nature inconsistent with amity. A fault is a wrong done from inattention or ignorance.—Moral Philosophy.

A scene in which there were no accessions of good to be gained, or, what is equivalent, no apparent evils to be removed, would be a scene of inaction adverse to the nature of man. In other words, a being that perceived no evil, or had no want, could have no principle of activity. The enjoyments of men are observed to depend, not on the measure of external accommodations, but on the part they act; not on their safety, but on the degree of courage they possess; not on what they gain for themselves or others, but on the degree of ardor and affection they exert.—Ibid.

I told you I read the book with great pleasure, which may be accounted for from its own merit: but perhaps it pleased me the more, because you had travelled the same road before me. You know there is such a pleasure as this, which would want great explanation to some folks, being, perhaps, a mystery to those whose hearts are a mere muscle, and serve only for the purposes of an even circulation.

A courtesy may be a trifle, and yet the omission of it a great matter. It may show the temper of a man's mind to a painful excess, and warrant the most benignant wisdom, in thinking him ill qualified to pretend to an equality of rank with it, much less a superiority.

CHILDREN.—No man can tell but he that loves his children, how many delicious accents make a man's heart dance in the pretty conversation of those dear pledges; their childishness, their stammering, their little angers, their innocence, their imperfections, their necessities, are so many little emanations of joy and comfort to him that delights in their persons and society.—Jeremy Taylor.

RICH FOOLS.—It is but fair that he who has no ideas should have something in their stead.—Hazlitt.

Self-love exaggerates our virtues.—Goethe.

PARTING WITH MONEY.—My brother-in-law is giving up his fortune, in so far as this is in his power, to the community of Herrnhuth. He reckons, that by doing so, he is advancing the salvation of his soul. Had he sacrificed a slender portion of his revenue, he might have rendered many people happy, might have made for them and for himself a heaven upon earth. Our sacrifices are but rarely of an active kind. We, as it were, let go what we give away. It is not from resolution, but despair, that we renounce our property.—Meister.

VALUE OF CONJECTURES.—Conjectures, like parcels of unknown ore, are sold but at low rates. If they prove some rich metal, the buyer is a great gainer; if base, no loser, for he pays for it accordingly.

EVIL OF CREDIT.—A boy at a crossing having begged for something of a gentleman, the latter told him he would give him something as he came back. The boy replied, "Your honor would be surprised if you knew the money I lose by giving credit in that way."

A GOOD ESTATE.—according to Solon—is one which is got without injustice, kept without distrust, and spent without repentance.

RAPHAELLESQUE.

And next to her sat sober Modesty,
Holding her hand upon her gentle heart.

CHOICE OF A COMPANION.

A drop of rain fell on a glowing iron;
It hissed and was no more.
Another fell into a fragrant flower;
And glitter'd long as dew.
A third dropp'd just within a muscle shell,
And there became a pearl.
Son, fancy not that friendship with the bad,
With the indifferent, or with the good,
Can be all one to thee.

AFFECTED PLAINNESS IN WEALTH.

CURIOUS DISCOVERIES.

An account of what appeared on opening the coffin of King Charles the First, in the vault of King Henry VIII. in St. George's chapel, Windsor, on the first of April, 1813.* By Sir Henry Hallford, Bart., M.D., G.C.H. President of the College of Physicians. With a faithful representation of the countenance of the king at that time.

It is stated by Lord Clarendon, in his history of the rebellion, that the body of King Charles I., though known to be interred in St. George's chapel, at Windsor, could not be found, when searched for there, some years afterwards.† It seems, by the historian's account, to have been the wish and the intention of King Charles II. after his restoration, to take up his father's corpse, and to re-inter it in Westminster Abbey, with those royal honors which had been denied it under the government of the regicides. The most careful search was made for the body by several people, amongst whom were some of those noble persons, whose faithful attachment had led them to pay their last tribute of respect to their unfortunate master, by attending him to the grave. Yet such had been the injury done to the chapel, such were the mutilations it had undergone, during the period of the usurpation, that no marks were left by which the exact place of burial of the king could be ascertained.‡

There is some difficulty in reconciling this account with the information which has reached us, since the death of Lord Clarendon, particularly with that of Mr. Ashmole, and more especially with that most interesting narrative of Mr. Herbert, given in the "Athenæ Oxonienses." Mr. Herbert had been a groom of the bed-chamber, and a faithful companion of the king in all circumstances, from the time he left the Isle of Wight, until his death—was employed to convey his body to Windsor, and to fix upon a proper place for his interment there, and was an eye-witness to that interment in the vault of King Henry VIII.

Were it allowable to hazard a conjecture, after Lord Clarendon's depreciation of all conjectures on the subject, one might suppose, that it was deemed imprudent by the ministers of King Charles II. that his majesty should indulge his pious inclinations to re-inter his father at a period when those ill-judged effusions of loyalty, which had been manifested by taking out of their graves and hanging up the bodies of some of the most active members of the court, which had condemned and executed the king, might, in the event of another triumph of the republicans, have subjected the body of the monarch to similar indignity. But the fact is, King Charles I. was buried in the vault of King Henry VIII.,§ situated precisely where Mr. Herbert has described it;|| and an accident has served to elucidate a point in history, which the great authority of Lord Clarendon had involved in some obscurity.

On completing the mausoleum, which his late majesty has built in the tomb-house, as it is called, it was necessary to form a passage to it from under the choir of St. George's chapel. In constructing this passage, an aperture was made accidentally in one of the walls of the vault of King Henry VIII. through which the workmen were enabled to see, not only the two coffins, which were supposed to contain the bodies of King Henry VIII. and Queen Jane Seymour, but a third also, covered with a black pall which, from Mr. Herbert's narrative, might fairly be presumed to hold the remains of King Charles I.

On representing the circumstance to the Prince Regent, his royal highness perceived at once, that a doubtful point in history might be cleared up by opening this vault, and accordingly his royal highness ordered an examination to be made of the fit convenient opportunity. This was done on the first of April 1813, the day after the funeral of the Duchess of Brunswick, in the presence of his royal highness himself, who guaranteed thereby the most respectful care and attention to the remains of the dead during the inquiry. His royal highness was accompanied by his royal highness the Duke of Cumberland, Count Munster, the Dean of Windsor, Benjamin Charles Stevenson, Esq., and Sir Henry Hallford.

The vault is covered by an arch, half a brick in thickness, is seven feet two inches in width, nine feet six inches in length, and four feet ten inches in height, and is situated in the centre of the choir, opposite the eleventh knight's stall, on the sovereign's side.

On removing the pall, a plain leaden coffin, with no appearance of ever having been inclosed in wood, and bearing an inscription, "King Charles, 1648," in large legible characters, on a scroll of lead encircling it, immediately presented itself to view. A square opening was then made in the upper part of the lid, of such dimensions as to admit a clear insight into its contents. These were an internal wooden coffin, very much decayed, and the body carefully wrapped up in cere-cloth, into the folds of which a quantity of unctuous or greasy matter, mixed with resin, as it seemed, had been melted, so as to exclude, as effectually as possible, the external air. The coffin was completely full; and from the tenacity of the cere-cloth, great difficulty was experienced in detaching it successfully from the parts which it enveloped. Wherever the unctuous matter had insinuated itself, the separation of the cere-cloth was easy; and when it came off, a correct impression of the features to which it had been applied, was observed in the unctuous substance. At length the whole face was disengaged from its covering. The complexion of the skin of it was dark and discolored. The forehead and temples had lost little or nothing of their muscular substance; the cartilage of the nose was gone; but the left eye, in the first moment of exposure, was open and full, though it vanished almost immediately; and the pointed beard, so characteristic of the period of the reign of King Charles, was perfect. The shape of the face was a long oval; many of the teeth remained; and the left ear, in consequence of the interposition of the unctuous matter between it and the cere-cloth, was found entire.

It was difficult at this moment to withhold a declaration that, notwithstanding its disfigurement, the countenance did bear a strong resemblance to the coins, the busts, and especially to the pictures of King Charles I., by Vandyke, by which it had been made familiar to us. It is true, that the minds of the spectators of this interesting sight were well prepared to receive this impression; but it is also certain that such a facility of belief had been occasioned by the simplicity and truth of Mr. Herbert's narrative, every part of which had been confirmed by the investigation, so far as it had advanced; and it will not be denied that the shape of the face, the forehead, an eye, and the beard, are the most important features by which resemblance is determined.

When the head had been entirely disengaged from the attachments which confined it, it was found to be loose, and, without any difficulty, was taken up and held to view. It was quite wet, and gave a greenish-red tinge to paper and to linen, which touched it.* The back part of the scalp was entirely perfect, and had a remarkably fresh appearance; the pores of the skin being more distinct, as they usually are when soaked in moisture; and the tendons and ligaments of the neck were of considerable substance and firmness. The hair was thick at the back part of the head, and, in appearance, nearly black. A portion of it, which has since been cleaned and dried, is of a beautiful dark-brown color. That of the beard was a redder brown. On the back part of the head it was more than an inch in length, and had probably been cut so short for the convenience of the executioner, or perhaps by the piety of friends soon after death, in order to furnish memorials of the unhappy king.

On holding up the head to examine the place of separation from

* I have not asserted this liquid to be blood, because I had not an opportunity of being sure that it was so, and I wish to record facts only, and not opinions. I believe it, however, to have been blood in which the head rested. It gave to writing paper, and to a white handkerchief, such a color as blood which has been kept for a length of time generally leaves behind it. Nobody present had a doubt of its being blood, and it appears from Mr. Herbert's narrative, that the king was embalmed immediately after decapitation. It is probable, therefore, that the large blood-vessels continued to empty themselves for some time afterwards. I am aware that some of the softer parts of the human body, and particularly the brain, undergo, in the course of time, a decomposition, and will melt. A liquid, therefore, might be found after long interment, where solids only had been buried; but the weight of the head, in this instance, gave no suspicion that the brain had lost its substance; and no moisture appeared in any other part of the coffin, as far as we could see, excepting at the back part of the head and neck.

the body, the muscles of the neck had evidently retracted themselves considerably; and the fourth cervical vertebra was found to be cut through its substance transversely, leaving the surfaces of the divided portions perfectly smooth and even, an appearance which could have been produced only by a heavy blow,* inflicted with a very sharp instrument, and which furnished the last proof wanting to identify King Charles the First.

After this examination of the head, which served every purpose in view, and without examining the body below the neck, it was immediately restored to its situation, the coffin was soldered up again, and the vault closed.

Neither of the other coffins had any inscription upon them. The larger one, supposed on good grounds to contain the remains of King Henry VIII. measured six feet ten inches in length, and had been inclosed in an elm one of two inches in thickness; but this was decayed, and lay in small fragments near it. The leaden coffin appeared to have been beaten in by violence about the middle, and a considerable opening in that part of it exposed a mere skeleton of the king. Some beard remained upon the chin, but there was nothing to discriminate the personage contained in it.

The smaller coffin, understood to be that of Queen Jane Seymour, was not touched; mere curiosity not being considered by the prince regent as a sufficient motive for disturbing these remains.

On examining the vault with some attention, it was found that the wall at the west end had, at some period or other, been partly pulled down and repaired again, not by regular masonry, but by fragments of stones and bricks put rudely and hastily together without cement.

From Lord Clarendon's account, as well as from Mr. Herbert's narrative of the interment of King Charles, it is to be inferred that the ceremony was a very hasty one, performed in the presence of the governor, who had refused to allow the service, according to the book of common prayer, to be used on the occasion;† and had, probably, scarcely admitted the time necessary for a decent deposit of the body. It is not unlikely, therefore, that the coffin of King Henry VIII. had been injured by a precipitate introduction of the coffin of King Charles; and that the governor was not under the influence of feelings, in those times, which gave him any concern about royal remains, or the vault which contained them.

It may be right to add, that a very small mahogany coffin, covered with crimson velvet, containing the body of an infant, had been laid upon the pall which covered king Charles. This is known to have been a still-born child of the Princess George of Denmark, afterwards Queen Anne.

TRIALS OF A POET.

"I do desire we may be better strangers."—Shakespeare.

I HAD passed the afternoon with a very amiable cousin, who was to embark for Europe the next morning. Just as I was leaving the house she handed me a beautiful little scrap-book, containing, among memoranda of laces and new novels, and many an extract on love and beauty, some few original pieces by her most intimate friends.

"Come, coz," said the affectionate girl, as she gave it me, "you must favor me with a keepsake from your lady of Helicon. Don't say no, for I'll not be denied. I'll carry it with me as an amulet, and who knows but it may shield me from sea-sickness."

There's no gallantry in arguing with a pretty woman; nor is there any use, for she always begins with what logicians call "begging the question," and ends with a positive command. I took the book, and

* "The fatal stroke was given by a disguised person."—Herbert.

† "It was committed to four of those servants who had been by them appointed to wait upon him during his imprisonment, that they should convey the body to Windsor, which they did. And it was, that night, placed in that chamber which had usually been his bed-chamber; the next morning it was carried into the great hall, where it remained till the lords came, who arrived there in the afternoon, and immediately went to Colonel Whitecoat, the governor of the castle, and showed the order they had from the parliament to be present at the burial, which he admitted; but when they desired that his majesty might be buried according to the form of the common prayer book, the bishop of London being present with them to officiate, he positively and roughly refused to consent to it; and said, 'it was not lawful that the common prayer book was put down, and he would not suffer it to be used in that garison where he commanded; nor could all the reasons, persuasions, and exhortations, prevail with him to suffer it.'—Clarendon.

"The king's body was then brought from his bed-chamber down into St. George's hall, whence, after a little stay, it was with a slow and solemn pace (much sorrow in most faces being then discernible) carried by gentlemen of quality in mourning. The noblemen in mourning also held up the pall; and the governor, with several gentlemen, officers, and attendants came after. It was then observed that at such time as the king's body was brought out from St. George's hall, the sky was serene and clear; but presently it began to snow, and the snow fell so fast that by the time the corpse came to the west end of the royal chapel, the black velvet pall was all white, (the color of innocence) being thick covered over with snow. The body being by the bearers set down near the place of burial, the bishop of London stood ready, with the service-book in his hands, to have performed his last duty to the king his master, according to the order and form of burial of the dead set forth in the book of common prayer, which the lords likewise desired; but it would not be suffered by Colonel Whitecoat, the governor of the castle, by reason of the directory to which (he said) he and others were to be conformable. Thus went the white king to his grave, in the forty-eighth year of his age, and twenty-second year and tenth month of his reign."—Herbert.

† "The confusion they had at that time observed to be in that church, and the small alterations which were begun to be made towards decency, so totally perplexed their memories, that they could not satisfy themselves in what place or part of the church the royal body was interred; yet where any occurred upon this or that place, they caused the ground to be opened at a good distance, and, upon such inquiries, found no cause to believe that they were near the place; and, upon their giving this account to the king, the thought of that remove was laid aside; and the reason communicated to very few, for the better discountenancing farther inquiry."—Clarendon.

‡ Pope, alluding to the doubts which were entertained in his day as to the place of the king's interment, invokes the muse to "Make sacred Charles's tomb for ever known, (Obscure the place and uninscribed the stone."

Windsor Forest, v. 319.

§ "Then they went into the church to make choice of a place for burial. But when they entered into it, which they had been so well acquainted with, they found it so altered and transformed, all inscriptions, and those landmarks pulled down, by which all men knew every particular place in that church, and such a dismal mutation over the whole, that they knew not where they were; nor was there one old officer that had belonged to it, or knew where our prince had used to be interred. At last there was a fellow of the town who undertook to tell them the place where, he said, 'there was a vault in which King Henry VIII. and Queen Jane Seymour were interred.' As near that place as could conveniently be, they caused the grave to be made. There the king's body was laid, without any words, or other ceremonies, than the tears and sighs of the few beholders. Upon the coffin was a plate of silver fixed, with these words only, 'King Charles, 1648.' When the coffin was put in, the black velvet pall that had covered it was thrown over it, and then the earth thrown in; which the governor staid to see perfectly done, and then took the keys of the church."—Clarendon.

|| Mr. Herbert, whose account furnishes the clue to our inquiry, retired immediately after his majesty's death, into Yorkshire, and lived to the beginning of the next century. His papers were not published till some time after his death.

scarcely had I gained the street before I unluckily met the most quizzical friend that ever played the deuce with one's equanimity.

"Ah, Hal," he exclaimed, "how d'ye do? Are you for the Park to-night? Cinderella, you know."

"Not to-night," I returned, showing him the canto.

"Ha, ha! in for it, eh? A sonnet to my dulcinea's fan? Well, bon soir, and success to your lucubrations. I sincerely hope they may not be disturbed."

I thought I spied a "lurking devil in his eye," as he uttered the last words.

It was too early for tea, accordingly I strolled to the Battery. It was just such an evening as would lead a man of romantic feelings to wish for the power once displayed by Israel's chieftain "in the valley of Ajalon," that he might arrest the moon in her starry course, and luxuriate at will amid the softened beauty and effulgence of night. So perfect was the fascination of the scene, that I lingered on the promenade till the evening was considerably advanced before I retired to my lodgings; indeed by the time I was fairly seated for my task it was nine. "Lines to ——" A long pause succeeded, during which in struggling for a rhyme I nearly annihilated my left eyebrow. The fates, or rather the muses, seemed unpropitious. The fact is, I loved my fair cousin too sincerely to attempt flattery, yet, of course, nothing else but the sentimental would do on the occasion. I rose, threw up the window, and looked towards the moon imploringly. I re-seated myself, whistled Di Tanti with a striking expression, and commenced:

There are tears for every passion,
In its weakness or its power,
But none so dear as those that mark
Affection's parting hour;
And such, sweet one, to-morrow
Shall weeping friendship shed,
When the lingering clasp is loosened,
And the faltering farewell said.

Yet peaceful be thy sleep to-night,
And bright its passing dreams,
As the blended radiance of the skies,
That round thy casement beams;
For thy father's heart is near thee,
And thy mother's sleepless eye,
And many a prayer for thee ascends
On many a midnight sigh.

At this crisis of my inspiration I was interrupted by a loud careless knock at my chamber door.

"Whom have we here?" said I to myself with a scowl. "It can't be —; no, that's not a gentleman's summons."

By the way, you can always tell a well-bred gentleman by his rap; there is an air of ease and delicacy about it, which a coarse mind and rude hand can never imitate. It is altogether above the philosophy of a plebeian. I should like to hear Brummel touch a knocker. But this is irrelevant.

"Busy," cried I, in a tone of the most decided impatience, "very busy!"

"Whoever it be," thought I, "I'll cut him for this once." At that instant the door opened, and in stalked a tall, sun-burnt, hard-featured being, apparently about twenty-five, dressed in homespun blue, with steel buttons, a white bell-crowned hat, and round-toed shoes. He came forward and bade me good evening, with a most provoking assurance, and presenting me a billet, threw himself familiarly into a chair, as he said,

"Maybe you wouldn't like to read that, if I may be so bold?"

I took it and read as follows:

"To all whom it may concern: this is to certify that the bearer, Elihu Tuttle, is the son of Deacon Elathan Tuttle, of Bethlehem; and that he is a stirring, intelligent, and trust-worthy young man. N. B. He has taught school in our town several winters!"

"Deacon JOHN BABCOCK, } Selectmen of B.—
"ELIPHALET MUDGE, }

"And pray what does this concern me?" said I, returning him his recommendatory credentials.

"Why, pretty considerable," he replied, with a significant twitch of the left eye, "if you know a thing or two."

"Well, sir, will you please let me know to what I am indebted for the favor of this visit—and that briefly, for I am very much hurried this evening."

"He that is hurried is worried," observed he, dryly; "now, as for number one, I'm never in a hurry."

"Most unquestionably, or your business had been made known before this."

"The world was not made in a minute, you know," and hereupon the fellow gave a prodigious yawn.

"Now," repeated I. "I should like to know why you are here?"

"To seek my fortune, to be sure. I came from up Sound, hearin' there was fine chances for business hands in York; but 'twas all talk and no cider, as they say. I have been hither and yon—looking about all over, and though I'm real bunkum at figures, and all kinds of dickerin', not a single storekeeper will hire me. But to-night, as I was speirin' round as usual, I met a spruce, clever-looking fellow, and says I, don't you want a clerk? He didn't answer right away, but looked pretty deuced queer at me. At last says he, 'I can tell you who does,' and he sent me here; and, says he, 'stick to him, (meaning you,) for he has advertised for a salesman. Don't be discouraged if he tells you he don't want you, for he does; so stick to him;' and I mean to."

He then threw one leg over the table, and began jerking his foot up and down, as though his very life depended on the movement.

"Advertised—salesman—looked queer," and I mused. "Ah, I have it—that foolish quizz, that vexatious friend of mine, has dispatched this interrogation to me from sheer mischief, because he knew that I wished to be particularly alone this evening;" and I could not but laugh at the joke, though my patience was well nigh exhausted. While this thought was passing through my mind the perpetual motion kept drumming on the table to the half-whistled, half-hissed tune of Yankee doodle, accompanied on the floor by his other foot.

"You don't want to employ such a chap as I, then?"

"And what the d—l should I employ you about," interrupted I, with a terrible hitch in my chair, and a forlorn glance at my waiting task.

"Perhaps you don't want a salesman, since you've advertised for one—likely!"

"Really, sir, I am not a merchant, and do not stand in need of your services."

I turned away, and endeavored to proceed with my writing, but it was an impossibility; for that everlasting whistling kept ringing in my ears, nor was there any cessation to the bobbing of that abominable foot; so I dashed down my pen, and strode to the window. Hereupon Mr. Tuttle quietly bent forward across the table, and taking up the manuscript, with a crony-like familiarity, and a "You write verses, I guess," he commenced reading. My lip quivered, and I felt a decided contractile disposition among the members of my right hand. But measuring my slight figure with his sinewy frame, I concluded it safest not to proceed to extremities; and as for calling the watch and raising a mob, it was out of the question, so I paced the room in a very impatient mood.

"Will this fellow never leave me," muttered I, as I paused for the fiftieth time, and scowled at the barbarian, who at that moment was leisurely examining my watch, which he had taken up, and opened to its inmost recesses. He partly overheard me, and looked up. Our eyes met, and for once he stopped drumming. If ever I longed for the power of the basilisk it was then. I am positive I should have looked him into annihilation.

"If I'm in your way I ask pardon; but you may as well tell me you want me first as last, Mister, Mis-t-e-r—what might I call your name, if I may be so bold?"

"Bored—my name is Bored, just now," said I through my clenched teeth.

"Queer name that. Aint you akin to the Bordes of Quinepang?"

My tongue was a dead letter; I could not speak for my life; passion was absolutely choking me.

"Well, as I was saying," continued the horriker, a little struck by the forlorn expression of my countenance, "if I'm in your way I ask pardon; I'll move round a little. Dickens take me though, if the queer-looking fellow didn't tell me you'd be glad to see me, and that I should suit you to a T. If he's sent me on a fool's errand, by the Lord Harry, if I don't darken his peepers if ever I set eye on him again."

After this explosion Mr. Tuttle fell into a brown study, and taking a pen he began writing his name, and making sundry flourishes on the very sheet—the rose-colored sheet—immortalized by the unfinished lines to my cousin. This was too outrageous, but what could I do? I tore off my stock, for fear of suffocation. At this moment the ogre looked up, as though a new idea had occurred to him.

"May be; Mister, you're playing a carlecue to get me cheaper, by falling into the sulks, and pretending you don't want me; but you're mistaken in your chap, I tell you. I won't take a fourpens-appany less than a hundred dollars a-year and my victuals. Just think of my experience—two years was I in Deacon Babcock's store, and three years I've peddled here and there from Dan to Barsheba, just as it happened, besides teaching school and being in the supercargo line pretty considerably. You wouldn't like to hear how I got to windward of an old fellow up in 'Sopus one time? I was going along, you know, full chisel I tell ye, with my trunk-full of curiosities, when I meets a brother peddler coming out of a rich old Dutchman's lane. 'Well, Li,' says he, 'it's no use for you to go in there, the old man is as cross as Belzebub, and the gals are most 'mazen shy too. There's no speculation in there, Li.' 'Not as you know on,' says I, and in I goes. There sat the old boy, smoking. 'Good morning, neighbor,' says I, and d—l a word did he answer. But I was not to be cowed in a giffin, so says I, 'Any trade to-day, friend?' 'No, not wid a tarnation Yankee.' 'Well,' says I, 'spose you've no objection to my resting a minute, while I show the gals a thing or two that's pretty slick?' No answer. Down I sets, and all the Dutchesses looked wild, I tell you, to see what a squad of curiosities I had. By and by I contrives to drop a real cute tobacco-box close side the old man. I was busy showing the curiosities, and did not seem to mind the box. By and by he picks it up, looks at it, opens and shuts it, and the like. Thinks I, you're hooked, jist as slick as grease, though I didn't seem to mind him. Last says he, 'What may you ax for dis ting?' 'Fourpens-appany,' says I, 'and its pretty cheap too, I should guess, considering.' 'It ish mine, den,' says he, and he laughed in his sleeve, but I said nothing. Thinks I, you're hooked, Mister. Pretty soon I sold him a jack-knife, exactly after the fourpens-appany order. There was no more play-offs about the old Dutchman; he was wide awake to trade, and so was the gals and the old woman. I knew what was what, so I sold moderate for awhile, then raised little by little gradually, and when I left the house I was nine dollars and a pistareen better off than when I went in, with a buss from a rosy cheek, and my breakfast into the bargain! I call that trading, Mr. Bored. Now you needn't think to get me for less than I told you; I've been too long in the trading line to be out-Charleyed."

"Mr. Tuttle, I've not the remotest wish to employ you," said I, as soon as I recovered the use of my tongue. So far from it, sir, I assure you (and I threw the door open as I said it) that nothing could afford me greater relief than the prospect of never seeing you again. I do desire we may be better strangers, and that speedily."

At this crisis a fulminating cigar, of enormous size, given him, doubtless, by my quizzical friend, and which he had lighted while recounting his bargaining with the honest Dutchman, exploded like a pistol, just as he had poised himself on the hinder legs of his chair, with both feet mounted on the table. Over he went, and over went the table, with all its paraphernalia of books, portfolio, candles, &c. &c. A solitary lamp, burning on the mantel, escaped the general inversion, and shed a sort of twilight over the disastrous scene. One glance at the rising visage of the revolutionist told me he was shockingly frightened, and a happy thought struck me.

"Villain!" shouted I, "do you mean to shoot and rob me in my own chamber? Murder! Watch!"

Before he had fairly recovered his feet I snatched up a half-charged fowling-piece, which stood near, and bringing it to an angle of forty-five, discharged it into the ceiling. But I might have spared my ears the shock of the reverberation, for a heavy sound at the foot of the stairs informed me that the intruder was "stirring" in that neighborhood; and stepping to the window I caught a moonlight glimpse of a man with a white bell-crowned hat, as he shot like a ghost round an opposite corner of the street, with a brace of watchmen at his heels. I breathed freer, I revived, and recollecting my scattered thoughts as well as I could, I succeeded in fulfilling my cousin's request before morning.

I have met with many vexations in life—tight shoes, tight gaiters, and bad watches—have been disappointed in love, in friendship, and in my tailor—have been duped, dunned, cross-questioned by a quibbling lawyer—have been jilted in assignments, ridiculed by a flirt, eyed through a quizzing-glass by a cross-eyed dandy, and publicly collared by Hays, ('twas by mistake, gentle reader)—in a word, I have been bored with a long sermon by a dull preacher, bored with yesterday's news and last year's anecdotes, bored in the city and the country, by day and night, bored by friends, by strangers, and bored by my own good company, but never in my life before have my feelings been so outraged as they were by Mr. Elihu Tuttle, of Bethlehem!

THE FINE ARTS.

SACRED MUSIC.

It is much to be lamented that the same impetus does not exist in pressing forward the improvement of sacred music which evidently has taken possession of the drama. We complain of managers who get up operas imperfectly—we feel the most minute deficiency in that department, and call for the reinstatement of those desiderati which a growing taste for the art, and a progressing knowledge of the compositions of eminent composers teach us to appreciate. This taste is becoming so predominant, that it will soon dictate to managers, albeit up to the present writing this species of personage has been in the habit of dictating to the public, and often most wrongfully. Why then is the noble school of sacred music to be a secondary consideration? That it does not keep pace with the drama, is not less true than deplorable, and that the class of persons who compose the audiences, and preside as judges of that which is placed before them are less critical than those which are found in our theatres, is also certain. It follows then, that until the managers of theatres can be induced to extend their exertions to the productions of the sacred works of great masters, as in Europe, that class of compositions will inevitably be thrust into the back ground, and we shall not hold that station in contending with our European brethren in one branch of the art which we have possessed ourselves of in the other. In this untoward state of things, we have to congratulate our readers upon having a society admirably calculated to further the ends of sacred music, and to give us the chance of hearing the compositions of the great masters who have enrolled themselves under that banner to advantage—we refer to the New-York Sacred Music Society. This institution consists of a numerous assemblage of persons of taste and talent. Their choral department is extremely powerful, well directed, and efficient in all points—their performances are marked by good taste and a desire to give the best works in the best manner. Their liberality is praiseworthy in engaging the first singers in the country. The only complaint we make, and we confess it to be a selfish one, is that their performances take place seldom, consequently the good impressions which they are certain to produce, if not eradicated, become partially obliterated. Excitement, that idol of the profession, dies away, and each succeeding performance appears the first. At the present moment the society is employed in getting up Handel's "Messiah" complete—with the instrumental additions of Mozart. Mr. Horn, in giving a well patronized musical entertainment at Niblo's garden, previously to his departure for England, advertised the overture to the Messiah with Mozart's additional accompaniments, which Mr. Horn himself composed and wrote the evening before! Now, although the overture to the Messiah was played infamously, and Mr. Horn's accompaniments were but apologies for those of Mozart, the assembled multitude, and the patrons in particular, appeared perfectly content. We can take upon ourselves to assure our amateur readers that the Messiah, as about to be performed, will have the benefit of the assistance of Mozart in the orchestral arrangements, and bids fair to establish the character of the society which is undertaking to produce it.

AN OLD WHITE HEAD.

There they doe finde that godly aged sire,
With snowy locks adowne his shoulders shed;
As hoary frost with spangles doth attire
The mossy branches of an oak half dead.—Spenser.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SOME years ago, a young man with the exterior of a gentleman, but with a mind narrowed by early association with the vulgar, and subsequently unenlarged by education, was introduced to one of our most respectable families, whose only guardian was a woman, and that woman a widow. He had discovered—the sly and the selfish are quick in making discoveries of this nature—that a considerable amount of property would fall to the daughter, and her beauty and virtue elevated her far above her companions, yet her fortune was the principal object of his desire. His visits, few at first, became gradually more and more frequent, till at last the roof of her parent was a home to him in every thing but the name; morning, noon, and evening, found him regular in his appearance. He ingratiated himself with the mother by the most respectful attentions, and beguiled the unsuspecting girl into a belief that all his leisure hours were devoted to her alone. But it has since been discovered that at the very time he was so assiduous in his visits to this injured family, there were half a dozen others to whom he was no less regular in his attention. It appears that the gentleman was engaged in a pretty extensive speculation among the hearts, or rather the houses of his female acquaintance; for the moment he heard of one whose pecuniary prospects were rather considerable, he, if not dismissed by some prudent parent, would leave no means unemployed to gain admission to the object of his mercenary predilection, and every endearing expression he could devise, was dealt out most unsparingly. Year followed year, and yet his attachment was apparently strengthening with the lapse of seasons. One evening, about the close of autumn, she was seated at the window where they had often spent many a happy hour together, when he suddenly appeared with features of well-dissembled sorrow, telling her that business would require his presence for several weeks in the country. During his absence he begged she would confine herself to the circle of her home, that at his return, that solemn ceremony would take place, to which all his desires for the last three years had been tending, and that he should not know one happy hour till the spring should restore him to her society. They parted with mutual vows of eternal fidelity. Alas, by him how have these sacred asseverations been violated! How has the name of his Maker been turned to a mockery! She beguiled the hours of separation by turning over and over again, the written but worthless evidences of his fondness, and anxiously counting the days as they lessened toward the period of his promised return. Weeks became months, and yet she waited in vain. He never returned!—He had gone away with the deliberate intention of making that peaceful home the abode of the most dismal disappointment; of deceiving that affectionate mother who had received and cherished him like a child; of trampling on the hopes of an innocent girl, who had lavished on him the whole wealth of her earliest affection, and who had met nothing but the meanest of treachery in return. Too soon was the disgraceful secret discovered. He had married another! She had wasted the dearest feelings of her soul, the best and brightest years of her youth, upon a villain. The blow was so sudden that it almost shattered her senses; but a pure heart and a strong mind have given her power to struggle successfully with her fondness for one who was never worthy the confidence he has so cruelly abused.

It appears that he contrived to creep into the good graces of a man of large wealth but of doubtful reputation, and cheated his poor daughter into wedlock. Whether she will be contented with him, is one of those questions that time must answer. But he who could win the affections of an amiable girl, and, after years of the most endearing intercourse abandon her for no other reason than because she was not as rich as another, is quite too mean and miserly to afford much chance of happiness to any woman who has discernment enough to detect his motives, and spirit enough to despise them.

My object, gentlemen, in writing to you is to affix the stigma of public reprobation upon a crime which it is often in the power of a cold-blooded and selfish man to commit with impunity. Some may say that the injured party has open to her the tribunals of justice; but such as these forget that a delicate woman, whose affection has been wounded, would rather suffer agony than obtrude her sorrows and humiliations on the world. Besides, should she even so far overcome the modesty of her nature as to seek pecuniary redress from a jury for her wrong, what money (unless she be as vile and avaricious as him whom she censures,) can recompense her for the sickness of the heart which attends the disappointment of her affections, for the jibes and sneers of the crowds who attend such trials, for the anguish of having all those little evidences of love, which a sensitive female shrinks even from betraying to the eye of private friendship, broadly emblazoned before the public, making her a theme of curiosity and derision. No, gentlemen. I deem the custom of applying to courts of justice for damages in cases of a breach of promise of marriage, to be one which has already been carried too far. I have several times witnessed a charming woman in these places, asserting her claims to a man, or asking a good round sum as a substitute; but I must add I have always regarded each one as undergoing a species of degradation, the willingness to pass through which afforded me a secret conviction that the defendant had already found her unworthy to be a wife. But he who cruelly occupies several years of a young confiding girl's life, giving herself and friends every assurance to believe that he will soon claim her as a lawful bride, and thereby perhaps causing her to lose many other advantageous offers, should not go free. His penalty should exist in the reprobation of the community. He should be shunned by other females, who ought to make common cause with every one of their sex thus abused. Yet I am ashamed to add, that the moral sense upon this subject is not generally acute, nor the distinctions between right and wrong clearly defined. If a man is discovered to be a coward, there is no end to his mortifications. Every common quarrel flings it in his teeth, and his rank in society is immediately lowered; but although he may have thus slighted a girl whose love he had gained by long and assiduous attentions, merely from feelings of avarice, he yet is regarded with respect, and no one has sufficient dignity of moral character to refuse his acquaintance. I hope these few words of mine, though imperfectly written, for I am not an author by profession, or, as Shakspeare says, "I am no orator as Brutus is," will not be thrown away upon the object who called them forth, should they ever meet his eye. Let him know that there is at least one who looks on his base conduct with abhorrence and detestation, and who firmly believes that as he has already perpetrated a cruel and a cowardly action from the love of riches, he would, when in want of money, be equally ready to commit the meanest offence in the criminal code, but that he is prevented by fear.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

IN a late number of the Tatler, a daily paper published in London, we find the annexed poem, with the accompanying commendatory notice. The extreme modesty of these lines is somewhat impaired by the fact that the correspondent of the Tatler stole them from Mr. Bryant, the author of Thanatopsis.—Eds. N. Y. Mir.

From the English Tatler.

Thanks to H. We have always observed that when this correspondent offers us anything worth acceptance, it is sure to be modestly put.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE DISINTERRED WARRIOR.

Gather him to his grave again,
And solemnly and softly lay,
Beneath the verdure of the plain,
The warrior's scattered bones away.
Pay the deep reverence taught of old,
The homage of man's heart to death;
Nor trifle even with the mould
Once quickened by the Almighty's breath.

The soul hath hallowed every part:
That remnant of a martial brow,
Those ribs that held a mighty heart,
That strong arm—Ah! 'tis strengthless now:
Spare them—each mouldering fragment spare
Of God's own image; let them rest
Till not a trace shall speak of where
The awful likeness was impressed.

For he was fresher from the hand
That formed of earth the human face,
And to the elements did stand
In nearer kindred than our race.
In many a flood to madness tost,
In many a storm has been his path,
He hid him not from heat or frost,
But met them, and defied their wrath.

Then were they kind—the forest here,
Rivers and stiller waters, paid
A tribute to the net and spear
Of the red ruler of the shade.
Fruits on the woodland branches lay,
Roots in the shaded mould below;
The stars looked forth to teach his way,
The still earth warned him of the foe.

A noble race! but they are gone,
With their old forests wide and deep,
And we have built our homes upon
Fields where their generation sleep.
Their fountains stoke our thirst at noon,
Upon their hills our harvest waves,
Our lovers woo beneath their moon,
Ah, let us spare at least their graves!

While on this subject we add another piece from the same pen, which has been much admired.

AUTUMN.

The melancholy days are come, the saddest of the year,
Of wailing winds, and naked woods, and meadows brown and sere—
Heap'd in the hollows of the grove, the summer leaves lie dead;
They rustle to the eddying wind, and to the rabbit's tread!
The robin and the wren are flown, and from the shrub the jay,
And from the wood-top calls the crow, through all the gloomy day.

Where are the flowers, the fair young flowers, that lately sprung and stood,
In brighter light and softer airs, a beauteous sisterhood?
Alas! they all are in their graves, the gentle race of flowers
Are lying in their lowly beds, with the fair and good of ours—
The rain is falling where they be, but the cold November rain
Calls not from out the gloomy earth the lovely ones again!

The wind-flower and the violet they perished long ago,
And the brier rose and the orchis died amid the summer's glow;
But on the hill the golden-rod, and the aster in the wood,
And the yellow sun-flower by the brook in autumn beauty stood,
Till fell the frost from the clear cold heaven, as falls the plague on men,
And the brightness of their smile was gone from upland, glade, and glen!

And now, when comes a calm, mild day, as still such days will come,
To call the squirrel and the bee from out their winter home,
When the sound of dropping nuts is heard, though all the trees are still,
And twinkle in the smoky light the waters of the rill,
The south wind searches for the flowers whose fragrance late he bore,
And sighs to find them in the wood and by the stream no more!

And then I think of one who in her youthful beauty died,
The fair, meek blossom, that grew up and faded by my side:
In the cold moist earth we laid her, when the forest cast the leaf,
And we wept that one so lovely should have a life so brief!
Yet not unmet it was, that one, like that young friend of ours,
So gentle and so beautiful should perish with the flowers!

ANECDOTES OF RUSSIA.

In Russia, literature may be said to be in its infancy; the censorship is so severe, that I scarcely can mention a single foreign work which is entitled to be admitted, with the exception of a bible or a dictionary. The newspapers undergo the most rigid examinations; and should any article on religion or government be therein, if the paper is allowed to be circulated, it will be crossed with red and black lines in about one thousand directions. The English who resided in Moscow some years ago subscribed for a weekly paper, which they calculated would cost less, and give as much news as they would require. Out of the fifty-two papers which arrived in Moscow for the year, only eight were allowed to be circulated; in the second year they received ten, and very wisely gave up the concern, as a losing one, on the commencement of the third. They would as soon admit an importation of carriages free of the tariff, as admit Clarke or Cox; and certainly his satanic majesty would have an equal chance with Ancelet, Rae Wilson, Jones, or Chantreau. A late traveller thought his work would be admitted in consequence of the flattering manner in which he spoke of Russia, its sovereign, the nobles, and the Neva water; but he is and was mistaken: there is one unlucky and very old anecdote of the Emperor Paul, and these few lines were sufficient to prohibit the circulation of the flattering work. In point of fact I do not know one work on Russia which is admitted. Even poor Green, who some years back wrote a modest and innocent work, entitled "Green's Journal from London to St. Petersburg," is not admissible, although, poor soul, he has most truly mentioned the palaces and the price of meat in the capital. I do not deny that it is possible, in spite of the censor and the police, sometimes to purchase "Travels in Russia." I bought Chantreau in the Gostinoy Dvor myself; but it was wisely and carefully concealed from public view, and was only exhibited when the exorbitant vender found I would not purchase any of the trash he offered. Sir Walter Scott's novels, although very generally read in Russia, are not allowed to be circulated; but, in Russia, bribes and smuggling are on a magnificent scale, and, consequently, with a little care and perseverance, prohibited books may be procured.
